Too Close to Hide

by Jennfarag29

Summary

Shane is hiding something that could end his career.

Ilya is the kind of person who doesn't stop until he finds it.

What starts as rivalry turns into fixation.

Because something about Shane doesn't make sense, his control, his scent, the way he reacts.

And Ilya doesn't like unsolved patterns.

He likes breaking them open.

Even if it breaks Shane with it.

Not instinct. Not luck. Not being an alpha.

Control.

So when he watches Shane play, he sees it immediately, something precise, something careful, something just out of reach.

Something hidden.

And Ilya has never been good at leaving things alone.

Shane - 15 years old

Shane Hollander dropped into the back corner seat of the human studies classroom, shoulder bumping into his teammates as they packed in around him. Practice had been cancelled for everyone and that alone was enough to put the entire room on edge.

The football and lacrosse teams had clustered together across the room, louder, broader, taking up space like they always did. The air felt heavier than usual, too many alphas in one place, restless with no outlet.

Shane slouched lower in his chair, forcing himself still. Not fidgeting took effort.

His fingers twitched once against his thigh before he caught it, pressing his palm flat instead. Under two layers of fabric, the scent patch sat just below his collarbone, slightly too warm against his skin. He could feel it, always like something artificial pressed too close to something real.

He didn't touch it. He never touched it in public. Most of the guys just thought he had quirks. The extra layers. The way he didn't shower with the others, when he changed faster than anyone else in the locker room. How he never lingered too close when the room got crowded.

They didn't question it. Not really. He produced on the ice. That was enough.

Shane shifted his attention instead, grounding himself the way he always did. Watching, cataloging. He knew every formation their opponents ran, every weakness, every opening. It gave him something to focus on that wasn't his own body.

He glanced sideways at Jaques, the new kid. Quiet, observant, slipping into the team easier than most transfers ever did.

"I think this is the Omega/Beta lesson," Jaques murmured, voice low, accent still thick. "We had it last year at my old school. When they started letting male omegas enroll... things got complicated."

Shane went still. Not visibly. Not enough for anyone else to notice. But inside, something tightened- sharp and immediate.

"Half the school went crazy," Jaques continued quietly. "They had to start requiring scent patches."

Shane's jaw set just slightly. Marcus snorted from across the row. "You think they'd let an omega in this school? Our parents pay for this place because of the sports programs. No way."

“I don’t think any omega would be safe,” Hayden added from beside Shane, casual, certain. “We’re mostly alphas. Strong betas at best.”

Shane didn’t respond.

He didn’t trust his voice to come out neutral.

The room shifted as the coaches walked in, the noise cutting off almost instantly.

“Gentlemen!” one of them called. “Settle down.”

Shane sat up just enough to not draw attention. Coach Mercer stepped forward, expression harder than usual. “In case you haven’t noticed,” he said, voice carrying easily across the room, “one of your classmates wasn’t here today. Dallas Kent will not be returning for his final year.”

A ripple moved through the room.

“It was brought to light that he took advantage of an omega over the summer.”

Silence fell heavier this time. Not confusion. Not really. Something sharper. Shane felt it immediately - like pressure in the air.

Too many alphas reacting at once. The air turned almost bitter-a metallic scent rising from some of his classmates.

“Enough,” the coach snapped before the murmuring could build. “We are taking this seriously. You are all at the peak of your development. This school feeds directly into the scouting circuits. Most of you are alphas, and even betas can take on more aggressive tendencies in environments like this.”

Shane focused on breathing evenly. In. Out. Don’t react.

“We need to make something very clear,” the coach continued. “Omegas are not objects. They are not opportunities. They are people, and they are protected under the law.”

Shane kept his gaze forward, but he could feel it- heat creeping under his skin, subtle but wrong. The patch was holding, but barely. The room was too full. Too charged.

Coach Mercer stepped in beside him.

“The school has a strict code of ethics,” he said, voice lower but sharper. “You are all nearing adulthood. Any suspicion of mistreatment of an omega will cause immediate expulsion. And I will personally ensure that every scout, every team, every league knows exactly why.”

No one spoke.

“An alpha who cannot control his base instincts,” Mercer added, “is not disciplined enough to play at a professional level.”

That landed.

Shane felt it in the shift around him- postures adjusting, tension redirecting.

“Now,” Mercer said, stepping back, “you’re going to watch this video. Pay attention. In the real world, you may encounter someone newly presenting. They may not understand how to manage scent. You may find yourselves in... difficult situations.”

A pause.

“That will never excuse a lack of control.” The lights dimmed slightly. Shane didn’t move. Didn’t breathe too deep. Didn’t reach for the patch. But under the fabric, his skin burned just a little hotter than it should have.

The screen flickered to life, the school crest appearing briefly before fading into a clean, sterile title card:

Understanding Secondary Gender Presentation: Alpha, Beta, Omega

The narrator’s voice was calm, generic. Neutral. The kind of voice that made everything sound simple, even things that weren’t.

“While most individuals are aware of their designation from a young age, some may present later in adolescence. This is known as delayed presentation and requires careful medical and social consideration.”

Shane’s fingers pressed harder into his palm.

On screen, a diagram of the human body appeared- simplified, color-coded. Sections highlighted and faded in sequence.

“Omegas possess adaptive reproductive biology,” the voice continued. “Regardless of external anatomy, all omegas have the potential for gestation. Fertility is closely tied to cyclical hormonal changes commonly referred to as ‘heat.’ Some male omegas only develop a vaginal canal during heats or upon late stage pregnancy. Other-highly fertile omegas have small, permanently present vaginal canals, though they instinctively are not comfortable with usual intercourse with partners who are not their mates.”

A few guys shifted in their seats. Someone muttered something under their breath, cut off quickly when a coach cleared his throat.

The diagram changed.

“This cycle results in increased pheromone production, heightened sensitivity to external stimuli, and a temporary shift in physiological priorities. During this time, omegas may experience reduced physical control and increased vulnerability.”

The word hung there longer than the others. Vulnerability. Shane kept his eyes on the screen, even as heat prickled faintly under his skin. The patch held, but the room felt too full, too close.

Another slide. This one is sharper. “Alphas may experience corresponding behavioral responses when exposed to elevated omega pheromones. These responses can include increased focus, territorial instincts, and decreased impulse regulation.”

A low, uncomfortable sound moved through the room. “However,” the narrator added, voice firming slightly, “these responses do not override personal responsibility.”

The slide shifted again- this time to a list.

Recognizing Signs of Distress or Presentation:

- Sudden changes in body temperature
- Irregular breathing patterns
- Difficulty maintaining coordination
- Noticeable shifts in scent output

Shane forced his breathing to stay even. Don’t react. Don’t think about it.

“In the event of a suspected presentation,” the video continued, “it is critical to maintain distance and notify a qualified authority. Direct engagement may escalate the situation.”

The next line appeared more slowly, as if meant to be read carefully.

Do not attempt to intervene physically.

A pause.

Then “Failure to respect these boundaries may result in serious legal consequences.”

The screen dimmed slightly before transitioning to a final segment, real footage this time. Blurred, anonymous. A hallway. A student being guided away by staff, head down, shoulders tense.

“Proper response ensures the safety of all individuals involved.”

The narrator’s tone softened again, almost reassuring.

“Understanding these biological differences is essential for maintaining a respectful and controlled environment.” The video faded out. The room stayed quiet a second longer than it should have.

Shane didn’t move. But under the layers of fabric, the patch felt like it was burning into his skin.

Another 45 minutes of the coaches talking to the gathered students. Shane counted down every second until they could leave.

When they were dismissed, Shane forced himself to copy the relaxed pace of his friends. They joked on the way to the lockers, Shane quiet but smiling when appropriate. Hiding that he needed his parents immediately. Hiding that he felt like dying inside.

He walked home with Hayden and a few other team members, then leaving the group as they passed side streets.

When he came up on his street, he felt that he could breathe a bit better. His mother would know what to do. She would have answers.

Shane -16 years old

Yuna Hollander waited for her son by the door. At 16 years old, Shane had been her miracle baby. She would do anything for him, hence the secret trip in the middle of the night to drive for 3 hours and get what he needed. They both put on hooded jackets, and had the prize money Shane had won from the shot out competition at his hockey camp.

“Momma?” Shane came down the steps with a small empty backpack and his sunglasses over his head.

“Come on baby. We can talk on the way.”

“I’m sorr-”

“No. Absolutely not. You have nothing to be sorry for, honey.” She gave him a tight hug, holding him until the shivering stopped.

They got into the car and Yuna turned the radio on low just to fill the silence. She looked over at Shane when they were at a red light, noticing his bouncing leg. “You don't have to do this.”

“The exhibition is next week. Scouts are going to be there so I have to make it through. I have to be perfect.”

“Honey-”

“No, mom. I’ve been working towards this my whole life. Omega’s used to play all the time.” They were silent after that. Over the past decade, Omegas had began seeing a shift in public perception-they were deemed weaker, lower than beta females in the social hierarchy.

“Shane, I’ve been reading about the side effects of the blockers. What happens when you're older and want kids? When you retire?”

“I’ll schedule my heats for the off season. Others have done it so I can too. Adam Commark was an Omega and he had a great career and won 2 cups.”

Shane pulled the seatbelt across his chest, the fabric dragging lightly over the patch beneath his shirt. Even through two layers, he could feel it, warm, artificial, like something pressing his body into a shape it didn’t naturally hold.

It had been easier when he was younger. Before his body started pushing back. Now it felt like a constant negotiation, his instincts pressing one way, the chemicals forcing him another.

Yuna frowned but nodded. David and she had tried to educate themselves as soon as Shane was born and they declared that he had a high possibility to be an Omega. A few behaviors growing up solidified their suspicions and so they were determined to protect him as much as possible but still have him follow his dreams.

“Momma, thank you. I know this can't be easy. I know I'm different-”

“You're perfect, understand? Your dad and I love you so much. So very much and we'll support you and help you no matter what.” He smiled at that a bit, and went to squeeze her hand.

After a few hours, Yuna switched to the hockey commentary station and they listened to that in the background until Shane's name came up.

They were comparing him to the Russian prospect that they had flown over. Ilya Rozanov seemed to be in every conversation that Shane was in. The journalists were always talking about the two of them, listing their stats, strengths and differences.

They'd finally meet soon at the Winter Prospect where they would play against each other. He had almost looked him up online, but the stress of his omega puberty coming in had occupied all the time he had that was not on the ice or school.

After that, school became more difficult. He was never one for big crowds when not at the rink. Alphas started coming closer to him, invading his personal space. His last day of school was when a new younger teacher cornered him in the hallway in between classes and tried to kiss him. He kneed the older man and ran to the office. His scent patches were no longer working for some reason and he was pulled from the school to continue classes online.

He finished high school a year early. Without the distractions of blending into the social hierarchy of being a very popular athlete that was getting international notice, lessons were a breeze. He had more time on the ice and he had an easier time socializing when it was with his team.

The sun was rising when they made it to New York. They stopped for breakfast before taking the twisting back roads to a small neighborhood in Brooklyn. They agreed that his mother would wait down the block in the parking lot of a pharmacy while he went into the shabby looking house. He licked his lips nervously. It was a facade-this wasn't exactly legal-birth rates were down all over the world in the past few years, and they were blaming omegas for taking heat restricting medications in order to do exactly what Shane was about to do.

Fights in several countries had begun to break out-especially in Russia and China where unmated omegas were being forced to bond with men and produce as many babies as possible. Whenever that type of news was on, his parents quickly changed the channel. He wasn't completely naive and while it was rare in Canada, he knew some Omegas had more appeal than most and they sometimes were tricked into mating with an Alpha.

His parents had warned him. Lots of blushing on both sides when they explained sex to him last year. They made sure he wore a bite guard around his neck when possible, he was never alone with men. If his Alpha teammates knew he was an Omega, they never said anything. It was more an overly affectionate family. The Alphas took him under their wings, protecting him on and off the ice and he loved them all like brothers.

When he almost confessed his designation, they collectively waived him off and said it didn't matter if he kept playing like he did and kept being his quirky self. Recently they made more of an effort to make sure they all communicated better through the group chat they had going on since some would be moving on to college and some were expected to be drafted.

He walked to the house and entered through the side door. He walked down the hall and knocked on apartment 4 and waited. An older woman answered-Omega by her scent. "Come in son."

He walked in, slipping off his shoes and taking off his glasses. "No problem finding the place?"

"No ma'am."

"Good. That's good. No come, I have everything here for you."

Shane walked over to the table where packets of pills and scent patches were laid out.

"We have to go over this one more time. These pills, once a day-every day. This will stop your heat from coming. You'll still get your monthlies but not as heavy and they might be more uncomfortable. When you want to have a heat-stop taking them and it'll happen within a day or two. I recommend going through at least one heat a year-it'll help when you decide to stop the suppressants.

The scent patches don't just mask, they neutralize the pheromones so make sure you take them off at night to give your scent glands some time to balance themselves. Make sure you're in a safe space. Try to get single hotel rooms when you're on the road.

When you are sexually active, be careful-when off heat, your body will still try to follow instincts. Be responsible with your partners. An alpha will be desperate for you-

"What do you mean desperate?"

"An omega like you, untouched and looking the way you do?" She tilted her head slightly, studying him in a way that made his skin feel too tight. "Even suppressed, your scent isn't gone. Just quieter. Softer. The kind that pulls instead of pushes."

Shane swallowed. "I thought the patches-

“They help,” she interrupted gently. “But a strong alpha? Close enough?”

She gave a small shrug.

“They’ll notice. Maybe not right away. But your body... it doesn’t forget what it is. And neither will theirs.”

His fingers curled slightly at his sides.

“You just need to be smarter than them.

Technically you can skip heats, but I would highly recommend against it. You have a full years supply here and that will get you by unless you miss a dose or forget a patch. Replace the patches every 24 hours.”

“Any more questions?”

Shane shook his head and opened the duffel bag, pulled out the twelve thousand dollars and laying them on the table, “You want to count it?”

She gave him a warm smile. “No, you have an honest face.”

He nodded and began putting the pills in and patches in his bag. She handed him the instructions written out in a booklet. “If you have any questions, please use this burner phone. The website changes all the time and this is a safe connection.”

He took the small flip phone and they said goodbye. Shane put up his hoodie and the sunglasses as he was leaving the building and walked for two minutes to the pharmacy. He sent her a text from his regular cell and waited in the car. A few minutes later, she came out with a small bag.

They made small talk during the drive home. They spoke about Shane’s stats, who to watch out for during the next conference. They stopped for lunch but he only let himself have a small salad with some grilled chicken.

“You know, maybe you should skip next week. Just while your body gets used to the medication?”

“No. Scouts will be there. I want to go.”

“You’ll need to learn how to be around the Russians. I heard its harder to-”

“I know mom. I have to act like them. Alex and Joey will have my back so I don’t get into the boards too much so I’m covered in that respect.”

“Have you really thought this through?”

“Mom-hockey is above everything. This is what I was meant to do. Or what-do you want me to just have some random man that thinks I smell good just come and take me away to pop out babies left and right?”

He was slightly horrified when his mom inhaled and turned her head slightly. “Mom, I’m sorry. It’s just-”

“I know, sweetheart. I just want you safe. If I could trade places with you over this omega thing I would in a heart beat.”

They held hands for a minute before Shane broke the ice and started talking again, asking for help on some homework that he had.

Dinner that night was quiet. David, Shane’s father had mentioned seeing a highlight of Russia’s junior team and that the captain was intense. Shane knew it was Rozanov without having to hear the name. He tuned out the rest of the conversation and focused on trying to eat more of his dinner. He had to hit another 200 calories before bedtime, but he was struggling. His mother had used cream-which normally he would completely refuse to eat but she had put forth the effort to make a comforting meal so he would try to eat it.

Once he managed to excuse himself to his bedroom, he pulled out his laptop to do some of his research paper but instead the urge to research Ilya Rozanov wouldn't be ignored. He felt his face warm as he looked at pictures of the Russian-a gorgeous but stern face. Dark blonde curls, beautiful lips. Shane was fascinated. The curiosity only increased when he watched him play.

Ilya Rozanov was an amazing athlete. He was surprisingly graceful for someone as large as he was. Shane had always had to use speed to avoid getting slammed into the boards, but Ilya seemed to go out of his way to fight. When he aimed for the net, it looked like he didn't have a strategy. Shane had the habit of analyzing all the shots, had memorized what the goalie usually tried to cover first and exploited the hole in the defense.

When he found some interviews, he watched them in a loop-not understanding anything he said since it was all in Russian. He found and translated articles, watched game reels...it was 4 in the morning when he finally forced himself to close the laptop screen. Shane felt a strange warmth in his stomach and he went to his bathroom to splash cold water on his face.

Rozanov was an amazing hockey player-probably as good as he was. His checks were brutal but all clean. He was quick to antagonize the opposing team but his talent was real. Shane was fascinated. There was something that hadn't allowed him to look away - it wasn't often that he was impressed by another player around his age.

He did his nightly routine and carefully laid out the medication in a straight and neat line. After washing his face and brushing his teeth, he got ready for bed, trying his best to ignore the two new features staring back from the reflection-a faint blush making his freckles stand out and the almost invisible scent patch right at the dip of his collar bone.

He put his glasses on to do some reading but couldn't focus. He ran over his mental list of what needed to be done for the next few days and over the defense line of his opposing teams. Russia was the 2nd match. America the first, but they had beaten the same team last week without a problem so he didn't worry.

He closed his eyes, willing his body to relax. He went through his mental list repeatedly until he felt himself start to drift off. He lay on his back, staring at the ceiling.

The room was quiet. Too quiet.

He shifted once under the covers, then stilled again immediately, forcing himself not to move a second time. The sheets felt wrong, too warm where they pressed against his legs, too tight across his chest. He exhaled slowly, deliberately, counting the seconds the way he always did.

One. Two. Three. His hand drifted up before he could stop it, hovering just above his collarbone.

The patch.

He didn't touch it.

He knew exactly where it was without needing to feel it- the slight pull of adhesive, the faint warmth underneath, the way his skin reacted differently there than anywhere else.

He dropped his hand back to the mattress. It was fine. Everything was working. It had to be. He turned his head slightly, eyes tracking the faint line of light under his door. Tomorrow he would take the first pill. One a day. Every day. Simple. He liked simple things. Simple meant predictable. Predictable meant control.

But the instructions hadn't been simple.

Not really.

Take the pill. Replace the patch every twenty-four hours. Remove it at night. Be in a safe place. Safe place. Shane swallowed. What counted as safe? His room was safe. The rink - usually safe. The locker room... less so. Hotels weren't safe. Buses definitely weren't safe. He squeezed his eyes shut briefly.

Too many variables.

His brain started organizing anyway, whether he wanted it to or not. Schedule.

Morning: pill. Same time every day. Patch: replace before practice. Not after, but before. Less risk. Night: remove patch only if door is locked. Always lock the door. Check twice. No-three times.

He exhaled again, slower this time. That was manageable. But then-

What if he forgot? The thought hit fast and sharp. Not dramatic. Just immediate. What if he missed a pill? What if he didn't notice? What if something changed and he didn't understand it in time?

His fingers curled slightly into the sheets. He didn't always notice things right away. Not like other people did.

Sometimes it took him longer to realize something was wrong -longer to connect what he was feeling to what it meant. That was fine most of the time. On the ice, it didn't matter. He could read plays, anticipate movement, calculate angles faster than anyone. But this-

This wasn't structured. There were no clear patterns. No playbook to memorize.

He rolled onto his side, pulling the blanket tighter around himself. The warmth settled around him, grounding. He tried to map it out again. If something feels off: check patch. If still off: check the timing of pill. If still off: isolate. Isolation was easy. He was good at that.

But what if it wasn't enough? The question sat heavier. What if he didn't realize something was wrong until someone else did? Until an alpha noticed. Until-

He stopped the thought there. Didn't finish it. Didn't let himself. His breathing had gone uneven again. Shane pressed his palm flat against his sternum, just below the patch, feeling the steady rhythm of his heartbeat. It was fine. Still steady. Still normal. He focused on that instead.

His mom's voice echoed faintly in his head. You're perfect, understand? He didn't feel perfect. He felt... complicated. Like too many systems running at once, and none of them communicating properly.

He turned onto his back again, staring at the ceiling. He could do this. He would do this. He just needed rules. Clear ones. Ones he could follow.

After a long moment, he reached over to his nightstand, grabbed a notebook, and clicked his pen open. If he wrote it down, it would be easier. Everything was easier when it was written down.

Daily Control:

- Pill – same time every morning
- Patch – replace every 24 hours (set alarm)
- Remove patch - only in locked room
- Check door (x3)

Warning Signs:

- Heat (body temperature)
- Restlessness
- Difficulty focusing
- Scent? (hard to tell -monitor reactions from others)

If something feels wrong:

1. Check patch
2. Check timing
3. Isolate immediately

He stared at the list for a long time. Adjusted one word. Then another. Neater. Clearer. Better. The tension in his chest eased- just slightly. Enough.

He set the notebook back down, turned off the light, and lay still again. This time, when he closed his eyes, the thoughts didn't spiral as quickly. They lined up. Organized. Contained.

Just before sleep finally pulled him under, one thought slipped through anyway. Uninvited. Unstructured.

What if control isn't enough?

And, just behind it- Ilya Rozanov's face. Sharp. Focused. Watching. Shane's fingers tightened once against the blanket. Then went still.

Chapter 2

Chapter Summary

Hi Ilya-people may dislike you at first because I plan on making you some crazy sh!t but they'll grow to love you, like I love you...

Chapter Notes

Y'all - thank you so much for the reviews and kudos! I had to get this out-its not beta read so some tweaks will be made but I hope you enjoy. Next chapter will be up in a couple days.

Ilya stood in the penalty box watching his team beat the Americans. It wasn't really a hard thing to do. Stupid Americans thinking that they were good at all sports—it was fun beating them. He loved the faces of anger on other alphas' faces when they realized that the win would be out of their reach.

After his three minutes were up, he skated right toward center ice and took possession of the puck with an ease that made him wish he had some real competition. The past few games were like this.

He was only here because this series led directly to the NHL. Scouts had been after him since juniors and had gone to his games back home in Russia. After he saw attention from the other countries, he started teaching himself English with his friend Svetlana. His English was getting pretty good if the conversation wasn't too deep and he could focus on one person at a time, but if he wanted to get out of Russia, he needed to be the best here.

Reporters were comparing him to a member of the Canadian team, Shane Hollander. That name kept popping up over the course of the past year or two. Ilya couldn't get a good read on the boy. He wasn't photographed much. His team were a bit protective of him and there were no pictures online without his helmet.

In a few days, Ilya would come head to head with him for the first time. He wanted to win. He wanted to face off against this Hollander and see if the hype was real. If the precision translated under pressure. If the calm held when someone pushed back. Most players broke eventually. They all did.

The whistle blew and play resumed. Ilya didn't rush. He never rushed. He let the puck move once, twice, watched the spacing open exactly where he expected it to. When it came back to him, he took it clean, cutting through center with controlled speed. Not flashy. Not wasted. Efficient.

The American defenseman stepped up too early. Mistake. Ilya shifted his weight just enough to throw him off balance, shoulder dipping, skates carving a sharp edge into the ice. The man tried to recover, reaching. Too slow. Always too slow.

Ilya slipped past him, closing the distance to the net. The goalie squared up, tense, already overthinking. Good. He didn't aim where the opening was. He aimed where it would be, then adjusted. The puck snapped into the net with a clean, decisive crack.

The crowd roared, but it barely registered. Ilya was already turning away, exhaling through his nose, pulse steadying just as quickly as it had risen. Routine.

Another hit came, late and unnecessary. He expected it. He always did. This time he didn't move out of the way. The impact drove into his shoulder, sharp and solid. He absorbed it, planted, then turned, eyes locking on the American immediately. Anger. Frustration. Predictable.

"Lucky," the man muttered.

Ilya tilted his head slightly, studying him. His English wasn't perfect, but it didn't need to be. "Not luck," he said evenly. "You are just not good."

That did it.

Gloves dropped.

The fight was fast. It always was. Ilya didn't swing wildly. Didn't waste energy. He stepped in close, controlling distance, landing two clean hits before the other player even found his footing. One to stagger. One to finish. The American hit the ice hard.

The whistle shrieked. Hands grabbed at Ilya, pulling him back, separating them. He didn't resist. Didn't need to. He'd already won.

Back in the penalty box, he rolled his shoulder once, testing the joint. Fine. Everything was fine.

Across the ice, the Americans were louder now, frustrated, sloppy, pushing harder than they should. They'd already lost. They just didn't know how to stop trying.

Ilya leaned back against the glass, gaze drifting lazily over the rink. This was the problem. No one here was enough.

They relied on size. On instinct. On being alphas. Weak.

He had built himself differently. Early mornings. Extra drills. Endless repetition until movement became something sharper than instinct, something controlled. Predictable.

Reliable.

That was the only thing you could trust.

The game ended exactly how it should have. Russia on top. Again.

After, the reporters swarmed like they always did. Flashes. Questions. Too many voices at once. Ilya filtered them automatically, focusing on one at a time, the way he'd taught himself.

"Rozanov! Your performance tonight-"

"We play well," he said.

"You've been compared to Canadian prospect Shane Hollander-"

There it was again. That name. Ilya's attention sharpened slightly, though his expression didn't change. "Is good player," he said. "We see soon."

He moved on before they could ask more. No reason to waste time.

Later, in the locker room, the noise pressed in, loud, humid, thick with overlapping scents and adrenaline. Teammates shouted, laughed, celebrated. Ilya ignored it. He always ignored it.

It wasn't that he didn't feel it. He did. The pull. The pressure. The sharp edge under his skin when too many alphas crowded too close. But he didn't let it decide anything for him.

That was the difference. By the time he stepped out into the hallway, the noise had faded behind him. Quieter here. Better. His coach was waiting. Of course he was.

"Tomorrow," Petrov said in Russian, handing him a tablet, "you leave for Canada."

"I know."

"Watch this."

Ilya took the tablet without question and pressed play. The footage loaded, grainy at first, then clearing. A game. Fast. Clean. He saw him immediately.

Shane Hollander.

Not because he stood out in the usual way. Not because he was louder, stronger, or more aggressive. Because he wasn't. He moved differently. Ilya leaned forward slightly. Hollander didn't force plays. He didn't chase. He didn't collide unless he had to. He calculated.

Every movement had purpose. Every shift in position created something. Ilya watched one sequence twice. Then again. There.

A gap opened, small, barely there. Hollander moved into it before it fully formed. Not instinct. Not reaction. Prediction. Ilya's eyes narrowed just slightly. Interesting.

"Again," Petrov said.

Ilya didn't argue. He replayed it, slower this time. And then he noticed something else. Subtle. Hollander avoided contact. Not fear. Not weakness. Intentional. Always just outside reach.

Ilya leaned back, gaze still fixed on the screen. Something about it didn't fit. Not wrong. Just incomplete.

Like there was something missing from the pattern. Or something hidden inside it. He couldn't name it yet. But he would. He always did.

"Canada," Petrov said. "You face him there."

Ilya handed the tablet back. "Good," he said. And this time he meant it. Because for the first time in a long time, he might actually have to try. And somewhere under that thought, quieter, harder to reach, something else settled in. Not excitement. Not curiosity. Recognition. Even if he didn't understand why yet.

The apartment was dark when he got home.

Not quiet. Never quiet.

The television murmured from the other room, low and constant, a voice talking about nothing that mattered. A bottle knocked lightly against glass somewhere, the sound sharp in the stillness.

Ilya slipped his shoes off without turning on the lights. He knew the layout by memory, could walk it in the dark without thinking. It was easier that way.

Less chance of being noticed.

He moved down the hallway, shoulders tight, gaze forward, not looking into the living room as he passed. He didn't need to see to know his father was there.

"You're late," came the voice anyway, rough, already irritated.

Practice had run long. Interviews after. Travel logistics. None of it mattered.

"You think you are too important now?" his father continued. "Big player. Big money. You forget who pays for this apartment?"

Ilya stopped. Just for a second. His jaw tightened, but his expression didn't change.

"I pay," he said evenly.

A pause.

The television clicked louder.

"Watch how you speak," his father snapped, but there was something thinner underneath it now. Not anger. Not fully. Something closer to dependence.

Ilya didn't answer. There was no point. There was never any point. He kept walking, closing his bedroom door behind him with quiet precision. The lock clicked.

Only then did his shoulders drop—barely. His room was small. Half clean, half a chaotic mess.. Everything in its place for his hockey equipment- that was lined neatly along the wall, skates polished, sticks taped and ready. No clutter. No distractions when it came to his hockey things. Everything else no one cared about.

Control. Always control. He sat on the edge of his bed for a moment, staring at nothing.

The silence pressed in differently here. Not heavy. Just empty. His phone buzzed once in his hand.

Svetlana.

He unlocked it immediately.

You alive? she had written.

He exhaled through his nose, something in his chest loosening just slightly.

Да. Won.

Of course you did. Any fights?

He looked down at his knuckles, already bruising slightly.

Да..

A pause.

Then:

You're going to get yourself killed one day.

He huffed quietly, the closest thing to a laugh.

Not today.

She sent a typing bubble. Stopped. Started again.

You leave tomorrow?

Yes.

Canada.

Another pause.

That Hollander boy will be there.

Ilya's gaze flicked briefly to the tablet still sitting on his desk.

I know.

Is he good?

Ilya leaned back slightly, considering.

Good. Different.

Typing bubble again.

Careful, Ilya.

He stared at that message a second longer than the others.

Why?

Because you only look twice at things that matter.

His jaw tightened faintly.

He didn't respond to that.

Instead, he set the phone down on the bed beside him and leaned forward, elbows on his knees, hands clasped loosely together. The apartment creaked faintly outside his door. The television still murmured. His father's presence pressed through the walls, even without words.

Ilya focused on his breathing.

Slow.

Controlled.

Predictable.

Just like everything else.

It had to be.

Because if it wasn't-

There was nothing holding anything together.

He reached for the tablet again without thinking and replayed the footage.

Hollander moved across the screen, precise, controlled, always just out of reach.

Ilya watched him longer this time. Not analyzing the play. Not the structure. Something else. Something harder to define. His eyes narrowed slightly. Interesting. For the first time in a long time, something had caught his attention and refused to let go.

He didn't like that. But he wasn't going to ignore it either. He never ignored patterns. Even the ones he didn't understand yet. Especially those. Tomorrow, he would see him in person. And then he would figure it out. Whatever it was.

Ilya woke up, looking around his room to what he might have missed while packing. American or Canadian teams would supply anything he needed but when he thought about personal items, there was not much other than his clothes. All his English lessons were digital or by video. The only things he really cared about was his mother's cross and an old photo album. He wore one, the other was already packed in his duffle bag.

He dressed carefully. It was freezing temperatures outside but he hated looking sloppy. With the layers and his good coat and toque on, he picked up his bag and went out to the hall.

His father's wife, Polina was already in the kitchen. She was a quiet thing, An Omega that had thought she could be happy after her first mate passed in an accident. His father had sucked the life out of the woman of course. She had tried to show kindness to the two orphaned boys at first, but Ilya couldn't tolerate the thought of having another woman try to mother him.

She looked up from the stove when she heard him by the door. Slowly she placed a covered bundle. "Blini's. I thought you might want something warm for your journey." she said quietly in Russian.

"Спасибо вам" He took it off the table and nodded his goodbye.

He left the apartment without seeing his father or brother. It was for the best. The next time he saw his father would be with offers from the NHL. He would not stay and play for Russia unless forced, and his father had enough friends to avoid that at least.

His coach was picking him up and together they had planned to go over strategy. His name was in front of many of the major decision makers for the leagues and there was no real doubt that he would be drafted. Realistically he wanted to be on a newer team-where he can have a say on who he played with and make a bigger impact. But he also would go for an established team who could afford him.

That way he could try to make as much money as possible for the first part of his career and then follow where his gut would take him.

He listened to the American podcasts that he could follow, frowning because his accent was still very strong and some of the words did not make sense. He would be playing on a team with his Russian friends, but he wanted to understand what was being said about them without a translator flattening the information.

He watched more film as the plane took off, his coach letting him focus on that while he scolded one of the goaltenders. He found himself watching Hollander play. There was definitely something different on the way he moved. When he took shots, it was almost snakelike.

He was good-very good. He had tried to find some interview or something that will show more of his face-Ilya was of the thought that you could tell a lot from someones eyes-but no luck. A grainy picture from a newspaper article was not clear and so he focused on the plays and tried to find the weaker points to exploit. There had to be something. There always was.

The plane landed smoothly, the shift in pressure barely noticeable. Ilya was already awake, already focused, already moving before most of the others had unbuckled their seatbelts.

Cold air hit him the moment he stepped outside, sharper than back home, cleaner. It bit through the layers just enough to be noticeable, just enough to wake him fully. Good.

The bus waiting for them was exactly what he expected. Black. Polished. Already running. Another small reminder that they wanted the team -but mostly him, comfortable. Wanted him to be impressed. Wanted him choosing them before the draft was even official. He didn't comment on it. He simply got in.

The arena came into view not long after. Large. Bright. Already alive with movement despite the early hour. Ilya didn't wait. The moment the bus stopped, he was out, bag slung over his shoulder, already moving toward the entrance. Inside, the air shifted immediately. Colder. Familiar. Ice. He paused just long enough to orient himself, then headed up instead of down. Not locker rooms. Not yet. He wanted to see.

The upper seats were mostly empty, scattered staff, a few early players warming up below. Perfect. Ilya moved silently along the row, choosing a spot high enough to see everything clearly. Then he stopped. There.

Shane Hollander.

He knew it immediately. Not by face. Not by jersey. By movement. Hollander cut across the ice in a clean line, edges sharp, body low, completely balanced. Not rushing. Never rushing.

Ilya leaned forward slightly, forearms resting against his knees. Watching. The puck moved toward him. Hollander adjusted before it reached him. Already where it needed to be. Again.

A defenseman stepped in. Closer this time. More aggressive.

Hollander slipped past him without contact. Not speed alone. Timing. Always timing.

Ilya's gaze sharpened. Find it. Where does it break?

He watched another sequence. Then another. Nothing. No hesitation. No wasted movement. No panic. Annoying.

Ilya leaned back slightly, jaw tightening just enough to be noticeable. There should be something. A flaw. A delay. A pattern that could be forced into a mistake.

But from up here- he couldn't see enough. The helmet stayed on. The distance was too far. The details he needed- micro-adjustments, reactions, and expressions were missing. Incomplete.

Ilya exhaled slowly through his nose, irritation settling low and steady. Not enough.

He stood abruptly, decision already made. If he couldn't see what he needed from here, he would find another way. The cold hit him again as he stepped outside, sharper this time after the warmth of the arena. He welcomed it. Grounding. He reached into his pocket, pulling out a cigarette and lighter.

Chapter 3: Chapter 3

First meeting with our two love birds! After this chapter we start deviating from cannon. I'm inserting a warning-my Ilya is a bit obsessed. I promise this will end with a HEA but they'll be going through it.

Chapter Notes

Very special thank you to my beta reader- LordRandalll for all the help to make this story make more sense.

The arena was loud, not just noise, but pressure and expectation were pressing in from every side.

Team Canada had already won their first match against Sweden earlier that day. The opposing team had pushed hard in the second period with tight neutral zone pressure and aggressive forechecking, forcing rushed exits and broken entries, but Shane had adjusted. He had slowed the pace, forced cleaner breakouts, and created controlled entries instead of forcing plays through traffic. It had been a good win. A necessary one.

After the game, Shane had managed to dodge spending too long in the locker room with his celebrating team when the Canadian coach asked him to come speak to some local reporters. He took the chance, knowing that if he had a brief ten-minute conversation, the showers would most likely be done when he came back so he would be able to shower in peace. The name Ilya Rozanov came up again.

A Québécois reporter asked in French whether he was nervous or looking forward to playing against his most direct competitor. Shane understood the intention enough to catch the angle they were trying to get. He smiled, answered smoothly, and redirected the conversation back to the team's performance, talking about zone entries, defensive structure, and how they had handled Sweden's pressure.

He wondered, briefly, if Rozanov was getting the same questions.

After fifteen minutes of answering, his mother stepped in and pulled him away from the reporters.

"Go, you've got this."

Shane nodded and slipped past her quickly.

The locker room was mostly empty when he entered. Steam still hung in the air, gear half-packed, the noise fading into something manageable.

Good.

He moved slower than usual, deliberately unhurried as he pulled out his change of clothes. He checked his phone. The timer showed that he had almost five more hours until he needed to change the scent patch and take the next round of his pills.

Still within control.

He showered fast, under five minutes, like he had trained himself to do. The farthest stall from the door, back to the wall, his movements efficient and controlled. No lingering. No unnecessary exposure. In and out. Safe.

At the locker mirrors, he went through his skincare routine, precise and practiced. The one omega-coded habit he allowed himself. No one had questioned it yet. He dressed in Team Canada's black and red sweats and shoved his damp hair under a beanie, fingers lingering just long enough to make sure everything felt right. Normal.

He made his way back out to the rink just as Russia took the ice against Germany.

Shane settled into his seat, posture relaxing while his focus sharpened. Rozanov stood out immediately. Not just size, but presence.

He was a powerful skater. Where Shane relied on speed, edge work, and angles, Rozanov drove straight through plays. Heavy strides, strong crossovers, no hesitation at the blue line. He pushed defenders back simply by entering the zone, forcing collapse and creating space without needing to search for it.

But it wasn't just brute force. Shane leaned forward slightly, observing how Rozanov adjusted mid-stride, subtle but precise. He read pressure quickly, not as structured as Shane's own game but effective in a way that forced reaction instead of anticipation. Dangerously effective.

A German defenseman stepped up too late. Rozanov did not go around him. He went through him. The hit echoed. Shane's fingers curled slightly against his sleeve. That would not work against him.

He tracked the next play. Rozanov carried the puck deeper, drawing two defenders before slipping a wide pass. It looked careless for a second, but it connected. Intentional. Shane's mind mapped it immediately.

Rozanov was a violent player, not because he thrived on violence, but because he had no qualms about entering in another player's space, dominating it. He had a way of forcing a reaction out of his opponents and not just through his chirping. He was able to put pressure on other players instead of anticipating it and turning it against them like Shane did.

Different. Not wrong. Opposite.

Rozanov ended up in the penalty box twice in the last period, once for a late hit and once for roughing after the whistle. He antagonized players as they passed him, building frustration in ways that had nothing to do with the puck. Shane found himself watching him even when the play moved elsewhere. That was unusual.

After the game, he leaned toward his mother and talked about strategy.

“If we force him wide early, he’ll push harder inside. We collapse late instead. Cut off his second move. He’ll create pressure anyway,” she said.

“Yeah.”

Later, needing space, he excused himself. Shane stepped outside into the cold air. The wind carried a scent with it. Leather. Something else. Familiar. He followed it without thinking.

Around the corner stood Ilya Rozanov, trying to light a cigarette.

Shane stopped. Watching. Listening to the clicks of the lighter. Then forced himself forward.

“Ilya Rozanov? Hi. I’m Shane Hollander. I just wanted to introduce myself. You’re an amazing player.”

Ilya

He had freckles. Dotted all along his cheekbones and nose. Ilya had the sudden urge to pull him close and count them.

The deep brown eyes waiting for a response grew wary and he realized that Hollander had been holding his hand out.

He put the cigarette back in his mouth and shook his hand briskly.

Hollander's hand was soft and smooth, aside from a tiny callous on the knuckle of his pinky. Ilya pulled away before he could drag the hand closer to examine the skin there.

For some reason couldn’t look away from him, while Hollander seemed like he was having trouble meeting his eyes back. “I don't think smoking is allowed here.”

Ilya almost smiled. He watched as the other player motioned as if holding a cigarette - the gesture was just so cute. Hollander rambled again for a few seconds before offering his hand to shake again.

Ilya tried to find a way to keep him there, but fell short. This whole interaction had left him feeling out of his depth. “You will not be so nice when we beat you.” He managed to call out before Hollander turned away, trying to return to familiar grounds. The smile he received back made him take even more notice of the pretty curve of Hollander’s full lips, and he wondered what he’d do if Ilya shoved him against the brick wall and nuzzled that small visible patch of skin on his neck.

“That’s not happening,” Shane said, smiling back before walking away.

Ilya watched him go, something unsettled in his chest. The scent lingered faintly.

Honeysuckle. Muted, not right. Probably nothing.

Still, he wanted more.

The next game came fast.

Canada versus Russia. This one mattered.

Shane stepped onto the ice, shoulders rolling once as the cold hit him. Across from him stood Ilya again, closer now, heavier in presence.

The puck dropped.

Shane moved first, clean and fast, but Ilya drove forward instead of contesting the pull, closing space immediately. The contact came sharp and controlled.

Too close. Ilya felt it again. Not the play. Him. Something faint, buried. He marked it.

The game stayed tight through the first period. Shane controlled pace, cutting off passing lanes, intercepting plays, setting up clean shots. Close.

Russia answered with pressure. Rozanov drove the play, pulling the defenders in.

Late in the first period, Shane had managed to adjust to his play and won a clean faceoff. Ilya grinned. Better than expected. The second period was faster. Rozanov hit him along the boards, hard but clean. Shane twisted to absorb it. Ilya did not pull away immediately.

He held him there just long enough, testing, feeling the tension, the controlled stillness. There it was again. The faint smell.

He leaned in slightly, close enough to feel the shift in Shane's breathing.

Then he met his eyes. And smiled. Small. Controlled. Then he skated away.

Shane adjusted after that, cutting angles tighter, avoiding contact.

Too careful. Ilya noticed. The third period opened with a tie. The puck dropped between them again. They moved at the same time. The sticks locked for too long. The puck slipped loose. Russia recovered it. Ilya drove forward, cutting through the neutral zone, forcing space open through pressure alone. Shane tracked back, read the play, and moved to intercept him. He was half a second late. Ilya adjusted. Shot. Goal. The arena exploded.

Ilya turned, just once, looking back at Shane before skating away.

The final buzzer came soon after. Russia won. By a single goal.

Shane stood still at center ice. Half a second. Not a complete failure. But not enough to win.

They lined up while the Russian national anthem played to bump fists with the Russian line. When they crossed paths, Ilya bent down slightly and whispered "See you at the draft."

In the locker room, the silence felt heavier. Too slow. Too careful. Too weak. The thoughts came sharp. Because you are an omega. He forced himself through his routine, stripping gear, breathing steady. No one said anything.

It did not matter. He knew. He had held back. And it had cost them. Not good enough. Next time, there would not be a second place.

There could not be.

The win felt settled before the final buzzer. Not guaranteed, but close enough that Ilya didn't need to chase it.

When the horn sounded, his teammates surged forward, loud and immediate. Sticks tapped the ice, bodies collided, voices rose in celebration. Ilya slowed instead, pulling off his helmet as he turned away from the net.

He looked back once. Hollander stood at center ice, still for a second longer than anyone else. Ilya held the image for a moment, then dropped it.

Not important now. The locker room was loud in a way he didn't need. They were celebrating. They had earned it. But Ilya had already moved on. He stripped out of his gear with practiced efficiency, ignoring the noise around him. His hands worked automatically, undoing straps, pulling off pads, wiping sweat from his neck.

"How did you make that goal?" one of his teammates said.

Ilya shrugged. "Was open." That was enough for them.

The media waited outside. They always did. Lights flashed the second he stepped into view, voices overlapping in English that came too fast when they talked over each other. He picked one. Always one.

"Mr. Rozanov, can you talk about that final play?"

"Defense was late," he said. "I take space." Simple. Done.

Another voice cut in. "You've been compared a lot to Shane Hollander. Thoughts on that matchup?"

Ilya didn't look at the reporter this time.

"Good player," he said. "But we still win." He stepped away before they could follow up.

No reason to stay.

The team went out that night. They always did after a win. The club was crowded, loud enough that conversation didn't matter. Music filled the space, heavy and constant, making everything feel slower than it actually was.

Men and women came to him, they always did. It didn't take long to spot one for the night.

She approached without hesitation, confident in the way people were when they already knew how the night would end. Brown hair. Brown eyes. He noticed that first. Then the rest. Pretty. Easy. He let her talk, nodding when necessary, answering just enough to keep her there. She leaned in closer, hand brushing his arm, testing space the same way he did on the ice. Predictable. He let it happen.

Later, back at the hotel, it was the same as always. No lingering. He didn't stay awake after. Didn't ask questions. Didn't care about answers. When she left, the room felt quieter than it should have. Ilya sat on the edge of the bed for a second, rubbing a hand over the back of his neck. Something about it hadn't landed the way it usually did.

He knew why. He just didn't like it.

His phone buzzed. Unknown number. He answered.

“Rozanov, this is Carter Jameson from the Boston Bears. We'd like to invite you to come see the facilities while you're in North America. Meet the staff, talk through options.”

Ilya leaned back slightly, gaze drifting toward the window.

Boston.

That was one of the teams that could afford him.

“We will see,” he said. Not a yes. Not a no.

Enough to keep them interested. Another call came in before he even set the phone down. Different team. He ignored it. Instead, he opened his messages.

Svetlana.

I: You awake?

S: Always.

S: You win?

I: Да.

S: And?

I: I need something. Information.

S: On who?

I: Hollander. Shane Hollander.

S: You're serious?

I: Yes.

S: What kind of information?

I: Everything.

S: I might know someone. Private. Not cheap.

I: Do it.

S: You don't even know what you're looking for.

Ilya looked down at his hand, flexing his fingers once. He thought about the boards. The contact. The moment that didn't match the rest.

I: I will know when I see it.

S: You're getting obsessive.

He locked the phone without responding. The room was quiet again. Too quiet. Ilya stood, moving to the window. The city lights stretched out below, unfamiliar but not uncomfortable. Temporary. Everything here was temporary.

Except -

He stopped that thought before it finished.

Hollander's movement was replayed once, clean and precise. Too precise. There was something missing. Ilya exhaled slowly, pressing his hand briefly against the glass. He would figure it out. Next time, he wouldn't waste it watching from a distance. He would get close.

And this time he wouldn't let him slip away.

Chapter 4: Chapter 4

Chapter Summary

After this we're straying from cannon. Please remember that this will be HEA-but I like crazy obsessive men so Ilya will be...intense starting on chapter 6.

Chapter 5 is done, will probably post it tomorrow or the day after if you all like this chapter.

The lights were brighter than they needed to be.

Shane stood still anyway, shoulders squared, posture easy in a way that took effort to maintain. Cameras flashed in quick bursts while voices overlapped, reporters calling out questions that blurred together until they became noise more than anything else. First and second. That was the headline. It should have felt like a win, something worth holding onto, but it didn't settle that way in his chest.

"Shane, one more here."

He turned automatically, the smile already in place before he faced them. Polished. Practiced. The good Canadian poster boy they wanted him to be. It came easily enough after years of repetition, even when it didn't feel real.

"Can we get both of you together?"

He stepped closer before he could think about it. Ilya was already at the center of the photos, another Alpha—the third overall pick—positioned confidently at his other side. Shane slipped into place beside them, close enough that he could feel him without actually touching him. It wasn't scent, not in a room this crowded. It was something else entirely. Presence. Heavy and steady in a way that made him more aware of his own breathing.

"Top two picks. How does it feel going one and two?"

Shane didn't look at him.

"It's an incredible opportunity," he said smoothly. "There's a lot of talent in this class. I'm just excited to get started."

It was safe. Polite. Exactly what they wanted to hear.

Ilya spoke next, his voice lower, accented but clear. "We will see on ice."

A few reporters laughed, pleased with the answer. Shane didn't. He glanced over despite himself, and immediately regretted it. Ilya was already watching him, not the cameras, not the crowd. Just him.

Shane held the smile a second longer than necessary before forcing himself to look away.

“Perfect, thank you.”

The moment broke as quickly as it had formed. Shane stepped back immediately, the air feeling easier to breathe with even a small amount of distance between them.

“Are you okay?” Yuna asked quietly, already guiding him away. “Good. Come on.”

The reception was louder, less controlled. Executives, scouts, and coaches moved through the room like it belonged to them, conversations overlapping in low, practiced tones. Deals were being shaped behind polite smiles, expectations set without ever being said outright.

“We’re very excited about Montreal,” Yuna said smoothly as she introduced him again.

Hands were shaken. Names exchanged. Shane responded easily, falling into the language he knew best. Systems, pace, transition. Hockey made sense. The structure of it, the predictability, the way everything could be broken down and rebuilt—that was where he was comfortable.

But his attention drifted anyway.

Across the room.

Ilya stood with his father, posture unchanged at first glance, but there was tension there if you knew where to look. It sat in his shoulders, in the stillness that felt too controlled to be relaxed.

“You stand like you’ve already done something,” his father said in Russian, voice low but sharp. “This is only the beginning.”

Ilya didn’t react.

“You get lazy,” the man continued. “You enjoy too much. That is when you lose everything.”

“He earned this,” another voice cut in, calm but firm.

His coach.

“If you’ve watched him play, you’d know lazy is not a word that applies.”

There was a pause, the tension shifting just slightly before his father turned away. Ilya didn’t move. His gaze lifted instead, scanning the room until it landed on Shane.

Shane looked away first.

He couldn't sleep.

The hotel room was too quiet, too still, and his thoughts refused to settle into anything manageable. After twenty minutes of lying there, staring at the ceiling and tracking his breathing, he gave up. There was no point forcing it.

Routine.

That had always helped.

He got out of bed and checked the time before reaching for his bag. The scent patch needed to be replaced anyway. He peeled it off carefully and pressed a new one into place with practiced precision, fingers lingering just long enough to make sure it held. The pills came next, swallowed without hesitation.

He couldn't change where he had been drafted.

But this—this was something he could control.

The gym would be empty at this hour. That was the point.

He pulled his hoodie up and kept his head down as he moved through the lobby. A few members of the press lingered, but no one stopped him. No one looked too closely.

Good.

The gym was dim and quiet when he stepped inside. No music. No voices. Just the low hum of the machines waiting to be used.

Exactly what he needed.

Shane moved straight to the bikes, setting the resistance high before starting immediately. The rhythm came quickly, steady and controlled, his breathing falling into something predictable as his legs pushed harder with each rotation.

For a few minutes, it worked.

Until the door opened.

“Couldn't sleep?”

Shane didn't stop. He pulled one earbud out and glanced over.

“Something like that.”

Ilya stepped inside like he belonged there, like the space had already been his before Shane got there.

“You train late.”

Of course he chose the bike next to him. Of course he did.

They didn't speak at first. The rhythm of their movement filled the space instead, the low hum of the machines blending with the sound of controlled breathing. Then Ilya pushed, gradually increasing the pace, adjusting the resistance until it demanded more.

Shane matched him instinctively.

They hit the same speed and held it there.

Shane's breathing shifted first, faster and tighter as the effort built. Sweat rolled down the back of his neck, and with it—

That scent.

Faint-Honeysuckle.

Ilya slowed just enough to notice. Not lotion, not this time.

Shane broke first, stepping off the bike and moving toward the mirrors to stretch. Ilya followed without hesitation, settling across from him like the distance meant nothing.

“What a fucking day, huh?” Shane muttered.

“Yes. Congratulations.”

“Mm. Thanks.”

They talked for a few minutes, nothing important. Just enough to fill the silence. But Ilya watched him the entire time, noting every shift in expression, every glance that didn't quite land where it should.

Shane's eyes drifted more than once, dropping to his lips, his throat, then away again.

Ilya noticed.

He extended his water bottle toward him.

Shane waved it off. “I've got-”

“Drink.”

The word cut cleanly through the space. Low, direct. Shane didn't think. He took it immediately and drank, maintaining eye contact as if that made it normal.

Ilya watched carefully, letting a few seconds pass before speaking again.

“More.”

Same tone. Shane obeyed again, slower this time. Then he stopped and looked at him. Confusion flickered first, then realization. Too late- Shane stood abruptly.

“I’m done.” He left before Ilya could respond.

The hallway felt wrong the second he stepped into it. Too bright, too long, too exposed. His skin burned in a way that didn’t make sense, heat spreading too fast for him to control.

No.

This couldn’t- He fumbled with the keycard, barely managing to get the door open before slipping inside and locking it behind him.

His breathing broke.

The heat hit harder now, settling deeper into his body in a way that made his stomach twist sharply. “No.” He grabbed the old flip phone, hands unsteady as he dialed.

“Shane?”

“Something’s wrong,” he said. “It’s too hot.”

“Are you alone?”

“Yes.”

There was a long pause from the other end. “Go to the bathroom. Turn the shower on cold. Fill the tub. Get in.”

He did it without thinking, moving on instinct more than anything else.

“I took everything,” he said. “The patch, the pills—”

“When did it start?”

“What happened?”

“...Rozanov.”

A pause. “Was there skin to skin contact?”

Shane hesitated. “Our hands touched.” Silence stretched just long enough to feel worse.

“That should not have been enough.”

“I know.”

“Stay in the water.”

The call ended. Shane sat in the tub, letting the cold bite into his skin. It helped, but not enough. The heat didn’t fully fade. It lingered, wrong and persistent.

Time blurred after that.

Cold water. Try to breathe. Repeat.

When the water warmed, he drained it and refilled it again. And again.

His phone buzzed later.

“Add a second suppressant,” the doctor said. “I’ll send more. Enough for the year.”

Good. Having a plan meant control. He stayed in the tub all night. Because leaving wasn’t safe.

Ilya didn’t follow.

He could have. The hallway had been empty, and it would have been easy to close the distance before Shane made it far. Under normal circumstances, he wouldn’t have hesitated. He liked the chase when it was mutual, when the tension stayed balanced and sharp instead of uneven.

But the look on Shane’s face before he left had stopped him.

That hadn’t been part of any game.

It hadn’t been irritation, or embarrassment, or even anger. It had been something else entirely—something sharper, more immediate. Panic. Real and unguarded in a way that didn’t fit with everything else Shane had shown him.

So Ilya stayed.

After a few minutes, he pushed himself up from the bench and walked back into the gym, the quiet settling around him again as if nothing had happened. He sat for a moment without moving, forearms resting on his thighs, replaying the interaction in his head with the same precision he used to break down plays.

The scent, the response. It was too fast. It didn’t line up to the usual Beta behavior .

The thought came back again, more persistent this time. Omega.

He dismissed it just as quickly. That didn’t make sense. The leagues tested too often, too thoroughly. There were too many checks, too many safeguards in place for something like that to go unnoticed, especially at Shane’s level. Someone would have caught it by now.

And yet-

Something still didn't fit.

He had seen betas who leaned submissive before. It wasn't common, but it wasn't unheard of either, especially in certain dynamics. Some of them didn't even realize it themselves. That could explain the response. It should have explained it.

But it didn't explain everything.

Not the scent, not the discipline. Not the way Shane had reacted when things tipped just slightly out of his grasp.

Ilya leaned back, exhaling slowly through his nose, irritation settling low in his chest. He didn't like loose ends. He didn't like patterns he couldn't immediately solve.

His phone vibrated in his bag, the sound cutting cleanly through the quiet.

He reached for it without looking away from the empty stretch of floor in front of him, pulling it out and glancing at the screen. Unknown number.

He answered.

"Yes."

"Mr. Rozanov," the voice said, accented and careful. "I found something."

Ilya didn't interrupt. He just listened.

"Shane Hollander's parents opened a bank account for him a few years ago. All his hockey income goes there, starting from his early teens. Last year, he withdrew twelve thousand U.S. dollars in cash. A car was rented. They were seen in New York, going to a private residence."

Ilya's gaze shifted slightly, unfocused now as he processed the information.

"I don't know what happened there," the man continued, "but the person living at that address moves every few months."

That alone would have been enough to raise questions.

"Even more," the voice added, "the same league doctors administer all of Mr. Hollander's bloodwork. The schedules always align. Only those two."

That was worse. More deliberate. More controlled.

"Curious, is it not?"

Ilya leaned forward slightly, his grip tightening around the phone just enough to register.

"Say someone wanted to hide designation," he said slowly. "Make omega look like beta."

There was a pause on the other end.

“That kind of thing exists,” the man said carefully. “But it is usually cheaper than that. And most stop when they hear about the side effects. They don’t last long.”

Unless it was something new.

Ilya didn’t respond immediately. He let the silence sit for a second longer, letting the pieces settle into place.

“I understand,” he said finally.

He ended the call without another word.

For a moment, he stayed where he was, phone still in his hand, the quiet of the room pressing in again. Then he set it aside and leaned forward, elbows resting on his knees, his focus sharpening in a way that had nothing to do with hockey.

The scent. The reaction. The tight rein Hollander seemed to have with every interaction. The money. The doctors.

Individually, the facts didn’t prove anything.

Together- they formed something much harder to ignore.

But something in his expression shifted. Not confusion, not uncertainty.

Something closer to recognition.

Whatever Shane Hollander was hiding, it wasn’t small.

And now that he had started pulling at it - he wasn’t going to stop.

Six months later, the noise of the after game interviews didn’t bother him.

It never really had.

But here, in this setting, it became something else entirely- fuel. Cameras flashing, voices calling out his name, the constant pull of attention that followed him from the ice to the hallway and into the press room like it belonged there.

Ilya stepped into it without hesitation.

He didn’t slow down. Didn’t adjust. The room adjusted to him.

“Rozanov! Over here-”

“Question about that last goal-”

“Ilya, how do you-”

He picked one voice out of the crowd and moved toward it, just enough to give the illusion of choice. “What did you see on that play?” the reporter asked, already leaning forward.

Ilya shrugged slightly, expression loose, almost bored.

“They slow,” he said. “Defense was open too much.”

A few people laughed. He tensed, trying to see if his English words were mistaken and they were laughing at him or if they were laughing with him.

Another voice cut in quickly. “You’ve been dominating this season. Do you think there’s anyone in the league right now who can actually match you?”

Ilya tilted his head, considering the question like it deserved more thought than it did.

“Maybe,” he said.

A pause.

Then, with the faintest shift in his expression- “I have not seen enough yet. Only one other player comes close.”

That got a reaction.

Laughter again, louder this time. A few murmured comments between reporters as they scribbled something down, already shaping it into a headline.

Confidence. Arrogance. They ate it up.

“Is there anyone you’re specifically looking forward to playing against?”

Another easy question. Another expected answer.

Ilya leaned back slightly in his chair, one arm draped over the back like he had nowhere else to be, like this wasn’t something scheduled and structured and controlled by people who thought they were in charge.

“Depends,” he said. “If they are good, is fun.”

“And if they’re not?”

A flicker of something sharper crossed his face.

“Then is waste of time.”

More laughter.

Someone near the back called out, “You’re not worried about making enemies in the league?”

Ilya’s mouth curved slightly.

“No,” he said simply.

He didn’t need to explain it. The answer stood on its own.

They kept going, they always did until a coach pulled him away.

Questions about strategy. About the upcoming stretch of games. About rivalries that had been mostly started by the press- narratives that needed something to sell.

Ilya gave them just enough.

Short answers and reactions. A few deliberate remarks that pushed just far enough to keep them interested without crossing a line that would get him pulled aside later.

He knew exactly where that line was. He just liked walking along it. A reporter leaned forward, smiling a little too easily.

“You’ve become something of a fan favorite already. How are you adjusting to that kind of attention?”

Ilya glanced at her, taking in the details automatically. Confident. Comfortable. Used to this.

“Is fine,” he said. “They like good hockey.”

She smiled wider. “And they like you.”

He didn’t answer right away. Let the silence stretch just enough.

Then-

“Maybe,” he said.

The room laughed again. When the reporters had enough, it didn’t actually end. People lingered. They always did.

A few reporters approached him directly, questions shifting from professional to personal in a way that wasn’t subtle. Someone from a local station asked about his adjustment to the city. Another asked about his training habits, leaning in just a little too close while she spoke.

He didn’t pull away. Didn’t lean in either. Just stayed exactly where he was, letting them come to him. That was the pattern. They came to him.

By the time he stepped out into the hallway, the noise followed again, quieter now but still present. A couple of younger players from another team passed by, glancing at him quickly before looking away just as fast. Recognition. Respect. Something else mixed in.

He didn’t care enough to name it. Someone called his name again, not a reporter this time.

A woman leaned against the wall near the exit, arms crossed loosely, watching him with open interest. She smiled when he looked over, pushing herself off the wall and stepping closer.

“You’re even worse in person,” she said.

“Worse?”

“More cocky than you should be.”

Ilya shrugged. “Is problem?”

She laughed. “No. Not really.”

It would have been easy- it always was.

The conversation fell into place without effort, her tone light, her interest obvious. She stepped closer without hesitation, testing space in a way that felt familiar.

Ilya responded the way he always did. Not too much interest shown. He made it clear that this is just sex. But something about it felt off.

Not wrong. Just not enough to hold his attention the way it used to. He let the conversation taper off sooner than expected, offering a half-smile and a vague excuse about needing to get back. She didn’t push. They rarely did.

When he stepped outside, the air felt colder than it had inside, sharper in a way that cut through the leftover noise in his head. Better.

He stood there for a moment, hands loose at his sides, gaze unfocused as his mind drifted somewhere else entirely.

Six months. Six months since the gym. He could still see it clearly - the hesitation, the reaction. The moment something didn’t line up.

Ilya exhaled slowly, shifting his weight slightly as a car passed in the distance. He was tired off it all already. Less than a year into his professional career and the excitement was not enough at times. The money was great. Men and women throwing themselves at him was nice but his mind constantly drifted off to the boy with freckles and secrets that he

On the ice, he was sharper than ever. Faster, stronger. His team was looking to him more and more for leadership. He loved his life while playing.

Off the ice, his attention had narrowed.

Not to the crowd. Not to the noise. Not even to the people who kept trying to get close.

To one thing. One man. One problem he hadn't solved yet.

Shane Hollander.

Ilya's mouth curved slightly, but not quite a smile. Because when something didn't make sense, he would not force the answer.

You waited. Watched. And when the moment came- you pushed. Hard enough to see what broke.

Six months later, Shane had learned how to belong. At least, that's what it looked like from the outside.

He showed up early, stayed late, and did everything that was expected of him without needing to be told twice. He learned the systems quickly, adapted to the pace, and earned his place in the lineup in a way that made coaches trust him and teammates respect him. On the ice, things were simple. Structured. Predictable. He could read the play before it happened, move where he needed to be, and execute without hesitation.

Off the ice was different. That part required more effort.

The locker room had stopped feeling like foreign territory after the first few weeks. The noise didn't hit him as hard anymore, and he had learned how to navigate conversations without overthinking every response. He laughed when he was supposed to, contributed just enough to stay included, and deflected anything that got too personal with practiced ease.

It was manageable. As long as he did what he could to hide his secret.

"Hey, Hollander, you coming out tonight or what?"

Shane glanced up from where he was re-taping his stick, forcing a small smile as he looked over. A few of the guys were already half-dressed, talking over each other about whatever bar they had decided on.

"Maybe," he said, keeping it light. "Depends how dead I feel after practice."

"Come on, you say that every time."

"Because it's true every time."

A few laughs, easy and expected. It worked. He didn't go. He rarely did. It wasn't that he didn't want to.

There were moments, sitting there listening to them talk, where he could almost see what it would be like to just say yes. To go out, relax, let himself exist without calculating every movement, every reaction, every possible risk.

But the more people there were, the harder it became to control everything. And control was the only thing keeping him safe.

Hayden didn't push. That was part of why Shane gravitated toward him early on. He was easy to be around, in a way that didn't demand anything Shane couldn't give. Their conversations stayed simple most of the time—hockey, travel, dumb observations about other teams- and when things got quieter, Hayden didn't seem to mind that either.

JJ was different. Louder. More direct. But not in a way that felt invasive. He filled the silence instead of forcing Shane to. That helped. The three of them fell into something that looked like routine.

Eating together after practice. Sitting near each other on the bus. Talking just enough to pass the time without turning it into something Shane had to manage too closely.

It was... comfortable. Or at least close enough.

The rest of the team, Shane considered friends. That was what they were. But there was a line he didn't let himself cross. Because every extra hour spent around them meant more chances for something to slip. A scent that didn't fade fast enough. A reaction he couldn't hide quickly enough. A moment where he didn't think before responding.

It didn't take much. So he kept it balanced. Close enough to belong. Distant enough to stay safe. Practice was the easiest part of his day. It always had been.

The ice didn't ask questions. It didn't care about anything except execution. Shane pushed harder than he needed to. That had become normal.

He stayed late after drills, running the same sequences over and over until they felt perfect again, even if they had already been good enough the first time. His edges were sharper now, his reactions faster, his control tighter than it had been at the start of the season.

Coaches noticed. They praised it. "You're reading everything early," one of them told him after practice, watching him reset for another rep. "Keep doing that." Shane nodded. He didn't explain that it wasn't intentional anymore. Nothing could catch him off guard.

At least, that was the idea. It didn't always work. There were moments, small and quick, where his focus slipped just enough for something else to push in. A scent lingering too long when someone brushed past him in the locker room. The shift in his own breathing when a teammate got too close without warning. The constant, underlying awareness of his body in a way that never fully shut off anymore.

It had gotten worse after the draft. Worse after the gym.

He didn't think about that night unless he had to. But his body remembered. The pills helped, he let himself go through one heat in the past six months and that had been brutal. The increased dosage kept everything contained, most of the time. But it came with its own problems.

He was more tired now. Not in a way that showed easily, but it sat behind everything, slowing him down just enough that he had to push harder to keep up the same level of performance. His sleep was inconsistent, his appetite off, his focus sharper in some moments and worse in others.

He adjusted- he always adjusted. No one noticed, that was the goal.

“Hey, you good?”

Shane blinked, realizing he had been standing still longer than he should have.

Hayden was looking at him, brow slightly furrowed.

“Yeah,” Shane said quickly. “Just thinking about that last drill.”

“You’ve been thinking about it for like two minutes.”

“Yeah, well,” Shane shrugged lightly, “it wasn’t great.”

Hayden snorted.

“If that wasn’t great, I’m screwed.”

Shane smiled faintly, but it didn’t quite reach his eyes.

“I just want it clean.”

“It was clean.”

Hayden shook his head but didn’t argue. That was another reason Shane liked him - he didn’t dig.

JJ dropped down onto the bench beside them a second later, still half in his gear.

“You’re both overthinking it,” he said, nudging Shane’s shoulder lightly. “Coach is already obsessed with you. Relax.”

Shane stiffened for a fraction of a second at the contact.

Then forced himself to relax.

“Yeah, that’s the plan,” he said.

JJ laughed.

“Worst liar I’ve ever met.”

Shane huffed out a quiet breath, shaking his head. But the comment stuck. Relax. He didn’t remember what that felt like. Later, when the locker room had mostly cleared out, Shane stayed behind like he usually did. Not long enough to be obvious, just enough to avoid the rush.

He moved through his routine quickly, keeping everything efficient, controlled. He timed it carefully, listening to the noise in the hallway, tracking when people left, when it quieted down enough that he could finish without worrying about someone walking back in unexpectedly.

It worked. It always did. Until it wouldn't.

Someone laughed in the hallway, closer than he expected. Shane froze for half a second, listening.

He exhaled slowly as the footsteps faded, forcing his body to settle again. Too close. He finished faster after that.

Back in his apartment later that night, the quiet felt heavier than usual. Shane sat on the edge of his bed, staring at nothing for a few seconds before reaching up to press at the edge of his scent patch again. Still in place. Still working. He didn't trust it. Not completely.

His phone buzzed.

A message from Hayden.

You alive or did JJ kill you with his terrible jokes?

Shane stared at it for a second, then typed back.

Barely survived.

A second later:

You coming tomorrow early?

Yeah.

Good. I need someone to make me look better.

Shane huffed out a quiet breath, something in his chest loosening just slightly.

That's easy.

It was simple.

But even as he set the phone down, the weight settled back in. Because it didn't change anything. The more he built here-The more he settled into this team, these routines, these people, the more there was to lose. And the harder it would be if anyone ever found out.

The press room in Montreal was quieter than most.

Not silent, but contained. The kind of space where conversations didn't overlap so much as take turns, where reporters waited instead of shouting over each other. The lighting was softer, less aggressive, and the questions—at least on the surface—felt more structured.

Shane preferred it.

It gave him time to think.

Too much time, sometimes.

He adjusted slightly in his seat, offering a small, easy smile as he turned toward the voice.

“How are you settling in with the team so far?”

“Really well,” he said, nodding once. “The guys have been great. It's been a pretty smooth transition.”

It sounded right.

It was right.

Mostly.

“Est-ce que tu te sens à l'aise avec le système jusqu'à présent?” another reporter asked from the side.

Shane shifted his attention without hesitation.

“Oui, ça va bien,” he answered, his accent soft but clear. “Le système est rapide, mais j'aime ça. Ça correspond bien à mon style de jeu.”

The reporter nodded, satisfied, jotting something down quickly.

Shane kept the small smile in place.

It was easier in French sometimes. The distance helped.

“Do you feel any pressure coming in as a top draft pick?” someone asked next.

There it was.

Expected.

Shane leaned back slightly, keeping his tone light.

“I think there’s always pressure at this level,” he said. “But for me, it’s more about focusing on getting better every day and contributing where I can.”

He could hear it as he said it. Clean. Polished. Empty.

He resisted the urge to wince.

“Tu joues avec beaucoup de calme sur la glace. Est-ce que c’est quelque chose que tu travailles consciemment?” another voice asked.

Shane nodded again, shifting easily.

“Un peu, oui,” he said. “Mais je pense que c’est aussi naturel. J’essaie de lire le jeu et rester patient.”

Patient. That was one way to describe it. Internally, he felt anything but. A reporter near the front leaned forward slightly.

“You’ve been praised for your consistency early in the season. Is that something you take pride in?”

Shane paused just long enough to make it look thoughtful.

“Yeah,” he said. “I think consistency is important. It’s something I try to bring every game.”

Another good answer. Another safe one.

It made his skin itch.

“Comment trouves-tu la ville de Montréal jusqu’à maintenant?”

That one was easier.

“J’aime beaucoup,” he said, a little more genuine this time. “C’est une belle ville. Les partisans sont passionnés.”

That part was true. The energy in the arena, the way the crowd reacted—it was something he could hold onto without overthinking it.

“Have any of the veteran players taken you under their wing?”

Shane smiled faintly.

“Yeah, a few of them have been really helpful,” he said. “Just with the little things—adjusting to the schedule, the pace. It’s been good.”

Names flickered through his mind.

He didn’t say them. Safer that way.

“Tu passes beaucoup de temps avec certains coéquipiers en particulier?” another reporter asked, tone casual.

Shane felt something tighten slightly in his chest.

Careful.

“On est tous assez proches,” he said, keeping his voice even. “Mais oui, je parle souvent avec Hayden et JJ.”

That was safe enough. True. Contained. The reporter nodded, satisfied.

Shane kept his posture relaxed, even as his thoughts sharpened behind the calm expression. Too specific was risky. Too vague was suspicious, he needed to be balanced.

Always balance.

“Last one,” someone said. “What are your goals for the rest of the season?”

Shane exhaled quietly through his nose before answering.

“Just to keep improving,” he said. “Do what I can to help the team win.”

It sounded like something he had said a hundred times before. Because he had. And every time, it felt a little less like something he believed. The media coordinator stepped forward, signaling the end of the session.

“Thanks, everyone.”

Shane stood, offering one last polite smile before stepping away from the table. The room cleared slowly, quieter than it had been when he walked in.

He exhaled once he reached the hallway. It had gone well. No mistakes, no slips. Nothing out of place. Exactly how it was supposed to be.

And still- His shoulders felt tight. His skin too warm under the layers. His thoughts already replaying every answer, every word choice, every shift in tone. Did that sound natural? Too rehearsed? Too vague?

He reached up, fingers brushing briefly against the edge of his collar where the scent patch sat hidden beneath. Still in place. Still working. Good.

He dropped his hand quickly, glancing down the hallway out of habit more than fear.

No one was looking. He started walking again, pace steady. Friendly, approachable. Future captain of Canada's best team.

From the outside he looked exactly like he was supposed to.

Inside he was getting tired of hearing himself talk.

We're getting to the heavy stuff my people. Dropping this one here before going to work and getting ready to crash out over the Met Gala on Threads tonight.

Chapter Notes

Last beta'd chapter because of life. I'd LOVE LOVE LOVE an ARC reader to pull me back from the ledge though. My sister usually prereads my outlines and she's too pregnant right now to read about the crazy stuff Ilya is about to do.

Cold air settled against Shane's skin the moment he stepped through the doors, the familiar bite of it filling his lungs with every breath as the ice stretched out clean and bright under standard arena lights. There was no dramatic staging to it, no artificial glow, just the steady hum of overhead fixtures and the faint echo of skates somewhere in the distance. It smelled like sharpened steel, rubber, and freshly cut ice, grounded and predictable in a way Shane understood without needing to think about it.

The production equipment was what broke that illusion.

Cameras lined the boards at calculated angles, lighting rigs were adjusted in careful increments, and a cluster of crew members moved with quiet efficiency across the ice. It was still a normal rink, but now it had been layered with something else, something controlled and deliberate.

"You made it Hollander."

Shane turned at the sound of his name and immediately found Rozanov already watching him, already skating toward him with that same effortless glide that made everything he did look intentional.

"Of course." Shane replied, still trying to make sense of it.

"So when they tell you you do commercial?" Ilya said, the corner of his mouth lifting slightly.

Shane narrowed his eyes. "A couple days ago? My mom called me and said they'd fly me out.. Why? When did they tell you?"

“They tell me nothing-it was my idea.” Ilya said simply.

Before Shane could respond, the director called them into position, and the moment shifted.

The first shots were simple in theory and exacting in practice. They were placed at center ice and adjusted repeatedly, shoulders turned, posture corrected, spacing refined down to inches as if in a face off at the start of a game.

“Closer together.”

Shane hesitated for half a second before stepping in. Ilya did not hesitate at all, closing the space easily until their shoulders brushed, the contact light but constant. Shane focused on the camera. Ilya focused on him.

“You look like you are about to fight someone,” Ilya said quietly.

“I might,” Shane muttered.

“Good,” Ilya replied, watching the way the tension sat in his shoulders. “They will like that.”

Shane let out a small breath, the edge of a smile slipping through before he could stop it, and the shift was immediate. His posture loosened, his expression softened, and the camera clicked rapidly as the director caught it.

That was the first moment it changed.

It did not stop there.

Every reset gave them time to talk, and the conversations came easier than they should have. Ilya pushed in small ways, comments that were just off enough to draw a reaction, questions that felt casual but were not.

“You skate too clean,” Ilya said at one point.

“That’s not a thing.”

“It is. You make it look easy. It is annoying.”

Shane snorted quietly. “You’re such an asshole. You’re the one they built this around.”

“Yes,” Ilya said without hesitation. “But you are still boring.”

Shane laughed, and this time it was real.

Ilya watched that too.

They were moved to the bench while the crew adjusted the camera rig. Shane sat first, resting his stick loosely between his hands. Ilya followed, sitting close enough that their knees brushed when Shane shifted.

Shane stilled for a second before forcing himself to relax.

“You are nervous,” Ilya said.

“I’m not.”

“You are.”

Shane glanced at him. “You always like this?”

“Not always.”

“Just with me?”

Ilya turned his head, holding his gaze. “Yes.”

Shane looked away almost immediately.

That became a pattern.

He could not seem to hold eye contact for long, his gaze slipping away after a second, dropping to his hands or the ice. Ilya noticed every time, and he started pushing it, holding his gaze longer, leaning in slightly when Shane tried to create space, making it harder and harder for him to avoid it without being obvious.

Later, a makeup artist stepped in briefly, brushing under Shane’s eyes and along his cheekbones before sending him back out.

Ilya looked at him again, slower this time.

“You look pretty like this,” he said.

Shane blinked, thrown off. “You’re wearing makeup too.”

“It is different.”

“How?”

“I do not need it.”

Shane rolled his eyes, but there was no real bite behind it.

Ilya liked that.

When the shoot shifted to motion capture, Ilya was pulled onto the ice alone, sensors attached to his gear while cameras tracked every movement. Shane stood off to the side, watching despite himself.

“Three new sponsorship offers,” his mother said beside him, scrolling through something on her tablet. “We will go over them tonight.”

“Okay,” Shane said, not looking away.

Ilya accelerated into a tight turn, the spray of ice catching the light as he shifted direction with precision that translated even through the artificial setup.

“You are not listening, Reebok is sending clothes and sneakers to your house by courier.” she said.

“I am listening,” Shane replied automatically.

“You are not.”

He did not argue because he wasn't.

After a few more hours, the commercial shoot ended early since the director couldn't film the two of them together any longer since they both started laughing after a few seconds of screen time.

Shane took advantage that Ilya had been pulled to do what looked like an interview with someone and went to the lockers for a quick shower to wash off the feeling of the makeup.

The shower was where everything broke.

Shane stepped under the water, letting it run over him as steam gathered and softened the room, trying to ground himself in routine. It worked for a few seconds.

Then the door opened and he felt the air shift immediately. The shift in the air, the presence behind him, the awareness settling under his skin before he even turned.

When he did look, it was already too late.

Shane stood under the shower, eyes closed but they snapped open when he heard another showerhead turn on. He was naked, of course, water cascading over the formidable landscape of his body - over the thick cords of his shoulders, the sculpted planes of his chest and abdomen, running in rivulets through the dark blonde hair that arched down past his navel. The bruise on his ribs was a vivid splash of purple and blue against his damp skin.

Shane meant to turn away, to give them both privacy, to get out of the shower as quickly as possible. But his body refused the command. He was rooted, his gaze traveling over Ilya with a helpless, hungry fascination he could no longer deny. He'd seen naked men countless times - it came with being an athlete for most of his life but he had never paid another person any attention while in the locker rooms or showers. It felt illicit. Primal.

The sheer physicality of the man was staggering. Power radiated from him even while standing still. Water sluiced over the heavy curve of his biceps, the defined quadriceps, the- Shane's breath hitched. His gaze, inevitably, treacherously, dipped lower.

Ilya's cock hung thick and heavy between his legs, already half swollen from the heat of Hollanders quick glances. As Shane stared, paralyzed by the mix of awe and acute embarrassment, he saw it twitch. A distinct, uncontrollable jump against Rozanov's hand.

Mortification burned through Shane, hotter than the water and steam surrounding them. He jerked his eyes up.

Too late. Rozanov's eyebrow lifted. Those glacier blue eyes were firmly fixed directly on him. He'd seen it all—the unabashed appraisal, the guilty linger, the telling reaction. A slow, knowing smile curved Ilya's lips, far more potent than any he'd given the camera. He didn't say a word.

Still holding Shane's captive gaze, Ilya's own hand drifted down his body, bypassing soap, ignoring everything but its target. His fingers wrapped around his growing length with a familiarity that made Shane's mouth go dry. He began to stroke himself, a slow, indolent pump, his fist gliding easily through the wetness provided by the shower.

He wasn't hiding. He wasn't turning away. He was fully facing Shane, presenting the explicit spectacle of his own self-pleasure as a challenge, a provocation. The rise and fall of his muscular forearm was hypnotic. Water droplets clung to the back of his hand, to the straining veins on the shaft he was working. His expression was one of arrogant inquiry, a raised eyebrow asking a silent, deafening question: Well? What are you going to do about it?

“Fuck off.” Shane said angrily, trying to control himself.

Shane stood frozen under his own punishing spray, the water suddenly feeling lukewarm, irrelevant. The soap was forgotten in his hand. Every nerve ending was attuned to the visual feast before him, to the shameless, rhythmic motion of Ilya's fist. His own body responded traitorously, blood rushing south, his earlier limpness vanishing as he hardened under the relentless, watchful eye of this Alpha.

Shane quickly turned. He had to get himself under control and leave the room immediately. This was too risky. No one had seen him naked in years and if the steam let up a bit more, Rozanov would see the physical proof of what he was.

He failed.

The awareness sharpened with every second, something slipping beneath his control in ways he could not stop.

Ilya stepped closer. Shane moved to leave. Ilya caught his arm. “Don't,” Shane said, panic breaking through.

Ilya didn't stop.

His attention had already shifted, narrowing as he watched the water move across Shane's neck, catching briefly against something almost invisible. The patch.

He reached up slowly. “Don't, please.” Shane said again.

Ilya ignored him. He peeled it away. The scent flooded the room instantly. Honeysuckle. Fresh rain. Cinnamon. The Omega scent bloomed into the room, overcoming Ilya. Soft and warm and completely wrong for the space, filling the steam-heavy air in a way that made it impossible to ignore. Ilya stilled, his grip tightening slightly as the realization settled into place.

Not a theory anymore. Something real. “You hid this,” he said quietly.

“Rozanov, please.”

That word changed something. Not softened it. Sharpened it. He let Shane go a second later, but the shift had already happened.

Shane ran.

By the time he reached the locker room, his hands were shaking too badly to work properly as he dug through his bag for another patch.

“Hollander.”

He froze.

Ilya stood behind him, a towel low around his waist, completely unbothered.

“Just forget it,” Shane said quickly. “You didn’t see anything.”

“You lie.”

“I’m not.”

“You are.”

Shane’s composure cracked. “If anyone finds out-”

“They will not.”

“You don’t know that.”

“I do.”

Then, in a calm tone filled with authority- “Give me your room number.”

“So we talk.”

Shane hesitated, then answered “1410.”

“I will come later. Be ready for me.”

And Shane knew this was not over.

It wasn't.

The knock came sooner than he expected. Shane opened the door nervously.

Ilya stepped inside, and the tension returned immediately.

"You try to fix it," Ilya said.

"It's not what you think."

"You are liar."

"I'm not-"

"Then explain."

"I can't."

"Because you do not trust me?"

"This isn't about trust."

"Then what?"

"I don't have a choice." That was the first real answer.

And Ilya understood enough. Then he moved. Slowly. Deliberately. He circled Shane the same way he had on the ice, each step subtle enough to seem casual while guiding him backward until the wall pressed against his back.

"Roz-" Ilya didn't stop, making Shane not know what to say. He closed the distance completely.

The scent, even suppressed again, hit harder this close, mixing with his own in a way that made Shane's head feel light, his focus slipping. He tried to look away. Ilya didn't let him. His hand came up, gripping Shane's chin, firm and unyielding, forcing his gaze back.

"Look at me," he said quietly. Shane's eyes flickered, trying to hold it and failing. Ilya tightened his grip slightly.

"Look at me." This time, Shane did. His eyes gave everything away. Ilya watched all of it and enjoyed it.

"You feel that," he said.

"Yes," Shane admitted, his voice unsteady. That was enough. Ilya's hand slid from his chin to his throat, his grip firm and grounding. Shane's breath hitched. The kiss was softer than it should have been.

Controlled. Measured. Almost gentle against the firm hold at his throat, the contrast sending a sharp, disorienting reaction through Shane's body as the scent wrapped around him, making it harder to think, harder to focus.

He should have pulled away.

He didn't. He couldn't

Ilya felt that immediately, the lack of resistance, the way Shane leaned into it without meaning to. When he pulled back, it was only enough to look at him. Shane's eyes were unfocused again, his pupils fully blown out. Too open, too easy to read.

Ilya tilted his chin up again when his gaze dropped.

"Don't look away," he said.

Shane swallowed. This time, he obeyed. And that was worse. Because now he was choosing to stay. Even if he didn't understand why. The silence after the kiss did not break easily.

It stretched between them, heavy and charged, the kind of silence that was not empty but filled with everything neither of them was saying. Shane stayed where he was, his back still pressed to the wall, his breathing uneven in a way he could not quite hide no matter how hard he tried to steady it.

Ilya did not step away.

If anything, he stayed closer.

Close enough that Shane could still feel the warmth of him, the faint trace of his scent mixed with his own in a way that made it harder to separate where one ended and the other began. Shane's focus slipped again, not as sharply as before, but enough that it made him tense.

He tried to look away.

Ilya caught his chin again.

Not rough, but firm enough to stop the motion before it could complete, guiding his face back up with quiet certainty.

"I told you not to do that," Ilya said.

Shane swallowed, his throat moving under the pressure of Ilya's hand. "I'm trying," he said softly, though it sounded more like an admission than a defense. "Rozanov, please. I don't want a mate. I don't-we can't do this. We shouldn't."

The knowing looking in Ilya's blue eyes was a tangible thing, warming Shane down to his very bones. He didn't step back. Instead, the hand that had been cradling Shane's neck slid down, over the rapid flutter of his pulse, to settle heavily on his shoulder. Ilya rumbled something, probably in Russian, the single syllable vibrating through Shane's bones. Then, his voice dropping into a register of pure, unquestionable command: "Kneel."

It wasn't shouted. It was worse -it was perfectly calm, perfectly expectant, leaving no possibility in the universe except compliance. At the same time, a wave of scent rolled off him, thick and deliberate. That clean, leather scent deepened, mellowing into something richer, heavier - like aged cedar and amber resin, heated by a hearth.

It was an Alpha's purposeful pheromone release, designed not to intimidate, but to soothe, to subdue instinctual fear and replace it with a profound, bone-deep acquiescence. It washed over Shane, seeping into his lungs, his bloodstream, untangling the last knots of anxious hesitation in his muscles.

Shane's body obeyed before his mind could fully process the order. His knees buckled, finding the worn hotel carpet beneath them. He went down gracefully, almost bonelessly, the plush fibers pressing into his shins. He looked up, the position placing Rozanov in a new, monumental perspective—towering, broad-shouldered, silhouetted against the dark sky. The fog of the kiss still clouded his thoughts, but beneath it, a new, sharper awareness was crystallizing. His heart hammered, but it was laced now with a strange, warm lethargy from the scent saturating the air.

From above, Ilya watched the descent, a slight, predatory tilt to his head. Pleasure, dark and satisfied, glinted in his eyes. The speed of the obedience, the utter lack of resistance, pleased him immensely. It spoke of a trust, or perhaps a recognition of natural order, that went beyond thought.

"Very good," Ilya repeated, his voice like velvet-covered stone. His hands went to the fastenings of his trousers—simple, functional buttons on sturdy fabric. He worked them open with efficient, unhurried motions, each click of a button loud in the silent hotel room.

Shane watched, transfixed, his mouth gone dry again. As the fabric parted, he caught a glimpse of darker boxers beneath. His own hands twisted nervously in his lap. Sensing the direction, driven by a desperate desire to please, to participate, he lurched forward slightly, his fingers fumbling for Ilya's waistband.

They trembled, clumsy with nerves and rushing adrenaline, snagging on the material. A low chuckle escaped Ilya.

"Eager," Ilya observed, not unkindly, but with immense amusement. He gently batted Shane's inept hands away. "Allow me." With a final shrug, the trousers and briefs were pushed down over his hips just enough. His cock sprang free, already fully erect, thick and ruddy against the tanned skin of his abdomen. It was an imposing sight, veined and heavy, the reality of it making Shane's breath catch audibly. This was no longer theory or stolen glance; this was dominant, physical fact.

Ilya took himself in hand, his own grasp sure and familiar. He gave a few slow, languid strokes, his eyes fixed on Shane's upturned face, watching the kaleidoscope of emotions—awe, fear, apprehension, undeniable fascination—play across his features.

“Open,” Ilya commanded softly, the pheromones in the air thickening, coaxing, making the command feel like a natural next step, an inevitable progression from the kiss. Shane’s lips, still tender and swollen from before, parted on a shaky inhale. Ilya guided himself forward, not aiming for entry, not yet. Instead, he dragged the broad, slick head over Shane’s lips, painting them with the evidence of his arousal. The sensation was startlingly intimate - hot, silken, salty. Shane flinched minutely at the first touch, then stilled, his eyes huge, lashes fluttering. Ilya rubbed the tip back and forth, tracing the cupid’s bow of his upper lip, sliding along the fuller lower one, a blatant, sensual claim. “Relax your jaw,” Ilya instructed, his thumb coming up to press lightly on Shane’s chin. The pheromonal blanket wrapped tighter around them, muffling panic, amplifying submission. “And when I push, you yield. Understand?”

Shane managed a weak nod, the movement causing the head of Ilya’s cock to bump against his teeth. Then, with no further ceremony, Ilya applied pressure. The blunt crown nudged past Shane’s lips, meeting the resistant barrier of his clenched teeth for a second before, with a soft, surrendering sigh from Shane, they parted. Ilya pushed inside. The stretch was immediate, unfamiliar, overwhelming. Shane gagged reflexively, his body tensing, a choked sound escaping his stuffed mouth.

Tears sprung to the corners of his eyes.

What he lacked in technique, he drowned in raw enthusiasm after a few seconds it seemed. Once the paralyzing surprise passed, a determined fire lit within him. He wanted this. He wanted to please the Alpha whose taste and scent and command were rewiring his very soul. He tried to relax his jaw further, letting it sink deeper, and tentatively, experimentally, his tongue stirred. It swiped along the underside of the shaft filling his mouth. The movement was clumsy, unpracticed, but it was effort. It was an offering. A guttural groan vibrated from his chest, a sound of pure, gratified pleasure.

Suddenly he was yanked up. “I’m sorry.” He said out of breath. “Was that bad?”

“No. Too good. I don’t want to finish like that yet.”

Ilya’s fingers were clenched tight in Shane’s hair, bending down he initiated another searing kiss. The coiled tension in his gut was a white-hot spring, winding tighter, tighter- with a ragged, bitten off curse, Ilya bent, one powerful arm hooking under Shane’s knees, the other banding around his back. With a grunt of effortless force, he stood, lifting Shane clear off the floor as if he were weightless. Shane cried out in surprise, his arms instinctively flying around Ilya’s neck for purchase. Ilya adjusted his grip, hoisting him higher, encouraging Shane’s legs to wrap around his narrow waist.

Shane collapsed on top of Ilya, on the bed and he blinked up, disoriented, his mind foggy with submission and unmet need. Had he done something wrong? Ilya loomed over him, chest heaving, his expression a stark mask of strained restraint. “Too fast,” he gritted out, the words husky with unfinished business. “You’re too damn good. I won’t finish like this. Stand and take off your clothes. I want to see you.” Before Shane could process the command, Ilya moved, taking off his own clothes while motioning for Shane to stand before him and undress.

His eyes were blazing. Swallowing hard, his fingers trembling anew, Shane reached for the hem of his own shirt. He peeled it off slowly, nervously. He folded it, a nervous, automatic habit, and placed it neatly on a nearby couch. His belt buckle clinked loudly in the silence as he undid it, then the button and zip of his trousers. He pushed them down his legs, stepping out of them, and bent to pick them up, smoothing the creases before laying them atop his sweater. His socks were last, each one rolled off and tucked together.

Throughout this hesitant striptease, Ilya watched Shane’s modest pile of neatly folded clothes, a slow, genuine smile spread across Ilya’s face. It wasn’t the predatory smirk from before; this was different. Softer at the edges, touched with real delight.

The fastidiousness, the inherent orderliness in the midst of such chaos—it was so quintessentially Shane. An Omega trait, some might dismiss. To Ilya, in this charged moment, it was an unspeakably erotic display of innate character. It showed a mind that sought comfort in routine, even as his body was being introduced to pandemonium. It was a vulnerability offered in a unique language. Finally bare, Shane straightened, crossing his arms self-consciously over his slender waist. The cool air of the chamber raised goosebumps on his skin. He was all lean lines and pale expanse, his own arousal evident but seeming shy compared to Ilya’s bold declaration. Ilya leaned up and stared unabashedly at Shane, watching the way his eyes flickered, the way every reaction passed through them before Shane could mask it. It made him easier to read than anyone else he had met, and that alone made something settle deeper in his chest.

He liked knowing. He liked seeing it happen in real time.

Shane took the hint and went to lay on the bed, stiffly laying and staring at the ceiling with fidgeting fingers.

“So what do we do now?”

Ilya moved to rest his head and shoulders a bit elevated against the headboard, maneuvering Shane to lay between his legs. With very little encouragement, Shane adjusted himself and bent down, taking the Russian man back into his mouth. He tried to remember the few tips he had remembered reading but his jaw was quickly tiring.

Shane tried to slow down this time, but it was hard to focus. The scent of the Alpha was making him feel drugged in a way and he wanted to do things that logically, in the back of his mind he knew he should put a stop to all this but he couldn’t, didn’t really want to stop.

He felt himself swell with what must have been pride as Rozanov grunted and groaned—muttering Russian words and gripping the back of his hair tightly. After a few more moments, Shane was yanked off suddenly and he stared transfixed as Rozanov finished himself off.

He laid there for a minute, in the bigger man’s arms and just stared at the mess. His mouth watered but he didn’t know what to do now, what would the appropriate socially acceptable next steps.

Ilya was very proud of his self control. If he'd let himself finish in Hollanders mouth like he really wanted to, the man would be completely vulnerable to him and he would feel guilty for a while. He centered himself and turned. His gaze, always assessing, swept over Shane's tense form. He saw the shell-shocked eyes, the white-knuckled grip on the bedsheets, the slight tremble of his legs. He rolled over closer, not with the prowling intent from before, but with a calm, almost clinical purpose.

"This was fun. I'm going." Ilya said, moving as if to leave the bed.

Shane scoffed. "You've got to be kidding me."

"What-do you need something?" Ilya asked with a raised eyebrow. Shane hadn't looked at him yet-focusing on the ceiling again with the cutest frown on his face.

"I wouldn't do that to you. Let me show you how to do this, kid," Ilya said, his voice a low rumble. Before Shane could parse the meaning his thoughts began to spiral- Was he criticizing his technique?

Ilya moved to hover over Shane. Ilya's large hands settled on his bare thighs, pushing them apart with an insistence that brooked no resistance.

Exposed like that, Shane froze. Ilya's eyes catalogued him openly: his half-hard cock, and below it, the softer, hidden slit, glistening with a nervous moisture of its own. Shane's entire body went rigid, a wave of protective shame tightening his stomach as Ilya's gaze lingered there. He couldn't help it. It was too new, too vulnerable.

Ilya noted the tension. He didn't comment. He didn't push. With a focus that was somehow both detached and deeply intimate, he simply lowered his head and took Shane's cock into his mouth.

The shock was absolute. White-hot and blinding. It was nothing like giving. This was having, being taken, being consumed. Ilya's mouth was furnace-hot, impossibly skilled, his tongue swirling a devastating pattern that mapped every nerve ending Shane possessed. The contrast between Ilya's rugged, dominant presence and this act of sublime submission was catastrophic to Shane's senses. He lasted mere seconds. A broken cry tore from his throat as his back arched violently off the bed. Release slammed into him like a freight train, a convulsive, mind-obliterating surge that left him seeing stars behind his eyelids. He pulsed into the welcoming heat of Ilya's mouth, over and over, until he was spent, collapsing back onto the mattress like a puppet with cut strings, gasping for air.

Ilya pulled away, swallowing smoothly. He rose to his feet, looking down at the wreckage he'd created. Shane lay boneless, shimmering with sweat, eyes glazed and unfocused. For a long minute, Ilya just watched him breathe. He fetched a glass of water from the bedside, placed it within reach. "Drink that when you can." he said, his tone permitting no argument. Satisfied Shane was cognizant - overwhelmed, but present, Ilya retrieved his clothes. He got dressed while Shane slowly came down from his high, forgoing the black tank and just putting on the worn in leather jacket. He walked back to the bed, leaned down, and captured Shane's slack, pleasantly stunned mouth in a final, possessive kiss.

It was brief, but deep, a brand of ownership. He straightened up, his silhouette framed by the bland hotel room door. "Put yourself to bed," he ordered, his voice leaving no room for negotiation. A final, sweeping glance. "We'll see each other in a few weeks. For the game."

And then he was gone. The door clicked shut with a definitive sound, sealing Shane in a room saturated with pheromones, exhaustion, and the haunting, expert ghost of a mouth that had unraveled him completely. The promise of weeks apart yawned like a chasm, but it was filled now with the indelible memory of heat, and skill, and a lesson that had shattered him. He eventually moved, curling onto his side, and slept dreamlessly in the nest of his own scent and Ilya's fading one.

This was a tough one because what started at an almost 10k word chapter got cut down by nearly half since my sister thought Ilya was too much. "He should be institutionalized if you keep him like this."

I saved the cut paragraphs to rework them later on though because I like the crazy lol. Next chapter is being worked on already so I hope to have it posted tomorrow.

Thank you so much for the comments-its extremely heartwarming.

Six days. It had been six whole days and Ilya was going insane. The first thing Ilya noticed was that almost nothing had seemingly changed. The ice stretched clean and unbroken beneath the arena lights, the lines sharp and familiar, the boards marked in the same places they always were. The air carried that steady, biting cold that filled his lungs and settled into his chest in a way that usually grounded him. He went to practice, worked out, went to team meetings. It should have been enough to anchor him.

"Again."

The command cut across the rink, sharp and clear. Ilya pushed off immediately, his stride powerful and efficient, blades carving deep into the ice as he took the pass without looking down. The puck settled on his stick as if it belonged there, his movements precise and automatic. He adjusted his angle, shifted his weight, and released. The shot snapped into the net with a clean, echoing crack that carried across the arena.

He knew the second it left his stick that it had been too much. The placement was perfect, but the force behind it was unnecessary, a level of aggression that did not belong in a simple drill. A few of the players nearby glanced at him, the reaction subtle but noticeable.

"Dial it back," someone muttered, not quite quiet enough.

Ilya circled once, slow and controlled, his breathing steady even as something restless moved beneath the surface. He did not respond, but the tension did not settle either.

The first few days had been manageable, which was what made it difficult to track. A laugh from across the ice caught his attention before he could stop himself, the sound wrong in a way he could not immediately place. He looked toward it automatically and then looked away just as quickly when he realized it was not who he thought it was. The reaction left a faint irritation behind, something that lingered longer than it should have.

It happened again in the locker room later. A scent brushed faintly through the air as someone passed him, unremarkable and familiar, yet it caught in his lungs in a way that made him slow for half a second. There was nothing actually wrong with it, and that was the problem. Everything around him was exactly as it should be, and yet it was not.

By the second game, it was no longer subtle. He was desperate to know what Hollander was doing. What he was thinking. Where he was. Some of the information came easily. Game schedules, travel routes, public updates. It was all accessible, all harmless. He checked once, just to confirm something that did not matter, and then again, and then it stopped being a choice at all.

He started looking through after game interviews. Watching game footage and replaying the images of the bench. The clip loaded quickly. Shane sat on the bench, leaning forward as he spoke to a teammate, his posture relaxed, his focus easy. It was that ease that made something tighten in Ilya's chest. That relaxed expression. It did not belong there. Not after what had happened. Ilya stilled the frame with a touch of his thumb and studied it longer than necessary before closing the video and opening another.

This one showed Shane moving through an arena tunnel, someone brushing his shoulder in passing. The contact was casual, unremarkable, accepted without thought. Ilya watched it happen, his jaw tightening slightly, and then closed that one too.

"You're distracted."

The voice came from nearby. Ilya did not look up. "No."

"You are."

He lifted his head slowly, his expression flattening into something cold and final. It was enough to end the conversation immediately. The other player backed off without pushing further.

It should have faded. Distance had always solved things like this. Remove the variable, remove the distraction. Simple. Except this was not fading. It was sharpening, becoming quieter and more precise. Ilya was not losing control. He was organizing it. That was the difference.

It irritated him that this infatuation did not go away as it usually did but he refused to back down. He was irked that Hollander seemed fine. As if their time together had had no effect. He swore to himself that it was just a good time and that he would drop it and find someone else to turn his attention too.

"Rozanov, watch it."

The warning came too late. Ilya closed the distance in two strides and drove straight through the opposing player. The impact was clean and brutal, the boards rattling as the other man hit them hard. The whistle blew immediately, voices rising around him. Ilya stood over him for half a second longer than necessary before turning and skating toward the penalty box without a word.

Inside, everything felt muted. The crowd noise blurred into something distant, unimportant. He sat down, elbows resting on his knees, gaze forward. The next shift, it happened again. A defender stepped into his path at the wrong angle, and instead of adjusting, Ilya drove through him. The hit sent the man off balance, the puck already gone before he hit the ice.

“Jesus, Roz,” a teammate muttered nearby.

Ilya did not respond.

Later, a misread pass brought one of his own teammates into his path. The collision was immediate and hard, the impact sending the other player stumbling to the ice. There was a brief pause before play resumed, just long enough for the tension to settle in.

“You good?” someone called.

“Yeah,” came the answer, but the player’s eyes flicked toward Ilya, assessing.

“You need to rein it in,” the coach said quietly when Ilya returned to the bench.

Ilya pulled his gloves tighter and said nothing.

Because he already knew.

The hits were not mistakes. They were release. The only release he’s had in days. If he let his thoughts loose, he’d be a mess—he didn’t feel anything other than the need to see Hollander again until he was hitting others during the game. It was insane. He could feel himself losing his sanity slowly.

That night, alone in his hotel room, the city moved in distant patterns beyond the glass. Ilya sat in the quiet, his phone resting in his hand. He had tried to avoid dialing the number to Svetlana’s contact again but he really needed to get his mind straight. This was his rookie season. He needed to excel and the way he had been playing, he would be spending more time benched or in the penalty box soon.

“Mr. Rozanov. How can I help you?” The gruff voice as in Russian.

“Hollander. I need you get more information. I want everything.”

“Very well. Give me a week.”

Ilya paused at that. It was amazing what money could do. “Another thing. Do you have any one who could maybe follow him? I see—”

“Follow how closely?”

Ilya breathed out, raising his head to the ceiling and pinching his eyes closed. “How close can you get?”

“Depends, this will not be cheap.”

“I dont care. I just need-”

“Mr. Rozanov, I have a contact that can get the information-they can go as close as you want. I just cannot be traced back to this and you need to tell me exactly how much information you want.”

“Get everything. I dont care how. Just do it. I want to know absolutely everything. I want to know who he spends his time with, where he is all the time.”

“Understood, sir. Give me some time to move some things into place and you’ll hear back.”

So he waited. Ilya stalked social media. Hollander seemed to not use any of the normal platforms but he did appear a fair amount in the teams official accounts and sometime he got lucky and spotted him on the other teammates accounts. It was rather pathetic the way he was looking over accounts during his free time.

He was convinced that this infatuation would end once they fucked. And Ilya was determined to have that happen soon.

He was on his way home after training. Nearly another week passed before the package arrived. The courier stopped him and gave him a box. He put it in his car and raced home while sneaking glances down at the brown box, his name in cyrillic was the only information on it.

After getting into his apartment, he threw his coat and hat towards the kitchen island and grabbed a knife to open the box. Inside he found a phone and tablet. The folded note was also in Russian-

Phone is mirrored. Enter 1085 to access Mr. Hollander’s phone as it is being used. Enter 2008 to use for historical data. Tablet is connected to a tail placed on Hollander and to cameras placed in his home.

Body cam will be activated while on the street-working on access while in arenas.

Wire instructions will be sent tonight. Please send payment in american dollars.

Ilya’s heart sped up. He quickly powered up the cell phone and typed in 1085, grinning when the background changed into a picture of what must have been the day of the draft with his parents? The woman looked alot like Hollander-pretty brown eyes and dark hair. The man was tall and well built but average looking with light eyes and graying light hair. Hollander was in between them, holding up his Voyeguers jersey.

He was about to go through the the apps installed when the keypad popped up and he put the phone down and watched a call connect.

‘Hi Hayd.’ Hollandar’s voice came from the loud speaker

“Hey Buddy. Whats going on?”

“I got the invite for Friday but I don't think I'm going to make it. My mom has this thing set up for me. Some type of commercial for the new Under Armour shirts.”

“Jesus Shane. Can she let you have some downtime?”

Ilya listened to the conversation for a few minutes. The only Hayden he knew of was Hollander's teammate. That friendship would need to be looked into. Ilya hated whenever they were interviewed together, Pike had stood closer than usual to Hollander, sometimes having his arm around the smaller man's shoulders.

He sounded insane—in the back of his mind he recognized that but the anger didn't subside. He pulled his normal cell phone to record the call to research later, not all the words were easy to understand for him so he pulled the tablet while they spoke for a few more minutes.

The tablet powered on and the first images came in simple sequences. Shane leaving a hotel. Shane outside the arena. Shane talking to someone, his expression lighter, easier. Then another image loaded, and this time he was laughing. Not controlled. Not measured—real.

Ilya went completely still. He did not react immediately. He studied the details instead, the angle of his posture, the proximity of the people around him, the way his expression shifted. He grabbed his cell: “More frequent updates,” he sent.

A moment later, “Open the app with a green eye as the icon.”

He tossed his phone back on the and found the app. It took a few seconds but a video feed of a living room came on. He was about to text the investigator again when he let out a breath as Hollander came on the screen, wearing basketball shorts and a plain tighter t-shirt. Ilya eased himself onto the barstool as he watched the Omega pace around the living room, on the phone. Блядь—this was a live feed.

He sat there for over an hour, watching the live feed and a few phone calls. It was so boring but for some reason he found it incredibly endearing. By the third day, it became routine. He checked the feed in between drills, between periods, before sleep, when he woke. Not compulsively. Not chaotically. He had himself under control, he told himself.

Across the country, Shane did not understand why everything felt off.

He had not meant to keep the tank top. He told himself that the first night, and then again the next morning, and again when he packed. It stayed anyway. Folded at first, tucked neatly between his clothes, then placed on the bed, then left within reach.

The room felt too quiet around him. Shane lay back against the pillows, staring at the ceiling, his hand drifting without thought until it found the fabric. He stilled, his fingers tightening slightly as he pulled it closer.

The scent had started to fade, but it was still there if he focused. Something warm beneath the sharper edge of it, something that settled low in his chest and slowed his breathing without permission. Shane shut his eyes.

“Don’t,” he said to himself quietly.

It did not help.

He pushed himself upright, dropping the fabric beside him as if it might burn him. His gaze moved across the room, landing on his suitcase, on the neatly folded clothes inside it.

The thought came without warning. Build it. Shane froze. “No.”

But his body had already begun mapping it out. The placement of pillows, the weight of blankets, the shape of something enclosed and contained. It would be easy. Too easy. A few minutes and it would be done.

This was not home. It was a hotel room. Temporary. Exposed. Anyone could walk in. Housekeeping. Teammates. Staff. The image hit hard enough to break the thought apart.

Shane stood abruptly, pacing once before stopping himself.

“You don’t do that here,” he muttered. His gaze dropped back to the bed, to the tank top. That was already too much. He sat down again, slower this time, and pulled it just a little closer. Not a nest, but holding the piece of clothing close was just close enough.

Later, he picked up his phone, not thinking about it, just needing something else to focus on. The highlight reels of the Bears last game loaded, and Ilya appeared on the screen.

The hit was brutal. Clean. Too hard.

Shane sat down on the edge of the bed, his grip tightening slightly around his phone as he watched. Another clip followed. Another hit. Something about it felt different. Not wrong, exactly, but more intense- sharper. He exited the video, then opened it again, watching it a second time without understanding why he could not stop.

The next day, the locker room felt different. Nothing had changed, but Shane noticed everything. A hand brushing his shoulder as someone passed made him shift immediately. A knee bumping his on the bench had him standing before he could think about it.

“Dude, you good?”

“Yeah,” he said too quickly, already moving away.

Shane had not meant to keep the tank top, that was the truth.

The first morning after everything with Ilya, he had stared at it lying near the end of the hotel bed for nearly a full minute, black fabric wrinkled and carrying the faintest trace of scent. He should have left it there. He should have thrown it into the pile of abandoned clothes for housekeeping to deal with. Instead, he folded it carefully and tucked it into his own bag before he could think too hard about why.

Now, over a week later, it had somehow become part of his routine.

At first it stayed buried neatly beneath his clothes where he did not have to look at it. Then it became something he left near the pillow while sleeping. Somewhere along the line, without consciously deciding it, Shane had started reaching for it whenever the strange restless feeling beneath his skin became too sharp to ignore.

And lately, that feeling was almost constant.

By the time the team left for their next road trip, Shane's nerves had gotten noticeably worse. The restlessness followed him from city to city now, settling into him quietly enough that nobody else seemed to fully notice yet. Hotel rooms felt wrong almost immediately after stepping inside them. Too open. Too temporary. Too empty in a way that made his chest tighten every night once the noise of teammates and arenas disappeared.

The instincts were getting worse too. Every night the same thoughts crept in while he tried to sleep. Pull the blankets closer. Move the pillows. Build something enclosed. Something softer, something safe. It terrified him how natural the thoughts felt.

Shane sat alone on the edge of another hotel bed somewhere in Chicago, staring blankly at the folded blankets near the foot of the mattress while traffic lights flickered faintly through the curtains. His duffel bag lay half-open near the desk. The room smelled like detergent, stale air conditioning, and faint traces of the tank top resting beside him.

His eyes drifted toward it automatically.

That was already too much.

The scent had faded over the last several days, but enough remained that his body still reacted immediately whenever he touched it. Warm leather. Cedar. Something deeper underneath that settled low in his chest and loosened the tension in his muscles before he could stop it.

Shane hated that. Hated how quickly his body calmed around it. Hated the awful sense of comfort that came every time he pulled it closer. Slowly, he picked it up again, fingers curling tightly into the soft fabric.

His shoulders relaxed almost instantly. "Fuck," he whispered quietly. That scared him more than anything else. Because he was beginning to understand exactly why Omegas built nests in the first place. Comfort, security.

His body kept reaching desperately toward those things now, especially at night when he was alone. The urges arrived strongest in hotel rooms where nothing felt familiar and nobody smelled right.

Except this. Shane looked toward the extra pillows again. The folded blankets. His suitcase.

Move them closer.

The thought came so naturally it made his stomach twist.

Layer the blankets there, pillows against the wall, something enclosed, something hidden.

His breathing became uneven. He could almost picture it taking shape around him. Warm. Quiet. Protected. Safe.

Shane stood abruptly. “No.”

The word came out sharper this time.

He paced once across the room, dragging both hands back through his damp hair before forcing himself to stop moving.

This was a hotel room. Not home. Anyone could walk in.

Housekeeping, teammates, coaches.

The image of someone opening the door and seeing it hit hard enough to break the instinct apart for a moment. “You don’t do that here,” he muttered to himself.

The words sounded weak even to him. Because part of him still wanted to. His gaze drifted helplessly back toward the bed. Toward the tank top still clenched tightly in his hand.

Not a nest, just close enough.

Shane sat back down heavily against the mattress, pulling the shirt unconsciously closer against his chest while exhaustion settled over him in waves. He stared blankly toward the television for several long minutes before finally reaching for his phone beside him.

He did not even realize what he was doing until the NHL app was already open.

Then Ilya’s game highlights loaded onto the screen.

Shane’s stomach dropped immediately.

Ilya looked different.

Not visibly. Not in a way most people would probably notice. But Shane noticed.

The aggression was sharper now. Less controlled.

The first hit came fast and brutal, driving another player violently into the boards hard enough to make the crowd erupt. The replay slowed the impact from multiple angles while commentators praised the physicality of it.

Shane barely heard them.

He watched Ilya instead. The stillness afterward. The way he stood there for half a second too long watching the other player struggle back up.

Another clip followed almost immediately. Another hit. Worse this time.

Shane sat down harder against the mattress, eyes fixed helplessly on the screen.

“That’s too much,” he whispered quietly.

But even saying it, he knew the truth. It was not random. It was intentional. And somehow that made it worse.

His chest tightened painfully as another replay showed Ilya skating away without looking back.

Shane exited the video.

Then reopened it less than thirty seconds later.

He did not know why he kept watching.

Maybe because he could not stop thinking about him.

Maybe because some broken part of him liked being looked at with that same intensity.

That thought made guilt twist violently through his stomach.

He dropped the phone onto the bed beside him like it had burned him.

The room fell quiet again.

Too quiet.

Shane pressed both hands over his face and exhaled shakily into the silence.

He missed him.

The realization landed suddenly and horribly.

Not just physically.

Not just the scent or the kiss or the overwhelming instinctual pull that kept making his body betray him.

He missed the attention.

Missed the terrifying certainty in Ilya’s eyes.

Missed the feeling of being looked at like nothing else in the room mattered.

Shane swallowed hard against the tightness suddenly sitting in his throat.

“This is bad,” he whispered quietly.

No one answered.

After a long moment, his hand drifted back toward the tank top again.

This time, he did not stop himself from pulling it against his chest before eventually falling asleep with it tangled tightly in his hands.

That night, Ilya reviewed another set of images. Shane crossing a street, entering a building, sitting at a table. Ilya zoomed in, studying the small shifts in expression, comparing them to memory. Better.

He set the phone down slowly and leaned back.

Now it was clearer. Not complete, but enough.

This was not distance nor absence. This felt like progress, he felt in better control of his emotions now. It would only take a few days of watching over Hollander before he would find something else to obsess over.

He sat up in surprise when he heard his apartment door open. Shoved the tablet and extra cell phone into his nightstand before Svetlana walked into his bedroom with a grin. She shrugged off her long coat, revealing a bright red lacey underwear set that would usually have Ilya ready for some fun right away but they both noticed something was wrong almost immediately.

Not because Ilya said anything, but he was just sitting there in bed, a total lack of interest was almost shocking.

Usually, when she came over after games, the atmosphere carried a familiar rhythm to it. Music low in the background. Vodka already poured before she even took her coat off. Ilya stretched out across the couch or leaning against the kitchen counter watching her with that lazy, predatory focus he wore so naturally. There was always an edge to him after games, especially aggressive ones. Adrenaline still lingering beneath his skin. Restlessness. Hunger.

Tonight, the apartment felt strangely cold. Not physically, but emotionally. Ilya had barely looked up when she walked in. That alone was alarming.

“Well,” Svetlana said lightly as she shut the door behind herself, slipping off her boots. “Either you lost tonight or somebody died.”

“We won.”

His voice came out flat. He needed to make sure Shane was staying in for the night. He still lived with his parents and they were out for the night.

Svetlana frowned slightly as she walked further inside. Ilya swung his legs over the side of the bed and sat up fully and grabbed a glass of vodka near his elbow. The television played muted highlights in the background, though he clearly was not watching them.

His attention remained fixed towards the nightstand. Towards the hidden phone.

“I was expecting an invitation. I come all the way here, leaving the parties you never want to go to now, and you just lay there after seeing me in this?” she asked, tossing off her coat.

Usually that line earned her at least a smirk.

Tonight, nothing.

“Mm.”

Svetlana leaned against the dresser, quietly studying him. She had known Ilya for almost ten years now, long enough to recognize his moods. Most people assumed he was impossible to read because his expressions rarely changed, but that was not true at all. Ilya felt things intensely. He simply controlled how much other people were allowed to see.

Right now, the control looked strained. “You are being strange,” she said finally.

“No.”

“You almost concussed your own teammate tonight.”

That got his attention.

Barely.

His eyes lifted toward her for a second before drifting back to the nightstand.

“He should watch where he skates.”

Svetlana stared.

Then laughed once in disbelief. “Jesus Christ.” she said in Russian.

Still nothing.

Now she was genuinely curious.

Slowly, she rounded the island and reached for the vodka bottle herself. “What happened to you?”

“Nothing happened.” Another lie. A bad one this time.

Svetlana poured herself a drink and deliberately nudged his knee with hers. Normally that alone would have shifted the atmosphere immediately. Ilya liked touch. Any touch honestly. He was physical by nature, possessive without effort even in situations that meant very little to him.

Tonight he barely reacted. That was new, and very unlike her friend. Her eyes narrowed slightly. "There's someone new?"

That finally made him look at her properly. Not guilty, not defensive - worse.

Guarded.

Svetlana sat back slightly. "Oh my God," she said softly, the realization beginning to settle. "There is."

"There is not."

"Ilyanusha. You ask as if I don't know you. You usually want to fuck after games. I didn't run into anyone around here so I know you didn't have one already. I didn't run into anyone after the game today either."

"I am tired."

"You have never once in your life been too tired to fuck me."

His mouth twitched faintly at that, but the reaction felt hollow.

Svetlana watched him carefully now. Interesting. Very interesting.

She had always known eventually somebody would get under his skin badly enough to disrupt the perfect control he wrapped around himself. She simply had not expected it to happen this quickly.

Or this severely. "Who are they?"

Ilya's expression closed immediately. That answered the question too.

Svetlana blinked once. "Oh, wow."

"Do not start."

"You brought home a hockey player?"

"I did not bring him home."

"So dramatic already." She took another sip before tilting her head. "Is this the one from the commercial?"

Silence.

Then: "You watched it?"

“I have eyes, Ilya.” A pause. “And internet access.”

He looked away again.

Svetlana’s curiosity sharpened instantly. Because there it was again. That strange tension.

Something deeper and infinitely more dangerous. She knew Ilya inside and out. Knew the real him- the small boy who was brilliant and protective and beautiful.

“You actually like him.”

The words came out softer this time. Careful. Ilya’s jaw tightened almost imperceptibly. “No.” Too fast.

Svetlana smiled slightly into her glass. “Ah. So it’s serious.”

His glare flicked toward her immediately. “It is not serious.”

“Then why are you acting like somebody shot your dog?”

“I am not.”

“You are one bad game away from murdering a referee.”

That actually made him exhale sharply through his nose in something almost resembling amusement. Progress.

Svetlana leaned closer against the dresser. “What’s different about this one?”

“Nothing.” Another bad lie.

“You have had plenty of pretty boys before.”

“I know.”

“You have had hockey players before.”

“I know.”

“You have had clingy ones. Emotional ones. Crazy ones. One of them cried in your kitchen for three hours.”

“He was dramatic.”

“You liked it.”

“I tolerated it.”

Svetlana rolled her eyes. “So what is different?”

Ilya went quiet. That silence stretched long enough that she began genuinely expecting him not to answer. Then finally:

“He is...” Ilya stopped.

The hesitation alone startled her.

Ilya never hesitated.

“He is what?”

His fingers tapped once against the side of the glass.

“Interesting.”

Svetlana burst out laughing.

“Interesting?” she repeated incredulously. “That is your explanation? Ilya, you nearly killed three people this week.”

“I did not kill anyone.”

“You understand that is not comforting.”

He ignored her.

But she noticed something then. The furtive glances he kept throwing to his nightstand.

Protective, attached.

Her amusement faded slightly.

“Oh,” she said more quietly this time. This was worse than she thought. “You really have it bad.”

“I do not.”

“You absolutely do.”

He stood abruptly then, grabbing the vodka bottle and moving toward the living room windows. The city lights reflected dimly across the glass while snow drifted lazily outside.

Svetlana watched his shoulders tighten beneath the thin black shirt stretched across his back.

“He is just a distraction,” Ilya said finally. “It will pass.” The words sounded practiced, empty.

Even he did not seem convinced by them.

Svetlana rose slowly and walked over beside him. “Then why does it sound like you are trying to convince yourself?”

His jaw flexed. No answer.

Interesting. Very, very interesting. She studied him quietly for another moment before finally asking, “Have you even slept with him properly yet?”

A pause. “No.”

Svetlana stared at him. “You are acting like this and you have not even fucked him?”

“He is complicated.”

That nearly made her laugh again.

“Ilya,” she said carefully, “you once hooked up with a married politician’s son during playoffs because you were bored.”

“He was annoying.”

“You still did it.”

“He looked good on his knees.” That sounded more like him at least. But only briefly.

The silence settled back in immediately afterward.

Svetlana leaned against the window beside him. “So what is this really?”

Ilya remained still for so long she thought he might ignore her completely.

Then finally: “I cannot stop thinking about him.”

There it was. Not love. Not romance. Worse- obsession.

Svetlana felt the shift immediately. And judging by the way Ilya stared out at the city like he was trying to outrun his own thoughts, he felt it too. “You should leave him alone,” she said quietly.

Ilya looked at her then. Actually looked at her. And the cold certainty in his expression made something uncomfortable crawl down her spine.

“No.” Simple. Absolute.

Svetlana suddenly understood that whatever this thing was had already gone too far.

Neither of them spoke for a while after that.

Eventually, she nudged his shoulder lightly. “Come to bed before you spiral into a supervillain monologue.”

A faint smirk tugged briefly at the corner of his mouth.

Small, but real. Progress again.

The bedroom stayed dark except for the dim city glow spilling through the curtains. Svetlana changed into one of his shirts automatically while Ilya stripped down to boxers, movements slower than usual. Still distracted, still elsewhere.

When she climbed into bed beside him, she expected him to reach for her eventually. That was how this usually worked. Comfortable. Familiar. Physical without complication.

Instead, Ilya simply lay beside her staring at the ceiling.

Minutes passed. Svetlana rolled onto her side finally, propping herself up on one elbow. “You really are not going to touch me?”

“I am touching you now.”

His arm rested loosely around her waist.

Barely. She snorted softly. “This is tragic.”

That finally earned another quiet exhale that almost resembled laughter.

Eventually she settled against his chest anyway, surprised when he actually relaxed slightly afterward. Not sexually. Just... calmer.

His fingers moved absently against her back while his mind clearly remained somewhere else entirely.

“Hm,” Svetlana murmured sleepily after a while. “You know what the worst part is?”

“What?”

“You look guilty.”

That made his hand still.

Svetlana lifted her head slightly to study him in the dark. “You never feel guilty.”

“I do not feel guilty.”

“Liar.”

Silence.

Then quietly: “He looked frightened.” The admission surprised both of them.

Svetlana stared. There it was again. That hollow tone, something raw enough to hollow him out from the inside anyway.

“You should really leave this boy alone,” she whispered.

Ilya’s arm tightened around her instinctively.

“No,” he repeated again.

But this time, lying there in the dark with his thoughts clearly somewhere far away, the certainty sounded thinner than before.

Chapter 7: Chapter 7

Chapter Summary

We're getting to the good parts. I managed to salvage this from too many cuts by my sister. But if I haven't scared anyone away yet I might as well start the unhinged parts like I planned.

I'm writing this while running a midgrade fever and on no sleep-I might come back mid week and change some stuff or roll with it and keep typing away for chapter 8.

Thank you for the reviews-they truly make my day soooooo much better (especially douzi96, little_blue_owl and Peixinho_001-they're reviews made me push this chapter out faster and not let scenes get deleted)

Six months later, nothing had gotten better. Ilya spent most of his free time watching games he pretended he had no interest in or listening to conversations dull enough that even he occasionally questioned his own patience. There had been no sharp realization, no dramatic moment where he understood something had gone fundamentally wrong. Nothing had dissuaded him from continuing to watch his so-called rival.

It had happened slowly, quietly.

Somewhere between flights, road games, and late nights in anonymous hotel rooms, Shane Hollander had stopped feeling like a temporary fixation and became something far more inconvenient.

At first, Ilya assumed time would solve it. Distance usually did.

He had never struggled much with wanting something and eventually losing interest once the novelty disappeared. People bored him quickly. Even beautiful people. Especially beautiful people. Bodies had always been easy. Temporary. Disposable. He liked movement, liked distractions that arrived briefly and left before they became inconvenient.

Attachment had never interested him.

So naturally, he assumed whatever strange thing had happened in that hotel room would eventually dull into memory. Instead, distance sharpened it.

Months later, he still remembered everything with humiliating clarity.

The exact expression on Shane's face whenever he became overwhelmed. The way he avoided eye contact until forced into it. The softness hidden beneath suppressants. The compulsive neatness of him. The eagerness that had surprised them both.

Most annoyingly, he remembered the uncertainty.

The way Shane had looked at him like he did not know whether to run or stay. Nobody else had ever looked at him that way.

That became a problem. The first replacement happened accidentally. Dark hair. Quiet disposition. Slender in roughly the same ways. Close enough, in dim lighting, that something restless beneath Ilya's skin briefly settled. Until the man laughed. It was wrong. The way he moved was wrong.

By morning, irritation had replaced whatever distraction he had hoped for. He had nearly said the wrong name. That unsettled him. Not because he felt guilty.

Because it annoyed him. Nothing worked.

Not distance. Not distractions. Not other people.

Even Svetlana noticed eventually.

“You’re getting predictable,” she said one night while leaning comfortably against his kitchen counter, watching him with open amusement over the rim of a vodka glass.

Ilya barely looked up from his phone. “No.”

“You are.” Her eyes narrowed slightly. “They all look the same now.”

Silence. That was enough to answer.

A pause. He ignored her.

She tilted her head, studying him longer. “Whatever happened to blondes?”

“I never cared about blondes.”

“No,” she agreed slowly. “You cared about novelty.”

That landed harder than he expected. Because she was right. Ilya had always liked movement. Temporary things. Temporary people. Brief distractions that never stayed long enough to become inconvenient.

Nothing about this felt temporary anymore. That was the real problem. He still had not contacted Shane even though he had come up with logical explanations to have his phone number.

Because now Shane existed almost entirely in fragments and stolen knowledge.

Interviews. Games. Media clips. Press conferences.

Then watching the video feeds when he was home. Listening to his phone conversations with his parents and friends. Watching the body cam that the security guard he hired when he went out- late at night in dark hotel rooms while the rest of the team slept he allowed himself to indulge in his obsession. It should have felt pathetic.

Instead, it felt necessary -comforting, even.

Ilya learned things without meaning to. The way Shane touched the back of his neck whenever anxious. The way he only took a few bites of dessert after team dinners. How exhaustion made him quieter instead of irritable. How he stood too close to exits in unfamiliar rooms without seeming aware of it.

Things nobody else noticed. Things nobody should reasonably know. That should have bothered him more than it did. Instead, it felt like instinct. Like paying attention, like understanding.

And understanding made distance easier to tolerate. At least temporarily. Ilya knew everything about Hollander on a surface level but he needed more.

Ilya wanted to know if he kept his hair long enough to have to push back like he constantly did out because he wanted to or if it was because his day was so busy that he didn't have time to get a haircut.

Ilya didn't know if his thick thighs would still be as smooth as they had been all thoughts months ago, or how they'll look with bite marks all over from where he planned to bury his head between them and lick his virgin pussy and suck his cock again. He didn't know nearly enough, and it needed to change this weekend.

The ban on him that Ilya had set for himself had been lifted and it was time to claim him, even if it wouldn't be a permanent claim. The All Star weekend mixer proved that Hollander was too beautiful to be left unprotected, that little fuckwit Elliot Long from one of the American teams gave him the final push to move things along.

He stood towards the back of the room and watched as the tall blonde man greeted Hollander and put his disgusting arm around the smaller man. He watched as Hollander tried to shrug away when Pike came over to talk to him and he broke the glass of vodka in his hand as he watched the other man remove his arm from Hollander's shoulders but not before dragging his hand down slowly his back before pausing at the small of Hollander's back.

He stood there as he watched Shane move away quickly following Pike and another teammate. Ilya fisted his bleeding palm and made his way to the man now walking towards the bar.

“Rozanov! Great to meet you man!” The idiot said, forgetting his drink on the counter.

“Pleased to meet you too. I was wondering if you knew somewhere I could smoke. I keep getting stopped and its just too much.”

They walked out and made their way outside. Ilya stayed a few paces away to hopefully not make it obvious that they were walking out together. Once outside, Ilya removed his suit jacket and placed it over the bench nearby.

He pulled out his lighter and a cigarette and blew out a stream of smoke as he looked around. No one was out, the other man was prattling on too fast for Ilya to fully understand the whole one sided conversation.

“Do you think it's okay for you to touch people that don't belong to you?” He suddenly asked.

“What?”

“Hollander. I saw how you touched him in there. That is not allowed.”

“Look man, Shane’s an unattached beta as far as I know. He could speak up for himself but-”

Ilya didn't let him finish that sentence before he lunged and tackled the other man towards the alleyway by the doors, moving them completely out of view. He let the rage and tension of the past few months out and landed blow after blow.

When he paused after several minutes, he noticed that the other man was about to pass out.

“Listen to me carefully. Hollander is off limits. To everyone. You look his way again, I will end you.”

Ilya had forced himself to back away and went back to the bench and picked up his jacket. He slowly made his way back inside, smiling to himself when he saw the object of his obsession walking by himself into the restroom.

Across the country, Shane had stopped believing the feeling would go away.

At first, he blamed stress. Then travel. Then the stronger suppressants. Then the increasingly uncomfortable realization that maybe his instincts were trying to tell him something he did not want to hear.

Nothing obvious had happened. That somehow made everything worse. It was small things. The persistent feeling of being watched while walking back to hotels after dinners. The strange habit he had developed of checking over his shoulder more often than necessary. The way crowded spaces suddenly made him tense in a way they never used to.

His teammates still touched him casually without thinking. Shoulder bumps. Hands brushing his back in locker rooms. Leaning too close during conversations. But Shane hated it now.

Not because it hurt. Because it felt wrong, like he was betraying Rozanov which he knew was ridiculous. Everything just felt wrong lately, too loud, too close.

He still kept the tank top. That was its own humiliation.

Months later, it remained folded near whatever pillow he slept beside on road trips. He had stopped pretending it was temporary around the same time he stopped pretending he slept better without it nearby. The scent had faded significantly by now, but enough remained. Enough that it still calmed him. Enough that he hated himself for needing it.

Some nights, especially during longer road trips, he caught himself rearranging blankets without realizing it. Pulling pillows too close. Creating something dangerously close to a nest before forcing himself to stop. His instincts only got louder when he was alone. And now, layered underneath all of it, sat something worse. Paranoia.

Enough to make him close blinds automatically. Enough to make him check locks twice. Enough to turn around too quickly whenever footsteps lingered behind him.

Nothing was ever there, but still-

Something felt wrong. That feeling only worsened when people started acting strange around him. "You ghost everybody now?"

Shane blinked across the locker room. "What?"

Hayden shrugged while tying his skates. "That girl from Denver."

Silence.

Because Shane vaguely remembered her.

Friendly conversation after a charity event. Someone introduced by mutual friends. Easy enough to talk to. Nothing serious.

"You gave her your number," Hayden said.

"I never heard from her."

Hayden frowned. "Apparently she thought you weren't interested."

Weird. Not impossible. Still weird.

It kept happening. Different cities, different people. Introductions that quietly disappeared. Numbers exchanged that somehow turned into silence. Enough to feel strange, but not enough to explain. Not enough to make sense. He would just get his phone checked when he went back home for more than a few days at a time.

Shane found himself staring at his phone more often because of it. Checking notifications. Messages. Nothing unusual. Still, something felt off. The hair on the back of his neck prickles and the horrible sensation of being watched hits him again. It's irrational, he was in a roomful of people, many of them were looking at him since there was so much press surrounding the fact that the two top rookies of the season had both made it to the all star game in their first year playing. Surreptitiously, he took a moment and glanced around the room, he caught Rozanov's eye for a second but quickly looked away.

“Are you okay?” Haiden asked.

“Yeah, I just had that horrible feeling of being watched, do you know what I mean?” He wrinkled his nose, hating that he sounded like an idiot.

“Oh my gosh, I get that all the time when go swimming at night and I get out of the pool and have to walk back up to the house. It’s weird.”

He left the mixer and went to his room. The Alpha scent of the place should have been too much but he swore he could mostly smell Rozanov in the air. He went to the bed and found an itinerary with his name. He almost ignored it. Another media day schedule, another obligation.

His thumb moved automatically.

Then stopped.

Shared Press Conference:
Ilya Rozanov & Shane Hollander 11:00 - 13:00

Everything in him went still. No.

No.

Months. It had been months. Months of distance. Months of avoidance. Months of pretending that enough space between them meant something had settled. His stomach dropped hard enough to make him physically straighten. He reread the line. Then dropped the phone onto the bed beside him. The room suddenly felt too warm.

Still noticed how much more aggressive Ilya had gotten. Still searched interviews without meaning to. Still slept too close to that stupid shirt. Distance had helped, just barely enough. And now suddenly the distance was gone.

He pressed both hands hard over his face. “This is bad,” he whispered quietly into the empty room. No one answered.

All-Star Weekend was supposed to feel different from the regular season. Lighter. More relaxed. Less like work and more like spectacle. The hotel lobby alone looked like the league had taken over every available surface, banners hanging from the balconies, branded signs near the elevators, staff moving in coordinated clusters with clipboards and headsets while players, agents, family members, media people, and sponsors threaded through the space in overlapping streams.

Shane stepped through the revolving doors with his bag over one shoulder and immediately felt the strange, practiced smile settle onto his face. It was automatic by now. Pleasant. Polite. Professional. His mother had drilled that into him long before he had become old enough to understand why it mattered. Smile when people are watching. Shake hands firmly. Do not look nervous. Do not make anyone work too hard to like you.

Usually, it worked.

Today, it felt like a mask sitting slightly crooked over his face.

He kept his gaze moving as he crossed the lobby with one of the team staff members walking beside him, nodding when necessary, answering when spoken to, trying not to look like he was searching the room. That was the problem. He was trying not to look. He was trying very hard not to scan every corner, every group near the lounge, every cluster of players standing near the check-in area, because if he looked too obviously, someone would notice, and if someone noticed, they might ask.

The lobby smelled wrong. Too many scents layered over one another, expensive cologne, coffee, wool coats damp from cold weather outside, leather bags, flowers from the reception desk, Alpha scents under blockers, Beta scents barely noticeable beneath it all. Shane’s suppressant patches held firm beneath his clothes, one at the side of his neck hidden by his collar and another at the small of his back, both checked twice in the elevator and once again before stepping out. They should have made him feel secure.

They did not.

His hand twitched toward his neck before he stopped it.

“Shane Hollander.” He turned automatically toward the voice, grateful for the distraction until he saw who it belonged to.

Scott Hunter stood a few feet away near one of the league banners, taller than Shane had expected in person even though he had seen him on television for most of his life.

The thirty nine year old still had broad shoulders, still carrying that steady Alpha presence that made people move naturally around him without thinking. His hair had a tiny bit gray near the temples now, more visible up close than it was on broadcasts, and there were faint lines around his eyes that made him look warmer somehow, less like a hockey icon and more like a man who had survived long enough in the league to stop trying to prove every room belonged to him.

Shane’s expression changed before he could control it.

Scott smiled like he had noticed and was kind enough not to comment. “Good to finally meet you properly.”

Shane blinked once, then immediately felt embarrassed by how quickly his expression must have changed.

Because this was Scott Hunter.

Not in the distant way celebrities existed on television or interviews clipped into highlight reels online, but standing directly in front of him like a normal person who happened to also be one of the most respected players in the league. Someone Shane had watched for years. Someone whose jersey he had worn so often as a teenager that his mother eventually stopped replacing it after the numbers started peeling.

It was ridiculous. He was an adult. A professional athlete- Scott Hunter’s peer.

And somehow still internally fourteen.

“You alright there rook?” Scott asked, amusement settling into the corners of his voice.

Shane straightened too quickly. “Yeah. Sorry. It’s just weird.”

“Weird?”

“I mean-” Shane exhaled awkwardly. “You were kind of my favorite player growing up.”

Scott laughed softly, easy and unbothered in a way that somehow made Shane more comfortable instead of less.

“That sentence gets more offensive every year.”

“No, I didn’t mean old-”

“You definitely meant old.”

Shane groaned quietly under his breath, earning another laugh. The thing that surprised him most was how normal Scott felt. Not intimidating, or performative.

Years in the league had worn down whatever edges celebrity might have created. He carried himself like someone who had already proven everything he needed to prove and no longer cared about taking up unnecessary space doing it again.

Even his Alpha scent sat quietly beneath blockers, present but unobtrusive in a way Shane immediately noticed before hating himself for noticing anything at all.

It was warm, comforting. The kind of scent that did not press. Scott adjusted the strap of his own bag before nodding toward the elevators. “Come on. They’ve got us trapped in the same hotel for three days. Might as well make friends.”

The word settled oddly in Shane’s chest.

Friends. Easy. Normal. They walked together toward the elevators while people called Scott’s name every few steps, sponsors and media staff greeting him with the kind of familiar respect that came only after years of being impossible to dislike.

“So,” Scott said casually, “how bad’s your first All-Star Weekend anxiety?”

Shane laughed weakly. “That obvious?”

“You’ve checked your phone four times in thirty seconds.”

Mortification hit immediately. “I’m not nervous.”

Scott gave him a look.

“Okay,” Shane admitted. “Maybe a little.”

“A lot?”

“A lot.”

“Good.” Scott smiled. “Means you care.”

That should not have helped as much as it did. It still did. Then Scott added, casually enough that it almost caught Shane off guard, “My husband said I looked like I was going to throw up before each one.”

Something in Shane immediately softened. Husband, not mate. Because there it was again. The thing he had quietly admired from afar for years. Scott never hid him. Never danced around the language. Never softened the reality of what he was. Like it had never been anything worth apologizing for.

Shane hated how much that mattered to him. He tried very hard not to think too hard about why.

Then the elevator doors opened. They stepped in and before the doors closed Ilya Rozanov stepped inside. For half a second, Shane forgot how to move. Ilya stood near the back of the elevator with his hands in the pockets of a dark coat, his blond curls slightly damp at the ends like he had come in from the cold not long before. He looked the same. That was the first terrible thing Shane noticed. Months had passed, and Ilya still looked exactly like the memory Shane had been trying to bury. Tall, loose-limbed, controlled in that way that never seemed stiff, blue eyes lifting with immediate recognition and settling on Shane like they were the only people in the entire.

Shane's pulse spiked so hard he felt it in his throat.

The memory of the previous hotel room came back all at once. The wall against his back. Ilya's hand at his chin. His voice telling him to look. The scent. The kiss. The overwhelming certainty in his eyes like he had already decided something Shane had not agreed to and did not entirely know how to refuse.

He must have stopped too suddenly because Scott glanced down at him.

"You good?"

Shane forced air into his lungs and made himself step forward. "Yeah. Sorry." Professional. Normal. Fine. He was fine.

The elevator was large, but not large enough. Scott stepped in beside him, and Shane moved automatically to stand near him, not because he was afraid exactly, not in any way he could explain cleanly, but because Scott felt steady. Ilya's gaze flicked briefly to the space between them, then back to Shane's face.

"Hollander," Ilya said.

His voice was calm, too calm.

Shane's mouth went dry. "Rozanov."

Scott looked between them with mild interest. "You two behave this weekend. This is supposed to be a good time for the fans."

"I know." Shane said at the same time Ilya said, "Ok."

Silence. Shane could feel his ears heat.

Ilya's mouth curved faintly, just enough to make Shane's stomach tighten. "We have spent some time together without fight coming.

“Commercial shoot,” Shane said quickly, gripping the strap of his bag harder. “League thing.”

“Ah.” Scott nodded, either missing the tension or politely deciding not to acknowledge it. “Right. The one with both of you staring like you were about to kill each other. I saw that on TV.”

Ilya’s eyes did not leave Shane. “Ah yes. Good editing.”

The elevator rose too slowly.

Shane stared at the glowing numbers above the doors and tried not to breathe too deeply. Ilya’s scent was muted under blockers, but proximity still made something underneath Shane’s skin react, some traitorous part of him recognizing before thought could interfere. He hated it, despised how immediate it was. Hated that even after months of silence, distance, paranoia, and confusion, his body still remembered before his mind could protect him.

When the doors finally opened on Scott’s floor, Shane nearly followed him out by reflex. Scott paused, smiling easily. “I’ll see you downstairs later.”

“Yeah,” Shane said, too fast. “Yeah. See you then.”

Scott gave him one last friendly nod and stepped out.

The doors slid closed.

Shane and Ilya were alone for exactly four seconds before Shane reached for the button to the next floor as if pressing it harder would make the elevator move faster.

“You look tired,” Ilya said. Shane’s hand froze against the panel. It was such a normal thing to say. Casual. Observational. It still made his skin go cold.

“I’m fine.”

“You don’t sound too sure.”

Shane turned his head slightly, despite himself.

Ilya's gaze moved over his face with slow, unnerving focus, taking in the shadows beneath his eyes, the stiff set of his mouth, the tension in his shoulders. It felt exactly like being studied. Like Rozanov was not just looking at him but comparing him against some private version he had kept all this time.

"You not sleeping," Ilya said.

Shane's heart kicked once against his ribs. "You don't know that."

Something flickered in Ilya's expression, gone too quickly to name. "I can see."

The elevator stopped.

Shane stepped out immediately, barely remembering to keep his pace normal. He did not look back, but he felt Ilya's eyes on him until the doors closed again.

By the time he reached his room, his hands were shaking.

He told himself it was because he had not eaten enough. That was easier than the truth.

The press conference was worse. Not at first. At first, it was simply the usual media chaos, bright lights, long table, microphones arranged in a neat line, name cards placed in front of each chair. Shane arrived early because being early gave him time to breathe and because his mother had trained him to never give people the chance to think he was unprepared. He sat where they directed him, adjusted the water bottle in front of him without thinking, and nodded politely as one of the league media coordinators explained the structure of the panel like he had not done a thousand of these before.

Then Ilya walked in.

Shane did not look at him immediately. That was deliberate. He focused on the coordinator. On the female and some male reporters shooting appreciative glances at the Alpha as he strode in. Then the microphones. Then the press packets stacked near the end of the table.

Anything else. Anything that did not involve watching Ilya cross the room toward the empty chair beside him with the same lazy, controlled confidence Shane remembered too well.

Ilya sat down like he belonged there, which, unfortunately, he did.

Their shoulders did not touch but Shane still felt the heat radiating from the larger man. There was a reasonable amount of space between the chairs. Enough for professionalism, enough for cameras. Not enough for Shane to forget he was there.

“You are avoiding me,” Ilya said under his breath, low enough that the microphones would not catch it.

Shane kept his face neutral. “Not here.” He had moved away from the microphone enough to whisper it, looking down as if adjusting his tie.

Ilya made a quiet sound that might have been amusement.

Shane picked up his water bottle, realized his hand was too tense, and set it down again without drinking.

The reporters started almost immediately once the panel opened, questions coming from every direction, overlapping in a way that always made these things harder than they looked on television. Shane was used to it. He could filter quickly, catching the important parts, choosing the safest answer, making it sound just personal enough to seem sincere and just polished enough to be usable.

Ilya handled the first few easily. A question about adjusting to the league. Another about being selected for the All-Star Weekend as a rookie. A joke about his reputation for getting into fights with most players. He answered with that dry confidence people loved from him, the accent making everything sound more deliberate, more amused, even when he said very little.

Then the questions sped up.

Three reporters tried to speak at once. Someone from the left asked about the pressure of representing Russian hockey. Someone from the right cut in about his physical play recently. Another asked about rumors of tension with teammates after a few penalties. The words overlapped, fast and sharp, too many at once.

For the first time that afternoon, Ilya hesitated. It was barely noticeable. Most people probably missed it. Shane did not.

Ilya's expression did not change, but his eyes shifted quickly from right to left, not confused exactly, more irritated at the speed and noise than unable to understand. Before he could think better of it, Shane leaned slightly toward his microphone.

"I can take that, if you don't mind." He said smoothly, drawing the attention toward himself before the silence could stretch. "I think all of us are dealing with pressure in different ways this weekend, but that's kind of the point of being here. You're surrounded by players who are the best at what they do, and there's a lot of noise around that. As for physical play, I mean, that's part of his game, right? Everyone here competes hard. Nobody gets to this level by being easy to play against."

The room shifted toward him immediately.

A few reporters redirected follow-ups.

Shane kept talking, polite and measured, giving enough that it sounded generous without saying anything that could become a headline. It was automatic, the same press instinct he always relied on when things got uncomfortable. Only when the attention settled more fully on him did he realize what he had done.

The press conference continued for another few minutes. Someone asked Shane about the shootout challenge. Someone asked Ilya about the fastest skater. Someone joked that the league had placed them together because people liked watching them compete, and Shane gave a careful laugh while Ilya leaned toward his microphone and said, "They like drama," which made the room laugh.

Shane's stomach tightened.

For one dangerous second, the room faded around them, and Shane realized he had turned his head toward Ilya without meaning to. Ilya was already looking at him. Of course he was. His expression was relaxed, almost amused, but his eyes were not.

He felt a hand caress his thigh with then a firm, deliberate squeeze through the fabric of his dress pants. Shane stopped breathing.

Nothing changed above the table. The lights stayed bright. Reporters kept scribbling. Someone asked another question from the back. Shane's face remained pleasant because years of training and terror held it there, but beneath the table, every nerve in his body went violently awake.

Ilya's hand stayed only a second longer before lifting away, Shane felt branded by it. He imagined that when he stripped down for his shower tonight the large imprint of a hand would still be on his upper thigh. Somehow, he survived the rest of the panel.

The moment it ended, Shane stood too quickly. Ilya rose beside him. "Hollander," he said softly. Shane pretended not to hear.

He moved toward the side exit where Scott Hunter was waiting with two other players, laughing at something one of them had said. Scott looked up as Shane approached, and whatever was on Shane's face must have shifted his expression because the older man's amusement softened immediately.

"You okay?" Scott asked quietly.

Shane forced a laugh, too light. "Yeah. Press is just a lot."

Scott studied him for a second, not prying, not pushing. That alone nearly undid him. "Come on," Scott said, clapping him lightly on the shoulder in a way that did not make Shane flinch. "They've got us doing sponsor photos next. Misery loves company."

Shane went with him.

Behind them, Ilya watched.

He watched Scott's hand land briefly on Shane's shoulder. Watched Shane not move away. Watched the tension in Shane's posture ease in a way it had not eased once beside Ilya all afternoon.

The reaction inside him was immediate and ugly. Scott Hunter was not flirting, he couldn't be. That man was old, not good enough for Hollander. Plus he already had a mate.

That made it worse.

Flirting, Ilya could understand. Desire was simple. Competition was simple. But this was something else. Shane looked at Scott like he trusted him. Like he admired him. Like being near him made the world quieter instead of louder.

That was intolerable.

For the rest of the afternoon, Ilya kept finding reasons to be in Shane's line of sight.

Not obviously.

Never obviously.

He knew how to move through rooms without appearing to seek anything. He stopped near sponsor walls when Shane passed. Lingered near hallways where groups were being sorted.

Joined conversations close enough that Shane could feel him there, close enough that he would have to acknowledge him if he turned.

Shane rarely did. That was new. And it irritated Ilya more than fear would have. Fear at least meant attention. Avoidance meant control slipping somewhere he could not immediately correct.

Every time Shane looked toward Scott instead, something colder settled in Ilya's chest.

Scott was older, established, respected in the way players became respected after surviving long enough to become part of the league's mythology. Worse, he was safe. Publicly bonded. Publicly devoted. An Alpha who had stood beside a male Omega for years without shame, without secrecy, without the sharp hunger Ilya knew he himself wore too easily when his control thinned.

Of course Shane admired him. Of course Shane would drift toward that. Of course that made Ilya want to put himself between them and stay there. By the time evening came, Shane had managed to avoid being alone with Ilya again. Only barely.

Every hallway felt like a trap. Every room felt too crowded and too exposed at the same time. He kept ending up near Scott because Scott was easy. Because Scott asked normal questions and told normal stories and did not look at Shane like he could smell every thought he was trying to bury.

Still, Shane felt Ilya everywhere. Across rooms, behind conversations. In the moments when the back of his neck prickled for no reason and he looked up to find blue eyes already on him. He hated how quickly his body reacted. He hated that part of him had missed it.

The realization followed him back to his hotel room that night, sitting heavy in his chest as he closed the door and leaned back against it. The room was quiet. Too quiet. He checked the lock twice, then the blinds, then the bathroom, even though he knew how ridiculous that was.

His suitcase sat open near the dresser. The tank top was folded beneath his clothes. He did not take it out. Not immediately. He stood there for a long moment, pressing the heel of his hand against his sternum like he could physically hold himself together. Then his phone buzzed.

A message from the event coordinator.

Reminder: Skills Competition call time tomorrow 10:30 AM. Shootout group includes Hollander, Rozanov, Corrie , Hunter.

Shane stared at the names. Rozanov, Hunter, himself. Same group.

Of course.

His laugh came out small and humorless. “Great,” he muttered to the empty room. Then, because he had no discipline left at all, he opened the NHL app and searched Ilya’s name.

Across the hotel, Ilya sat in the dark and thought about Scott Hunter’s hand on Shane’s shoulder.

He thought about Shane looking away in the elevator. Shane helping him in the press conference. Shane freezing under his hand. Shane leaving with Scott. The weekend had only just begun, and already one thing was clear. Scott Hunter was going to be a problem.

Shane detested how much of it had felt real.

The skills competitions had somehow made everything worse. Scott had spent most of the day beside him, easy company in the middle of chaos, offering quiet advice without making it feel like criticism. They had laughed between events, traded stories about growing up in hockey culture, and for the first time all weekend, Shane had almost relaxed. Almost. Then he would look up and find Ilya watching.

Not subtly.

Never enough to be obvious to anyone else, but enough that Shane always noticed eventually. Across warmups. Sponsor events. Hallways. Training rooms. During media appearances. It had become impossible to ignore.

And somehow, infuriatingly, impossible not to notice.

The shootout challenge had gone worse for Ilya than anyone expected.

Or maybe better for Shane.

The crowd had been loud enough to feel through the ice by the final round, cameras tracking every movement while commentators eagerly pushed the rivalry harder with every second that passed.

“Rozanov currently holds the event record,” someone announced overhead. “Hollander’s got one last shot to beat it.”

Shane had not even meant to think about him. But he had. He always did.

Especially because Ilya stood near the boards watching with his arms folded across his chest, expression unreadable and annoyingly composed in the way only he seemed capable of being.

Shane remembered the commercial.

Remembered the way Ilya pushed until reactions slipped free before he could stop them.

Remembered the hotel room. The kiss. The impossible months afterward.

Then something sharp and competitive twisted through him.

Fine. This was just a game to Rozanov. Pictures of him going out with women and men hanging all over him were frequently shown in the gossip columns so obviously he was just messing with his mind. All Shane needed was for him to keep the secret. Apart from that they wouldn't need to ever speak again.

He skated up to the line and took aim with his stick. Fast. Clean.

Perfect. The crowd erupted. Two seconds faster. A new record.

Shane barely had time to process it before teammates collided into him, laughing and shouting while cameras shoved closer.

Across the ice, Ilya only watched. Still. Silent. Expression impossible to read.

Later, when Ilya won Fastest Skater and then helped carry the 2v2 event, Shane found himself watching anyway. Despite himself. Against his better judgment.

Because nobody moved like him. That was the problem. Nobody else occupied space the same way. Nobody else looked so terrifyingly controlled while skating hard enough to make everyone around him seem slower.

And worse - nobody else made Shane so painfully aware of himself.

Scott noticed eventually.

"You alright?" Shane blinked quickly.

They stood near the tunnel waiting for introductions, the arena loud around them.

"Yeah," Shane answered immediately. Too quickly.

Scott raised an eyebrow but let it go. "You look distracted."

“Tired.”

“Mm.”

The older Alpha looked unconvinced but kind enough not to press.

“Big game,” he said instead. “Don’t overthink it.”

Easy for him to say.

Scott Hunter looked like the kind of Alpha who had spent years learning exactly how to exist comfortably inside himself. Steady. Public. Safe.

The exact opposite of chaos. The exact opposite of Ilya Rozanov.

Across the rink, Ilya leaned against the boards, gaze already fixed on Shane.

The introductions blurred.

Then the faceoff. Of course. Center ice. Because apparently the universe hated him.

Shane crouched automatically, gripping his stick tighter while the referee positioned himself nearby. Then Rozanov leaned closer.

“Shane Hollander. Listen to the crowd. What would happen if I pulled you to me and shoved my tongue down your throat? How many would be shocked when they saw how immediately you would drop to your knees for me?”

Shane froze, thinking about what would happen if he backed away and asked for a line switch suddenly. He can play wing to another center but he didn’t think he could face off against Rozanov like this.

“Relax. Come to my room tonight. We need to talk.”

The whistle blew and they fought over the puck with Rozanov gaining the advantage but Shane recovered quickly less than a minute later.

The game ended more brutally than Shane expected. 6-3, their loss.

By the third period, adrenaline had burned through enough of the tension that instinct finally gave way to muscle memory. The entire weekend had been building toward this in ways Shane had not anticipated. The media had spent two straight days feeding the narrative until it had become impossible to escape. Hollander and Rozanov. The rookie rivalry. Opposite styles. Opposite personalities. The two of them neck and neck in nearly every event while commentators grinned knowingly over replay footage like they had stumbled into the perfect storyline.

Shane had gotten slammed against the boards just once by Rozanov before the game ended. He had tried to brace himself for impact but was surprised when the hit made more noise than hurt and for a moment, he was in Rozanov's arms again, looking into the intense eyes.

"Come to my room tonight. Either you come or I drag you out in front of everyone.

The referees came over and made them break away.

It was too loud to think properly.

Shane played hard because not thinking was easier than thinking. Because every time Rozanov crossed into his orbit something inside him tightened painfully. Because avoiding him became impossible once the game started.

Their team lost. Shane barely processed the final horn. Only the exhaustion afterward. The handshake line moved automatically, muscle memory carrying him through the familiar ritual while adrenaline slowly burned itself out.

Gloves tapped.

Quick nods. "Good game." "Hell of a goal." "See you next season." Routine.

Then Ilya stepped in front of him. Too close immediately. "1221." He whispered but Shane heard it clearly as if they were the only ones in the arena.

Up close, Ilya looked annoyingly composed for someone who had just lost. Damp hair curling slightly at the edges beneath his helmet, flushed from exertion, blue eyes fixed steadily on Shane like the rest of the line had stopped existing.

Their gloves met once. Brief. Professional. To anyone watching, it looked normal.

Another player stepped between them immediately after. Another handshake. Another meaningless exchange Shane barely heard. Because suddenly his pulse was too loud again.

Because months apart had somehow changed absolutely nothing.

And because the truly humiliating part, the awful, terrifying part - was that some small terrible part of him still wanted to turn around.

"You ok there?" Scott had skated up to him again and they got off the ice together. "Don't let Rozanov get to you. I'm in the room next to him and the guy has anger issues."

"No worries, I don't let him bother me." Shane said, going back towards the locker room. He made as if he recognized a few fans and asked Scott to just go ahead and that he'd follow after signing some pucks.

He stayed for about half an hour- but security pulled him away when too many people started to press against the glass to get to him.

Once he was back in his hotel room, he started to pace back and forth. Room 1221 was down two floors. Scott was rooming next to that room. He should ignore Rozanov. Nothing about going there would result in anything good for either of them. He waited a couple hours. He almost went to bed but the threat of Rozanov coming up and making a commotion was very real and he made up his mind and went down.

He managed to avoid running into anyone due to the late hour and knocked softly on the door. His heart was racing at the high chance of getting caught but before he can turn back the door opened. He rushed inside and closed the door quickly, swearing he heard something in the hallway as he crossed the threshold.

The hotel room air hung thick, Rozanov's scent was all over the room, as if he removed his scent patch as soon as he came into the room for no other reason than to drive Shane insane.

"Is someone chasing you?" Rozanov said with a smirk.

"You asshole! Scott Hunter is right next door. There's 10 other players all around here and you have me waiting in the fucking hallway."

Ilya had to smile. He just had to. An angry Shane Hollander reminded him of a tiny kitten trying to roar and bite at his owners.

He just stared at the adorable face

Ilya leaned against the frame, a vision of casual, predatory ownership. He was in low-slung jeans and another tight black wifebeater, the hard planes of his chest and abdomen on full display under the thin fabric. He smelled of steam and expensive soap and the Alpha scent that was uniquely his. His blue eyes swept over Shane, from his tense, set jaw down to his white-knuckled hands, and a slow, knowing smile touched his lips.

"You are late," Ilya said, his voice a low purr that vibrated in the hollow space of Shane's chest. He didn't move to let him in. He made Shane stand there, in the accusatory hallway light.

Ilya followed his glance. The smile widened, turning cruel at the edges. "Ah. You are worried about the neighbor." He pushed off the frame and finally stepped back, a silent, commanding invitation. "Do not be. He hears nothing but his own boring old man thoughts."

Shane stood there nervously but he couldn't stop himself. The scent he had been missing was now surrounding him. He stumbled out of his shoes and lunged. It wasn't a graceful move. It was a collapse, a surrender to a gravitational pull he could no longer fight. He fisted his hand in Rozanov's shirt and tangled his other hand went into the soft blonde curls, pulling him down, crashing their mouths together.

The kiss was pure desperation, a clash of teeth and tongue and stifled noise. It was anger and terror and a craving so deep it felt like bone-deep starvation. Rozanov made a rough, approving sound against his mouth and took over, one hand cupping the back of Shane's head, the other splaying possessively against the small of his back, grinding their bodies together. Shane melted into the onslaught, a whimper trapped in his throat, his own hands scrambling over the solid muscle of Rozanov's shoulders, his back, anywhere to hold on as the world dissolved into taste and heat and pure sensation.

Ilya's mouth was ruthless, devouring. He kissed like he played hockey- with brutal precision, overwhelming force, and a complete disregard for the rules. He bit Shane's lower lip, sucked on his tongue, and Shane could only give, and give, and give, his mind whiteing out into a static hum of more.

It was during a frantic shift of Ilya's head, his mouth trailing fire down the line of Shane's jaw towards his neck, that his nose wrinkled. He stopped, pulling back just an inch. His breath was hot and ragged on Shane's damp skin. His fingers, which had been tangled in Shane's hair, slid down, searching, until they brushed the edge of the small, clear patch just below Shane's ear.

A low growl rumbled through Ilya's chest. It wasn't one of passion. It was one of pure, unadulterated annoyance.

"This," Ilya muttered, his voice thick with contempt. His fingers hooked under the edge of the suppressant patch.

Shane's eyes flew open. "Don't-"

It was too late. With a sharp, deliberate rip, Ilya tore the patch clean off Shane's neck.

The sensation was not just physical. It was an unveiling. A sudden, violent breach in the dam. The synthetic barrier that muted his omega scent, that buffered him from the full force of alphas and his own biology, was gone. The raw, vulnerable scent of him—fear, arousal, slick, and sweet, sweet omega—bloomed into the space between them, intimate and shocking.

Ilya inhaled deeply, his eyes fluttering shut for a second in what looked like bliss. When they opened, the blue had darkened to the color of a storm-chased sea. All traces of teasing, of casual cruelty, were gone. Replaced by an absolute, primal authority.

He didn't ask. He didn't request it. He gave an order, his voice dropping to a tone that vibrated in Shane's very marrow, a tone that brooked not even the possibility of disobedience.

"On your knees."

The words were a shockwave. It bypassed Shane's brain, his pride, his terror about Scott next door. It went straight to the core of him, the omega core that recognized a direct command from a dominant alpha in its space. His body moved before his mind could form a protest.

His knees hit the hotel carpet with a soft thud. He was looking up at Rozanov, who loomed over him, a god of muscle and will. Shane's hands, acting on an instinct older than reason, went to the waistband of Ilya's jeans. His fingers found the zipper, fumbled for a second, then pulled it loose. He didn't look away from Ilya's face as he hooked his thumbs in the waistline and pushed, dragging the fabric down just enough, just over the sharp jut of Ilya's hips.

Ilya was already hard, thick and flushed against his stomach. The sight of him, the intimate, salty smell of him, sent a jolt of pure, wanton hunger through Shane that obliterated every other thought. He didn't hesitate. He didn't need to be told twice.

He leaned forward, his lips parting, and took Rozanov into his mouth.

The groan that ripped from Ilya was guttural, raw, a sound of pure, conquered pleasure. His hand flew back to Shane's head, not guiding, not forcing, but simply holding on, his fingers tightening in the short strands of hair. "Bozhe moi, yes... just like that..."

Shane lost himself in the rhythm, in the weight and heat on his tongue, in the desperate, approving sounds from above. The world narrowed to this: the taste of salt and skin, the faint tremble in the powerful thighs before him, the overwhelming scent of his own submission and Ilya's dominance mixing in the air. He hollowed his cheeks, took him deeper, his own need came secondary, throbbing echo between his legs. He was here, on his knees, with the man who he couldn't stop thinking about, and he had never felt more utterly, terribly, perfectly used in his life. And he never wanted it to stop.

Suddenly, Rozanov pulled Shane up quickly-just like their first time. They made out for a few seconds before they pulled away to catch their breaths.

Ilya reached out, not touching him, but tracing a phantom line in the air beside Shane's cheek. "You are shaking. Is it fear? Or is it want?" He leaned in, his lips brushing the shell of Shane's ear. His whisper was a hot, devastating brand. "I can smell it on you, kotenok. The fear is sweet. But the want... the want is delicious."

He pulled Shane against his body again and lifted him. Walking back towards the bed. Shane wanted to kiss some more but was not obliged as Rozanov pulled back and practically ripped his clothes off, doing the same to himself while staring at Shane. They made out for a few more minutes when Rozanov pulled back and tapped Shane on the side of his stomach. "Turn. On your stomach." He said, kissing his way down to Shane's neck. The bite guard was still on and he had an irrational want to yank the damn thing off. Shane froze. His eyes wide, but Rozanov was doing such amazing things to his neck and his hand was caressing him that he let himself be guided. When he felt the Alpha move behind him he stiffened. It took a minute for Rozanov to notice that Shane wasn't responding but he stopped. "What is the matter?"

"We can't. Hunter is right next door. your teams all around..."

"Are you kidding me?"

Shane rolled over, his breath hitching when he realized that now he was pinned under the larger man. "If they hear, and if someone saw me leaving the room later-I'd," Shane looked away. "I'd loose everything. My career would be over."

He felt Rozanov settle his hips down right on top of him, his eyes rolling back at the sensation. He felt the soft kisses right at the edge of his bite guard and he buried his hands in the curly hair again.

“Scott is -”

Shane was cut off from speaking further when Rozanov’s hand flew up and he wrapped his fingers tightly over his throat. “Never mention another man's name when in bed with me. You understand?”

A shiver ran through Shane’s entire body at the order. The grip didn’t cut off his air, but the implication was there.

Rozanov soothed the rough touch with more kissing, down this throat, lower to his chest. Shane whimpered when the Alpha reached his cock and started to suck slowly. He felt his legs being guided to wrap around Rozanov and he was physically and mentally incapable of resisting at all.

It was embarrassing how fast he came. He didn’t feel in control of his body at all and he couldn’t stop the shaking- he just laid on the bed, legs splayed wide as he watched Rozanov inch his way up and straddle his stomach. He watched as the blonde jerked himself off and come all over his chest. It alarmed him that he loved that-that he didn't mind the mess or the facts that he should have felt ashamed and didn’t.

It was a silence that vibrated, filled with the ragged symphony of their breathing. Shane lay beneath Rozanov, his chest rising and falling in stuttering hitches, painted white and sticky. He felt flayed open, every nerve ending scorched and singing, his mind a blissful, humming static. The world had narrowed to the weight on his hips, the heat of the body over him, the smell of alpha- dominant, satisfied, his.

Ilya braced his hands on either side of Shane’s head, looking down at his handiwork. His own breath was coming hard, his biceps trembling with residual tension. Shane’s eyes were glassy, pupils blown wide, lips kiss-swollen and parted. A perfect, ruined omega. A possession marked in the most primitive way.

“See?” Ilya’s voice was a gravelly rumble, deep in his chest. He lowered his head, nuzzling roughly into the junction of Shane’s neck and shoulder, inhaling the scent that was now subtly changing, the chemical sterility of the suppressant patch gone, leaving the vulnerable, sweet honeysuckle base note exposed. “Is so much better. No suppressant. Just you.”

He licked a broad, possessive stripe up Shane’s throat, over his pounding pulse, and Shane shuddered, a weak, punched-out sound escaping him. The action smeared the mess on Shane’s chest. Ilya didn’t seem to mind. He was cataloging it, claiming it.

The fog in Shane’s brain began to condense into cold, dripping dread. The physical sensation was receding, and in its wake rushed the reality of the situation. The paper thin hotel wall. Scott, his captain for the weekend, his friends and peers, lying in oblivious sleep just feet away. The entire team, a constellation of potential witnesses, scattered through the hallway. He was naked, covered in another alpha’s cum, his protective patch ripped away.

“Rozanov,” he whispered, the word strangled.

“Mmm?” Ilya was kissing his collarbone, seemingly fascinated by the contrast of his own pale spend on Shane’s skin.

“You have to... I need to clean up. I need to go.”

The kisses stopped. Ilya went very still. Then, slowly, he pushed himself up again, looking down at Shane. The post-coital softness in his blue eyes was gone, replaced by a glacial, calculating sharpness. “Go?”

“Scott is next door,” Shane said, his voice gaining a desperate edge. He tried to sit up, but Ilya’s weight was immovable. “What if he heard? What if he comes to check?”

Ilya’s lip curled. “Let him check. Let him see.” He leaned down, his nose almost touching Shane’s. “Would be good for him. Good for everyone. It might excite him. Like mating call.”

The words were a bucket of ice water. Shane's stomach lurched. "I don't belong to you. This was a mistake. A huge, fucking mistake." The panic was giving him a brittle courage. He shoved at Ilya's shoulders. "Get off."

For a second, he thought Rozanov would refuse, would pin him harder and prove his point with teeth and force. A thrill of terror, and something darker, shot through him. But the bigger man merely snorted, a sound of profound contempt, and rolled off him onto his back on the rumpled sheets.

The sudden absence of his weight and heat left Shane feeling hollow and exposed. He scrambled to the edge of the bed, his legs wobbly. He grabbed the first thing he could find, Ilya's discarded t-shirt, and began scrubbing frantically at his chest and stomach. The fabric smelled overwhelmingly of Ilya, pine and cold air and alpha, and it felt like another layer of violation, but the physical evidence had to go.

He heard the click of a lighter, then the slow exhale of smoke. He turned. Ilya was lying back against the headboard, one arm behind his head, a cigarette dangling from his lips. He was still gloriously, arrogantly naked, watching Shane with the detached interest of a scientist observing a panicked specimen.

"You are so boring, Hollander." Ilya stated, blowing a smoke ring towards the ceiling. "All that fire. All that fight. And then you melt. You beg. You take me so sweetly into your mouth, kotenok. And now you are having panic attack because someone might hear?" He laughed, a short, harsh sound. "You think they do not know? You think your precious Alpha friends are not going to smell me on you tomorrow?"

Shane froze, the shirt clutched in his fist. He felt sick. Was it true? Would they be able to smell it? Could everyone? The suppressant patch was gone. He was broadcasting a muddled, terrified omega signal marinated in Ilya's dominant pheromones. He was a walking scandal if he met someone on his way back up to his room.

"Give it back," he demanded, his voice trembling.

Ilya glanced at him. "Give what?"

“The patch! You ripped it off. Give it back!”

Ilya took another drag, his eyes slitting against the smoke. He gestured lazily with his free hand towards the floor somewhere near the foot of the bed. “Is there. Probably.”

Shane dropped to his knees, scanning the carpet. He found it, the small, clear adhesive square, now wrinkled and dirty. It was useless. He couldn't put a contaminated, floor-worn patch back on a fresh wound. It was a symbol of his shattered control. He crumpled it in his hand, his shoulders slumping.

“I have spare,” Ilya said, his tone conversational. “In my kit. But is in bathroom.”

It was a test. A cruel, simple test. Ask me. Beg me. Shane closed his eyes. The humiliation burned hotter than any desire had. He could walk into that bathroom, find the kit himself. But it was Ilya's territory. Taking it would feel like stealing. Asking for it would be surrender.

Ilya watched the struggle play out on Shane's face. He stubbed out the cigarette in a glass on the nightstand. “You know,” he said softly, swinging his legs over the side of the bed. He stood, a tower of lean muscle and intimidating calm, and walked over to Shane. He didn't touch him. He just loomed. “This fear of being caught. This shame. Is the most interesting part.”

Shane glared up at him. “Go to hell.”

“Maybe,” Ilya agreed. He crouched down, bringing them eye to eye. His gaze was unnervingly focused. “But you are coming with me. You think this is about sex? Is about fucking?” He shook his head slowly. “No. Is about this.” He reached out and tapped two fingers against Shane's sternum, right over his frantic heart. “Is about you, on your knees because I told you to. You, shaking because I took your little shield. You, cleaning my cum from your skin while you panic about your teammate.” He said the word like it was a delicious flavor. “You want me. You hate that you want me. You crave what I make you feel.”

Rozanov stood. He ran his fingers through Shane's hair. "Don't worry Hollander. I will get you a patch so you can run to your room and try to hide from what you want. Like coward."

Shane heard the faucet run, the clatter of a kit being opened. He remained on the floor, the crumpled patch digging into his palm. Ilya's words circled in his head like vultures, tearing strips off his self-image. He was right. That was the most horrifying part. The desire wasn't just physical. It was for the annihilation of his careful control. It was for the moment he stopped being Shane Hollander

Ilya returned. He held out a fresh, sealed suppressant patch. Not the team-issued brand, but a premium, high-strength one. Of course.

Shane stood and stared at it, then up at Ilya's impassive face. He didn't move.

"Take it," Ilya said, no kindness in his voice. It was an order.

Shane's fingers unclenched. He let the old patch fall to the carpet. He took the new one. His hand didn't shake. The gesture felt like signing a contract.

"Put it on," Ilya said. He didn't offer to help. He just watched.

Shane peeled the backing, his movements mechanical. He pressed it to the side of his neck, over the tender, kissed skin. The familiar, mild cooling sensation spread, a feeble dam against the torrent inside him.

"Good," Ilya said. He turned and walked back to the bed, picking up his pants and stepping into them. He didn't look at Shane again as he zipped them up. The dismissal was absolute. "Now get dressed. Some people from the team went out and curfew is in an hour."

The whiplash was stunning. From overwhelming possession to cold ejection in minutes. Shane stumbled to gather his own clothes from where they were strewn like battle casualties. He dressed quickly, his fingers fumbling on buttons. The silence was heavier than before, charged with everything unsaid and undone. “I’m not a coward. I’ve just worked so hard to get this far. You wouldn’t understand.”

Rozanov looked at him, his expression blank. “What the fuck do you want Hollander? You act like scared little boy and run away when things get risky.”

“I want something I shouldn’t have. Neither one of us wants a mate. He just started our careers and everyone is expecting these crazy things from us and-”

Rozanov quickly crossed the room and smashed their lips together again. “Montreal and Boston play in two weeks. We meet then. No more hiding.”

He pulled Shane’s face up to meet his eyes. “Two weeks?”

“Yes, Hollander. We play together in two weeks then we will meet after game.”

“Um, where? I mean wouldn’t your hotel be full of your team?”

Rozanov rolled his eyes. “Your brain still not working from cumming so hard. I will go to your place and we finish what was started here.”

“Um, how will we meet?” Shane asked nervously.

“You have phone? Give.”

Shane pulled his cell phone from his pocket and stared, fascinated at just watching the man. He mentally shook his head before he got caught staring and noticed that he now had Rozanov’s number.

“There. We text now.”

Shane’s hand was on the door handle. He should leave. Just walk out and never look back. Treat this like a dangerous, one-time lapse.

“Goodnight, Roanov.”

“Goodnight Hollander.”

Shane slowly opened the door and slipped into the hallway, closing it with a soft, definitive click. He leaned against the cold wood, his heart hammering against his ribs. From the other side of the wall, Scott’s room was silent.

But from Ilya’s room, through the thin, terrible wall, he heard it. The clear, unmistakable sound of a lighter flicking once more, and the long, slow exhale of a man who was, without a doubt, already winning.

I'm officially running a fever so I called out of work for the rest of the week. This is a set up chapter-next chapter we get our boys together. Getting to the good bits. I tried to edit this chapter myself, no sister involved lol and I rewrote the parts she took out to be used later.

Please remember: this is AU/not following cannon here and there-I have a VISION lol. Next chapter is where we start to get steamy. I have started the first few chapters and its intense. Some people will NOT like what Ilya does, but I promise there is a HEA and he is not irredeemable. There is a method to my madness.

Chapter Notes

Once again, thank you thank you thank you for the kudos and reviews-they truly mean SO MUCH to me=each and every single one.

Shane made his way up to his room in a daze. He couldn't focus on anything much and his heart was racing. He started pacing back and forth, thankful that he had the single room for the night.

He paced. Four steps from the bed to the window, pivot, four steps back. The carpet, a bland swirl of blues and greys, blurred beneath his feet. His heart was a trapped bird beating against his ribs, his mind replaying the ultimatum on a hellish loop: he'd almost had sex. With Ilya Rozanov. The fact that Rozanov could destroy everything he'd work so hard towards. If discovered, there would be no consequences for his team or Rozanov- just for him. He knew in his gut that he was meant to play this game. This fling wouldn't be worth losing that for and he knew that he needed to break this off with Rozanov before it was too late. He'd walked away twice. How much harder could just sending a quick 'Let's not take this any father.' text be?. He'd said nothing. He'd just... left.

His phone, left on the nightstand, buzzed. A short, sharp vibration that sliced through the muffled quiet. He froze mid-pace, his blood turning to slush. He didn't want to look. He had to.

He crossed the room, picked it up.

IGR: Open your door in one hour.

No greeting. Just a command and a timeframe. The finality of it stole the air from his lungs. No discussion. No negotiation. Open your door. It wasn't a request for entry; it was an order to make himself accessible. To be ready.

The pacing resumed, more frantic now. An hour. Sixty minutes. What would be on the other side? Ilya himself, with that glacial, unreadable expression? Something worse? His mind conjured images of the team, of Scott Hunter, gathered there with questions he couldn't answer. The panic was a live wire under his skin.

He was grateful, with a desperation that was pathetic, for the single room. No roommate to witness this unraveling. No one to ask why he was wearing a path in the carpet, why his hands wouldn't stop shaking.

He needed to move. To do something. The restless energy had no outlet. Shower. The thought was a lifeline. A mundane, human ritual. It was also, he realized with a sinking heart, a way to follow an unspoken order. To be ready. He stood in front of the mirror, grimacing at the sticky mess that had dried on his chest. His base instinct was to not wash the mess off. He was embarrassed where his mind went and turned the shower to the hottest water allowed.

The water was as hot, scalding his skin pink. He scrubbed himself raw, as if he could wash away the feel of Ilya's gaze, the phantom pressure of the larger body that wasn't there anymore, the memory of being on his knees. The steam filled the small bathroom, fogging the mirror, hiding his reflection. He was glad. He didn't want to see his own eyes.

He performed his nighttime routine by rote: brushing his teeth, slapping moisturizer on his face, the familiar actions a soothing balm against the chaos. He opened his toiletry kit and took out his nightly medication—the two suppressants, the omega-specific vitamin complex. He swallowed them dry, the pills sticking in his throat. A pathetic attempt at normalcy. At chemical calm.

He pulled on a clean pair of boxers and a soft, old t-shirt. The fabric felt alien against his skin, too simple for the tension coiling inside him. He checked the time on his phone.

58 minutes....59.

The final sixty seconds were an eternity. He stood in the center of the room, facing the door, his body thrumming with a fight-or-flight response with nowhere to go. The timer in his mind reached zero.

He rushed forward, his hand closing around the cold metal of the handle. He yanked the door open, his heart in his throat, braced for confrontation, for Ilya's imposing frame filling the hallway.

The hallway was empty.

He blinked, his eyes scanning left and right. Nothing. No one. Just the garish carpet and the silent, numbered doors. His gaze dropped.

There, sitting squarely on the floor directly in front of his threshold, was a plain brown paper bag. It was folded neatly at the top, like a large packed lunch. It looked utterly innocuous. Profoundly menacing.

He stared at it for a full ten seconds, half-expecting it to move. When it didn't, he leaned out, snatched it up, and retreated back into his room, shutting and locking the door as if chased by ghosts. He leaned against it, the rough paper of the bag crinkling in his grip.

He carried it to the bed, sitting on the edge as if it contained a bomb. Slowly, he unfolded the top.

The smell hit him first.

It wasn't a strong smell. It was subtle, intimate, devastating. It was the clean, sharp scent of Ilya's hotel soap, yes, but underneath it... underneath it was the musky, unmistakable scent of them. Of sweat, skin, and sex. Of the hour they'd spent tangled in Ilya's sheets.

His hands trembled as he reached inside.

His fingers touched fabric. He pulled out the first item.

It was the fitted sheet from Ilya's bed. Crisp white cotton, now slightly rumpled. He unfolded it, and the scent bloomed stronger, enveloping him. He could see the faint impression of a body, the subtle wrinkles from their struggle. He dropped it as if burned.

Next came a pillowcase. Then another sheet.

Beneath the linens were clothes. A few worn, soft cotton t-shirts. A couple of tank tops. And finally, bundled at the bottom, a large, heavy hoodie—dark grey, well-worn, the fabric pilled in places. It was the hoodie Ilya had been wearing around the hotel earlier in the weekend.

Shane sat surrounded by the haul, his mind reeling. This wasn't a gift. It wasn't a romantic gesture. It was a colonization.

He'd stripped his own bed and delivered the evidence of their coupling. He'd given Shane his own clothes, items saturated with his personal smell, the smell of alpha, of possession, of home.

The message was clearer, more insidious, than any steel band. A folded piece of paper crinkled under a sleeve.

You chose the patch. You chose to hide. So I will make hiding impossible.

You want to stay in your room, in your own space? I have now defined your space. It smells like me. It contains me. When you sleep tonight, you will sleep in my sheets. You will be wrapped in the smell of where you belong. When you wake, you will put on my clothes. You will wear my scent against your skin, all day, under your gear. Everyone will smell it. Everyone will know, even if they do not understand what they are knowing.

You can keep your chemical barrier on your neck and in your body, Shane. But I will be in your bed. I will be on your skin. I am in the air you breathe.

See you soon-

I

It was a psychological collar. A cage made of memory and smell.

Shane's eyes stung. He looked at the soft, inviting pile of fabric. A part of him, a deep, shameful, omega part that was exhausted from the fight, craved it. Craved the comfort of that enveloping scent, the primal reassurance of being surrounded by his alpha's presence. The other part of him screamed in humiliation. He didn't want his baser instincts to take over. He needed to have a stronger hold on his emotions and body before he started making mistakes in public.

If he let himself relax and lean into what he really wanted, then his guard would relax. Things could be forgotten and then he'd get caught. He didn't make a conscious decision. His body moved for him. He picked up the fitted sheet. He walked to his bed, stripped off his own bland, hotel-issued linens in a heap on the floor, and began to remake it with Rozanov's. Each tug of the fabric, each tuck of the corner, released another wave of that intoxicating, terrifying smell. By the time he'd put the pillowcases on and spread the top sheet, his own bed had been transformed into Ilya's. A perfect replica.

He stood back, breathing heavily. The room was no longer his.

He picked up the hoodie. He brought it to his face, inhaling deeply. It was all Ily-Rozanov, the crisp outdoor smell, the underlying warmth of his skin, a faint hint of his shampoo. It was the smell of the man who had torn his patch off, who had commanded him to his knees, who tracked his every move and now demanded he sleep in his scent.

Shane pulled the hoodie on over his t-shirt. It was massive on him, the sleeves swallowing his hands, the hem hanging past his hips. It was like being engulfed. He climbed into the nest—no, bed - the bed that smelled like the Alpha and pulled the sheets, smelling of their shared sweat, up to his chin.

He lay in the dark, cocooned in the evidence of his own submission. The weight of the hoodie was a poor substitute for the weight of the man, but it was a weight nonetheless. A constant, smothering reminder. The scent was everywhere, inescapable. He was breathing Ilya in with every breath. His own clean scent from the shower was already gone, overwritten.

His phone buzzed once more on the nightstand. He didn't reach for it. He already knew what it would say.

The obsession had found a new, more intimate form. It wasn't just those two stolen moments. It was in his bed. It was on his skin. It was in his lungs. And as he finally, fitfully, descended into a sleep haunted by blue eyes and the smell of pine and leather, he understood the true depth of having an Alpha's focus.

He had made Shane's entire world the cage.

The hotel's main banquet room was a sea of controlled chaos and the low, resonant hum of alpha energy. The All-Star breakfast was a tradition, the last friendly mixer before the competitive instincts fully took over when they returned back to the regular season. Sunlight streamed through tall windows, glinting off polished cutlery and the championship rings on a dozen fingers. The air smelled of expensive coffee, maple syrup, and the subtle, varied cocktail of top-tier athlete pheromones.

Shane had chosen his seat with the precision of a bomb disposal expert. He was at a round table with Scott Hunter, of course, and a few other players he trusted—Marty from Vancouver, a laid-back beta defenseman with a perpetual easy smile, and Alexei Petrov, a veteran Russian winger who was gruff but fair, and crucially, a beta as well. A safe island in a room full of potential predators.

He'd woken that morning wrapped in the scent of Ilya Rozanov. It had clung to his skin, his hair, woven into the very fibers of his sleep. He'd showered again, scrubbing until his skin was tender, used his strongest body wash. He'd dressed in his own clothes, fresh from his suitcase. He'd applied a new suppressant patch with meticulous care, pressing it firmly over the spot Ilya had so violently bared.

But as he sat at the table, picking at a fruit salad, a low-level panic hummed in his veins. "Could they smell it?" Was there a trace, a ghost of Ilya's possessive, pine-and-leather scent lingering on him like a watermark? He watched Scott laugh at something Marty said, his posture relaxed. Petrov was methodically demolishing a stack of pancakes, paying him no mind. So far, so good.

He'd even managed to contribute to the conversation, a few comments about matchups, a weak joke about the hotel gym. He was playing the part. Shane Hollander, dependable Center, one of the guys. Not the omega who had spent the night buried in another alpha's sheets, drowning in his smell.

"You sure you're okay, Rookie?" Scott asked, nudging him with an elbow. His voice was low, concerned. "You look nervous."

Shane forced a smile. "Just... big crowd. You know how it is." It was a weak excuse for an All-Star, but Scott, ever the protector, seemed to buy it, giving him a reassuring nod.

The morning was going well. It was going normally. The knot in Shane's chest began, infinitesimally, to loosen.

Then the atmosphere in the room changed.

It wasn't a sound. It was a shift in pressure, like the air before a thunderstorm. Conversations didn't stop, but they dipped, heads turned subtly towards the entrance. Ilya Rozanov stood in the doorway.

He wasn't doing anything dramatic. He was just... there. Dressed in dark, tailored trousers and a simple black form fitting sweater, he looked more like a billionaire at a board meeting than a hockey player at a buffet. His eyes, that impossible, teal blue, swept across the room with a languid, disinterested authority. They passed over tables of all-stars, MVPs, legends, as if inventorying furniture.

Then they found Shane.

They didn't linger. They didn't narrow. They simply registered him, noted his location, his company, and moved on. Rozanov turned to speak to a league official who had hurried over, a polite, empty smile on his face. But the connection had been made. A circuit completed. Shane felt it like a static shock up his spine.

His appetite vanished. The fruit in his mouth turned to paste. He dropped his gaze to his plate, his fingers tightening around his fork. At that moment, he felt it: a buzzing in his pocket. A short, insistent vibration against his thigh.

His blood went cold. He knew. He knew.

Under the table, hidden by the long drape of the linen tablecloth, he slid his phone out. He angled it on his lap, his body a shield.

The screen lit up. A single message.

IGR - Petrov's hand is on your shoulder. Remove it. Now.

Shane's head snapped up. He hadn't even noticed. But there it was, Alexei Petrov's large, bear-like hand, resting companionably on Shane's shoulder as he leaned in to say something to Marty about the food. A casual, friendly, beta-to-beta touch. Utterly innocuous.

And Ilya had seen it. From across the crowded room, through the shifting bodies, while engaged in another conversation, he had seen it, catalogued it, and deemed it unacceptable.

The command on the screen was absolute. Remove it. Now.

Panic, sharp and acidic, flooded Shane's mouth. If he shrugged Petrov off suddenly, it would be weird. Rude. It would draw more attention than the touch itself. He was trapped between Ilya's directive and the need to maintain his fragile cover in front of Scott and the others.

Petrov gave his shoulder a final, friendly squeeze and leaned back, reaching for his coffee. The contact broke naturally.

Shane let out a breath he didn't know he was holding, his body slumping slightly in his chair. Crisis averted. He chanced a glance toward the door.

Ilya was gone.

But his phone buzzed again, immediately.

IGR - Better. Do not let it happen again. Your skin is not for their hands. Remember whose scent you slept in. Whose clothes you will wear. Every touch from another is a dilution. I will not allow it.

Shane stared at the words. Whose clothes you will wear. The hoodie. The t-shirts. They were in his room, waiting. A mandate. Ilya wasn't just watching. He was curating. He was controlling who could touch him, from across a room, via text. The obsession wasn't just about possession; it was about purity of that possession. He was to be a closed system, with Ilya as the sole point of contact.

"Earth to Shane," Marty said, waving a hand in front of his face. "You zoning out on us? Big night last night?"

Shane shoved the phone back into his pocket as if it were burning him. He tried to smile again. It felt like a crack in plaster. “Yeah,” he mumbled, his voice rough. “Something like that.”

He looked at Scott, who was watching him again, the concern back in his eyes, deeper this time. Shane looked at Petrov’s now-harmless hands, at Marty’s open, friendly face. He saw the normal, sunny breakfast room.

And all he could feel was the invisible, tightening web of Ilya’s gaze, and the phantom weight of a hoodie he hadn’t even put on yet, smothering him from the inside out. The game hadn’t even started, and he was already playing by Rozanov’s rules, on a field only Rozanov could see.

‘Just get through the day. Avoid him. Smile, eat, be a person. It’s one breakfast.’

When Hunter moved his head closer to him, Shane forced himself to calm down. “You can head out early if this is too much, Hollander.”

Scott nodded, sipping his own coffee. “Tell me about it. First time I did this, I hid in my room for a full day just to decompress. Kip- my husband, says even after all these years he see’s me get a bit nervous when these are scheduled. I hate it until I remember how much fun it is to just hang out with players that are not part of the team.” He smiled, a private, soft thing. “He’s an omega, you know? Has this sixth sense for when I’m getting in my own head. Told me, ‘Big weekends like this mess with your head, Scott. Try not to isolate. It makes the weirdness worse.’”

The words, meant to be comforting, landed like a blow. Try not to isolate. Shane’s gut twisted. He was isolated. He had built a fortress of secrets so high he could no longer see over the walls. He took a too-quick gulp of coffee, the heat scalding his tongue. “Smart guy,” he mumbled.

“The smartest,” Scott agreed, then his eyes narrowed slightly. “You sure you’re okay?”

Before Shane could formulate another lie, a shadow fell over their table.

A chair was pulled out from the table directly across from Shane, the legs scraping softly on the tile. Ilya Rozanov sat down.

Scott’s eyebrows lifted a fraction, amused. “Morning, Rozanov. Joining the party?”

“The coffee is good here.” Ilya said, his voice a low rumble as he poured. His eyes flicked to Shane, held for a half-second, then moved away. No smirk. No intense stare. Just... acknowledgement. As if seeing Shane first thing in the morning was the most ordinary thing in the world.

Scott was watching them both now, the easy camaraderie at their table gone, replaced by a faint, puzzled tension. It wasn’t romantic suspicion; it was the unease of a man seeing a dynamic he didn’t understand, one that felt oddly... proprietary.

“Well,” Scott said, clearing his throat and checking his watch. “I’ve got that league media thing in five. You two... enjoy your coffee.” He stood, clapping Shane on the shoulder once—a gesture that now made Shane flinch, wondering if Ilya was counting that touch, too. “Remember what I said, Hollander. Don’t isolate yourself.”

And then he was gone, leaving Shane trapped at the table with the man who was the very source of his isolation.

The silence that descended was thick, charged not with aggression, but with the sheer, unnerving weight of Ilya’s attention. He wasn’t glaring. He was just... there. Occupying space with a terrifying assumption of right.

After a moment, Ilya reached for the small ceramic pot in the center of the table. It wasn’t coffee. It was hot water for tea. He picked up an empty cup and saucer from the stack beside it and placed them deliberately in front of Shane. Then, from the pocket of his henley, he produced a single tea bag—Earl Grey—and set it beside the cup.

“You do not like the hotel coffee after the first cup. It turns bitter on your palate. You switch to tea,” Rozanov said, his voice low enough that only Shane could hear it over the breakfast hum. “You take it with one sugar and a splash of milk, but only if the milk is very cold. The creamer on the table is room temperature. It will curdle. Do not use it.”

Shane could only stare at the tea bag, at the cup, at Rozanov’s impassive face. His mind screamed the question on a loop: *How do you know that? How do you KNOW that?*

He had never taken tea with Ilya. He’d never taken coffee with him. These were private, mundane rituals. The kind of thing a partner of years might know.

Ilya leaned forward slightly, his elbows on the table, his eyes capturing Shane’s. There was no warmth in them, but there was a profound, unsettling intimacy. “The shaking in your hands stops after you have eaten something with protein and complex carbohydrates. Yogurt is not good enough. You need eggs.” He nodded toward the buffet. “Go. Now.”

It wasn’t a suggestion. It was a calm, implacable directive born of a knowledge so intimate it felt violating. He knew Shane’s body, his habits, his tells, better than Shane knew them himself. This wasn’t about desire at that moment. It was about ownership of information. It was as if Rozanov had compiled a dossier on him, and he was now administrating Shane’s life based on its contents.

The erotic charge of it was sickening, and undeniable. It wasn’t about touch. It was about being so thoroughly seen, so completely known and controlled down to the temperature of his preferred milk, that resistance felt not just futile, but absurd. The obsession wasn’t a fire—it was a science, and Shane was the sole subject of the experiment.

Swallowing against a dry throat, Shane stood on unsteady legs. Without a word, he walked to the buffet, filled a plate with scrambled eggs and a piece of whole wheat toast, and returned to the table. He sat. He poured the hot water, dunked the tea bag, added one sugar from the bowl. He left the milk alone.

He ate under Ilya's silent, watchful gaze, every bite a surrender to the terrifying, quiet fact that had just been established:

There was no avoiding him. Ilya wasn't just in his space. He was in his habits, in his bloodstream, in the very way he took his tea. And he had been for a long, long time.

Shane's mind, usually a focused, tactical thing on the ice, began to stutter and spin, connecting dots he'd never thought to look for.

The hotel coffee. He did hate it after the first cup. It did taste bitter. He always switched to tea at these league events. But he'd never said that out loud to anyone here. He'd just... done it. Quietly, at the back of a press room, in the corner of a hospitality suite.

His hand, holding the fork, trembled slightly. He saw Rozanov's eyes flick up from his phone, note the tremor, and return to the screen without comment. You shake when you need protein.

A cold sweat broke out on the back of Shane's neck. He resisted the urge to rub at it. Do I do that? Do I touch my neck when I'm stressed? He thought back. After a bad shift, in a tense meeting... his fingers would often find the spot just below his ear, where the suppressant patch lay. A self-soothing gesture. Had Ily-Rozanov seen that? Had he noted it, filed it away?

Has he been paying attention this whole time?

The realization was a sinkhole opening up beneath his feet. This wasn't a sudden, hot obsession. It was a cold, deliberate project. Shane had been under a microscope for months, and he hadn't even known the lab was running. And the worst part—the small, terrible, shameful part that made bile rise in his throat—was the tiny, glowing ember of warmth it sparked deep in his gut.

Someone noticed him. Not the poster child of Montreal.

Not just his hockey. Not just his mistakes on the ice. But him. The way he took his tea. The fact that he got hangry. The specific, silent way he expressed anxiety. Someone had seen all those invisible, mundane details- details even Shane himself took for granted - and had remembered them. Had catalogued them with the focus of a scholar studying a sacred text. It was the most intimate thing anyone had ever done to him. It was also the most violating.

He hated it. He hated the part of him that curled around that attention like a plant towards a sinister sun. He was an omega in a world that either fetishized or dismissed his designation; he was a center man known for being steady, the best player on his team-one of the top players in the league. But to be seen so completely, so minutely, was a drug he'd never known he craved, and its dealer was a man who intended to own him, body and soul.

He finished the eggs, the last bite like swallowing clay. He took a sip of the now-perfect-temperature Earl Grey. It was, infuriatingly, exactly how he liked it.

Rozanov looked up as Shane set the cup down. His expression didn't change. He didn't smile in satisfaction. He simply gave a small, almost imperceptible nod, as if a minor task had been completed to specification.

"The car should be here to pick me up soon. I expect you to answer when I text you. We will see each other in two weeks, Hollander." Ilya said, his voice back to a neutral, informational tone.

He just nodded, a numb, mechanical mirror of Ilya's own gesture.

Ilya stood, pushing his chair back smoothly. He looked down at Shane for a moment, that same calm, proprietorial look in his eyes. "Do not ignore me when I contact you." he said, and it wasn't a reminder for a peer. It was an order for a possession that needed to be in its proper place at the appointed time.

Then he turned and walked away, melting into the crowd of departing players, leaving Shane sitting alone at the table, surrounded by the ghosts of a hundred observed, remembered details, and the horrifying, seductive understanding that to Ilya Rozanov, he was not a mystery. He was an open book, and Ilya had already memorized every word.

Back at the hotel, with a few hours to go before his flight back home, Shane finally had solitude. He'd successfully avoided the group lunch, claiming a headache, and had retreated to his room. He should have felt relief. He felt exposed.

He paced for a bit, then tried to watch film on his laptop. The players on screen were just blurry shapes. He gave up and stood at the window, staring down at the city without seeing it.

That's when he realized it.

His eyes weren't just gazing blankly. Without any conscious intent, they were scanning the hotel lobby far below, flicking across the clusters of people coming and going. They were looking for a specific height, a particular way of moving, a dark blonde head of hair.

He was looking for Rozanov.

The realization hit him like a punch to the solar plexus, stealing his breath. Which was stupid really, he knew Rozanov had left over an hour ago. It wasn't a search born of fear or even attraction. It was a new, horrifying instinct. His internal compass had been recalibrated. Rozanov was the magnetic north his subconscious now checked for, constantly, automatically. He was looking for the threat, for the obsession, because on some primal level, his body had accepted that its coordinates were now defined in relation to that man.

A wave of nausea rolled through him. He turned from the window, pressing the heels of his hands against his closed eyes. This is how it starts. This is how you get consumed. You start seeking them out in a crowd. Don't let this man turn you into a pathetic simping moron

He needed to break the loop. He needed to do something normal, something that belonged to Shane, not to this new, twisted version of himself.

IGR- 14 days and counting. Can't wait.

He stood there, in the middle of the silent room, the text glowing on his screen, and understood the true depth of the inevitability Scott had hinted at.

Ilya Rozanov didn't just want him. He was programming him. And Shane was now awake enough to watch it happen, but utterly powerless to stop it. The cage wasn't just around him anymore.

It was being built inside his own mind.

Home felt smaller than Shane remembered.

Not physically. The house looked exactly the same as it always had. The basketball net near the driveway still leaned slightly to the left where his father had promised to fix it five summers ago and never actually did. The kitchen light above the sink was still on when he came in through the front door because his mother had always hated the idea of anyone coming home to darkness. Everything about it should have felt comforting after the chaos of All-Star Weekend, after hotels and cameras and too many people packed into too little space. Instead, standing in the foyer with his duffel hanging heavy from one shoulder, Shane felt strangely disconnected from it all, as though he had stepped back into a place he had already quietly outgrown without realizing it.

His mother hugged him too tightly, immediately fussing over whether he had eaten enough and whether the league had actually fed them properly or if he had survived mostly on protein bars and bad catering again. His father was subtler about it, clapping him once on the shoulder and asking about travel delays, the game, the media obligations. Normal questions. Familiar questions. It should have settled something restless inside him.

When he told his mother he wanted to look for his own place that night over dinner, she was a bit taken aback but his father had encouraged his need for independence, so a realtor was contacted and in a stroke of luck, she found him an apartment building with all his wants-a little over his budget but with the tenants already living there, he would be able to recoup the investment within a few months.

At night, he let his mind wander. No new texts. Nothing from Ily-Rozanov. Which should have felt relieving. Instead, if he was being embarrassingly honest with himself, it mostly just felt strange.

The next several days moved quickly. Hockey had a way of swallowing time whole, especially during the regular season. Practice, games, recovery then team workouts or film sessions until days folded into one another so seamlessly that sometimes Shane only realized how tired he was when he caught himself zoning out halfway through a meeting. Normally that rhythm grounded him. Normally hockey made everything else quieter.

Then the texts began. Shane had expected the bossy overhand texts. Instead, something had shifted. Mostly because Ilya Rozanov somehow became part of his routine. Not in any dramatic way. Not all at once. Just slowly -quietly. Persistently. At first, the texts annoyed him.

They arrived without warning and without context, usually phrased less like conversation and more like observations that somehow managed to sound vaguely like orders.

IGR - Eat before practice.

IGR - You looked tired after game.

IGR - You skate slower when exhausted.

Sometimes they were insulting:

IGR - Your defense tonight was embarrassing.

IGR - You looked distracted.

IGR - You are like a angry baby tiger when mad.

Which inevitably led to Shane texting back things like:

Shut up, asshole

Or:

You're literally the most annoying person alive.

Then, somehow, infuriatingly, those conversations stretched longer than they should have.

A complaint about airport food somehow turned into twenty minutes arguing over who had worse travel schedules. A stupid joke about bad hotel coffee became a running argument over whether Americans genuinely did not know how to make tea properly. One afternoon, after a particularly awful pregame meal, Shane had snapped a picture of dry chicken and overcooked vegetables with:

IGR: If I die from food poisoning, tell the league this is their fault.

Three minutes later:

IGR: America cooks terribly.

Followed immediately by:

IGR: Why are eggs this color?

Shane had laughed. Actually laughed.

Then sat there staring at his own phone afterward with immediate suspicion because what exactly had been funny about that?

Nothing. Absolutely nothing. And yet- The worst part, the truly humiliating part, was how quickly the texts became expected. He started checking his phone between workouts. Started looking at the screen during intermissions. Started wondering, quietly, privately, whether something would be waiting after games.

Some days the conversations felt weirdly easy in ways that unsettled him far more than the intensity ever had. Intensity he understood. Intensity was easier to fight. Harder to explain was the way Ilya somehow remembered things Shane barely noticed about himself. The tea he preferred after difficult games. The fact that he forgot meals whenever he got overwhelmed.

The specific way he got quieter before stressful road trips.

The fact that he hated early morning flights because they made him feel vaguely sick for hours afterward.

None of those observations arrived dramatically. They just appeared casually, slipped into conversation with alarming certainty, dropped between insults and hockey arguments like they had always existed there.

Every single time, Shane had the same awful thought:

How long have you been paying attention?

He never asked. Mostly because he suspected the answer would make him uncomfortable. Partly because some deeply embarrassing, traitorous part of him liked it. He liked being noticed.

But Shane wanted control again. Space. Privacy. Safety.

Sometimes, late at night, after road trips or difficult losses, the conversations settled into something unexpectedly easy. Hockey complaints. Dumb arguments. Long stretches of teasing insults that somehow felt comforting instead of exhausting.

Those were the dangerous nights. Because those were the moments Shane caught himself forgetting to be careful. Forgetting why this felt complicated. Forgetting why he should probably stop.

The realization usually came later, always later.

Usually while lying in bed staring at the ceiling of the new apartment after another conversation had stretched too long, phone warm in his hand, stomach twisted around emotions he did not fully trust.

Because none of this felt temporary anymore. That was the problem. It had started with one hotel room. One terrible, confusing night he still did not fully know how to categorize.

Somehow- without permission, Ilya had become woven into the quieter parts of his days. That should have scared him more than it did. Maybe it already did. The apartment had become dangerous too in its own way. Not because anything bad happened there. Because it felt too safe. Too private. Too easy to settle into habits he probably should not have.

The blankets had multiplied without him meaning for them to. Familiar textures gathered in corners of the couch. Hoodies stayed draped over chairs longer than necessary. Comfort accumulated slowly until the place felt warm in ways hotel rooms never had.

Sometimes Shane caught himself relaxing too much there. Sometimes he hated how quickly his body softened once he stepped through the door, Rozanov's scent still in the air from the clothes that still carried his scent. And sometimes, on worse days, he thought too hard about what all of it meant. Because eventually, inevitably, the same thought always found him.

This could end badly. Badly enough to ruin things he cared about. Badly enough to expose things he had spent years hiding. He understood enough about biology to know instincts were never simple. Alpha. Omega. It was already complicated before feelings entered the equation.

If feelings ever entered the equation. The possibility alone unsettled him.

Because whatever this thing between them was- it had edges now, weight. Something growing quietly beneath all the arguments and teasing and strange moments of softness Shane never knew what to do with afterward. And instinct complicated everything.

He had spent most of his life suppressing pieces of himself carefully enough that nobody questioned anything. The risks were too high otherwise. Hockey culture had gotten better, sure, but not enough. Not completely. Not in ways that made him feel safe gambling his future on hope. Omega's were still treated as trophy's, breeders and lower class.

Especially not when instinct eventually wanted things people could not always control. Attachment. Bonding. Mating. The word alone made his stomach twist.

Because if whatever this was became something real- eventually biology would want more, would push, would complicate.

Would demand.

And Shane had no idea what happened if he could not give it. Or worse, if he wanted to.

That thought scared him most.

Because somewhere beneath all the fear and irritation and confusion sat something much quieter. Something harder to argue with. He missed Rozanov when the texts stopped for too long. Missed the attention, missed being noticed. Missed the strange certainty of someone remembering small things about him without being asked.

That alone felt dangerous enough.

Which was why, one quiet night after another long conversation stretched later than it should have, Shane finally sat staring at his phone for a long time.

The apartment sat warm around him. A lamp glowed softly near the couch. Outside, snow pressed quietly against the windows while the city blurred into muted gold beneath the dark.

His thumbs hovered uselessly over the keyboard.

Then finally moved.

S- I think we should probably talk less.

He stared at the message.

Deleted it.

Typed again.

S- I'm getting busier over the next few weeks.

Deleted that too.

Coward.

Eventually, after nearly ten minutes of rewriting, he settled on something simpler. Safer.

Something that felt less honest than the truth.

S- Going to be quieter for a while. Need to focus.

The typing bubble appeared almost immediately.

Disappeared.

Appeared again.

Shane's pulse kicked unpleasantly.

Finally:

IGR- On what?

Shane swallowed.

Everything, he almost wrote. Himself, distance, control.

How badly this could go if he let himself stop thinking.

Instead:

S- Hockey. And I have endorsements to do.

The pause afterward stretched longer this time.

Too long.

Then finally:

IGR - Fine. We will discuss when I see you next week.

Nothing else came after. No argument. No teasing insult. No sarcastic comment.

Just silence.

Shane set the phone face down beside him and immediately hated how empty the apartment suddenly felt.

Chapter Summary

Putting this one down gently for you all, and running away to my bed again and hopefully breaking this fever. This chapter started was 13,000+ words, my sister edited down to around 9000 and I insisted to keeping my original ideas.

Don't kill me! Ilya will get more normal... maybe...probably.

Thank you to Alex, the best gay bestie a girl could have when she needs details on some boy boy love lol.

A million kisses to all the reviewers, people who leave kudos, and the ones who review every chapter-big fat Ilya kisses for you all lol

I'm going to go hide and anxiously await the feedback.

The plan had been simple. Or at least, as simple as anything involving Ilya Rozanov had apparently become.

Boston versus Montreal. Two weeks after All-Star weekend. After the first Boston vs.Montreal game, they'd meet, hookup and get this infatuation out of their systems.

Shane had spent an embarrassing amount of time trying very hard not to think about their last time together. Which naturally meant he thought about it constantly.

The idea settled into the edges of his routine before he fully realized it had become something to anticipate. He thought about it while unpacking kitchen cabinets, then reorganizing them when they absolutely did not need reorganizing. While unpacking groceries with the kind of meticulous focus that only really happened when he was nervous about something he refused to name. During workouts. During film review. Halfway through stretches when his attention drifted somewhere it should not.

Because despite everything, despite the boundary he told himself that they needed to establish, despite how serious Shane had been when he said they should talk less-

The texts had not stopped. They had changed. That was somehow worse.

The silence after Shane's message had lasted almost a full day.

Twenty-two deeply uncomfortable hours, to be exact.

Not that Shane had counted, obviously.

Then, late the following evening, while standing in his kitchen pretending to cook something healthier than takeout, his phone buzzed.

IGR- Ate dinner?

No acknowledgment of the silence for the day. No argument. No defensiveness.

Just dinner. Like nothing had happened.

Shane had stared at the message for three full minutes before finally typing:

S - Yes.

Three dots appeared immediately.

IGR - Good.

Then, a second later:

IGR- What is it? Some boring salad or a depressing flavor lacking piece of chicken.

Shane had laughed despite himself.

Then immediately hated himself for laughing. Things settled strangely after that. Not better exactly. But different.

Rozanov adjusted in ways Shane had not expected. Still annoying. Still incapable of minding his own business. Still somehow deeply irritating in ways that should have been exhausting.

But softer around the edges.

More observant.

After rough practices:

IGR- Rough day?

After games where Shane clearly looked exhausted:

IGR- Sleep tonight.

After interviews where nerves sat too visibly beneath carefully polite answers:

IGR- You looked not like yourself.

The worst part was how natural it started feeling, how easy.

The rhythm of it slipped quietly into Shane's days until he found himself checking his phone between workouts or after practice without really meaning to. Some nights the conversations stretched too late, drifting from hockey to stupid arguments to long silences that somehow never felt awkward.

Distance made it manageable. That was the dangerous part. Distance made everything feel safer.

Texting existed in this strange contained space where Shane could think before answering, where instinct stayed quieter, where proximity could not complicate things further. They could argue there. Joke there. Be strange there.

He liked it when the words didn't make sense. Rozanov had told him a few times that he had to look words up to make sure it was used correctly. He liked it when Rozanov gave little Russian names to him but refused to look them up- he didn't need to learn words in another language for something that was going to end in less than a week.

Even when Ilya made that difficult. Especially when Ilya made that difficult.

Like one night after an interview:

IGR- You looked good.

Shane frowned immediately.

S- Weird thing to say.

Pause.

Then:

IGR- True thing though.

Or after Shane sent a picture of a new sweater Hayden had bullied him into buying:

IGR- Keep wearing that.

S- Why?

Long pause.

Then:

IGR: Makes me want to bend you over and fuck you in just that sweater.

Which somehow felt worse.

Because it made heat bloom in his belly and he felt himself smile.

The deeply humiliating part was that sometimes Shane genuinely failed to recognize when Ilya was flirting with him until much later.

Usually hours later.

Usually while brushing his teeth or trying to fall asleep.

Then suddenly-

Oh.

That had been flirting.

Idiot.

Still- Seeing him again felt dangerous. The way Ilya somehow occupied space too easily. The way he looked at him. The way Shane forgot himself whenever they stood too close.

Texting felt safe. Seeing him again felt real. And real felt terrifying. This whole thing couldn't be real. The game sat on Shane's calendar like a countdown. Boston versus Montreal.

Every time he looked at it, something uncomfortable twisted beneath his ribs.

Especially because Ilya brought it up with unsettling certainty.

IGR- Dinner after game.

Not:

Do you want to have dinner with me after the game?

Just- Dinner. As if there was no way on earth that Shane would say no.

Shane had stared at the screen.

Then:

S: You're such an asshole.

IGR- You like it I think.

Heat climbed immediately into Shane's face. Because absolutely not. No. He ignored the message for twenty-six minutes.

Then:

S- Depends on the day.

The response arrived suspiciously fast.

IGR- Good answer, kotenok.

Shane spent fifteen full minutes pretending he had not immediately looked up the translation again despite already knowing perfectly well what it meant. That was one of the few words he let himself learn.

Idiot.

Then the snowstorm hit. At first, nobody worried. Hockey dealt with weather constantly. Flights got delayed all the time. Roads reopened. Schedules adjusted. Life moved on.

Then airports shut down.

Then the league announcement came. Game postponed. Shane stared at the notification for a long time.

Relief arrived first. Then disappointment. Sharp enough to make guilt follow almost instantly after. Some terrible part of him had been quietly panicking for days.

Now he had time. Distance. An excuse.

His phone buzzed.

Of course.

IGR- Convenient.

Shane frowned.

S- I literally did not cause a blizzard.

IGR- Suspicious timing.

S- Shut up.

Three dots.

Then:

IGR- Still seeing you soon.

Something unpleasantly warm settled low in Shane's stomach. Because it was stated as a fact again. Always certainty. Like time did not matter, like postponement was temporary.

Like eventually was enough. That should not have comforted him. Unfortunately, it kind of did. That was the beginning of the realization that he really needed to end this. There conversations continued over text and it left Shane feeling unbalanced and chaotic. The game had been postponed to the end of season, there was no real reason for them to be communicating now that plans had changed.

He made up his mind. He knew people had casual sex, he wasn't completely oblivious so that's what he needed to treat this as. No friendship, no need to be involved in each others day to day.

So that's what he did. Over the next few months, he put distance between them. Every time Rozanov brought meeting up while one of them was playing nearby, Shane somehow had a reason to not go.

Practice, travel, family obligations, apartment things, filming endorsements.

Busy. Always busy.

IGR- I fly out next week.

Shane stared. Too fast. Too real.

S- Kind of slammed.

Pause.

IGR- Following week then.

S- Road trip.

Another pause.

Then:

IGR- You are very busy suddenly these past few months.

The guilt landed immediately. Because Shane knew exactly what he was doing. The problem was not that he did not want to see Ilya. The problem was that he wanted too much. Wanted it desperately. Every time over the past 4 months, whenever he was happy, sad, lonely, tired- anything really, he wanted to reach out to Rozanov. To ask him how his day was. To tell him that he was going crazy because he thought his tenants were spying on him. That he wanted to win against him at the NHL awards next month. But no one always got what they wanted.

And wanting felt dangerous. Because texting had already become too important. Too routine. Too comforting. Stopping it before more feelings got involved felt safer for both of them, before they met in person again.

What happened if proximity made all of that worse?

What happened if seeing him again turned whatever this was into something Shane could no longer pretend was temporary?

Because eventually- instinct complicated things. Attachment complicated things. Being an Alpha and an Omega complicated things. And Shane had no idea what happened if this became real enough to want more. That terrified him.

Across the country, Ilya noticed the pattern almost immediately. Not rejection at first but avoidance.

Hollander still replied- just not as quickly. Ilya noticed immediately. Ilya watched the cameras in his apartment when he sent a text out, saw Shane read the message and put down the phone for a while before he eventually answered.

It maddened him. He had trashed his hotel room the first time he'd noticed and had been ejected from the game for being too aggressive that night when another three texts went unanswered.

When he managed to calm himself by the next day, he spent hours watching the feed of Shane moving around his home. Then it hit him-Shane's world was small-hockey, parents, a few friends. That was all. He was scared. Frightened of having something risky in his neat little world. And Ilya could understand that. It wouldn't change the outcome but at least he can understand that Hollander wanted to protect himself. He wasn't exactly unwilling and that distinction mattered.

For now, Ilya let the distance exist. Not because he liked it. Because pushing harder too early rarely worked. Eventually, Hollander would stop treating this want like something dangerous.

He didn't stay completely away though. That was an impossibility. Whenever he had the whole day off or the rare treat of consecutive days off, he flew to wherever Hollander was. He stood back in shadows while he filmed ads. He followed when he went shopping with his father, he particularly watched when he spent time with his teammate Pike and Dagenais. Those two he really hated-they were way too familiar with Hollander and he was too relaxed with them. But he stayed in the background, unseen and would wait for the chance to get him face to face- where he wouldn't be able to run.

The NHL Awards sounded like a amazing honor and opportunity to Shane and he was ecstatic when he was nominated for the Rookie of the Year. His first instinct was to call Rozanov and congratulate him on his own nomination but he stopped himself. Months of near complete silence put a damper on his mood but he had to push through when his parents ran over and they celebrated with the team at his mother's favorite Japanese restaurant. He braced himself to see Rozanov for the first time in months. He took the month to think about what they'd say to each other if anything. Clearly the only one suffering was Shane- he couldn't remember all the articles of Rozanov out every night with a different woman or man on his arm.

That was Shane's first coherent thought after the third hour of smiling politely at cameras and pretending he was not already exhausted. Already emotionally spent from being in the same room as the other man.

Everything about the night felt too polished. Too bright. Too full of people who wanted things from him. Cameras flashed constantly, catching awkward half smiles and stiff shoulders and conversations he barely registered. Veteran players moved through the room in expensive suits with the kind of practiced confidence Shane still had not learned how to imitate. Everywhere he turned, someone wanted something. A picture. An interview. A handshake. A quick comment about the season.

He tried his best. He really did. Winning Rookie of the Year was amazing, something he had wanted since he was a little kid. He was surprised since Rozanov was ahead of him by three goals for the season so far, but he was incredibly pleased.

But being seen this much had always made something restless crawl under his skin.

The applause still rang strangely in his ears long after he stepped off the stage. His parents had cried. His mother openly, his father pretending not to while squeezing his shoulder hard enough afterward that Shane understood anyway. Hayden had nearly tackled him backstage. JJ had texted him fourteen times in all caps.

Scott Hunter had looked genuinely proud. "Hell of a year, kid," Scott had said, one broad hand landing warm and steady between Shane's shoulder blades. "You earned this."

The praise settled awkwardly somewhere beneath Shane's ribs because he still sometimes forgot people he grew up admiring were real enough to stand beside him. Scott had become something of a friend these past few weeks after New York had played against Montreal., he made things feel possible. Or at least less terrifying. Which was probably why Shane stayed near him most of the night. Not intentionally at first, it just happened. Scott understood media rooms. Understood crowds. Understood when Shane looked overwhelmed enough that conversation became difficult.

"You good?" Scott had asked quietly after one particularly aggressive round of interviews.

"Yeah," Shane answered automatically.

Scott snorted. "Terrible liar."

Shane laughed softly despite himself.

"You look like you wanna crawl under a table."

"That obvious?"

"Yeah. Come on-let's get the others and have a drink. Where's your boy Rozanov?"

Shane stopped cold. "What? My boy?" A million denials were on the tip of his tongue.

"Well, you know. It's always 'Hollander and Rozanov'. You two are always going to be thrown together it looks like." Scott gathered a few players he was familiar with and after two shots, Shane was starting to feel it.

Across the room, Ilya Rozanov watched the entire thing unfold with steadily worsening patience.

Months. Months apart. Months of avoidance disguised as scheduling conflicts and nervous excuses. The silence. Ilya still watched his games. Still watched his phone activity and the cameras. He had been patient.

Far more patient than anyone deserved credit for. And now, after months - he finally stood in the same room again. Only for every Alpha in the building to suddenly decide Shane Hollander was approachable. Congratulatory hands landed too easily on shoulders. Too many people stood too close. Too much scent in one place.

And Scott Hunter. That one annoyed him most. Not because Hunter was doing anything inappropriate. That almost made it worse. Hunter felt safe. Older. Established. Publicly mated. Calm. The kind of Alpha Shane visibly relaxed around without even realizing it. Ilya hated how obvious it was. The slight loosening of Shane's shoulders. The easier laugh.

The way he kept drifting subtly back toward Hunter throughout dinner. Every instinct in Ilya sharpened unpleasantly around the edges.

He knew better than to make a scene. Knew better than to trust his temper tonight. Because the ugly truth sat heavy beneath all the irritation: He had missed Shane, too much. More than he intended. More than made sense.

Seeing him again after months of distance felt unfairly immediate. Familiar in ways distance should have dulled but somehow never did. Shane still touched the side of his neck when nervous. Still folded inward slightly when overwhelmed. Still looked too young whenever he got tired. And he still had no idea when someone was flirting with him. That part remained absurdly endearing.

A retired player had spent ten straight minutes obviously hitting on him near the bar earlier while Shane nodded politely and changed the conversation to hockey drills.

Idiot. My beautiful, boring idiot.

Hunter leaned closer to say something. Shane laughed. Something dark tightened unpleasantly in Ilya's chest. Enough.

Before he did something embarrassing. Before he said something territorial in a room full of cameras. Before he actually considered punching Scott Hunter, which felt deeply unreasonable considering the man had done absolutely nothing wrong besides exist comfortably beside Shane.

"I need air," Ilya muttered to no one in particular. A teammate frowned. "You okay?"

"Yes."

"You look angry." Maybe. Ilya left anyway.

The rooftop was cold. Quiet- better.

City lights stretched endlessly below while cooler night air whisked the cigarette smoke away from him. He leaned against the railing, suit jacket abandoned over one shoulder, cigarette balanced loosely between his fingers.

The first drag burned pleasantly. The second did nothing. The third barely touched the tension under his ribs.

"Still smoking?"

Ilya stilled. Of course. He turned slowly.

Hollander stood near the rooftop door, tie loosened slightly now, hair messier than earlier., a faint blush bringing out those damn freckles that had enraptured him as soon as he laid eyes on Hollander. Trophy long abandoned somewhere downstairs.

For a second, neither moved. Distance suddenly felt ridiculous. Because there he was.

Months apart collapsing uncomfortably fast beneath proximity.

Shane frowned faintly.

"You okay?" No greeting. No awkwardness. Straight to concern.

Something warm and irritating twisted low in Ilya's chest.

"No."

The honesty seemed to surprise them both.

Shane shifted closer carefully, hands shoved into pockets. "You disappeared."

"I needed to leave."

"Why?"

Ilya laughed once. Sharp, humorless.

"You really ask?"

Shane frowned harder.

"I don't know."

Of course he didn't. Because Hollander genuinely had no idea what he looked like standing beside Scott Hunter all night. Comfortable. Easy. Safe.

Like he belonged there. Like months apart hadn't hurt him as much as it hurt Ilya..

Ilya looked away briefly, jaw tightening.

"You avoid me for months," he said quietly. "Then I finally see you again and every Alpha in room is suddenly touching you."

Shane blinked. "What?"

"Hunter." The word came flatter than intended.

Recognition hit Shane almost immediately.

"Oh my God."

"You stay beside him entire night."

"He's helping me."

"Yes."

"You sound jealous."

"I am."

The honesty landed hard enough that Shane stopped. Neither of them spoke for a second. The city hummed quietly below.

Shane crossed his arms. "You don't get to be jealous."

"I know."

"Then why are you acting like this?"

Ilya exhaled slowly. Because the truthful answer sounded unreasonable. Because months of distance sat badly under his skin. Because seeing Hollander again after so long had somehow made missing him worse instead of better.

"You've been hiding from me for months.," he said finally, quieter now.

Shane looked away. Guilt arrived too visibly. "That's not fair."

"No?"

"No."

"You avoid me."

Shane swallowed hard. "You make things difficult."

"I ask to see you."

"You don't ask," Shane said immediately. "You decided. You ordered."

Pause.

Then - "...fair," Ilya admitted.

That startled him. Enough that Shane laughed softly despite himself.

"I don't know what I'm doing," Shane admitted eventually, voice quieter now. "Okay?"

The honesty shifted something.

Ilya waited.

"It's easier when you're far away," Shane said finally.

Fear. Distance felt safer. Of course it did. Shane continued before Ilya could answer.

"When you're far away, I can think. We text. I can pretend this isn't..." He hesitated.

"You are drunk." Ilya stated, finally managing to get a better look at him.

"I just need some air."

For a long second, only city noise filled the silence.

Then Ilya looked out toward the skyline. Suddenly the anger that had simmered under the surface from Hollander ignoring him for so long burst out.

"Had to get away from your new fans at party? Congratulations, by the way."

Shane frowned slightly. "It would have gone to either one of us."

"But it went to you. Well deserved, the poster boy of the NHL."

"You're such a fucking asshole! I win one stupid thing and you couldn't even come up to me and just talk to me. You're ahead of me in all the stats and I win one fucking thing and you're out here throwing yourself a pity party!"

"This has nothing to do with you, Hollander! You fucking try to disappear suddenly and what, I should congratulate you and put you on pedestal like everyone else? What do you want?"

"Nothing. I don't want anything from you. I just needed some air."

Ilya fumed more. He threw the spent cigarette over the ledge and tried to calm down before he spoke again. "I go back home this week."

"Home?"

"Russia." The word landed strangely heavy. Ask me to stay. Ask me to go back to what we were starting. Ilya begged internally.

The quiet afterward stretched. Long enough that Shane hated how disappointed he suddenly felt. Because summer felt long. Too long. "That must be nice." Because somehow, without realizing it, he had assumed Ilya would still be there. Texting. Annoying. Present.

Ilya looked at him finally. Expression unreadable. "I go see my family," he said quietly, pushing away from the balcony ledge.

Hollander looked down. "I thought we could, I don't know. Maybe-" He stopped himself and shook his head. Mostly because for the first time in months- he was not entirely sure he wanted an excuse anymore.

"Have a good summer, Rozanov. See you next season." He held out his hand and Ilya walked over slowly to him, Ilya couldn't stop himself anymore. There was no slow lean, no question. Ilya closed the final inch and captured Shane's mouth with his own. It wasn't a kiss. It was a conquest.

The initial pressure was fierce, almost bruising, a release of hours of pent-up tension. Ilya's lips were demanding, moving with a hungry, relentless rhythm that stole the air from Shane's lungs. A soft, startled sound and a muffled moan escaped Hollander, swallowed instantly by Ilya. One of Ilya's hands slid up to grip Shane's face moving him exactly how he wanted, the fingers of his other hand threading into his dark, soft hair, tilting his head to deepen the angle. Once Hollander was completely pliant he braced both arms against the wall, caging them the smaller man completely.

The taste of him was overwhelming. Bitter whiskey,, a hint of spearmint, and something uniquely, essentially Shane—a dark, warm flavor that went straight to Ilya's head. His own hands, which had been frozen at their sides, rose of their own volition, fists clutching desperately at the worn cotton of Ilya's shirt. They pulled him closer, or maybe he surged forward; the distinction melted away. The kiss deepened, turned wet and searching. Ilya's tongue swept against the seam of Shane's lips, and they opened for him with a shuddering gasp.

The quiet hallway was filled with the raw, intimate sounds of it: the slick, hot slide of mouths, the ragged pull of breath through noses, the soft, desperate whimpers Shane couldn't suppress. Ilya answered with a low groan from deep in his chest, a vibration Shane felt against his own. His body pressed Hollander's harder into the wall, the solid line of him from chest to thigh a brand of heat through their clothes. The careful professionalism of the day, the weeks of hurt and lonely, incinerated in the span of a heartbeat, leaving only this primal, grasping need.

Shane was drowning in it, in the scent and the taste and the sheer rightness of Ilya's weight. His mind fogged, blissfully empty of everything but sensation. The rough scrape of Ilya's stubble against their chin. The iron grip in his hair.

Suddenly Shane broke through the haze of sensation and realized where they were. What they were doing. It sliced through the haze like a shard of ice.

Reality crashed back in, cold and terrifying. A rooftop- a very public rooftop.

A bolt of pure, adrenal fear shot through Shane's veins, freezing the fire in their blood. They tore their mouth away from Ilya's with a ragged, wet sound.

"Nngh—stop! What the fuck are you doing!"

He yelled as he shoved against Ilya's lips. Shane's hands, which had been clinging, now pushed at his chest. The movement was frantic, bird-like.

Ilya stilled, but didn't pull back. His forehead rested against Shane's, his breath coming in harsh, hot gusts that fanned over their wet, swollen lips. His eyes were heavy-lidded, dark with a hunger that was far from sated. "Hollander," he murmured, voice gravelly and thick.

"Someone," Shane gasped, their own voice trembling. They strained to listen, their body rigid with panic. The silence now felt predatory, listening back. "I heard a door. Someone could come."

The spell shattered. Ilya's eyes cleared, sharpening from lust to alertness. He pulled back, just an inch, his head turning to scan the long, shadowed corridor. His jaw was tight, the muscles working. The loss of his heat was immediate and profound; the wall felt like ice against Shane's back.

For a long, suspended moment, they stayed there, frozen in the aftermath. Shane's heart hammered against their ribs, a frantic drumbeat of fear and lingering desire. His lips felt bruised, sensitive, throbbing with the ghost of the kiss. Ilya looked back at them, his gaze dropping to their mouth, and Shane saw the conflict warring in him, the urge to reclaim what was interrupted warring with the cold logic of the risk.

Slowly, with obvious effort, Ilya uncurled his fingers from Hollander's hair. His arm lowered from the wall. He took a full step back, putting a foot of devastating, professional distance between them. The space felt like a chasm.

"See you next season, Hollander."

By some stroke of luck, the first game of the season was Montreal vs. Boston. They had started texting again over the summer.

IGR- Let's make a bet.

S- Ok?

IGR- If I win, I get to fuck you wherever and however many times I want tonight.

Ilya watched the text bubbles start and stop for several minutes.

S- And if I win?

IGR- Same prize, but more boring...

S- Asshole

IGR- How many times do you think you can come tonight?

Same thing, typing and stopping for a few minutes. Ilya put the phone down within view while he put his gear on.

S- I dont know. Maybe twice.

So fucking cute, Ilya thought with a grin.

IGR- I'm going to ruin you.

Ilya pushed the cell into his bag.

They won. 4-3 but he had a hat trick and an all around amazing game. He gave Hollander a wink and an extra squeeze of his hand during the final lineup.

By the time he finished his shower, he had a text message with the address.

S- 175 Mountain Ct. Come through the side entrance on Manor.

He parked a block away, chewing gum to get rid of the cigarette taste. He went inbetween the building and frowned at the dark alley, relieved when he saw the door open and Hollander step out halfway..

"You will murder me." He said half in jest because Hollander had that angry kitten look to him again. He didn't stop until he was right in front of Shane, close enough that Shane had to tilt his head back to meet his eyes.

"Maybe!" He hissed. "What took you so long?" Shane's own voice was thin, breathless.

Ilya's gaze was a physical weight, traveling over Shane's face, lingering on his lips. "Are you going to invite me up?" They joked together as they raced each other up the stairs, loosening some of the tension.

Shane was hyper-aware of Ilya beside him, of his size, his heat, the clean, sharp scent of him cutting through the sterile air. He fumbled with his keys at the door, his hands clumsy.

His apartment was neat, quiet, all soft greys and blues. It felt small with Rozanov in it. He watched as the Alpha shrugged out of his coat, draping it over the back of his sofa, and looked around with that same assessing gaze. Taking inventory. Claiming territory.

“So, where do you want me?” Ilya said, nodding to the couch. “That chair, the floor? The counter?”

Shane scoffed, walking away towards the hallway. Ilya followed silently. He stood in the center of the room, looking around the bedroom. The power dynamic was immediate, palpable.

“Wow. Someone likes the decorating magazines.”

“Shut up. I hired someone.”

Ilya nodded, moving closer to him “You have been frightened.” Ilya took a step closer. “Of this.” Another step. “Of what happens when there is no phone between us.” He was standing in front of Shane now, looking down. “You do not need to be frightened of me.”

“I’m not,” Shane whispered, the lie obvious.

Ilya tilted Shane to look up at him with a hand wrapped around his chin. His expression was serious, intent. “Holander. Look at me.” Shane forced his eyes up. “Nothing happens here that you do not want. Do you understand? Every touch. Every kiss. Every single thing. You say yes, or you say no, or you say wait. And I will listen. This is not a game. This is a promise.”

The intensity of his gaze, the raw sincerity in his voice, shattered something inside Shane. The last of his resistance crumbled. He wanted this. He wanted him. The obsession, the attention, the terrifying, all-consuming focus.

“Yes,” Shane breathed.

Ilya’s eyes darkened. He reached up, his hand impossibly gentle, and cupped Shane’s cheek. His thumb stroked over the arch of Shane’s cheekbone. “Yes?”

“Yes.”

Ilya leaned in and kissed him.

It was not what Shane expected. It was not demanding or rough. It was slow. Deep. Devastatingly thorough. A kiss that felt like being known. Ilya’s mouth was warm, his taste clean and sharp. He kissed like he did everything else, with absolute focus, learning Shane’s responses, the soft sound he made in the back of his throat, the way his hands came up to clutch at Ilya’s shoulders.

When they broke apart, both were breathing heavily. Ilya rested his forehead against Shane’s. “Patches,” he murmured, and it was a question.

In the soft light of his bedroom, Rozanov undressed him with a reverence that made Shane tremble. Each button of his shirt, each brush of fingers against his skin, was deliberate. Ilya kissed every new inch of skin he uncovered, his collarbone, the center of his chest, the dip of his navel. When Shane stood bare before him, shivering, Ilya just looked at him, his gaze hot and worshipful.

“You are so beautiful,” Ilya said, the words gravel-rough. “You have no idea.”

Then it was Ilya’s turn. Shane watched, heart hammering, as Ilya stripped off his own clothes, revealing the most powerful, beautiful body Shane had ever seen. He was magnificent. And he was here. For him.

Ilya guided him onto the bed, covering Shane’s body with his own, their skin meeting everywhere in a shock of heat. The weight of him was glorious, anchoring, safe. The kissing resumed, deeper, hungrier, but Ilya’s hands were endlessly patient, mapping Shane’s body, learning what made him gasp, what made him arch.

“Tell me,” Ilya whispered against his throat, his lips brushing over the suppressant patch. “Tell me that you still want.”

“I still want,” Shane gasped, his hips canting up of their own accord. “I want you. All of you.”

Ilya made a low, approving sound. Shane reached for the nightstand, where he pulled out a strip of condoms. Ilya prepared Shane with meticulous, tender care that made Shane weep. His fingers were gentle, stretching, scissoring, crooking until Shane was a writhing, begging mess beneath him.

“Roza-please-”

“Look at me, are you okay?” Ilya asked, poised at his entrance. Shane forced his eyes open and nodded quickly but tensed again when he looked down and felt Ilya’s cock at his entrance. He looked up, meeting the stormy blue gaze. “Don’t worry, it will fit. Last chance to say no.” He said with a smirk and an incredibly gentle kiss.

“Yes. God, yes.”

Ilya pushed in.

It was a stretch, a burn, an overwhelming fullness that stole the air from Shane’s lungs. He arched his head back and cried out, his nails digging into Ilya’s back. Ilya stilled, buried to the hilt, his entire body trembling with the effort of holding back.

“Breathe, kotenok,” he soothed, brushing the sweat-damp hair from Shane’s forehead. “Breathe for me. Tell me when.”

Shane took a shuddering breath, the initial shock melting into a deep, radiating pleasure. The feeling of being so completely filled, so utterly claimed, was unlike anything he’d ever imagined. “Move,” he pleaded. “God, please move.”

Ilya began to move. Slow, deep, relentless strokes that built a fire in Shane's core. He set a rhythm that was both punishing and worshipful, his eyes never leaving Shane's face, watching every flicker of pleasure, every wince of overstimulation. He adjusted his angle, and Shane saw stars.

"There-oh, god, right there"

Ilya hammered that spot, his thrusts growing more urgent, his control fraying. "You feel... you feel like heaven, Hollander. So tight. So perfect for me." He leaned down, capturing Shane's mouth in a searing kiss. "Come for me. Let me feel you."

It was the combination of the words, the relentless friction, the smell of Ilya's skin, the feeling of his teeth scraping gently over Shane's scent gland. Shane shattered. Pleasure tore through him, white-hot and blinding, his body bowing off the bed as he came with a broken sob, his release striping between their stomachs.

The sensation of Shane pulsing around him tipped Ilya over the edge. With a guttural groan that was pure possession, he followed, his own climax wracking through him as he emptied into the condom, his hips stuttering against Shane's.

He collapsed, careful to keep his weight on his elbows, and buried his face in Shane's neck, breathing in the scent of sweat, sex, and them. Shane's arms came up, weak and trembling, to wrap around his back, holding him there.

For a long time, they just breathed together, the world slowly filtering back in the sound of rain against the window, the distant hum of city traffic, the pounding of their own hearts.

The pleasure was a tidal wave, pulling him under, dragging him into a warm, silent, blissful dark. Subspace. He floated there, weightless, thoughtless, aware only of the heavy, perfect weight on top of him and the slow, aftershock pulses of his own body. The world was reduced to heat, scent, and the low, steady thrum of a satisfied alpha's purr against his chest.

Ilya felt the exact moment Shane's consciousness drifted away from the sharp edges of the room and into that soft, surrendered place. The tension melted from his limbs, his breathing evened out, his eyes glazed over, staring at the ceiling without seeing it. A perfect, pliant omega. His omega.

A crazy, possessive idea, sharp and sudden as a shard of ice, lanced through Ilya's post-orgasm haze.

He could stop this now. He could let Shane believe this was just a hot, intense hookup. A one-time collision. He could pull out, clean them up, make a joke, and leave. That was the plan. The safe plan. The plan that wouldn't send Shane running for the hills.

The thought of leaving, of walking out of this room and letting Shane think this was just sex, felt like tearing out his own ribs.

He looked down at Shane's face, slack with pleasure, lips kiss-swollen, utterly trusting in his vulnerability. No. This wasn't a fling. It couldn't be.

He shifted, moving slowly so as not to startle him. He gathered Shane's boneless body in his arms and rolled them, maneuvering Shane onto his back again, settling between his thighs. Shane made a soft, confused noise, his brow furrowing slightly as the change in position began to tug him back toward awareness.

Ilya didn't let him surface fully. He dipped his head, nuzzling into Shane's throat, bypassing the suppressant patch to nip and suck at the sensitive skin just below his ear, along the line of his jaw. It was a possessive, grounding touch, a reassertion of claim. Shane's breath hitched, a low whimper escaping him as sensation began to filter back in.

"Ilya...?" His voice was slurred, thick with confusion and lingering pleasure.

"Shh, kotenok," Ilya murmured against his skin, his voice a velvet-wrapped command. "Still with me?"

Shane nodded slowly, his hands coming up to tangle weakly in Ilya's hair. "Mmm."

Ilya kissed his way back to Shane's mouth, swallowing the little sigh he made. The kiss was deep, languid, a slow rekindling of the fire. When he pulled back, Shane's eyes were clearer, but still hazy, his pupils blown wide.

"I want you here now," Ilya said, his voice dropping to a dark, intimate rasp. He slid his hand between them, his fingers finding Shane's slick, sensitive entrance, still stretched and throbbing from their first joining. He pressed against him, not entering, just applying a firm, bruising pressure that made Shane gasp and arch off the mattress. "Still okay?"

It was a formality. A pantomime of consent performed for the part of Shane's brain that was still capable of rational thought. The part that was rapidly being drowned out again by the renewed rush of arousal Ilya was coaxing from his body.

Shane's answer was a slow, dazed nod, his hips pushing down against Ilya's fingers. "Yes... okay..." He was chasing the feeling, chasing Ilya's lips again, already slipping back under the spell.

Ilya kissed him, deep and thorough, as his other hand groped blindly for the strip of condoms on the nightstand. He tore one free, the sound loud in the quiet room. He broke the kiss, holding Shane's gaze as he brought the packet to his mouth, tearing it open with his teeth. The act was deliberately primal, dominant, and he saw Shane shiver in response.

But as he went to sheath himself, Shane's hand fluttered up, landing on his wrist. Not to stop him. Just a touch. His eyes were unfocused again, drawn to Ilya's mouth. He leaned up, seeking another kiss, distractible as a kitten.

Ilya met him halfway, kissing him with a sudden, desperate hunger. This is wrong, a cold, logical voice whispered in the back of his mind. You are taking the choice from him.

He drowned the voice in the taste of Shane's mouth, in the sweet, surrendering scent of him. He couldn't help it. The need to bind Shane to him, truly bind him, was a fever in his blood.

While kissing Shane deeply, swallowing his soft, needy sounds, Ilya made a show of rolling the condom on. The latex whispered against his skin. But as he positioned himself at Shane's entrance once more, he let his control over his own scent slip. Just a fraction. Not a full, aggressive alpha command, but a targeted, potent release of calming, claiming pheromones - the biological equivalent of a lullaby mixed with a brand. He watched Shane's face as it hit him.

Shane's eyes, which had been fluttering closed in anticipation, flew open for a second, wide and startled. Then they glazed over completely, the last vestiges of tension melting from his body. His expression went slack, peaceful, utterly vacant. A low, contented hum vibrated in his chest. He was gone, submerged even deeper into that pliant, trusting subspace, his biology overriding his mind, accepting the pheromonal claim as truth.

"That's it," Ilya whispered, a vicious thrill of triumph and guilt twisting in his gut. He pressed forward, sinking into the exquisite, unprotected heat of Shane's body.

The feeling was astronomically better. Raw. Primal. The slick, tight clutch of him, the shocking intimacy of skin on skin. It was everything. It was a line crossed that could never be uncrossed.

Ilya set a slow, deep, devastating rhythm, each thrust a deliberate act of possession. He watched Shane's face, the blank pleasure there, and knew he was committing a sin. He was tying their futures together with a biological knot Shane hadn't consciously agreed to.

And as he felt his own climax building, a fierce, possessive certainty settled over him. It didn't matter. Shane was his. He had been from the moment Ilya decided it. This was just making it real in the most fundamental way possible.

He came with Shane's name a prayer and a curse on his lips, spilling inside him, marking him, claiming him in the oldest way an alpha could.

After, as he held Shane's limp, blissed-out body against his chest, he kissed his damp hair and whispered the truth into the silent, complicit dark.

"You are mine now, kotenok. You just don't know it yet."

Much later, Shane stirred. The fog was lifting, leaving behind a bone-deep soreness and a feeling of profound, terrifying peace. He was curled on his side, Ilya's chest a solid wall against his back, a heavy arm draped possessively over his waist.

The room was dark. The rain had stopped.

Reality began to seep in, cold and clarifying.

He'd done it. He'd slept with Ilya Rozanov. Not in a hotel room, not in a moment of desperate passion, but here, in his own bed. He'd given him everything, his first time with an alpha, his first time with anyone. And it had been... it had been more than he could have ever imagined. Overwhelming. Consuming. Perfect.

A flicker of unease cut through the afterglow. The second time... it was hazy. Beautiful, but hazy. He remembered the feeling of Ilya inside him again, even more intense, even more present. He remembered the scent that had wrapped around him, sweet and heavy, pulling him under...

He shifted slightly, and the movement triggered a dull, deep ache, a feeling of fullness that was... different. More significant.

Ilya's arm tightened around him. "Awake?" His voice was sleep-rough, vibrating against Shane's spine.

"Yeah."

Ilya nuzzled the back of his neck, his lips finding the edge of the suppressant patch. "Okay?"

Shane swallowed. "Yeah."

Ilya went very still behind him. The silence stretched, thick and heavy. Then he pressed a soft, lingering kiss to Shane's shoulder. "Sleep, kotenok. We will talk in the morning."

It wasn't an answer. It was a postponement. And in that moment, Shane knew. He knew with a sudden, chilling certainty what that different feeling meant. What the overwhelming, scent-drunk haze had allowed.

He should be furious. He should be terrified. He should shove Ilya away and scream.

But as Ilya's arm tightened around him again, pulling him closer into the safe, warm cage of his body, all Shane felt was a deep, settling certainty to match Ilya's own. A terrible, beautiful sense of fate.

He had wanted to be kept.

And now, in the most irrevocable way possible, he was.

The silence in the room was profound, broken only by the slowing syncopation of their breaths. Shane felt boneless, adrift in a warm, hazy sea. The sharp edges of the world- the rain, the streetlights, his own name, were all blurred beneath a layer of perfect, floating contentment. Subspace. He knew the term academically, but felt it was something else entirely. It was safety. It was surrender. It was the absence of all fear.

Ilya held him through it, his chest a solid, steady rise and fall against Shane's back. He said nothing, just stroked a hand slowly, rhythmically, from Shane's shoulder down to his hip and back again. A possessive, soothing metronome. He was waiting. Watching. Calculating.

He felt the precise moment Shane's breathing evened out from ragged pants to something deeper, more restful. The omega's scent, which had been a frantic, sweet storm of arousal and release, was mellowing into something sleepy and satisfied. But the pheromonal claim Ilya had released - the one that had pushed Shane so deep under, still lingered in the air, a subtle, binding perfume. It was time to move.

"Come," Ilya murmured, his voice a low vibration against Shane's skin. He shifted, disentangling their limbs with a care that felt incongruously tender. Before Shane could protest or even fully process the movement, Ilya had slid an arm under his knees and behind his back, lifting him from the sweat-damp sheets as if he weighed nothing.

Shane made a soft, confused sound, his head lolling against Ilya's shoulder. "Wha...?"

"Shower," Ilya said simply, carrying him effortlessly through the dim bedroom into the attached bathroom. He nudged the light on with his elbow—a soft, golden glow from a single fixture—and set Shane down on the closed toilet lid, keeping a steadying hand on his shoulder. Shane blinked up at him, his eyes still glassy, his expression soft and unguarded. Beautifully wrecked. His.

Ilya turned and started the shower, adjusting the taps until steam began to billow, fogging the mirror. The practical reason was clear: to clean up, to soothe sore muscles, to help Shane come down gently from the intense subspace. The other reason coiled, cold and deliberate, in Ilya's gut. He needed to wash away the evidence. The chances of conception outside of a heat were statistically slim, but they were not zero. And the biological claim he'd just made - the unprotected knotting, the deliberate pheromone surge, was designed to maximize those slim chances. It was a primal gamble, and he couldn't leave the physical proof of it on Shane's skin or sheets for him to find later, when his mind was clear and panic could set in.

He turned back to Shane, who was watching the steam curl with a childlike fascination. Ilya crouched in front of him, framing his face with both hands. "Stay with me, kotenok," he said, his tone firm but not unkind. "Just for a few more minutes."

He helped Shane stand, his body pliant and trusting, and guided him under the hot spray. Shane gasped as the water hit his skin, a full-body shiver running through him. The heat seemed to jumpstart his nervous system; his eyes lost some of their distant haze, focusing on Ilya's face as Ilya stepped in behind him, crowding him gently against the warm tile wall.

"Okay?" Ilya asked, reaching for the body wash. He poured a generous amount into his palm, the clean, citrus scent a stark contrast to the musk of sex that still clung to them.

Shane nodded, his head tipping back against Ilya's chest as Ilya's soap-slicked hands began to move over his body. It wasn't sexual. Not at first. It was methodical, thorough. Ilya washed every inch of him, his touch firm and proprietary, rinsing away the sweat, the spend, the scent of their coupling. He paid particular attention to between Shane's thighs, his fingers gentle but insistent, ensuring nothing remained. Shane trembled under the intimate ministrations, a faint blush returning to his cheeks as full awareness began to trickle back, bringing with it a wave of shyness.

"I can... I can do it," Shane mumbled, trying to turn.

“I know,” Ilya said, his hands not stopping. “Let me.”

It was a command, softly spoken. Shane stilled, surrendering again, but this time with a flicker of conscious choice. The submission went deeper now, past biology into something more willingly given.

When Shane was clean, Ilya turned him around and began to wash himself under Shane’s watchful gaze. Shane’s eyes traced the water sluicing over the hard planes of Ilya’s chest, the old scars, the evidence of his own nails down Ilya’s back. A different kind of heat began to stir, low and insistent, cutting through the lingering lethargy.

Ilya saw it. He always saw it. He rinsed off and reached for Shane again, not to clean, but to pull him close. The water beat down on them, a private cocoon of sound and steam. Shane’s body fit perfectly against his, skin slick and hot.

“Rozanov,” Shane breathed, the name a question and an answer.

Ilya kissed him, deep and slow, tasting the clean water on his lips. His hands slid down Shane’s back, over the curve of his ass, pulling him closer until their erections slid together, a shock of renewed sensation that made them both groan.

“Again?” Ilya murmured against his mouth, one hand drifting to cradle the back of Shane’s head, protecting it from the tile.

Shane’s answer was to surge up, kissing him with a desperate hunger that belied his earlier exhaustion. “Yes. Please.”

Ilya’s control, already frayed by the monumental transgression of before, threatened to snap. He wanted to take, to claim, to bury himself in that heat again and again until the bond was so deep nothing could ever break it. But as he guided Shane’s leg up around his hip, as he pressed forward and felt the tight, slick resistance, Shane winced. A sharp, bitten-off inhale against Ilya’s neck.

Ilya froze. Every possessive, alpha instinct screamed at him to push through, to remind Shane who he belonged to, that a little pain was part of the claiming. But the memory of Shane’s tear-streaked face at the height of his pleasure, the trust in his glazed eyes, rose up like a dam.

Gentle. He had to be gentle. He’d already taken too much.

He forced himself to still, to breathe through the pounding need. He shifted his angle, pressed in with infinitesimal slowness, watching Shane’s face for every micro-expression. “Breathe,” he coaxed, his voice strained with the effort of holding back. “Just breathe into it, kotenok. I have you.”

Shane’s eyes were squeezed shut, his nails digging into Ilya’s biceps. But as Ilya slid deeper, with excruciating patience, the pain etched on his face gradually melted into a dazed sort of wonder. “Oh,” he whispered, his body relaxing incrementally, accepting the renewed fullness.

“Good,” Ilya praised, brushing his lips over Shane’s damp forehead. “So good for me.” He began to move, a shallow, rocking rhythm that was more about connection than frantic pursuit. The water cascaded over them, muffling their sounds, turning the shower into a world of its own. This wasn’t the earth-shattering possession of before; it was something slower, sweeter, more devastating in its intimacy. Ilya kissed him through it, whispering praise and filth in equal measure in Russian and English, watching as Shane came apart not with a shattered cry, but with a series of soft, broken whimpers, his release washed away by the spray almost instantly.

Ilya followed, his own climax a deep, rolling wave of satisfaction that was as much emotional as physical. He held Shane upright as they both shuddered through the aftershocks, the water finally beginning to run cool.

He turned off the shower and reached for a towel, wrapping Shane in it first with a care that felt almost reverent. He dried him meticulously, then himself. When he led a sleepy, pliant Shane back to the bed, he pulled back the soiled top sheet, revealing clean ones underneath. He tucked Shane in, then climbed in beside him, pulling him back into the shelter of his body.

In the dark, with Shane’s breathing deepening into sleep, Ilya stared at the ceiling. The guilt was there, a cold, sharp stone in his chest. He had manipulated him. He had lied by omission. He had tried to seed a life inside him without his knowledge, all to chain him irrevocably.

Shane shifted in his sleep, murmuring something unintelligible, and pressed closer, his hand fisting loosely in the hair on Ilya’s chest. A gesture of pure, unconscious trust.

Ilya closed his eyes, the guilt not dissolving, but being absorbed into the larger, darker, more powerful emotion: certainty. The ends justified the means. Shane was his. He would be protected, cherished, owned. And if a child came of this night, then the bond would be unbreakable. Shane might never forgive him if he found out, but he would never leave.

It was a terrible, beautiful calculus.

As dawn began to lighten the edges of the blinds, Ilya pressed a final, possessive kiss to the sleeping omega’s hair.

“Mine,” he whispered into the quiet, a vow and a verdict.

The first thing Shane became aware of was warmth. A solid, heavy warmth along his back, and an arm like an iron band settled over his waist, holding him close. The second was the scent- clean linen, his own shower gel, and underneath it, the deep, unmistakable pine-and-snow signature of Ilya Rozanov. It wasn’t a ghost or a memory on borrowed sheets. It was the man himself, asleep and real in Shane’s bed.

He lay perfectly still, afraid to breathe too deeply and break the spell. Sunlight, thin and pale with early morning, filtered through the blinds, painting stripes across the rumpled duvet. The events of the night unspooled in his mind, not as a frantic, overwhelming blur, but as a series of vivid, stunning impressions. The look in Ilya’s eyes when he’d appeared on the sidewalk. The devastating patience of his hands. The feeling of being so thoroughly known, so completely wanted, that every fear had simply burned away.

A deep, bone-deep soreness hummed through him, a pleasant, claiming ache that made his cheeks heat with a private, thrilling shame. He had done that. He had let that happen. More than that, he had begged for it.

Ilya stirred behind him, his breathing pattern shifting from sleep to wakefulness. Shane felt the exact moment he became aware, the arm around his waist tightening almost imperceptibly, a silent, possessive good morning. A nose nudged into the hair at the nape of his neck, and Ilya inhaled deeply, a low, satisfied rumble vibrating against Shane's spine.

"Dobroye utro, kotenok," Ilya's voice was sleep-roughened, the words a warm puff against his skin.

"Hmm," Shane whispered back, his own voice shy.

Ilya shifted, rolling Shane onto his back so he could look down at him. In the soft morning light, he looked younger, the usual sharp edges of his intensity softened by sleep. But his eyes were the same—that impossible, focused blue, taking in every detail of Shane's face with a quiet intensity that made Shane's heart stutter.

"You are still here," Shane said, as if confirming a miracle.

"Where else would I be?" Rozanov asked, a small, sleepy smile touching his lips.

He lowered his head and kissed him. It was nothing like the desperate, consuming kisses of the night before. This was slow, tender, a gentle re-mapping of territory already claimed. A silent conversation. You are here. I am here. This is real.

They lingered like that, trading soft, waking kisses until the reality of the day began to press in. Ilya was the one who finally broke away with a reluctant sigh, checking the time on his phone on the nightstand. A shadow passed over his face.

"I have a flight," he said, the words heavy.

"I know." Shane did know. The schedule was an immutable law. Practice was mandatory. The world outside this room demanded its due.

Ilya pushed himself up, the sheets pooling around his waist. He looked back at Shane, who lay watching him, and for a fleeting second, Shane saw something raw and unguarded in his expression—a reluctance so profound it bordered on pain. Then the mask of calm control settled back into place.

The process of leaving was agonizingly slow, a drawn-out ritual of reluctance. Ilya showered again, and Shane made coffee, moving in a happy, sore daze around his kitchen. He brought a mug to Ilya, who was pulling on his jeans, and received a kiss that tasted of toothpaste and gratitude. They didn't talk much. Words felt superfluous, fragile things that might shatter the delicate bubble of the morning.

Ilya's jacket was by the door, a sobering reminder of the outside world. He finished dressing, Shane grabbing his jacket and they got out the door together.

The space between them felt charged, final. Ilya closed it, and framed Shane's face with his hands, his thumbs stroking over his cheekbones.

"You will be okay today," he stated, his gaze searching Shane's. "You will rest. You will eat. You will not overthink."

It was an order, but it was wrapped in a concern so genuine it made Shane's throat tight. He nodded. "I will."

"Good." Ilya leaned in, kissing him again, a soft, lingering press of lips. "I will call you. From the airport. From the plane if I can."

"You don't have to--"

"I will."

Another kiss, deeper this time, a silent argument against the separation. Ilya's phone buzzed in his pocket, the taxi, waiting outside. He ignored it, kissing Shane once more, then resting his forehead against his.

"Rozanov," Shane breathed, his fingers curling into the front of Ilya's shirt. "Your flight..."

"I know." He sounded angry, not at Shane, but at the circumstance. He took a deep, steadying breath, inhaling Shane's scent as if to store it. "This is... inconvenient."

A weak laugh escaped Shane. "Yeah."

The phone buzzed again, more insistently. Ilya finally pulled back, his expression hardening into resignation. He picked up his bag, his eyes never leaving Shane's. He opened the apartment door, then paused on the threshold, the line between the world they'd built last night and the one waiting outside.

He turned back, one last time. He didn't kiss him again. He just looked, his gaze a physical touch, branding the memory of Shane standing there, sleep-rumpled and his, into his mind.

"Do not forget what you are," Ilya said, his voice low and fierce. "Mine."

Then he was gone, the door clicking shut with a soft, final sound.

Shane stood in the sudden silence of his apartment, the warmth of Ilya's kisses still on his lips, the ghost of his weight still on his skin. The room felt larger, emptier, but differently so. It wasn't a void anymore. It was a space that had been witnessed, claimed, and irrevocably altered.

He walked to the window, pushing the blinds aside just in time to see Ilya slide into a black town car. He didn't look up. The car pulled away, merging into the morning traffic, carrying Ilya toward the airport, toward practice, toward a life that didn't include Shane in the immediacy of his bed.

But as Shane let the blinds fall back, a slow, sure warmth spread through his chest, settling beside the pleasant ache. Ilya's scent was on his sheets, on his skin. His words were in the air. Mine.

For the first time in his life, Shane Hollander felt truly, completely, and terrifyingly owned. And the most shocking part was the profound, unshakeable peace that came with it. He was someone's. He was Ilya's. The thought wasn't a cage. It was the first solid ground he'd found in years. He hugged his arms around himself, a small, secret smile touching his lips as he turned to face the quiet, changed space of his morning. The world outside could wait.

The silence in Shane's apartment the next morning was a different creature entirely. It wasn't the peaceful, sated quiet of the day before. It was a loud, accusatory void. Everywhere he looked, he saw evidence. A faint dent in the pillow next to his. A water glass in the sink that wasn't his. The air itself, though scrubbed clean by hours of open windows, seemed to thrum with the ghost of pine and snow and claim.

He missed him.

The thought was a sucker punch, leaving him breathless against his kitchen counter. He missed the solid weight of him, the rumble of his voice, the way his focus felt like a physical shelter. It was pathetic. It was dangerous.

It was a one-time thing. He chanted it in his head like a mantra as he pulled on his workout gear. A spectacular, mind-blowing, life-altering one-time thing. That's all it could be. Ilya lived on the other continent. He was an alpha, a force of nature, something he told himself he wouldn't fall for until after he retired. Now they needed to drift back to their separate trajectories.

His phone buzzed on the counter. Ilya's name flashed on the screen. A text.

IGR- How do you feel?

Simple. Direct. Caring. It made Shane's chest ache. He stared at it until the screen went dark. He didn't answer.

He threw himself into his workout at the team facility with a violence that startled the few other players there. He pounded the treadmill until his lungs burned, lifted weights until his muscles screamed, all in a frantic attempt to outrun the memories. The feel of Ilya's hands. The sound of his voice, whispering praise and filth. The devastating, total fullness. Each memory was a hook in his flesh, pulling him back toward a cliff edge.

His phone buzzed again in his gym bag. Then, an hour later, a call. He let it go to voicemail. He couldn't hear his voice. If he heard his voice, the carefully constructed wall of one-time thing would crumble to dust.

After showering, still buzzing with nervous energy and unresolved panic, he did the only thing that ever truly grounded him. He drove out to the plot of land. The paperwork was nearly final. The sale would go through. He'd been quietly funneling money from a couple of his quieter, long-term endorsements into a separate account for over a year. This was his future. Solid, real, his. A house he would build on the shore of this lake. A life of his own making. The antithesis of being consumed.

He walked the tree line, his boots crunching on last autumn's leaves, and emerged at the shoreline. The lake was still, a vast mirror reflecting the grey, cloud-scudded sky. He sat on a weathered log, pulling his knees up to his chest, and forced himself to look at the water, the trees, the future.

But his mind was a traitor.

It replayed the shower. The way Ilya had washed him with such devastating tenderness, then pinned him against the tiles and loved him with a fierce, gentle urgency that made Shane feel both cherished and utterly ravished. His body throbbed in remembered sympathy, a deep, sweet ache that was both a pain and a pleasure.

That was the core of the panic, wasn't it? The not knowing.

He had no frame of reference. He'd saved himself, not out of any grand principle, but out of caution, fear of complications, fear of the exact all-consuming feeling that was now choking him. Was that what sex was supposed to be? Was that the normal, human experience? A total annihilation of self and sense, a fusion so complete you forgot where you ended and the other person began? The pleasure had been so intense it bordered on pain, the intimacy so profound it felt like dying.

Or was it because Ilya was an Alpha?

Was it biological? Chemical? Had his omega biology, so long suppressed and managed, simply recognized its counterpart and short-circuited his higher reasoning, flooding him with endorphins and submissive bliss designed to bond him to the strongest mate? Was the earth-shattering pleasure just an evolutionary trick to ensure propagation? Was the feeling of peace, of rightness, just a hormonal lie?

The thought was a chilling splash of water. Had any of it been real? Had he been real in it? Or was he just a responsive organism, and Ilya the perfect key to his lock?

He remembered the haze, the subspace, the way the world had gone soft and quiet. Ilya's scent had been everywhere, a blanket. Had he been manipulated? Not in a malicious way, perhaps, but in a primal, inevitable way. An Alpha's influence.

A normal, good sexual experience, he imagined- was fun, exciting, pleasurable. You had a good time, you felt close to someone, you maybe slept well after.

What he'd had with Ilya hadn't been a "good time." It had been a spiritual event. It had rewritten his cellular code. It had left him sitting on the shore of his future dream, unable to see anything but the past.

His phone buzzed again in his pocket. He didn't even pull it out. He knew who it was. He could feel the pull through the device, a magnetic tug on the raw, exposed nerve endings Ilya had uncovered.

He wrapped his arms tighter around his knees, resting his chin on them, staring at the still lake. The reflection was perfect, but it was an illusion. Beneath the calm surface, the water was deep, dark, and cold. He'd built his entire life on control, on a calm surface. Ilya had plunged into his depths in a single night and stirred up everything hidden below.

He didn't know if it was love, or biology, or obsession, or destiny. He only knew the "one-time thing" was a lie he was telling himself to survive the minute. Because the truth was, if Ilya walked out of those trees right now and told him to get on his knees, Shane wasn't sure he'd have the strength, or even the desire, to say no.

The panic wasn't about what had happened. It was about the terrifying, thrilling certainty that it wasn't over. And he had no idea if the man he was missing was a person, or a force of nature he'd been foolish enough to invite in. All he knew was the hook was set deep, and the line was pulling taut.

The silence was an insult.

It grated against Ilya's nerves, a high-pitched, constant whine in the background of his every thought. Two days. Forty-eight hours of nothing. His texts sat unread, then read with no reply. His calls went straight to voicemail. The digital void where Shane's presence had been was now a glaring, infuriating blank space.

He told himself it was shock. Overwhelm. Omega skittishness after a profound first bonding. He could allow for that. For a day.

By the second morning, with practice a distracted blur of drills he performed by muscle memory alone, allowance curdled into a cold, simmering anger.

He sat in his condo, the lights off, and opened the encrypted feed on his laptop. The camera in Shane's apartment was a tiny, high-definition eye near the smoke detector. He watched the empty space. The neatly made bed. The clean kitchen. It was sterile, lifeless. Shane was not there.

A few keystrokes switched the feed. The camera at the Hollander family home in Ontario, a concession he'd extracted from a deeply paranoid - and well-paid, home security installer months ago, during his initial research phase. The living room was quiet. Shane's mother read a book. No Shane.

He pulled up the tracker on Shane's phone. The signal was stationary, pulsing from the team's practice facility. Good. At least he wasn't somewhere else, with someone else. The geofence alerts he'd set hadn't been triggered. But the silence was a violation of a different, more important rule.

Ilya's jaw ached from clenching. He watched the stationary dot, imagining Shane inside those walls, sweating, breathing, ignoring him. The urge to get on a plane, to storm into that gym and demand an answer, to put his hands on him and make him acknowledge the bond that had been forged, was a physical pressure in his chest. But it was the middle of the season. Games, travel, mandatory appearances. His movements were tracked, his time not his own. The leash of his profession, which he usually ignored, felt suddenly, unbearably tight.

His eyes, almost of their own volition, kept cataloguing the little he could see on the feeds and extrapolating from the tracker. Was he eating? He'd ordered no food deliveries to the apartment. Was he sleeping? The bed remained pristine. Was he... was there any sign?

The thought was a quiet, desperate drumbeat underneath the anger. He found himself scrutinizing the fleeting glimpse of Shane's mother on the feed, looking for any change in her demeanor, any hint of a secret. He replayed the memory of that night with clinical precision—the timing, the biology, his own deliberate release of pheromones to encourage receptivity. The chances were low. But not zero. He wanted it. He wanted that undeniable, biological tether. A reason Shane would have to answer.

But there was nothing. No unusual purchases on his monitored accounts. No doctor visits. No shift in routine that suggested nausea or fatigue. Just the silent, stubborn defiance of his absence.

The anger tightened, sharpening into a blade of disappointment. He had planted a seed in the most primal way he could, and the earth gave no sign of life.

His own phone buzzed. Svetlana.

S- You are watching walls again. I can feel it through the phone.

I- I am working.

S- You are obsessing. It is unattractive. Come out. The club on 4th. Many pretty Betas who do not ignore texts.

I- Not interested.

S- This is the problem! You are a ghost. Before this omega, you would have been there already. You need to clear your head. Hunt something else for a night.

Her words were pragmatic, a callback to a previous version of himself. Ilya Rozanov, who took what he wanted and forgot it by morning. Who viewed entanglement as a weakness. That man felt like a stranger. The idea of someone else's hands, someone else's scent, was not just unappealing; it was viscerally repulsive. Every instinct he had was now oriented toward a single, frustratingly silent point on a map.

He didn't answer her.

The days bled into a week. The Olympic team announcements were a media circus he navigated by rote. His own selection was a foregone conclusion, a line item in a schedule. It meant nothing. It was just a different jersey, a different set of walls to feel caged by, farther away from Boston.

He was in his car after a late meeting, the notification lighting up his screen amidst a sea of congratulatory messages from people who didn't matter. He almost dismissed it without looking.

Then he saw the name.

Shane

The world narrowed to the glow of the display. He opened it.

It was not an apology. It was not an explanation. It was not a surrender.

It was two words.

S- Congratulations, Rozanov.

That was all. Acknowledgment of a professional milestone. Polite. Distant. Impersonal. The kind of thing a casual acquaintance might send.

The cold, coiled anger in Ilya's gut exploded into a white-hot rage. His fingers tightened on the phone, the plastic casing creaking in protest. He stared at the message, at the pathetic period at the end, as if it was a period on them.

He wanted to write back a novel of fury. To demand. To threaten. To remind Shane of exactly what had happened, of what he was, of what he belonged to.

Instead, he took a breath that sawed in his lungs. He looked out the windshield at the dark parking garage, his reflection a grim mask in the glass.

He typed back, his movements precise and controlled.

I- Thank you.

He sent it. Two could play at this sterile, maddening game.

But as he started the car, the cold fury settled into something harder, more determined. The Olympics. A controlled environment. A closed circuit. Team Russia would be there. Team Canada would be there.

Shane had broken the silence. He had reached out. It was a crack. A tiny, hairline fracture in his resistance.

Ilya would be there. And this time, there would be no quiet apartment, no easy escape. There would be no more silence.

He pulled out of the garage, the plan already crystallizing in the cold, obsessive clarity of his mind. The congratulations weren't an end. They were an invitation. And Ilya had every intention of RSVPing in person.

Chapter 10: Chapter 10

Don't kill me when y'all get to the end! There is a reason for everything!
Didn't show this to my sister because she would have cut this chapter by a lot and take away my laptop.
Next up is them seeing each other again. and that's already half written.

Love love love all the reviews! They be making me blush and smile-better than any medicine.

Ilya woke before the alarm, though for a few slow seconds he did not remember where he was. The room sat in that strange blue-gray stillness of too early morning, the kind of quiet that made every small sound feel too intimate. Outside, Montreal was still half-buried beneath the storm that had blown through overnight, snow pressed against the windows and softening the city into something less sharp than usual. He stayed still, blinking at the unfamiliar ceiling while his body registered exhaustion first, then warmth, then the weight of someone sleeping beside him.

Shane.

The realization settled low beneath his ribs, steady and unfamiliar enough that he almost pushed it away out of instinct. Hollander was asleep half on his stomach, face buried awkwardly into the pillow like he had collapsed there sometime during the night without meaning to stay that way. The blankets were twisted around his legs, one arm shoved under the pillow while the other rested too close to Ilya's waist, fingers curled loosely into the fabric of his shirt. He looked messy and warm and real in a way that did not fit neatly into any category Ilya understood. Sex made sense. Want made sense. Competition, instinct, attraction, dominance, the sharp satisfaction of getting close enough to make someone break-those were simple enough. They had rules, even when people pretended they did not.

This did not feel simple.

The apartment still smelled faintly of laundry detergent, coffee grounds left in the kitchen from the night before, hockey tape, and underneath all of it, Shane. Muted scent patches or not, after hours in Shane's bed Ilya could still catch traces of something soft and warm that made him want to stay longer than he should. He should leave. His flight back to Russia was early, and the next two weeks were already crowded with federation obligations, media, sponsors, politicians, his father, and every other unpleasant thing that came with being useful to a country that wanted to claim him whenever he won. He should have been thinking about training. About Sochi. About getting out of Montreal before the roads became worse. Instead, he watched the freckles across Shane's nose darken slightly in the weak morning light and found himself resisting the ridiculous urge to count them.

Shane's apartment had surprised him first. It was cleaner than expected, but cluttered in strange, specific ways. Hockey things perfectly organized while everything else looked like Shane had started a system and then abandoned it when it stopped being directly necessary. Books stacked unevenly near the couch. A mug left on the kitchen counter because Shane had apparently forgotten about it halfway through drinking tea. Sticky notes in cramped handwriting stuck to cabinets, one reminding him to eat breakfast, another reminding him to water a plant that looked mostly dead. Ilya had nearly laughed when he saw that one, and Shane had gone pink when he noticed him reading it, muttering that he forgot things sometimes and it helped. Like it was something shameful. Like forgetting small things mattered more than the fact that Shane Hollander could remember entire defensive systems after seeing them once.

The apartment felt private in a way hotel rooms never did. Not fancy. Not carefully staged. Just Shane. The careful organization fighting with chaos, the dim lighting because overhead lights apparently bothered him, the weighted blanket shoved messily onto the couch, hockey games playing quietly in the background even when Shane clearly was not watching anymore. Shane had been different there, still anxious and strange and careful, but softer around the edges. More willing to sit close without realizing he was doing it. More likely to talk without filtering himself, like sometime around midnight when he had curled sideways against the couch after dinner and spent twenty uninterrupted minutes explaining defensive rotations with alarming enthusiasm before abruptly stopping mid-sentence to apologize for talking too much.

Ilya had not understood that apology. He still did not. Shane did not talk too much. Shane stopped himself too often.

The warmth beside him shifted. Hollander made a small sound somewhere between annoyance and sleep and he shifted, moving closer to Ilya, burrowing his face to press against Ilya's neck, right over his scent gland. The scent of him, warm and uniquely Shane, filled Ilya's senses, a possessive calm settling deep in his chest.

His hand, which had been making slow, soothing circles over the omega's lower back, stilled. The desire was a live wire under his skin, a hungry, pulsing thing that focused with acute intensity on the man curled trustingly against him. The memory of taking him, of Shane's heat-clenched body yielding beautifully to his own, was fresh and vivid. A low, possessive rumble vibrated in Ilya's throat, almost inaudible.

Slowly, his touch changed. The broad, calming strokes narrowed, his palm sliding down the dip of Shane's spine, over the curve of his ass. The skin was so warm, so impossibly soft. Ilya's breath hitched, his own body responding fiercely. He needed to know. He needed to feel if that devastating, perfect heat was still there, if his omega's body, even in exhausted sleep, was still open and ready for him. The thought was primal, stripping away any pretense of patience.

His fingers trailed through the dampness at the crease of Shane's thigh, a leftover slickness that made Ilya's mouth water. He pressed a kiss to the sleeping man's temple, a silent apology for the intrusion even as his own need mounted. With a tenderness that belied the ferocity of his want, he nudged Shane's thighs apart just a fraction, just enough.

He reached down, his touch now deliberate. One finger, slick with the evidence of Shane's own natural readiness, traced a feather-light path over his entrance, which was still swollen and sensitive from their earlier coupling. Ilya's heart hammered against his ribs. He applied the gentlest pressure, just the pad of his finger seeking to breach, to dip inside and test that incredible, clinging heat.

But as the tip of his finger began to press inward, Shane's body reacted. A sharp, involuntary tension seized the omega's muscles. In his sleep, Shane let out a soft, wounded sound, a faint cry -and his face, which had been serene in the crook of Ilya's neck, contorted. A clear wince of pain, swift and deep, flashed across his features. His brows drew together, his lips parting on a silent gasp, and he seemed to curl in on himself slightly, a subconscious retreat from the touch.

Ilya froze.

All the rampant hunger, the possessive drive, evaporated in an instant, replaced by a cold, dousing wave of something else. It was sharper than guilt, more visceral than concern. It was a protective fury - directed entirely at himself. His finger withdrew as if burned. He watched, stricken, as the pained lines on Shane's face gradually smoothed out once the pressure was gone, the omega settling back into deeper sleep with a shaky, exhausted sigh that sounded too much like relief.

The sight of that wince, so stark against Shane's peaceful slumber, carved something open inside Ilya. He had done that. His need had put that expression there. The man was spent, utterly drained, and here he was, pawing at him like a monster. A profound shame, hot and sour, coated the back of his throat.

He didn't pull away. Instead, he gathered Hollander closer, carefully, rearranging them so the omega was fully cradled against his chest, shielded. He brought his hand back up, not to explore, but to cradle Shane's head, his fingers threading gently through the damp hair. He pressed his lips to Shane's forehead and held them there, a silent vow breathed into his skin.

"Moy sladkiy," he murmured into the quiet dark, his voice rough with chastened desire. "Forgive me." The drive to claim was still there, a dull, persistent ache in his gut, but it was now encased in something harder and far more resolute. He would wait. He would let him rest. The claiming could come later, when Hollander was awake and willing and could take every bit of pleasure Ilya was desperate to give him, not a shred of pain. He settled, making his body a fortress around Shane's, and willed his own tumultuous hunger into a patient, watchful calm.

The freckles stood out more like this, his face unguarded and soft with sleep, the line between his brows gone completely. Relaxed, trusting. That was the part that sat strangest. Hollander trusted badly. Not with words, never emotionally, but physically he had let Ilya in. Into the apartment. Into his bed. Into the small routines he clearly protected carefully from everyone else.

He watched as Hollander woke up slowly, a soft smile brightening up his face until Ilya stroked his hip softly. He slowly opened his eyes and Ilya was fascinated yet again. Hollander had the most beautiful brown eyes he'd ever seen- Hollander had his mother's eyes from what he remembered.

Slightly almond-shaped, framed by dark lashes that looked almost unfair against his creamy skin. The corners tilted just enough to sharpen his expression whenever he frowned, which was often, though never mean enough to look intimidating. They softened quickly instead, too expressive to stay guarded for long. His irises were dark brown, nearly black in bad lighting, but warmer up close—layers of chestnut and dark honey hidden underneath if someone stood close enough to notice. Now, in the morning light, with him looking so soft and pliant, he saw more dark gold around the pupil.

"You have to leave soon," Shane said eventually, barely above a whisper.

"Da."

The silence stretched. Ilya watched Shane try to pretend it did not matter and fail in several small ways: the way his fingers curled once against the blanket, the way his gaze slid toward the window instead of meeting Ilya's eyes, the way his mouth tightened before smoothing out again. Most people would have missed it. Ilya did not.

"You'll text me when you land?" Shane asked after a moment, aiming for casual and missing by just enough to make something in Ilya's chest shift.

"Yes."

"We'll see each other at Sochi," Shane said, not quite a question but not confident enough to be fully a statement either. "And then a few weeks after that, when Montreal plays Boston."

Future. Something scheduled. Something expected. The was not temporary. Not one night. The thought settled easier than it should have. Ilya nodded once, and Shane seemed to relax at the confirmation, rolling out of bed with visible reluctance and dragging an oversized hoodie and sweatpants over himself before heading toward the kitchen barefoot. He moved slowly, sore despite trying to hide it, one hand braced briefly against the doorframe before he caught himself and straightened like dignity mattered after everything else had already happened.

"You want coffee?" Shane called, voice still sleep-rough.

"You don't drink coffee."

"If you're going right to the airport you can't do it without caffeine."

That stayed with him longer than it should have. Small. Domestic. Dangerous. Because suddenly Ilya could imagine it too easily: repeated mornings, coffee, Shane half asleep and irritated in oversized clothes, a routine that had no place inside the life Ilya had built for himself. He shut the thought down hard. Too much, too fast. He did not want a mate. Not officially. Not now. Not when the NHL was finally beginning and the Olympics were close and his life had finally become something he could direct himself. Mate meant permanence. Vulnerability. Obligation. Someone close enough to depend on him and be hurt by him. Someone he could ruin.

His mother's face rose uninvited, and he shoved the thought away before it could fully form.

By the time coffee was ready, Hollander looked only marginally more awake. He handed Ilya a mug while standing too close, apparently unaware of personal space again, and frowned when Ilya took too long to drink. "You'll be okay in Russia?" he asked eventually.

The question surprised him. "Yes."

"You always look..." Shane paused, rubbing awkwardly at the sleeve of his sweatshirt. "Stressed after talking about home."

No one usually noticed that. Ilya looked at him for a second longer than necessary before saying, "I survive."

Hollander frowned like he did not like that answer, which was inconvenient because it was the only one Ilya had. Instead of pushing, Hollander muttered something about not getting arrested before Sochi, and Ilya almost smiled as he promised nothing. The laugh Shane gave him then, quiet and sleepy and still a little embarrassed, stayed with him all the way to the airport.

It stayed with him after he landed too.

The plane to Moscow touched down through gray skies and dirty clouds, Russia below buried beneath weeks-old snow that no longer looked clean. Normally, coming home did not bother him. Not really. Russia was familiar, even when he hated parts of it. The language came easier here. Expectations made sense. There was comfort in understanding exactly what people wanted from him before they spoke. Today none of that landed properly, because before the wheels had fully settled against the runway, he was already reaching for his phone.

It took him a while to make his way out of the airport- people had found out he was coming home and fans swarmed him as he stepped to collect his baggage. The airline had sent security for him when they noticed the crowd, but it wasn't until police came that he managed to be led out of the building and to his car.

He took advantage of the chauffeur and tinted windows to take his hat and glasses off and he threw them on the seat next to him. He reached for his phone and texted Hollander that he landed. He wanted to ask how he felt, if he was still sore, if he took the time to have a hot bath to lessen the discomfort.

For one day, everything stayed normal enough to let him think the night had not broken anything. Hollander responded with a crying emoji and a comment about him being an asshole. Ilya reread it twice more than necessary and then locked his phone like that fixed anything. Ilya joked that next time he wouldn't take it easy on Hollander, that he'd find when they could spend more time together.

That text received no reply. He checked throughout the hour long car ride and when Hollander still hadn't replied when they pulled up to his neighborhood, Ilya checked the cameras. He saw Hollander move around slowly, then grabbing his phone off the charger and going to the kitchen. He frowned as the camera lagged but he figured it was fine. He switched back to look through the cell phone and saw that Hollander had missed messages from his parents and teammate. He started to read through some and went to delete the invitation to go out. Hollander didn't need to start having a night life now.

He sent another text, just to say hello but it wouldn't send, the reception gone as he reached the dead zone while crossing the final bridge.

The driver talked too much. Tomorrow's schedule, children's hospital, sports academy appearance, private dinner with ministers, press conference, family values, representing Russia abroad with strength. Ilya nodded at the right places without listening closely. He had learned young that most people did not need attention to feel heard. They only needed enough eye contact and a few low sounds of acknowledgment to continue talking themselves into satisfaction.

"Your father is very proud, I am sure, the whole of Russia is," the driver said warmly.

That made Ilya look up. The man smiled wider, mistaking attention for agreement. "It is good for a son to return home after success. Especially a son like you. Strong career, good reputation, no scandals. You are exactly what the country wants young men to look toward."

Ilya stared at him for half a second too long before smiling. "Da," he said, and the older man looked pleased.

Outside the car window, Moscow moved past in gray stretches, old buildings crowded beside new ones, snow shoved into dirty piles along the road. He had spent most of his life wanting to leave, and once he had, he discovered that leaving did not stop certain things from following. His father's voice, mostly. The particular way silence could feel dangerous. The instinctive need to know exits in any room. The belief that if something mattered, you kept it close enough to monitor.

He checked the phone again. Nothing.

By evening, he was expected at Grigory's apartment. He dressed in black trousers and a stiff collared black dress shirt. He checked his phone again but still no answer from Hollander.

He considered not going and then that thought went anyway, because avoiding his father made him feel like a boy again and he hated that more. The building had not changed. Same narrow stairwell, same sour smell of old smoke and boiled cabbage, same chipped paint near the door where someone had scraped furniture years ago and never repaired it. Ilya paused outside the apartment longer than necessary, listening to the television, the low voices, the sound of a glass set down too hard. Home, though not really. Close enough to make his shoulders tighten.

Polina was in the kitchen when he stepped inside, looking older than the last time he had seen her. She had been pretty once in a quiet, careful way. Still was, probably, if she had not spent so many years trying to make herself smaller in a space that punished anything soft. Her eyes lifted to his face and warmed briefly. Grigory sat in the living room with the television too loud, one arm stretched along the back of the couch like the room existed around him. He had aged, but not in ways that softened him. His face had thickened, hair grayed at the temples, body heavier than it had once been, but his eyes were the same. Sharp. Dissatisfied. Looking for weakness before anything else.

“You remember where we live,” Grigory said without standing.

“Good evening, Father.”

Polina’s hands stilled briefly in the kitchen. Grigory’s mouth tightened. “America made you funny?”

“Of course not.”

That earned him a look, but Ilya hung his overcoat near the door and crossed into the room anyway, letting his father look at him the way he always did. Assessment first. Approval never. Grigory’s gaze moved over his coat, watch, posture, face. Looking for excess. Looking for softness. Looking for evidence of success had changed him in some way he could criticize.

“You look tired.”

“I traveled the whole day.”

“You looked distracted in your last game. The American’s have made you lazy.”

There it was. Too fast. His father had always been good at finding places that bruised. Not because he understood people emotionally, but because he understood pressure. He knew where to push until something reacted.

“I am fine.”

Grigory snorted and looked back at the television, where hockey highlights played beneath a banner calling Ilya one of Russia’s greatest young exports. His father watched it like it belonged to him. “They praise you too much over there. You start believing it, that is when someone who is hungrier takes what you think is yours.”

Dinner began like most dinners with Grigory, which meant interrogation pretending to be conversation. Training. Contracts. Money. Whether his agents were competent. Whether Boston used him properly. Whether he was drinking too much. Whether women or omegas were distracting him. That last question came with a look, and Ilya lifted his eyes slowly.

“No.”

“No?”

“No.” He answered firmly.

Grigory leaned back, studying him. “Good. Women make men stupid. Omegas make them worse. You remember that when they start throwing pretty things in your path.”

Polina’s face went completely still. Ilya noticed. He always noticed when Grigory said something careless enough to cut someone else and then kept eating like no blood had been drawn.

“That hasn’t happened.” Ilya said.

Grigory laughed shortly. “You think they do not? You are famous now. Strong alpha. With money. A future. Everyone wants to attach themselves to that. You take what you want, but you do not let anyone take from you.”

The words settled badly because they sounded too close to thoughts Ilya had been having and trying not to examine. Take what you want. Do not let anything take from you. Shane’s unanswered messages flashed behind his eyes, and something in his grip tightened around his fork before he forced his hand still. Not the same. Completely different. Grigory used wanting like a weapon. Ilya had discipline. Control. He knew restraint. He had left the one Omega that had kept his interested only a few hours after sleeping when he could have changed his flight to stay longer, could have taken more time, could have pressed harder when Shane was still warm and trusting and half-soft from sleep. He had left because plans mattered. Future mattered. Because Shane had looked at him in the doorway and said Sochi like a promise.

“You are distracted,” Grigory said again, this time not observing but accusing.

“No.”

“There is someone.”

Polina looked down at her plate. The apartment seemed to shrink around the words. Ilya felt something in his chest go very still.

“It is nothing serious,” he said.

Liar. He thought to himself.

Grigory watched him for several seconds, then smiled in a way Ilya had hated since childhood. Not pleased. Worse. Knowing. “Good. You are not old enough to ruin yourself over mating with just anyone. Not with career beginning. Your mother was distraction enough for one lifetime. You will be smart and mate with the person found for you.”

The room went silent, not because Grigory had raised his voice, but it would have been better if he hit Ilya. He felt his blood run cold. His father had said it casually, like mentioning weather. Polina’s fingers curled around her napkin. Ilya did not move. For a second, he was no longer in the dining room but small again, barefoot in the hallway, listening to his mother cry behind a closed door while Grigory sat in the kitchen drinking and muttering about weak people. He remembered the way she tried to be quiet even when quiet hurt worse, like if she made herself small enough, she could disappear without making anyone angry. He remembered her before Russia only in fragments because he had been young when she still smiled easily, but he had photographs. A woman from a small town outside Minsk, standing in a garden with dark hair braided over one shoulder and a softness in her face that Russia had slowly eaten away.

Arranged mating. Clean words. Respectable words. His father had taken her from everything familiar and called it duty. Called it family. Called it stability. He had brought her into a city where she knew almost no one, into a home where every mistake became proof she was ungrateful, every sadness became weakness, every wish became selfishness. He told her what to wear, who to speak to, how much to smile, how often to visit home until eventually visits became inconvenient and stopped completely. Ilya had been old enough to notice when she stopped singing in the kitchen. Old enough to notice when she started sleeping through afternoons. Old enough to notice how Grigory looked at her sadness like an insult. Not old enough to stop any of it.

The silence in the apartment after she died had been worse than the crying. Not because Grigory mourned. Because he was inconvenienced.

“Do not speak about her,” Ilya said quietly.

Grigory’s expression hardened. “I speak how I want in my house.”

Ilya looked at him then, really looked. There had been a time when Grigory seemed enormous, untouchable, the center of every room because everyone learned to move around his moods. Now he looked older. Still cruel. Still dangerous in the pathetic way men became dangerous when they had lost power and resented everyone for noticing. But not enormous. Not anymore.

“It is not your house,” Ilya said.

The words landed. Polina went very still. Grigory’s face darkened. “What did you say?”

“I brought this apartment. I send money for your food, for you the clothes on your back. If you choose to give most of it to that drug addict you favor, that is not my problem.”

Quiet. Simple. True. That made it worse. For a moment, Ilya thought his father might stand, and part of him almost wanted it. An old, ugly part that had waited years for Grigory to give him a reason as an adult that he had not been strong enough to take as a boy. But Grigory only stared, then laughed once without humor.

“Money makes boys brave.”

“No,” Ilya said, standing. “It makes them able to leave.”

He did not look at Polina as he took his coat from the door because that would have made something in the room softer than he could afford. Still, as he opened the door, her voice followed quietly, offering blini she had packed for him. He paused long enough to take the covered bundle, thanked her softly in Russian, then left before the satisfaction of saying anything else to Grigory could become something uglier.

The hallway was colder than the apartment and easier to breathe in. Outside, snow had started falling again, thin and mean under the streetlights. He stood beside the waiting car and checked his phone. No message from Hollander. Tracker still offline. Apartment feed was empty. His chest tightened before he could stop it, and then anger came to cover it. Good. Anger had structure.

At first, irritation came fast. Hollander forgot things sometimes. He got busy. He overfocused. Olympic preparation had begun for both of them, and the season had left everyone half exhausted. Silence could be explained. Then the tracker stopped working, the apartment camera showed nothing but dark rooms and absence, and the man Ilya paid to keep eyes on Shane admitted he had lost him at the airport.

No signal at first. Then bars. Then the tracker app, loading too slowly before giving him the same blank answer it had been giving for hours. Offline. No location.

The next day, he tried again. The text went through, but hours later,

Apartment empty. No messages. The investigator answered on the third ring, and the pause before he spoke told Ilya more than the words did.

“We lost him,” the man said.

Ilya went very still. “You lost him.”

“At the airport. We had eyes on him after landing, through security, and then he disappeared.”

Outside, the snow dragged across the empty street. Ilya stared past his own reflection and asked, very quietly, “How do you lose Hollander?”

The investigator had no good answer. Limited footage. He visited his family briefly. No apartment return. No confirmed location. Maybe he left the country. That last part settled under Ilya’s skin worse than the rest. Hollander had left the country after sleeping with him. After asking him to text when he landed. After saying Sochi like it meant something. Had he run? From Ilya? The thought came sharp and unpleasant enough that he almost rejected it immediately. Almost. But the question stayed, because Shane had gone quiet after intimacy, and silence after intimacy meant something. Ilya just did not know what.

He ordered the investigator to pay more, look harder, and find out who Hollander was with. He ended the call before the man finished responding and stood only when most of the other passengers had already emptied into the aisle. Reporters waited beyond the building doors, cameras flashing hard enough that the lobby windows reflected white. Federation handlers smiled like they had been ordered to. A little boy in a red national-team jersey pushed forward with a pen in his shaking hand, and Ilya signed the front of the jersey because he had been raised badly in several ways, but not that one.

He smiled when expected. Answered when microphones came too close. Let them photograph him beneath dim lobby lighting while one of the federation men spoke loudly about Russian pride and what it meant for young athletes to see someone like him succeeding overseas. Ilya stood there in his expensive coat with his shoulders relaxed and his expression easy, and felt nothing except the weight of his phone in his pocket.

Still nothing.

He called the investigator again. "Find him," Ilya said when the man answered.

"We are still working-"

"Work better."

"Mr. Rozanov, he left the country-"

Ilya went still. "What?"

A pause. "We are in touch with people able to track his passport. I only mean it will take longer."

Left the country. Shane had left the country after sleeping with him. After looking sleepy in his kitchen. After saying Sochi like a promise. The thought moved through him slowly, sharp and then deeper. Did he run? From Ilya? Had Ilya scared him? Pushed too far? Wanted too much? He thought of Shane going still for half a second when things got intense, of the way he sometimes looked startled by his own wanting, like pleasure itself was a mistake he had not learned how to correct yet. He thought of Shane's hands gripping him too tightly, of the way he had hidden his face afterward, embarrassed and overwhelmed but not afraid. Not afraid. Ilya had checked. He had made sure. Hadn't he? Or had Hollander found out that he had removed the condom-had he run from him for that?

"Find where he went," he said.

"Yes, sir."

"And who he is with."

The words came out before he could decide not to say them. Silence followed. Then, carefully, "Understood."

Ilya ended the call and stood in the snow for several seconds, breathing slow through his nose until the cold burned faintly in his lungs. He did not want a mate. He repeated that to himself in the car to the federation building for the banquet being thrown in his honor, watching Moscow smear past the window. He did not want it to be permanent necessarily. He did not want someone depending on him. He did not want to become the kind of man who saw softness and thought it existed to be owned. He did not want to become Grigory.

All lies he told himself. Hollander had let him in. Hollander had said they might see each other in Sochi or when they came back for the season. And now Hollander was gone.

That was not acceptable.

Not because Shane belonged to him. Not officially. Not like that. But because Hollander did not get to disappear after becoming important. Not without explanation. Not without answering. Not when Ilya still remembered exactly how warm he had been in the morning, barefoot in his own kitchen, pretending not to care that Ilya was leaving while asking him to text when he landed.

Not when Ilya had done exactly that.

And Shane had stopped answering.

Shane stayed in bed for hours after Ilya left.

Not sleeping. Just lying there while the apartment sat strangely quiet around him. Too quiet, maybe. The kind of silence that usually felt comforting but now only seemed to emphasize absence. Outside, snow pressed weakly against the windows, Montreal still buried beneath the morning storm, the city moving slower than usual. Shane barely noticed. The blankets still smelled faintly like him, like cold air and expensive cologne and leather underneath that Shane had spent entirely too much time trying not to think about over the last few months.

Rozanov.

The thought alone made something warm and deeply embarrassing settle low in his stomach. Last night had complicated things. A lot. He pulled the blanket higher over himself and stared at the ceiling instead, face warming despite absolutely no one being there to witness it. This was ridiculous. Objectively ridiculous. He had spent months trying very hard not to let this happen. Months carefully keeping distance, dodging opportunities, pretending he did not understand flirting that in hindsight had been embarrassingly obvious. Months telling himself whatever existed between him and Ilya worked better from far away- texting sometimes, arguing occasionally, circling around something neither of them named directly.

And then somehow last night had happened, and everything felt different. Worse. Better. He didn't know.

He shifted slightly beneath the blankets and immediately regretted it. Everything hurt. Not badly, just noticeably, every movement coming with a reminder he would very much prefer not to think about too hard. His shoulders felt heavy, legs sore in ways he absolutely refused to unpack emotionally, and even turning over required effort. He buried his face briefly into the pillow and muttered, "Jesus Christ," to no one at all.

Mortifying. Completely mortifying. And somehow worth it, which felt worse because if he admitted that to himself, then he had to acknowledge how badly he had wanted it in the first place. How badly he still wanted- no. Absolutely not. Too early for emotional honesty.

Getting up turned out to be significantly harder than expected. He moved slowly, wincing once before immediately pretending he had not done that despite being completely alone. The apartment felt colder now, too empty, like something important had been removed from it. Which was ridiculous and not something he would be thinking about today. Instead, he focused on practical things. Food. Coffee. Smoothie, probably. Something easy.

He caught sight of the bed halfway to the bathroom and stopped. A faint flush crawled immediately up his neck. There were small spots of blood against the sheets. Not much but enough to make embarrassment arrive violently. He frowned at it, mortified all at once by the evidence of his own body, of last night, of how much had happened and how little control he had actually had over his reactions.

Had Ilya noticed? Probably. Definitely. Maybe not. No, Rozanov noticed everything.

Great. Fantastic.

Shane grabbed the nearest robe and wrapped it around himself quickly like modesty suddenly mattered hours too late. The apartment felt too bright, too revealing, too aware. He stripped the bed fast, not because anyone was there, but because leaving evidence behind felt unbearable. He shoved the sheets into the washer with more determination than necessary, hands moving automatically before stopping halfway through setting the cycle. Later. He could do it later. Everything suddenly felt like too much effort.

Food first.

He moved toward the kitchen, opening cabinets automatically while trying very hard not to think about the fact that less than twelve hours ago, Ilya had been standing right there making coffee like he belonged in the apartment. Like he belonged anywhere near domesticity. The memory arrived annoyingly vivid: messy hair still damp from the shower, sleeves rolled up, looking deeply unimpressed by Shane's coffee setup and declaring the machine terrible while drinking from the mug anyway. The corner of Shane's mouth pulled upward before he could stop it.

Stupid.

He grabbed fruit from the fridge instead. Protein powder. Frozen berries. Something vaguely healthy enough to count as effort. While the blender worked, he unlocked his phone and finally looked at the pile of ignored notifications. His mother had texted three times and called once, asking if he slept and whether lunch tomorrow still worked. Guilt arrived immediately, and he answered quickly that he was alive, sorry, and lunch sounded good. Then JJ's memes. A fantasy football argument he absolutely did not care about. Hayden's texts came next, several of them stacked together.

Club tonight? Celebrating Hill joining team. He seems cool. Come out loser.

Shane hesitated. A club sounded exhausting. Crowded. Loud. Too many people. Especially now, when his entire body felt heavy and weird and emotionally overcomplicated. He was halfway through typing an excuse when the message disappeared.

He blinked and frowned down at the screen. The whole text thread flickered strangely, then loaded again with one of Hayden's messages missing. He refreshed. Nothing. He turned the phone off and then back on. Still gone. Weird. He stepped out of the pantry, reaching automatically to call Hayden before stopping halfway. Hadn't Hayden mentioned this before? Messages disappearing. Calls not going through. Something weird with reception after travel. Maybe Shane's phone had finally given up. Honestly, that was probably a good excuse to replace it.

He should probably go see his parents anyway. His mother would guilt him if he stayed away longer, and maybe being around people would help. Distract him. Because currently every quiet second threatened to spiral directly back toward Ilya, the night, the morning, the stupid warmth of someone standing too close in his kitchen, the even stupider Sochi like it meant something.

Shane shoved that thought away hard enough to almost physically feel it and called his dad instead.

A few hours later, they were heading back toward his parents' house with shopping bags in the backseat. His mother had immediately placed the books he had brought her in the bookshelf in the den and hugged him tight in thanks. The new phone sat charging beside him, the old one shoved carelessly into his jacket pocket. Lunch had helped. The mall helped too. Normal things. Quiet things. Dad talking hockey. Mom talking about Rolex and Underarmor wanting to sign him. No pressure. No questions. No accidentally thinking too hard.

At least until nighttime. He ended up in his old bedroom after dinner, too tired to drive home and too relieved by the familiar quiet to make himself leave. Hayden answered on the second ring when Shane called from bed, immediately announcing that Shane was alive like this was breaking news.

"Unfortunately," Shane said, staring at the ceiling.

"You coming out?"

"No."

"You never want to come out with us. You need to live."

"Tired."

A pause followed, long enough that Shane knew what was coming before Hayden said, “You okay?”

Shane hesitated too long. “Yeah.”

“Bullshit,” Hayden said immediately.

Shane closed his eyes because how exactly did someone explain that he had slept with an emotionally confusing Russian, was now emotionally spiraling, had possibly ruined whatever strange friendship or rivalry or whatever it was between them, and definitely wanted to avoid all feelings for at least the next three to five business years? He could not. Absolutely not. Instead, he settled on, “Just a weird week.”

Hayden hummed knowingly, like someone who absolutely thought this involved feelings and thankfully decided not to say so. Then, abruptly, he asked, “Mexico?”

Shane blinked. “What?”

“Spur of the moment. Me, Jackie, JJ, Hill. Before the season starts. Come celebrate making Olympic team. Only for a couple days-Jackie has connections to get everything organized in a few minutes.”

Shane hesitated immediately. Travel sounded exhausting. People sounded exhausting. Thinking sounded worse. Hill was the new teammate Hayden had mentioned, traded because of the injury situation, quiet enough from what Shane had seen and apparently nice. Mexico sounded like too much. It also sounded like distraction, but distraction sounded safer than lying alone in Montreal with his phone in his hand and Ilya’s last text sitting there like an accusation.

“Okay,” Shane said quietly.

Hayden sounded genuinely shocked. “Oh my God, who are you?”

“Don’t make me change my mind.”

“Too late. Mexico happening.”

Shane laughed quietly despite himself. After hanging up, he lay back against the bed and stared at the ceiling for a long time. Then, before he could stop himself, he opened his texts and found Ilya’s message from the day before. Landed. Russia still terrible. The stupid warmth returned immediately. He typed a reply, deleted it, typed another, deleted that too, and eventually locked the phone without sending anything.

Tomorrow, he told himself.

Maybe tomorrow.

Another private dinner in Moscow happened three days after Ilya stopped pretending his concern was only irritation.

Officially, it was a celebration welcoming the Olympic teams. Unofficially, politics. The building looked exactly how government buildings always looked- the old Imperial grandeur while pretending to be democratic. Marble floors, dark wood, portraits of dead men who had almost certainly made life worse for someone. Security stood everywhere. Photographers waited near the entrance. A woman from the federation adjusted Ilya's tie before he entered like he was twelve and reminded him that he represented Russian excellence tonight.

Inside, the room glowed warm beneath low chandeliers, long tables arranged carefully beneath flags and expensive flower arrangements that looked like no one actually wanted them there. Politicians stood in clusters. Sports officials laughed too loudly. Wealthy donors drank good vodka while pretending patriotism came naturally. Ilya wanted to leave immediately. Instead, he smiled, shook hands, accepted compliments, and allowed himself to be photographed beside people whose names he forgot the moment introductions ended.

"Young men look up to you," one minister said warmly. Concerning. "You represent strength."

"You remind people what proper Russian values look like." Another said.

Ilya nearly laughed. If they knew him even slightly, they would stop saying that immediately.

Eventually, he found his assigned seat and paused when he saw the name card two places down. Dr. Sergei Morozov. Ilya recognized the name vaguely from the ministry briefings and the dinner schedule. Medicine. Omega health policy. Director-level. Important enough to be at the table but not a long serving politician. The doctor was older, sharp-eyed and composed, with silver at the temples and no performative smile. He noticed Ilya looking and inclined his head once. Not overly familiar. Not eager. Already better than everyone else in the room.

Dinner started slowly, courses arriving between speeches and too much vodka. Conversation shifted eventually, as Ilya had suspected it would, toward birthrates and national stability and family structures. The language changed first. Not the volume. Not the tone. Just the words. Omega stability initiatives. Cultural decay. Western influence. Delayed pairings. The room hummed with agreement while men who had never once feared being chosen discussed omegas like numbers in a report.

Then came the announcement.

The Omega Family Stability Act, though of course they called it something cleaner, softer, more patriotic. Education restrictions framed as protective accommodations. Marriage oversight framed as family preservation. Church and state approval. Mandatory pairing before twenty-one. Government intervention for those who failed to bond voluntarily. A minimum of three children, all presented as national recovery and demographic responsibility. Russia, unlike some countries that still pretended male omegas required different legal categories, would now treat all omegas equally.

Meaning all equally controlled.

Ilya thought of his mother before he could stop it. Young. Taken from the small town outside Minsk. An arranged mating, a promise of stability. Then trapped. Russia had already broken enough people. Now they wanted laws for it to make it legal.

Then Hollander arrived in his thoughts, fast and unwelcome. Hollander, who was scared of his own nature, under laws like this. Small and overwhelmed, trying to hide discomfort while everyone ignored it. Forced into a mating. Forced into dependence. Immediate rejection burned through him. No. Absolutely not. Not Hollander. Anyone but him.

But another thought followed too quickly, and that one made him go still.

Shane would be protected. Unavailable for any other Alpha. No rival alphas, no teammates touching him casually, no cameras, no Scott Hunter. No disappearing. No running. His.

The thought hit hard enough to make his stomach turn. No. Absolutely not. Too close. Too much like Grigory. Ownership disguised as care. He hated it instantly and he disgusted himself more that he did not dismiss it fully.

“You disagree,” Morozov said quietly beside him.

Ilya turned. The doctor was watching him calmly, not accusing, just observing. “You had his look about you that says you do not agree with these measures.” he added.

“Do you agree to force omega’s into mating with Alpha’s they do not want?” Ilya said.

“It would be for the greater good. For Russia. For every other country when they see our population growing. When they see that we are treating the males better.”

“Do you really think that male omega’s will be treated fairly?”

Something shifted in Morozov’s expression, recognition maybe. “You think the legislation is extreme.”

“I think people are not property.”

That earned him the faintest hint of amusement. “No,” Morozov said quietly. “They are not.”

Interesting, because that did not sound rehearsed. Morozov explained later, away from the worst of the table, that many doctors had fought parts of it. The original proposal had been worse: pairing at eighteen, restricted travel, reduced educational access almost entirely. Medical consultation had softened it, though not enough. Exemptions remained. Confidentiality protections. Delayed compliance. Special statuses. Privacy clauses. Morozov spoke clinically, but there was disgust under restraint if someone knew where to listen. He gathered that the doctor didn’t believe in the age restrictions.

Ilya asked questions he pretended were hypothetical. What if an omega refused? What if records needed to stay private? What protections existed for someone vulnerable? What if foreign status complicated things? Morozov studied him for a long time and eventually said, “Someone specific?”

“No,” Ilya said. Lie.

Morozov clearly knew it and did not call him out. Instead, he said there were ways to protect people if one had enough resources, status, and the correct medical discretion. Protection. The word landed safer than possession. Kinder than ownership. Easier to justify. Ilya turned on the charm after that, because useful people responded better when they felt chosen. He listened more closely, poured vodka, smiled in ways that made politicians look pleased and Morozov look faintly wary. By the end of dinner, they had exchanged numbers.

“If you ever need advice,” Morozov said.

Ilya smiled. “Maybe.”

Because now he had options, and somewhere deep down, something darker had quietly started growing around one impossible thought. Shane kept disappearing. That might eventually need solving.

Three days turned into a week. Hayden had been right. He did enjoy himself. He grew closer to Hayden and Jackie, who had claimed Shane as her favorite person on the planet. They bonded over the past few days, with Hayden and Shane joking that Jackie would be their shared girlfriend.

At night, his thoughts were filled with memories of Rozanov. He wanted to text him, wanted to hear his voice desperately, but he stopped himself. He thought that maybe some distance would help both of them figure out what exactly they were really doing.

The Olympics was coming up close enough now that the entire hockey world seemed to shrink around anticipation, interviews, training schedules, and endless speculation from people who had never once stood on the ice themselves. Russia wanted dominance. Canada wanted redemption. America wanted a surprise. Every country convinced itself patriotism somehow translated into chemistry.

Shane sat next to Jackie on the lounge chair watching Hayden and Chris mess around the diving board beneath their sunglasses.

He told himself that he would text Ilya tomorrow. He didn't want to come off as a clingy omega. They weren't dating. They had both said they didn't want mates. They slept together once. He didn't know what that meant and didn't have anyone to ask what to do.

Ilya mostly wanted distraction. That had turned out to be harder than expected because Shane Hollander, apparently, had become difficult to stop thinking about. It felt ridiculous. Embarrassing, even. He had survived far more complicated things than one quiet Canadian who apparently did not know how to answer messages in reasonable timeframes. He had survived Grigory. Survived losing his mother. Survived Russia and everything sharp-edged about growing up inside systems built to punish softness. Survived the NHL while older players waited impatiently for him to fail loudly enough that confidence could be relabeled arrogance and everyone could move on comfortably.

And yet ghosting unsettled him.

Mexico made everything worse. At first, relief arrived hard enough to surprise him. Alive. The investigator's voice had sounded almost cautious over the phone when he said they found him. Something unpleasantly tight inside Ilya loosened immediately before he could stop it. Mexico. Vacation. Friends. Nothing catastrophic. Nothing dangerous. Nothing wrong. He had slept better that night for exactly one night.

Then the photographs started arriving.

At first, they looked harmless. Too harmless. Shane sitting beside Hayden at breakfast in some resort restaurant, sunglasses pushed awkwardly into messy hair while he frowned down at something on his phone. Another showed him half asleep near the pool, shoulders pink from too much sun despite obvious sunscreen. JJ looked mid-sentence in most of them, Christopher Hill laughing beside him while Hayden's wife leaned back in her chair looking deeply entertained by something no one else could hear. Vacation. Normal. Fine.

The problem sat quieter than that. Shane looked relaxed. Actually relaxed. The kind of relaxed Ilya had only seen inside the apartment. The version of Shane who softened around the edges when he forgot to guard himself too carefully. The one who laughed without immediately looking embarrassed afterward. The one who leaned unconsciously toward people he trusted. That part unsettled him because he had assumed some of those things were private. Private enough to matter. Ilya couldn't help but focus on Hollander's lower belly. How soon do male omega's start showing? Ilya had no real reference but it had only been a few weeks. But Shane did have a pretty athletic but slender build.

Then Christopher Hill started appearing too often.

At first, Ilya barely registered him. Tall. Broad shoulders. Dark hair. Forgettable face. Another teammate. Nothing special. Then the investigator kept sending photographs, and Hill kept appearing. Standing beside Shane in the airport. Walking next to him on the beach. Too close during dinners. Too easy. One picture arrived three days later showing Shane laughing hard enough to duck his head while Hill leaned close beside him saying something only Shane could hear. Friendly. Normal. Nothing objectively wrong. That somehow made it worse because objectively wrong would have been easier. Easy to justify. Easy to hate.

Friendship settled under people's skin unexpectedly. Friendship turned into trust. Trust turned into dependency. Shane trusted badly. Carelessly. Not emotionally, never fully, but practically and socially in all the ways that mattered most. He let people crowd him. Accommodated discomfort until he disappeared underneath it. Apologized too easily. Avoided confrontation like it physically hurt. He folded around stronger personalities without meaning to. Easy to overwhelm. Easy to influence. Easy to hurt.

The photographs kept coming. Hill passing Shane a drink. Hill touching the small of Shane's back while crossing a crowded street. Hill leaning close enough during dinner that Shane had to tip his head sideways to hear him. One photo sat worse than the others. Shane half asleep in some lounge chair while Hill sat beside him reading something on his phone, Shane's shoulder pressed lightly against Hill's arm. Accidental, probably. Innocent. Ilya stared at that picture for too long.

Something ugly shifted beneath his ribs. Shane had taken months to soften around him. Months of awkward texts, distance, careful pushing, too much patience, too much restraint. Shane looked startled every single time closeness happened too naturally. And now this man, this quickly? No. Impossible. Unless Shane trusted him. Worse, Shane liked him.

The investigator reassured him repeatedly that nothing romantic was happening, which should have helped and did not. Romantic implied obvious. Predictable. What unsettled him sat quieter than romance. Ease. Routine. Comfort. The kind that arrived before anyone noticed it becoming important. But that was an idiotic statement. Hollander wouldn't be openly affectionate with someone like that.

Then a new set of pictures came in. Shane dancing in a dark club, another man grabbing his waist with his head bent down to Hollander's face. Ilya had destroyed his apartment then.

Later that night, long after Moscow had gone mostly quiet outside of the hotel room he had had to go stay in, something darker festered in his mind. It started as just a thought, brief and ugly and quick enough to almost disappear. If Hill stopped showing up, if he became unavailable for a while, if something minor happened- an injury, perhaps, nothing permanent, nothing but enough to get him away from Hollander- then whatever this friendship was becoming would have space to die before Shane folded too close into it. The man who had touched him so intimately would also have to be dealt with.

The thought landed so naturally that Ilya physically went still, phone in his hand, Mexico photographs open. His stomach turned unpleasantly because immediately there was Grigory. His father's voice. His father's logic. Ownership disguised as care. Control disguised as protection. I only want what is best for you. Immediate disgust followed. No. Absolutely not. Too far. Hollander would hate that, he would fear it. And worse, Hollander would never forgive him.

That thought mattered. Buried beneath irritation and bruised pride and increasingly humiliating emotional dependence sat one quiet truth Ilya disliked examining too closely: he wanted Hollander to choose him.

Instead, he stayed in Russia.

Two weeks remained before athletes arrived in full, which meant camps, coordination, politics, and endless federation obligations that somehow always multiplied once national pride got involved. Officially, he stayed to train. Unofficially, Sochi meant he would at least see Hollander, even if from a distance. The Olympics meant that they'd be close enough to stop wondering. Close enough to look directly at him and ask what happened.

Then captaincy complicated things. The announcement came quietly at first, leaked, rumored, then confirmed. Captain. Russia. At nineteen. Predictably, the older bureaucrats and other athletes hated it. Too young. Too arrogant. Had gotten used to the North American way of playing. Too independent. One federation official apparently described him during a private meeting as talented but insufficiently patriotic, and that one almost made him laugh because he should have taken the offer to play on the American team. Still, players listened. Older teammates respected consistency even when they disliked personality. Younger ones followed naturally. Ilya cared about winning with enough sincerity to make people uncomfortable, and somewhere along the way, leadership settled onto him without permission.

He trained harder after that. Stayed later. Watched the teams chemistry develop- who clashed, who avoided pressure, who needed pushing, who needed patience. Team first. Winning first. Distraction helped, though not enough, because every night there was still his phone, Hollander and messages going unanswered, silence, and the photographs he told himself not to open again before opening them anyway.

When Olympic housing opened, Russia settled loudly into its assigned section like they always did, players already arguing about rooms within twenty minutes. Ilya unpacked quickly, then casually, too casually, learned where Canada would stay. Three buildings over. Close enough. The knowledge settled low in his chest, dangerous and comforting at the same time. Shane would be here soon. Actually here. Reachable. No more guessing. No more photographs. No more Mexico.

That thought unsettled him enough that he called Morozov three nights later.

The doctor agreed to dinner immediately. The restaurant sat private enough that athletes rarely bothered with it, expensive vodka and heavy food under quiet lighting, the kind of place where conversations disappeared naturally into walls. Morozov arrived looking amused already and said he had wondered when Ilya would call. Ilya poured vodka and let the doctor talk himself warm. Politics first. The Olympics. The stupidity of bureaucrats. The omega legislation. Enough vodka softened Morozov around the edges without making him sloppy, which was perfect.

Then slowly, carefully, Ilya began asking questions again.

"If someone vulnerable needed help," Ilya asked evenly, "what options exist?"

Morozov studied him over the rim of his glass. "There is someone."

"No."

The doctor smiled slightly. "Of course."

Ilya said nothing.

“Depends on what kind of help,” Morozov said.

“Protection.”

“From what?”

Ilya almost said from himself. Instead, he shrugged and said, “Wrong people.”

An interesting silence followed. Morozov set his glass down carefully. “Protection becomes dangerous when people confuse it with control.”

The words landed harder than expected. Too close. Too accurate. Grigory flashed briefly through Ilya’s thoughts: his mother growing quieter, smaller, sad enough to disappear eventually. No. Not the same. Completely different. Hollander needed care. Someone paying attention. Someone making sure he was safe. Someone making sure he stopped trusting people too quickly. Christopher Hill appeared in his mind again, too close in photographs, too easy, too comfortable.

Ilya poured more vodka.

“And if someone needed discretion?” he asked quietly.

Morozov looked at him for a long second, not alarmed, just careful. “You care about this person.”

Not a question. Observation. Ilya looked down briefly, then said, “Maybe.” It felt too honest.

The doctor sighed softly. “Ilya Gregorovich, speak plainly please. I am sure you know that right now, there is nothing that you cannot ask from anyone in the whole of Russia that wouldn’t be given to you.”

Dangerous sentence. Because Ilya already knew that. The frightening part was that he was beginning not to care.

Ilya let the silence stretch before speaking again, voice controlled enough to sound almost bored. “How much would it take?”

Morozov’s expression changed by degrees. Not shock. He was too experienced for that. Something quieter. Understanding, maybe, and disappointment underneath it. “For what?”

“For private services. Under the table. No registry. No official questions. If an omega needed help and could not go through normal channels.”

The restaurant noise seemed to dull around them. Morozov did not reach for his glass this time. He watched Ilya with the kind of careful attention that made it clear he understood this was no longer hypothetical, and Ilya let him. There was no point pretending completely. Not anymore. Not when the games were days away and Hollander would be close enough to speak to, close enough to avoid him in person, close enough to look at him with those startled brown eyes and pretend Mexico had not happened, pretend silence meant nothing, pretend Christopher Hill did not stand too close in photographs.

“You are asking for dangerous favors,” Morozov said.

“I am asking how dangerous they are.”

“That depends on whether the omega wants them.”

Ilya’s jaw tightened slightly. There it was. The line. The one that mattered. The one he had been trying not to cross even in thought. Hollander choosing him, Hollander wanting him. Hollander not being forced. But he was past that when he saw the last round of photos. Them at the airport on their way back home. Fucking Hill’s arm over his omega’s shoulder, pulling him closer.

“It’s not a bad thing that I want. It will be for his benefit.” Ilya said.

Morozov did not answer immediately. “Men usually say that before they start making the wrong decisions.”

The words should have angered him. Instead, they stayed. Ilya looked down at the vodka glass, at the clear surface catching warm restaurant light. He thought of Hollander asleep in the apartment, soft and trusting, their scents mixed together. Then a few days later laughing in Mexico beside another man. Shane saying Sochi like a promise and then disappearing into silence. He thought of his mother, taken from her small town outside Minsk because a man with power decided wanting mattered more than consent. He thought of Grigory calling it family.

“I am not my father,” Ilya said quietly.

Morozov’s gaze sharpened, but he did not ask.

Ilya looked back up. “Answer question.”

For a long moment, the doctor only studied him. Then he reached for his glass, not drinking yet, fingers resting against the stem. “Everything has a price,” Morozov said carefully. “But before you decide to pay one, you should decide whether you are protecting this person or protecting your access to them.”

Ilya smiled then, small and controlled, because charm was easier than honesty and because the doctor was useful even when he was irritating. “Good,” he said.

Morozov did not smile back.

“So, I need..” Ilya started, leaning in closer.

The heat of Mexico clung to them even at night, a humid blanket that made every piece of clothing feel like too much. The club was a throbbing heart of sound and light, a cavern of swirling colors and a bassline that vibrated up through the floor into Shane's bones. He stuck close to Jackie, a fixed point in the chaotic sea of bodies. Her smile was encouraging, her hand firm around his wrist as she pulled him through the press of people.

"You're thinking too much!" she yelled over the music, her voice a bright thread in the din. Her eyes sparkled with reflected neon. "Your shoulders are up by your ears! This is fun, remember? Fun!"

Fun. Right. Shane tried to unclench his jaw, to let the rhythm find him. It was so loud, so much. Every brush against a stranger made his skin prickle with a vague alarm.

Jackie didn't wait for him to adjust. She started to move, a natural, confident sway of her hips, her hands in the air. She grabbed his hands and placed them on her waist, guiding him. "Just follow! Don't think, just move!"

He tried. The music was infectious, a pulsing beat that demanded motion. Slowly, awkwardly at first, he began to mirror her, their movements a small, private island in the crowd. A smile, tentative and real, touched his lips. This was okay. This was just dancing.

Chris materialized beside them with two small, clear glasses, condensation beading on the sides. "Medicine for the overthinker!" he announced, handing one to Shane. It smelled sharp, citrusy, and very alcoholic.

"I don't really-" Shane started.

"One sip," Jackie insisted, clinking her own glass where had she gotten that? against his. "For courage. For loosening the knot in your spine. Just one."

So he drank. The tequila was a smooth, fiery burn down his throat, settling in his stomach like a small sun. A few minutes later, another appeared in his hand, this time from a passing waiter Chris flagged down. "To vacation!" Chris toasted, and Shane, feeling the first drink already softening the hard edges of his anxiety, drank again.

The world gained a pleasant fuzz. The lights blurred into beautiful streaks. The music wasn't an assault anymore; it was a current he could ride. He laughed at something Jackie said, the sound feeling freer in his own throat. He was dancing, actually dancing, his movements less stilted, his body beginning to understand the language of the beat.

That's when Chris moved in. Jackie had spun away to dance with Hayden, and suddenly it was just Chris in front of him, closer than before. Chris was smiling, but it was a different smile- more focused, more intent. His hands came up to Shane's hips, ostensibly to keep time, but his thumbs pressed inwards, possessive.

“See? Told you you’d have fun,” Chris said, his voice low enough to be intimate despite the noise. His breath smelled of lime and alcohol. “You’re a natural.”

Before Shane could process the change in tone, Chris leaned in. It wasn’t a question. One hand slid up to cradle Shane’s jaw, and he kissed him.

It was all wrong.

The lips were too soft, the technique too practiced. The scent was wrong - cologne and sweat, not the deep, leathery, safe scent of Ilya. A bolt of pure, visceral revulsion shot through Shane. He froze for a second, stunned, then wrenched his head back, pulling out of Chris’s grip as if electrocuted.

“What are you doing?” Shane gasped, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. The pleasant alcohol buzz curdled into nausea. The music felt suddenly hostile again. He felt a sickening lurch in his gut, a profound sense of betrayal- not just of himself, but of Ilya. Ilya, who was thousands of miles away. Ilya, whose kiss felt like a claim and a homecoming. This felt like theft.

Chris held up his hands, the picture of placating confusion. “Whoa, easy! It’s just a kiss, Shane. We’re all friends here. Having fun.”

“That’s not-” Shane shook his head, the words choking him. He couldn’t articulate the violation, the deep wrongness of it. He just turned and pushed his way through the crowd, away from Chris’s knowing smile, seeking the darkness at the edges of the dance floor and another drink.

He found a quieter corner near a bar manned by a disinterested bartender. His heart was hammering, the taste of Chris still lingering, a toxic film. He needed to scrub it away. He needed to forget. When a shot glass appeared in front of him, he didn’t ask what it was. He just threw it back, welcoming the new, cleaner burn that scoured his mouth and throat. Then another. The sharp edges of his guilt and panic began to blur, sanded down by the alcohol. The memory of the kiss became a distant, unpleasant thing. The memory of Ilya’s face, however, remained crystalline, a painful, beautiful ache in his chest.

He pulled his phone out, fumbling to find the text thread that had been transferred to his new phone. He scrolled the messages until he landed on one from a couple months ago. Rozanov being an asshole like usual, ordering him around. That pissed him off again. Ily-Rozanov wasn’t his boyfriend, or keeper, or mate. He had the nerve to order him around constantly. Shane wouldn’t do that. He was his own person. He would do whatever he wanted. He downed the drink in front of him. It hurt being away from Rozanov though. He shouldn’t ignored him for so long.

Fueled by a new, reckless determination to outrun that ache, he shoved back into the crowd. This time, he didn’t need Jackie. The drinks had lit a fire in his veins, melting his inhibitions into a liquid courage. He closed his eyes and just moved, letting the beat take over, becoming another anonymous body in the pulsating mass. He danced for one song, then another, lost in the cathartic, mindless physicality of it.

A presence settled in front of him. He opened his eyes. A man was dancing with him, matching his rhythm effortlessly. He was taller than Shane, with dark hair swept back and eyes that seemed to catch the fractured light, holding it. He wasn't aggressively close, but his space was intimate, intentional. He smiled, not like Chris had, but with a quiet, assured confidence.

The man said something in Spanish that he didn't understand, his voice a rich, warm baritone that cut through the music with a heavy, melodic Spanish accent. "You are very beautiful to watch."

Shane, breathless, just shook his head, a denial he couldn't voice.

The man moved closer, not touching, but leading with his body. His movements were hypnotic, all controlled power and fluid grace. "You let it go, little by little," he murmured, his accent curling around the words, making them sound like a secret, a romance. "That is what the music is for."

And as they danced, Shane felt a strange, disorienting pull. It wasn't the man's words, though they were lovely. It was something else. The way he held himself- a certain unshakeable solidity. The way his gaze remained steady and focused, missing nothing. The faint, clean scent of him, cutting through the club's miasma- not the same as Ilya's, but it spoke of the same kind of assured masculinity, a quiet dominance that was felt, not announced.

It was in the shape of his hands. The set of his shoulders. An echo, a haunting, half-heard chord of something painfully familiar. It reminded him of Ilya, and he didn't know why. The realization was a splash of cold water in the warm, drunken haze. It drew him in and repelled him at once, leaving him spinning on the dance floor, tethered to a ghost and a stranger all at once.

The man's hand was on his elbow, not gripping, but guiding- a firm, inescapable pressure that cut through the haze of music and alcohol. Shane didn't resist. The part of him that should have been drowned, muted by tequila and the desperate, screaming echo of Ilya's memory that this stranger somehow invoked and betrayed at the same time.

"Too loud," the man said, his accent a warm, close thing by Shane's ear. It wasn't a question. He was already moving, cutting a path through the sweat-slick bodies with an authority that parted the crowd. Shane followed, a leaf in a current, his heart pounding a frantic, confused rhythm against his ribs.

They slipped through a heavy curtain into a narrow, dim alcove meant for storage or stolen moments. The music became a muffled throb here, a distant heartbeat. The air was cooler, smelling of dust and spilled liquor. A single, low-wattage bulb cast everything in deep amber shadows.

The man turned to him. In the semi-darkness, his features were even more pronounced, that haunting echo of a familiar strength now sharpened into a focused intent. He didn't speak. He simply looked at Shane, his gaze traveling over his flushed face, his parted lips, the rapid pulse at his throat. Then his hands went to the button of Shane's jeans.

Shane's breath hitched. A weak noise of protest died in his throat. This was wrong. This was so profoundly wrong it made his soul feel thin. But his body, traitorously, was alight with a confused, aching need. The wrongness and the need twisted together, a paralyzing knot.

The man worked with a quiet, efficient certainty. He didn't ask. He didn't coax. He simply knelt, the motion fluid and graceful, and took Shane into the warm, shocking cavern of his mouth.

Shane's head thudded back against the rough plaster wall, a gasp ripped from him. Pleasure, immediate and intense, jolted up his spine. It was skilled, devastatingly so- a masterful, relentless pressure and suction that had no business feeling this good. He squeezed his eyes shut, trying to block it out, but the physical sensation was a tidal wave, washing over the crumbling walls of his guilt.

His mind fractured. One part was here, in this dark, dirty alcove, arching into a stranger's mouth. Another part was thousands of miles away, in a quiet bedroom, feeling Ilya's worshipful, possessive touch. The two images bled together sickeningly. The Spanish-accented murmur of "está bien" from the man between his legs blurred with the memory of Ilya's guttural Russian praise. The hands on his hips were not the right hands. The scent was not the right scent. But the technique... it was designed to obliterate thought.

And yet, his body, for all its drunk, eager response, held back the final surrender. Climax coiled in his gut, a tight, urgent spring, but it wouldn't release. Shame was a colder, stronger drug. The face behind his eyelids was Ilya's- Ilya's hurt, Ilya's betrayed confusion if he could see this. The pleasure became a torture. Each expert flick of the tongue, each deep, pulling suck, felt like a nail being driven into the coffin of something pure he'd had. He whimpered, a sound of agony and building ecstasy.

The man seemed to sense the blockade. He changed rhythm, his hands coming up to grip Shane's thighs, holding him firmly in place. He took him deeper, until Shane felt the hit of the back of his throat, and a low, approving hum vibrated through him. It was the final, brutal push.

With a broken, choked-off cry that was more sob than shout, Shane came. It was a violent, convulsive release that felt less like pleasure and more like a system purge—a wretched, guilty expulsion of everything he'd drunk and everything he'd done. His knees buckled, and only the wall and the man's grip kept him upright.

The man pulled away, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. The word was the trigger. Reality crashed back in, cold and vicious. The taste of bile joined the taste of tequila in his throat. Shane fumbled, yanking his jeans up with trembling, clumsy hands, the fabric sticking to his damp skin. He couldn't look at the man. He couldn't speak.

He just fled.

He shoved past the curtain, back into the wall of sound and light, which now felt like a physical assault. He stumbled through the crowd, a ghost with a pounding heart, seeing nothing. The main doors appeared. He burst out into the humid Mexican night, the relative silence a roaring in his ears.

He made it three steps past the bouncer before his body rebelled. He lurched to the side of the building, into a dim alleyway reeking of garbage and urine, and fell to his hands and knees. The convulsion was brutal and total. He vomited up the tequila, the sour mix of drinks, the fleeting memory of Chris's kiss, and the slick, shameful climax he'd just given to a stranger. It came in heaving, painful waves, tears streaming from his eyes, mixing with the sweat and spit on his face.

When it was over, he slumped against the rough brick wall, spent and shaking. The cool night air did nothing to cleanse him. He felt hollowed out, filthy, and utterly, devastatingly alone. The echo of the accent was gone. All that remained was the crushing, silent weight of what he had done, and the pristine, distant image of Ilya's face, now feeling more out of reach than ever.

The opening ceremony would happen the next day. Ilya sat back in the shadowed alcove as he watched Hollander walk to his room, pale faced and with sunglasses and his hat pulled low over his face.

Two small camera's were already in the room, and a complementary welcome basket was on the table. His roommate would be delayed for several hours, thanks to an overly friendly customs officer who wanted to impress his wife with a signed jersey from Ilya.

Ilya watched on his phone as Shane moved around the room setting his bags down and removing the fleece team Canada. Ilya smiled as he watched the omega carefully cold the jacket and hang it over the chair.

Slowly he took a water bottle and sat on the bed, pitching the bridge of his nose. He had sat with his cell phone and Ilya noticed that it was a new one.

S- Hi. Just made it to the village.

Ilya's eyes narrowed. Too late moy kotyonok. He watched as Shane opened the bottle and start drinking the water.

Ilya opened his messages and sent out a quick text to the good doctor and sat back again to watch.

Ten minutes later, Ilya let himself in with the key card he had asked her and walked up to Hollander. The water had fallen to the floor. So he picked it up and dumped the remaining water down the sink in the small bathroom.

Slowly, he took stock of Hollander after so long without seeing him in person. He had a tan now, his hair a little longer, freckles darker-even more beautiful. He manouvered him to be under the blankets, brushing a hand through the soft dark hair. He went to the small back and took out the lancet, picking Hollander's finger briefly. A few drops of blood and the liquid in the vial would tell him if he was pregnant in about 20 minutes according to Morozov.

He waited for the knock at the door and went to answer. The doctor walked in and stopped short. "Shane Hollander! Mr. Rozanov- you did not-"

"I am not asking for permission. Get to it. And remember-a word of this to anyone and I will end you."

Ilya climbed into the bed and sat against the headboard, moving Hollander's head to rest on his lap. He stroked the omega's soft cheek, running his fingertips over the freckles again. Morozov approached with a frown, holding an alcohol swab and a thick syringe.

"Hold him still." Ilya raised the dark hair at the base of Shane's neck and held him down just in case. The drugs in the water were enough that he'll sleep through it and not feel much pain, but he followed the directive.

A soft click and shudder and it was done. He watched as Morozov ran a small screen over the area until they heard a high pitched beep. He turned and got a small clear bottle from his bag. "Surgical glue. The implant is the size of a large grain of rice but he wont really be able to tell unless he knows exactly was to look for."

Ilya nodded, locking down and stocking Hollander's face again. "Mr. Rozanov, I hope you know that-"

"You can leave now. I will wire your payment when I get back to my room."

Ilya watched the other man leave and pick up the small locator. It looked like a GPS screen and he smiled. Now he would know exactly where Hollander would be. His heartrate, his temperate-everything he could want.

He saw the time and knew that he would need to leave soon if he didn't want to get caught. He bent down and placed a soft kiss on Hollander's temple, pulling the blanket up to his chest.

He opened the new cell phone and downloaded the mirroring apps he had had in the old phone before placing it back carefully to exactly where it had been. He looked back again before quietly closing the door behind him, looking forward to seeing Hollander again soon.

Dropping this off tonight. Next chapter will be up on Wednesday most likely-it's 80% done but its one that will possibly make people really really hate Ilya for a while so I have to sit on it and read it over a few times.

Big fat juicy kisses for all the reviews and kuddos-I repeatedly read all of them while kicking my feet and giggling. Luv yall. Ugh

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Shane woke up feeling out of sorts. He usually didn't have time for naps in the middle of the day but judging by the sunlight seeping through the window, he must have slept for a few hours. He didn't feel sick exactly. Not injured either, though there was a heaviness in his body that made everything feel slower than usual, like someone had quietly replaced all his muscles with versions slightly less cooperative. His head felt packed with cotton, thoughts moving sluggishly behind his eyes while the room remained frustratingly too bright around him. For several seconds, he lay perfectly still beneath unfamiliar blankets, staring up at the ceiling and trying to remember where he was.

The Sochi Olympic Village. Right. The realization settled slowly. Opening ceremonies. Media. Practice. Team meetings. Russia. Ilya would be close soon.

That last thought woke him up more effectively than anything else.

Shane groaned quietly and dragged a hand over his face before immediately regretting moving at all. His neck ached faintly. Everything felt heavy in that irritating way exhaustion sometimes settled after too much travel and not enough sleep.

Mexico, he thought vaguely. Jet lag, too much tequila, too little sleep. Possibly punishment from the universe for making consistently bad decisions.

"Cool," he muttered to absolutely no one.

His roommate was already gone. Good, Shane wasn't emotionally prepared for human interaction before caffeine.

The bedside table held an empty bottle of water he barely remembered opening. Weird. He stared at it for a second before dismissing the thought entirely because honestly, the last week had blurred together enough that forgetting water felt pretty normal.

Mexico had ended in disaster.

The club. Chris. That random man with the accent who somehow reminded him too much of someone he absolutely should not have been thinking about. His stomach rolled when he thought about what happened but he pushed it out of his mind. He needed to focus now, he needed to figure out what to say to Rozanov after ignoring him for weeks. Annoyingly, every thought somehow circled back to Ilya.

Which was stupid, Objectively stupid. Shane sat up slowly and immediately regretted it when dizziness rolled unpleasantly through him.

“Jesus.” Definitely dehydration. Or jetlag. Or karma.

Probably karma.

He grabbed his phone before he was fully awake, thumb already moving without permission.

No messages. Well, that was disappointing. He frowned at the screen longer than necessary.

The text thread still sat there awkwardly, unfinished in the way things between them had suddenly become unfinished.

Montreal had complicated everything. That was the problem. Before Montreal, things had been weird but manageable. He thought they had started to get along even. The occasional feeling that Ilya Rozanov paid way too much attention to him for reasons Shane still didn't fully understand.

Then they slept together and Shane still hadn't fully processed that and he would need to decide very soon on how to approach Rozanov with his mind made up. Normal people knew what to do after that. Probably. But Shane did not.

Still, he should say something. Normal people texted. Normal people communicated. Normal people did not disappear emotionally for weeks and then pretend confusion counted as emotional maturity.

Before he could stop himself, he typed:

S - I checked into the Village. How have you been?

He stared at it. Was it too eager? Too obvious?

He almost deleted it, but didn't. He hit send before he could chicken out.

He immediately regretted it. Fantastic- amazing start.

He dropped the phone beside him and dragged himself toward the bathroom before he could stare at the screen like someone deeply embarrassing.

The mirror was unkind.

His hair looked terrible. The Mexico tan somehow made the dark circles under his eyes more obvious. He looked tired in a way that vaguely irritated him.

Olympics. Actual Olympics. He should have been more focused than this. It was an honor for a rookie to be on a team.

Instead, apparently he was thinking about one terrifying Russian hockey player too much.

Embarrassing.

The shower helped a little, but not enough. He checked his phone before even getting dressed.

Nothing.

Okay. Busy. He wouldn't be attached to his phone obviously.

Rozanov had captain responsibilities and media and terrifying Russian hockey obligations.

That was fine. Normal. Completely reasonable.

Still. He checked again before leaving the room. Nothing.

Dinner in the Olympic Village dining hall somehow managed to feel surreal and aggressively normal at the same time.

Too many people. Too many languages. Too many athletes pretending they definitely weren't sizing each other.

The dining hall buzzed with noise, trays clattering, conversations overlapping in different accents while muted sports coverage played overhead. Someone from speed skating laughed too loudly nearby. A gymnast walked past carrying what looked like enough fruit to feed an entire village.

Shane grabbed food mostly because elite athletes were supposed to eat and not because he actually wanted any of it.

His appetite had apparently stayed in Mexico.

Or maybe Montreal.

Hard to say. He sat alone at first, the table under the Canadian flag had been empty since they all arrived on the same flight hours ago.

Mistake. Because sitting alone meant thinking. Thinking meant checking his phone. Checking his phone that no response.

Still. Fine, he had done the same so he probably deserved it.

He typed again before he could stop himself.

S- Made it to the dining hall. The architecture is amazing.

Pause.

Then:

S: Good luck

Too much? Probably. Definitely. He tossed the phone face down beside his tray. Then looked up. And froze. Russia occupied nearly an entire section near the windows.

Of course they did.

Loud without actually being messy about it, confident in a way that somehow made every other team feel younger. Coaches spoke sharply between bites. Federation staff floated nearby looking mildly stressed.

And there, near the middle like gravity had decided to become a person, sat Ilya.

Black hoodie.

Damp hair.

Coffee in one hand.

Relaxed in the deeply unfair way he somehow always looked relaxed. Shane's chest tightened stupidly.

He looked fine.

Beautiful. And completely unaffected. Which somehow annoyed Shane more than it should have. Because Shane felt affected. Shane felt weird and distracted and vaguely pathetic.

Meanwhile apparently Ilya Rozanov woke up looking terrifying and emotionally stable.

Unfair. Completely unfair. As if sensing the stare, Ilya looked up. Their eyes met. The entire room seemed to go strangely quiet for one awful second. Shane forgot what he had been doing. Forgot breakfast. Forgot literally everything except the deeply unfortunate reality that Ilya somehow looked unfairly good from across a crowded room. Ilya held eye contact. Steady. Unreadable. Then someone beside him said something into his ear he looked away. Just like that.

Shane stared down at his eggs.

Rude. Honestly rude. But he wasn't blameless so he would just have to accept it.

His phone buzzed. Immediate relief hit before before it fell and he saw it was his mother.

Not Ilya.

His mother.

He almost texted again, but didn't and he texted his mom that everything was fine, and that yes, he was wearing the new reebok sneakers with the underarmour.

Five minutes later:

S: I wish we could at least say hello to each other.

He stared at it.

Too vulnerable.

Deleted.

Retyped.

S: You looked very Russian today. Very slavic.

Better.

Weirder somehow. But better- he hoped it would make Rozanov smile at least.

Sent.

Nothing. No response. No typing bubble. Cool.

Cool cool cool.

By lunch, Shane had checked his phone enough times to genuinely embarrass himself.

Practice helped.

Sort of.

At least hockey forced focus for short bursts. But even then, distraction lingered annoyingly close to the surface. Every time they crossed shared training areas, he found himself looking.

Not intentionally. Just automatically, as if he had an internal radar that told him whenever Rozanov was near.

Sometimes he spotted Russia across the rink.

Sometimes he caught glimpses of dark hoodies and sharp voices and entirely too much confidence moving through hallways.

Sometimes he found Rozanov right in his line of sight, sometimes he didn't.

Every single time, his stomach reacted before his brain caught up.

Which felt medically concerning. "You look miserable." Shane looked up from his tray.

Scott Hunter stood there looking unimpressed.

“That’s supportive.”

“You look like someone stole your puppy or something kid.” Carter added, appearing seemingly from nowhere.

“Love that for me.”

Scott nudged out a chair with his foot. “Sit with us.”

“I’m fine.”

“Come on Hollander. You’re going to be carrying your countries flag. You guys are going to medal during your rookie season and you’ll most likely get to play center for a bit.” Carter said immediately.

Scott nodded once. “Very true. You need to be happy about that at least.”

Shane considered resisting.

Then glanced toward Russia again. Mistake. Ilya sat with his teammates looking entirely too comfortable, saying something quietly to another player while absently scrolling through his phone. Probably ignoring him. Rude- again.

“You need to practice your pissed face if you’re going to stare at them over there.,” Carter said.

“I do not.”

“You fully do. You look like a little angry rabbit or something.”

Scott raised one eyebrow. “Come eat before you become weird in public.”

Unfortunately, that felt fair.

Shane sat.

Lunch helped.

A little.

Carter complained about literally everything- the smell in their rooms. The weather. The social restrictions that only the athletes and coaches were allowed in the village.

The beds. The food. A skier who apparently kept stealing yogurt. Scott contributed occasionally in dry comments that somehow only encouraged Carter to become more dramatic.

It helped enough that Shane almost stopped checking his phone every ten seconds.

Almost. But still nothing after half an hour.

No replies. No acknowledgment. And for reasons Shane absolutely did not want to think about too hard, being ignored bothered him way more than it should have.

Which didn't make sense to him, because he'd done the same thing too. Because it implied caring. Because Shane refused to be one of those Omegas who begged and pleaded for an Alpha's attention.

Also, Shane was pretty sure caring about Ilya Rozanov sounded like the beginning of a genuinely terrible idea.

Shane had had a terrible game. He was only put on the line during the 3rd quarter and had scored Canada's only two goals but it wasn't enough. His parents were thrilled still, texting him affirmations and how proud everyone back home was. He watched Russian annihilate all their opponents and was genuinely proud of Rozanov, but he wished it was him at the medal ceremony. They didn't interact after posing for the obligatory pictures and Shane had struggled to answer the few reporters that he couldn't shake off.

Dinner time came with still no reply so Shane just wanted to stay in bed, but Scott practically kidnapped him into it. Not literally. Mostly.

Shane had fully intended to grab something quick and disappear back to his room under the excuse of being tired, emotionally exhausted, and internationally disappointed in himself. Bronze still sat strangely in his chest. Not bad exactly, because a medal was still a medal, but wrong enough that every congratulations felt slightly undeserved.

He had not played badly. Just... not well enough. Not focused enough. And unfortunately, the part of his brain responsible for honesty kept whispering exactly why. Because apparently becoming emotionally invested in a terrifying Russian hockey player right before the Olympics had been a bad strategic decision.

Who could have predicted.

"Hollander."

Shane looked up from the deeply questionable sandwich he had been considering.

Scott stood three feet away holding a tray and looking unimpressed.

Before Shane could argue, Carter appeared out of nowhere already mid-conversation with himself.

"Oh my God," Carter said immediately. "Chin up, Rook. You'll be winning gold in four years. I've not heard one negative thing about your playing all day."

"Thanks."

"You'll be fine," Scott said.

Shane sighed loudly enough to qualify as suffering.

“You guys are weirdly committed to making me feel terrible.”

Scott nudged a chair out with his foot.

“Sit.”

Some of the younger Canadian players joined the American table and Shane laughed more than he expected to from Carters jokes.

Not enough to feel better. But enough to stop checking his phone every thirty seconds.

Mostly.

Then the television overhead shifted coverage.

News anchors.

Government buildings.

Russian subtitles.

A headline stretched across the bottom of the screen.

International concern grows over Russian omega legislation

The room around them stayed mostly normal. Athletes moved through dinner. Coaches talked too loudly. Someone nearby argued about hockey statistics.

But Shane felt something tighten low in his stomach instantly.

Carter glanced up.

“Oh,” he said. “That thing again.”

Scott looked toward the television but said nothing.

The anchor spoke beneath subtitles about national stability, protests, proposed restrictions, international backlash.

Shane stopped eating. Carter shrugged slightly.

“Everyone keeps freaking out about it.”

Something in Shane’s chest tightened.

“What do you mean?”

Carter looked over.

“I mean obviously some of it sounds intense, but every country has weird laws.” He gestured vaguely with his fork. “Media always makes stuff sound worse than it is.”

Scott stayed quiet.

Shane put his fork down carefully.

“I don’t think governments deciding who people should mate with counts as normal.”

The sharpness in his own voice surprised him.

Carter blinked. “Okay. Wow.” Silence stretched awkwardly.

Scott glanced sideways at Shane briefly. Not judgmental, just observant.

Carter shifted in his seat.

“I just meant headlines are sometimes exaggerated.”

“Mandatory pairing before twenty-one sounds pretty bad,” Shane said quietly.

Carter frowned. “Wait, that’s real?”

Shane immediately regretted saying too much.

Too invested. Too personal. “My mother mentioned something about it this morning. It’s all over the news everywhere,” he muttered.

Scott finally spoke. “Laws like that usually sound reasonable to people they don’t affect.”

Carter looked uncomfortable. “Okay, yeah, fair.”

Shane looked down at his tray again. Because that was the problem. For most people, this stayed theoretical. Politics, international news.

Something happening somewhere else.

For Shane, it is different. Because secrets changed things. Because suppressants changed things. Because medical forms and locked bottles and carefully controlled distance from teammates suddenly felt much more fragile when governments started talking about omegas like logistics problems.

If other countries started to adopt stricter Omega controls, Shane didn’t know what that would mean for his future.

His appetite disappeared completely. The television showed protest footage now. Arguments, signs. Politicians smiling in ways Shane instinctively disliked. And suddenly, irrationally, horribly, one thought hit harder than the rest.

What if people knew? What if something happened? The fear came fast enough to make his chest feel tight.

And then, annoyingly, embarrassingly, another thought followed immediately:

Ilya wouldn't let anything happen. The certainty arrived too quickly. Too naturally, but was dashed when he looked back to the TV and saw Rozanov sitting among the government officials that were announcing the new laws.

Shane was apparently an idiot. Of course Rozanov wasn't different then most alphas.

Great. Fantastic. Emotionally healthy choices all around.

"You okay?"

Scott's voice pulled him back.

Shane blinked.

"What?"

"You went quiet."

Cater leaned forward slightly.

"Like really quiet."

"I'm fine."

"You look like you're going to be sick," Carter said immediately.

Scott nodded once.

Shane rubbed a hand over his face.

"Just tired."

Not technically a lie.

Scott studied him for a second too long.

Then, mercifully: "You should sleep."

Carter nodded. "Yeah, you look like existential dread won."

"Fuck off." Shane replied with a weak smile. Despite himself, Shane laughed quietly.

The tension eased enough to breathe again.

Enough to survive dinner. Until he looked across the dining hall. Russia occupied the same corner. And there, near the center, sat Ilya. Relaxed. Unfairly attractive. Talking quietly to another player like he had not spent the entire day ignoring Shane's existence.

Shane looked away sadly.

His phone stayed silent in his pocket.

No response.

Again.

Which should not have bothered him.

Really.

It shouldn't have.

They weren't... anything.

Not technically.

It was a one night stand apparently.

But still. By the time Shane got back to his room, disappointment had shifted into something sharper. Embarrassment. Because apparently he cared too much. Enough to text again.

Against his better judgment.

S- I'm not well versed in one night stands like you, but let me know if I need to do anything before the season starts. I know condoms were used but I would like not to wake up with a herpes sore on my lip from our other activities.

There sent. He threw the phone on the desk and paced. Immediately, he regretted it.

Again. Honestly, at this point, humiliation felt like part of the routine.

He picked up the phone, no response of course, so he tossed it onto the bed and went to shower.

When he came back twenty minutes later, steam still clinging to the room, his screen lit up.

Heart traitorously fast, he grabbed it.

Nothing. Spam email. He stared at the ceiling for a long second.

"This is embarrassing," he muttered.

The next morning somehow felt worse, the air felt heavier.

Like sleep had happened around him instead of to him.

He rolled onto his side and checked his phone before he fully woke.

Nothing. Seriously? Fine. Whatever. Maybe Russia confiscated phones.

Maybe Olympic gold had gone directly to Rozanov's head. Maybe he died. Or was in a massive orgy with whores and puck bunnies.

By breakfast, Olympic Village had shifted into something quieter. Hockey and skyng were the bigger drawls and those games were over..

Everyone carried that weird middle-of-the-Games exhaustion now.

Excitement mixed with disappointment depending on medal counts and expectations.

Shane grabbed coffee first. Scott found him halfway through breakfast.

"You look sick."

"Why does everyone keep saying that?"

"Because you do."

Carter arrived seconds later already talking.

"I almost got into a fight with a skier."

Scott blinked once.

"Why?"

"He insulted hockey."

"That doesn't sound real."

"It was extremely real."

Despite himself, Shane laughed. "Do you guys want to come with me to the male figure skating event this morning? It starts in like 20 minutes. A buddy of mine is competing and I'd like to support him."

They both agreed and made their way out soon after.

Okay.

Maybe this helped.

A little.

At least Scott and Carter felt easy.

Familiar enough now that silence wasn't awkward.

Unfortunately, easy meant his brain wandered.

Which meant noticing.

Russia sat at their usual table again.

And there he was. Ilya. Again. Relaxed. Unfairly composed. Still apparently emotionally stable while Shane continued quietly losing his mind.

Their eyes met briefly. Ilya looked away first.

Again.

The dismissal landed harder than Shane wanted to admit.

“Earth to Shane!?” Carter asked suddenly.

“What?”

“You keep staring into space.”

Scott glanced sideways.

“You distracted?”

“No.”

The lie came too quickly.

Carter narrowed his eyes dramatically.

“Olympic crush?”

Shane nearly choked on coffee.

“No.”

Scott raised one eyebrow.

“That sounded defensive.”

“It wasn’t.”

“Very defensive,” Carter said.

“Oh my God.”

Scott looked thoughtful for one deeply unfortunate second.

“No.”

“That hesitation was suspicious.”

“Guys.”

“Russian team? The figure skaters are pretty cute.” Scott asked mildly.

Shane almost dropped his coffee.

“No.”

Too loud. Too fast. Too horrified.

Both of them stared.

Carter slowly lowered his fork.

Carter looked delighted. “You are being unbelievably weird.”

Scott studied him for one second too long before letting it go.

“For now,” he said.

Across the dining hall, Ilya stood.

Conversation shifted naturally around him.

Someone said something. He answered briefly.

Then looked over, straight at Shane. Again. This time, he didn’t immediately look away. The eye contact lingered. Steady. Unreadable, a challenge in his eyes.

Enough that Shane forgot Carter was talking entirely.

Then Ilya glanced once toward Shane’s phone sitting beside his tray.

Back to Shane.

And walked away.

Shane frowned.

What the hell was that?

His phone buzzed.

Hope hit instantly.

Embarrassingly instantly.

He grabbed it too fast.

IGR- Be in your room in half hour.

Shane stared.

Then immediately looked across the room.

Gone.No explanation. No greeting. No acknowledgment of any previous texts.

Just an order.

Unbelievable. Completely unbelievable.

And somehow, horrifyingly, Shane smiled anyway.

Ilya read every text. That was the humiliating part. Not that Shane texted but that when Shane texted and Ilya immediately stopped whatever he was doing to read them.

He just refused to answer. Which felt different. Important distinction.

At breakfast, his phone buzzed while one of the assistant coaches reviewed strategy nobody actually needed reviewed.

He wanted to be angry. He wanted to have Shane desperate for a reply from him like he had been for weeks.

That last text though-that made him grin. He had been disappointed that the omega was not pregnant yet, but that would come. Like the Americans say: Practice makes perfect.

But that last text, it was adorable how bratty Hollander sounded.

Ilya stared at the message longer than necessary.

He imagined Shane typing it.

Deleting things first.

Rewriting.

Overthinking.

Probably making that irritated little face he made whenever he got trapped inside his own head.

Something warm and deeply inconvenient moved low in Ilya's chest.

Then immediately hardened. No. Absolutely not. Hollander disappeared after they fucked. Hollander got silent for so long and he would need to apologize properly..

Strategic silence. He locked the phone. Did not answer. Then spent the next fifteen minutes checking the dining hall entrance every time the doors opened. Ridiculous.

He knew that Hollander had watched his matches. He wanted to impress the other man. Hollander was the only player he knew that matched his own skills, that offered him a challenge and he was disappointed that they wouldn't be playing against each other.

Ilya looked away from the cameras before anyone noticed the shift in his expression.

He almost replied a few times after the medal ceremony but he couldn't. This will serve as a lesson for Hollander.

He wouldn't be forgiven immediately. That would be too easy, too forgiving.

No.

Hollander had earned uncertainty. He wanted Hollander uncomfortable. Wanted him missing something.

Wanted proof Montreal had not only mattered to one of them.

That they both had wanted it.

But the next day, he took a good look at Hollander and suddenly punishment became more difficult. Because Shane looked tired. Too tired.

Paler than usual beneath the Mexico tan, dark circles under his eyes, movements slower somehow. He carried exhaustion like something heavy, shoulders tighter than normal, attention scattered.

Ilya noticed immediately. Of course he noticed. He noticed everything about Shane now. Dangerously. Annoyingly.

Shane sat alone at first. That bothered him. Then Scott Hunter arrived- that bothered him more. Carter shortly after- worse.

Ilya told himself he disliked the situation for practical reasons. Hunter observed too much. Carter talked too much. Neither felt good enough to be around someone like Shane. Not because they were dangerous. Because eventually people noticed things. Patterns, stressors, avoidance.

The things someone worked very hard to hide. Still- Hunter sat too close. Carter laughed too loudly. Shane relaxed around them in ways that unsettled Ilya unexpectedly.

Then Shane looked up. Their eyes met. The entire dining hall narrowed.

He looked startled.

Caught.

Like he had been staring longer than intended. Good.

Ilya held eye contact deliberately.

Let him sit in it. Let him feel the silence.

Then someone beside him asked a question and he looked away first.

Not because he wanted to. Because if he kept looking, he might have crossed the room.

And that would ruin everything.

Ilya nearly smiled. Nearly. Hollander was going to fall right into his hands.

Instead, today, hockey only gave him more opportunities to look for Shane.

Canada trained nearby.

Not always visible.

Still close enough.

Ilya caught glimpses through shared hallways and rink entrances.

Red jersey.

Messy hair.

The familiar shape of him moving too quickly when distracted.

Shane looked off.

Less sharp.

Half a second slower during drills.

Too inside his own head.

Because of me, Ilya thought.

The realization settled somewhere dark and unpleasantly satisfying.

Then immediately became concern.

Had Shane slept?

Eaten?

Why did he look exhausted?

One of the coaches said something sharp in Russian.

Ilya realized belatedly he had stopped paying attention.

Again.

This was becoming a problem.

The phone buzzed after practice.

Ilya actually laughed.

Quiet.

Brief.

Dangerously fond.

He imagined Shane saying it with that dry expression he used when pretending not to be nervous.

He almost answered. Almost. Then stopped himself. No- not yet.

Let him work harder. Let him explain. Let him come closer willingly this time.

Then he looked over to him again and he immediately hated what he was seeing.

Not rationally.

Completely irrationally.

He knew Hunter had done nothing wrong - Hunter seemed decent enough but he was too close.

Protective.

Observant.

Probably safe.

Which somehow made it worse.

Dangerous people were easier to dislike.

Kind people stayed.

One of his teammates asked if something was wrong.

“No.”

The answer came too quickly.

Across the room, Hunter touched Shane's shoulder briefly while saying something.

Too familiar.

Ilya looked away before he did something embarrassing.

Like walk over there.

Or say something insane.

Or start a problem during the Olympics.

Later that evening, the news changed everything.

He noticed Shane immediately.

Dining hall.

Television coverage.

Omega legislation.

Hollander went still -too still.

The kind of stillness that looked controlled from far away but wasn't.

Shane's shoulders tightened. Fear, Ilya recognized it instantly. His stomach turned unpleasantly.

The laws. Of course they would announce it after a big win. He had not considered what this looked like from Shane's side. Not fully.

To Ilya, it was politics, complicated. Temporary since it wouldn't affect him in his life in America.

To Shane? It probably felt personal, threatening.

Real.

A cold kind of anger settled low in his chest. Not at Shane. Not even entirely at Russia.

At the idea itself. At the possibility of Shane afraid.

The thought arrived before he could stop it:

No one touches what is mine.

The possessiveness of it should have unsettled him.

Instead, it felt obvious.

He watched Shane too long.

Watched him stop eating.

Watched him retreat quietly into himself.

Watched him leave dinner looking smaller somehow.

Ilya almost texted then.

Almost said something reassuring.

Something steady.

Instead, he waited.

Because if Shane was unsettled, Shane would eventually come closer.

And Ilya, unfortunately, wanted that very badly.

Shane had sounded annoyed.

Good.

Annoyed means invested.

He waited anyway.

Breakfast gave him exactly what he wanted.

Shane looked for him.

Immediately.

Instinctively.

Eyes drifting toward Russia before he even sat down.

Then Scott.

Then Carter.

Then laughter.

Then Shane staring again.

Ilya stood when he caught him watching.

Held eye contact deliberately. Long enough, steady enough.

Then glanced once toward Shane's phone before walking away.

Message sent.

Minutes later, he finally texted.

He imagined Shane smiling immediately.

The thought lingered unpleasantly warm for the rest of the morning.

Which was deeply inconvenient.

Because now, apparently, Olympic gold felt less satisfying than making Shane Hollander smile for five seconds at breakfast.

That realization annoyed him enough to ignore the next text for another three hours.

The figure skating events were being held in the same rinks as hockey had been hosted. The lighting was softer somehow. The crowd moved differently too, quieter between performances, applause replacing shouting, excitement settling into something gentler than the violent loyalty hockey crowds specialized in.

Shane still felt weird being there.

Not unwelcome.

Just out of place.

He sat between Scott and Carter, high enough in the stands that the entire rink stretched bright beneath them, lights glinting against ice while skaters warmed up below.

“You definitely owe me for this,” Carter said, sinking deeper into his seat. “I love you, Hollander, but if anyone falls dramatically in slow motion for three hours, I’m blaming you.”

Shane huffed a quiet laugh.

“My friend’s competing.”

“You’ve said that seven times,” Scott replied.

Carter pointed immediately.

“And every time you say it, somehow it sounds more emotional.”

“I’m being supportive.”

“Good on you for wanting to show support to an Omega after the announcement,” Carter corrected.

Shane rolled his eyes.

His old friend had messaged him weeks ago when Olympic qualifiers finalized, excited and nervous and somehow exactly the same as when they were younger. Shane had promised he would come if schedules worked.

Schedules had worked.

Mostly.

Mentally?

Questionable.

Because unfortunately, his brain remained deeply occupied elsewhere.

The arena lights dimmed slightly as another performance started.

Carter muttered something about “too much artistic suffering for one evening,” while Scott watched quietly beside him, more invested than he pretended.

Shane tried, really tried. But distraction lingered annoyingly close to the surface.

The Olympics had shifted strangely over the last few days.

Too many stolen glances. Too many unanswered texts.

Too many brief interactions that somehow felt bigger than they should have.

And then there was Russia.

Gold.

Of course.

Shane had watched the final match from Canada housing after their own bronze finish, jaw tight while commentators praised Rozanov like he had personally invented hockey.

They weren't wrong.

Annoyingly. Ilya had played terrifyingly well. Controlled, sharp. And Shane hated how much pride had mixed unpleasantly with disappointment while watching. Because Canada had lost. Because bronze still sat strangely in his chest. Because some part of him had looked at Ilya on television and thought:

Of course he won.

Which felt dangerously close to fond.

Terrible.

Objectively terrible.

“Hey.”

Scott nudged him lightly with an elbow.

“You disappeared again.”

“What?”

“You keep staring into space.”

Carter leaned around him dramatically.

“Do we need to call a doctor?”

“I’m fine.”

Scott narrowed his eyes slightly.

Shane looked down at the ice.

“I’m just tired.”

That excuse felt increasingly useless.

Carter crossed his arms.

“Nope.”

“What do you mean nope?”

“I mean you’ve got weird sad divorced energy.”

Scott actually laughed once under his breath.

Shane looked horrified.

“What?”

“You do,” Carter continued. “Like someone emotionally damaged you.”

“No one emotionally damaged me.”

Scott gave him a look.

“That sounded defensive.”

“Oh my God.”

Carter pointed accusingly.

“There is drama.”

“There is not.”

“There absolutely is.”

Scott stayed quieter.

Observant.

Too observant.

“Something happen in Montreal?” he asked casually.

Shane nearly choked.

“No.”

Thankfully, before Shane could embarrass himself further, the announcer introduced the next skater.

His friend. The familiar nerves hit immediately. Focus shifted. For a while, at least, Shane managed to forget himself. The performance was good. Really good, enough that pride briefly replaced everything else.

By the end, Shane found himself standing with everyone else clapping, grin slipping out before he could stop it.

“Okay,” Carter admitted reluctantly. “That was kind of cool.”

Scott nodded once.

“Your friend’s good.”

“Told you.”

The adrenaline faded quickly after.

Too quickly.

Because once things quieted again, Shane looked up.

And froze.

High above the lower stands.

Near the back.

Alone.

Ilya.

It took Shane a second to recognize him.

No hoodie this time.

Russian jacket half unzipped.

Sitting alone in the rafters while the rest of the world celebrated around him.

Watching the ice.

Or maybe not watching.

Something about it felt strange.

Wrong almost.

Russia had won.

He should have been downstairs with teammates.

Enjoying the attention from the media. Celebrating.

Instead, he sat by himself.

Like someone avoiding people.

Scott followed Shane's gaze.

"What are you looking at?"

Shane looked away too fast.

"Nothing."

"Hm."

Carter stretched beside him.

"I'm getting food after this. Figure skating made me emotional."

"You're emotional every day," Scott said.

"True."

Shane stood before he could think too hard.

"I'll be back."

Scott looked at him for one second too long.

"Where are you going?"

"Bathroom."

Carter pointed vaguely.

“You better not abandon us.”

“Would never.” The lie came embarrassingly easy.

The walk upstairs felt longer than it should have.

Stupidly nerve-racking.

Every step gave him more opportunity to turn around.

This was weird.

Objectively weird.

They weren’t... Whatever they were.

Still, the image of Ilya sitting alone kept bothering him.

By the time Shane reached the upper level, the crowd noise had dulled into something distant.

He spotted him immediately.

Of course he did.

Even sitting down, somehow Ilya occupied too much space.

One arm rested lazily across the seat beside him. Head tilted slightly back. Expression unreadable.

He looked tired.

Which somehow unsettled Shane.

Ilya looked up before Shane even reached him.

No surprise.

Just immediate attention.

“What are doing here Hollander?”

Not hello.

Not what are you doing here.

Shane crossed his arms automatically.

“You ignored me.”

The corner of Ilya's mouth twitched faintly.

"You sent boring texts."

Shane stared.

"Fuck off you damn asshole."

"You disappeared."

The words landed heavier than expected.

Shane hesitated. The irritation slipped unexpectedly. Because underneath the dry delivery sat something else. Something quieter. Hurt maybe.

"You ignored me for like four days."

"Da."

"I told you I would see you here. I thought we agreed."

Shane sat down despite himself.

Not too close.

Close enough.

Below them, applause echoed through the arena.

Neither paid attention.

"You won gold," Shane said eventually.

"Yes."

"You don't sound excited."

Ilya shrugged once.

"It happened."

"That's the most insane response to Olympic gold I've ever heard."

Ilya looked over.

"You watched?"

The question landed strangely soft.

Shane looked away immediately.

“Obviously.”

Something unreadable shifted across Ilya’s face.

Brief.

Gone.

“You played well,” Shane muttered.

“You watched,” Ilya repeated.

“Oh my God.”

“You watched.”

“Yes!”

The tiniest hint of satisfaction crossed Ilya’s expression.

Embarrassing.

“You still ignored me,” Shane muttered.

Ilya looked back toward the ice.

“You left first.”

And there it was again.

That same strange heaviness.

Shane exhaled quietly.

“I didn’t know what to say.”

“Why?”

Because everything got weird.

Because silence felt easier than figuring out what any of this meant.

Shane rubbed a hand over his face.

“Things got complicated.”

“Because of we fucked? Its not that dramatic, Hollander.”

The way he said it made Shane glance over.

Careful. Focused. Too focused.

“Can you please act like we’re both human beings here with feelings?”

Ilya stayed quiet.

Which somehow made it easier to keep talking.

“I didn’t know what to do after.”

“You pick up the fucking phone and answer me when I write to you. Is simple.”

“You make everything sound easy.”

“No.” Ilya looked over finally. “You make disappearing look easy.”

That one hit hard.

Harder than Shane expected.

Because suddenly, embarrassingly, painfully, he realized Ilya had actually cared.

Enough to be angry.

Enough to sit alone in the rafters instead of celebrating.

Shane swallowed.

“I’m sorry.”

Ilya said nothing.

“I just...” Shane exhaled hard. “I didn’t know what to say after.”

“You could say anything.”

“I know.”

Silence stretched.

Then quieter: “I was scared.”

Ilya looked at him immediately.

“Of me?”

“...Kind of.”

Something strange shifted in Ilya’s expression.

Not hurt. Something darker. Quieter. Like the answer mattered more than expected. Below them, applause thundered again. Neither moved. Neither looked away.

“I thought I was gentle with you. I tried to take it easy and not cause you pain.”

“You-” Shane tried to start a few times but couldn’t find the words.

“I will come to your room tonight. We’ll talk then.”

Shane blushed and nodded, turning to leave.

“Hollander-if you keep letting Hunter close to you and touching you, I’ll break his arm when Boston plays New York next week.”

That night, suitcases appeared outside doors. Teams drifted through hallways carrying medals and exhaustion in equal measure. Conversations shifted from schedules to flights, from competition to reunions back home. People traded numbers they probably would not use. Promised visits they probably would not make.

Everything suddenly felt like ending.

Shane hated that more than expected. Mostly because endings implied distance. And distance suddenly felt complicated. The rafters conversation had unsettled something in him in the worst possible way. Because now things felt... less broken. Not fixed- definitely not fixed.

But there was a promise of them talking.

Now Shane kept thinking. About their night together. About the Olympics. About how absurdly relieved he had felt after finding Ilya alone in the rafters. About the way Ilya had looked at him after Shane admitted he was scared. Not angry, not offended. Just... focused.

Like the honesty mattered. Which somehow made things worse. Or better, it was hard to say. He had spent the rest of the day pretending not to think about it.

His flight home was tomorrow.

Then distance. Three months until Montreal would play Boston again.

The realization sat strangely heavy.

Not because three months sounded long.

Because suddenly it did.

He hated that.

Hated how quickly things had shifted.

His thoughts were laser focused on Rozanov, on his expectations.

Dangerous. This was very dangerous, but he couldn't bring himself to care much.

Shane showered, packed half-heartedly, and eventually left to grab food after realizing he had forgotten dinner existed.

Olympic Village moved quieter at night.

Less energy. More exhaustion from the past week.

People lingering in hallways with coffees and medals and temporary friendships.

By the time he made it back upstairs, he mostly just wanted sleep.

The door opened easily.

Shane stepped inside.

Then stopped.

For one long second, his brain failed entirely.

Because someone sat in the desk chair.

Calm.

Comfortable.

Like he belonged there.

Dark sleeveless tank top.

Long jean clad legs stretched slightly.

Phone loose in one hand.

Ilya.

Shane stared.

“What the fuck?”

Ilya looked up slowly.

“You took too long.”

“That is not an answer.”

“You asked no question.”

“You’re in my room!”

“Yes.”

“How?”

Ilya shrugged slightly.

“I arrived.”

“What are you doing in my room? Who let you in?”

“Congradulate me, Hollander. It's my special week.”

Shane shut the door automatically behind him, still staring.

“You can't just break into people's rooms.”

“That's not what I mean!”

Something deeply inconvenient happened then. Relief- immediate, warmth spreading fast through his body at being alone with Rozanov after so long. Because somehow seeing him here felt less surprising than it should have. Like maybe some part of Shane had expected this eventually, which felt deeply unhealthy.

“You're unbelievable,” Shane muttered.

“Yes.”

“That wasn't a compliment.”

“I know.”

Shane dropped his bag beside the bed.

Only then did he notice Ilya looking toward the packed suitcase.

Something unreadable shifted across his face.

Briefly then gone.

“You packed already.”

Shane frowned.

“Yeah?”

Silence.

Then quieter:

“You leave tomorrow.”

Something about the way he said it made Shane pause.

Not accusation. Not irritation. Something stranger. Like the fact itself bothered him.

“You also leave tomorrow,” Shane said.

“Da.”

Another silence.

The room suddenly felt too quiet. Too small.

A distant laughter and doors opening somewhere down the hall.

Neither moved. Finally:

“Why are you here?” Shane asked quieter.

Ilya looked at him for a long second.

“You disappeared.”

There it was again. That strange heaviness beneath everything.

“You’re still on that?”

“Yes.”

Shane exhaled hard.

“I apologized.”

“You think that was apology?”

“As a matter of fact, I do. We aren’t together Rozanov. You can’t just expect me to move my life around to accommodate when you want to communicate with me.”

“You really think that?”

Despite himself, Shane laughed quietly. “You’re fucking unbelievable.”

Okay. Fine. Maybe deserved. “I just...” Shane rubbed a hand over his face. “I didn’t know what to say after that night.”

“Why?”

“Because everything got weird.”

Ilya tilted his head slightly. Ilya stood slowly and walked over to Shane. He crowded the smaller man against the wall, his hand coming up to hold his jaw up firmly so he’d had no choice but to look directly into his eyes. “Use your words. Tell me what happened.”

“We slept together.”

“Da. Of course. And you wanted it.”

“I didn’t say no,” Shane said immediately. “But it’s too much.”

“How?.”

That startled a laugh out of him. Which somehow made this easier. A little.

“We slept together,” Shane repeated quieter now. “And then suddenly you mattered too much.”

The honesty slipped out before he could stop it.

Immediately regretted. Ilya went still.

“What does that mean?”

Shane looked down, but Ilya forced his face back up again.

“It means I kept thinking about you,” he muttered. “And then getting annoyed at myself for thinking about you. Neither of us can have mates right now. I can’t get found out, my parents would be in trouble with me, I can’t, Rozanov. I don’t know what I’m doing when I’m around you and it literally hurts sometimes when I think about it. ”

The room was quiet now except for their breathing. When Shane looked up again, Ilya was watching him too carefully. Like the answer mattered too much.

“You disappeared,” Ilya said quietly.

“I know.”

“You scared me.”

That was hard to hear. Because somehow, impossibly, Shane believed him. And worse?

Part of him liked hearing it.

Which felt dangerous.

“I’m here now,” Shane said quietly.

Something shifted in Ilya’s expression.

Small. Gone too quickly to understand.

Then quieter: “Three months is too long.”

Shane blinked. “What?”

“The game schedule.” Pause. “I checked.”

“You checked?”

“Da.”

“That’s concerning.”

“Little bit.”

Shane huffed a laugh despite himself. God. He was so unbelievably weird.

And somehow, impossibly, standing here now, Shane realized he did not really want this to end tomorrow either.

Which felt like the beginning of another terrible idea.

“We will make this work to see where it goes. We meet when we are not busy. I fly to you, you fly to me. Get all this figured out.”

Ilya’s words hung in the space between them, a plan, a promise, a bridge thrown across the chasm of the next three months. The sheer, arrogant certainty of it -I fly to you, you fly to me, should have been infuriating. It was the kind of statement that ignored logistics, distance, and the fragile, complicated thing they were barely admitting existed.

Instead, it acted like a key turning in a lock deep inside Shane’s chest.

A low, warm shudder worked its way through him. The constant, buzzing static of what now, what next, what is this quieted, replaced by a single, clear frequency: Rozanov, here, now. The man who checked game schedules. Who sat alone after winning gold. Who was currently crowding him against a wall in a dim bedroom, looking at him like he wanted to consume him entirely.

“Da.”

Ilya didn’t move away. His thumb, still resting against Shane’s jaw, stroked once, a rough, deliberate caress of the smooth skin. The touch was a live wire. It connected directly to the base of Shane’s spine, pulling everything tight and hot. The space between them, already minimal, became unbearable. Like a vacuum begging to be filled.

Shane saw the decision in Ilya’s eyes a second before he moved. It wasn’t a question. It was a descent.

Ilya’s mouth crashed into his.

The first contact was less a kiss and more a claiming. A hard, desperate press of lips that stole the air from Shane’s lungs and the sense from his head. It was all heat and insistence, the faint, familiar taste of Ilya- spearmint gum, cigarette smoke and something darker, uniquely him, flooding Shane's senses. A ragged sound, half-gasp, half-moan, tore from Shane's throat and was swallowed immediately.

He didn't just accept it; he surged into it. His hands, which had been hanging uselessly at his sides, flew up. One fisted in the soft cotton of Ilya's tank, crumpling it, pulling him closer until not a sliver of light could pass between their bodies. The other hand slid up the solid, unforgiving plane of Ilya's back, feeling the shift and coil of muscle beneath warm skin.

Ilya responded with a low, approving grunt that vibrated through both of them. He angled his head, deepening the kiss, his tongue sweeping past Shane's lips. It was wet, deep, and shamelessly carnal. Shane tried to meet him thrust for thrust, but gave up and let Rozanov control the kiss, a dizzying, escalating rhythm that had less to do with tenderness and everything to do with weeks of pent-up frustration, anger, and a longing so acute it felt like sickness. This was the answer to every ignored text, every stolen glance across a cafeteria, every lonely, furious night spent replaying their first night together.

Their breaths grew ragged, loud in the quiet room. The kiss broke, not from lack of want, but from sheer need for air. They stayed forehead-to-forehead, panting harshly into the shared space, a haze of lust and something sharper, more dangerous, clouding the air.

"Bed," Ilya growled, the word a rough scrape against Shane's swollen lips.

It wasn't a request. In one fluid, terrifyingly strong motion, Ilya's arms banded around him, one across his shoulders, one hooking behind his knees, and he was lifted clean off the floor. Shane's world tilted, a yelp of surprise caught in his throat as he was carried the three short strides to the narrow single bed. He was deposited onto the stiff covers, Ilya following him down immediately, his weight a delicious, anchoring press that made the bedsprings complain.

There was no more pause. Ilya reclaimed his mouth, kissing him with a renewed, frantic hunger. His hands were everywhere- tangling in Shane's hair, sliding down his neck, skimming over his ribs through his t-shirt. Every touch was electric, a spark that lit a new fuse under Shane's skin. He arched up into it, his own hands roaming the impossibly broad terrain of Ilya's shoulders and back, learning the landscape he'd only glimpsed before.

Ilya's mouth left his, trailing a scorching path down the line of his jaw, to the frantic pulse pounding at the base of his throat. He sucked there, hard, and Shane cried out, a sharp, unfiltered "Ah!" that was pure sensation. The bite of pleasure-pain made his hips jerk up involuntarily, grinding against the solid weight between his legs. A thick, ragged groan was his reward, vibrating against his skin.

"You drive me fucking insane," Ilya muttered, his voice thick and slurred against Shane's collarbone as his hands slid down. They found the hem of Shane's t-shirt and rucked it up, his palms, hot and slightly rough, sliding over the bare skin of Shane's stomach. Shane shuddered violently, his own fingers scrambling for purchase on Ilya's back.

The world narrowed to sensation: the drag of denim against his thighs, the crush of Ilya's body, the wet, open-mouthed kisses being branded along his sternum. Ilya's hand dipped lower, fingers tracing the waistband of Shane's sweatpants, and Shane's brain, which had been blissfully offline, short-circuited into a white-hot buzz of yes, finally, more.

Then, those fingers hooked. Not just tracing, but tugging. The intent was unmistakable. A direct line to where Shane was hard and aching.

A jolt of pure, cold terror lanced through the heat.

It was instant. Paralyzing. It froze the moan in his throat and turned his muscles to stone.

Mexico.

The word exploded in his mind like a flashbang, bleaching out all the color and heat. The secret, the lie of omission, sat in his gut like a lead weight. He was here, kissing Ilya like he owned him, letting himself be unraveled, while holding onto a truth that could change everything. Rozanov, who was talking about flying across country to "figure this out." Rozanov, who was hurt by silence, who deserved... what? The truth? Or the fantasy of the omega who was only his?

Ilya, sensing the sudden rigidity beneath him, pulled back just an inch. His eyes, dark and heavy-lidded with desire, searched Shane's face, now pale and tense. "Hollander?" His voice was rough, confused.

Shane's hand shot out, his fingers wrapping around Rozanov's wrist, stopping the downward progress of his hand. The grip was tight, desperate.

"Stop," he breathed. The word was barely audible, but it hung between them like a physical barrier.

Rozanov went perfectly still. The heat in his eyes didn't vanish, but it was overlaid with a wary, sharpening focus. The shift from lover to predator was subtle and instantaneous.

"What?"

"I... just... stop for a second." Shane couldn't meet his gaze. He stared at the ceiling, his chest heaving for reasons that had nothing to do with passion anymore.

The tension in the room crystallized. The air, once thick with want, now felt thin and brittle. Ilya slowly, deliberately, removed his hand from Shane's waistband, though he didn't move off him. He braced himself on his forearms, caging Shane in, his entire body a question mark of coiled frustration.

"You tell me to stop," Ilya said, his voice dangerously low and even. "Now. After that. Explain."

I have to tell him. I have to say it. About the club. About the other alpha. About what happened, and I didn't tell you before we got into bed, and I've been carrying it like a stone ever since. The confession gathered on his tongue, bitter and sharp.

And then, the universe, with its impeccable, cruel timing, intervened.

From the discarded pile of his clothes on the floor, Shane's cell phone erupted into sound. Not a buzz. A shrill, obnoxious ringtone- the generic one he'd never bothered to change - that sliced through the silence like a knife.

Both of them jerked at the sound. The spell, already fractured, shattered completely.

Shane's eyes squeezed shut. A wave of cowardly, overwhelming relief washed over him, so potent it felt like nausea. The decision was taken away. For now.

The phone rang again, insistently.

Ilya's expression darkened, his jaw tightening. He looked from Shane's closed eyes to the source of the noise and back, the conflict between anger, concern, and sheer irritation plain on his face.

"Aren't you going to answer your fucking phone?" The words were gritted out.

Shane took a shaky breath and opened his eyes. He couldn't look at Ilya directly. He focused on the shoulder of his tank top. "It's... probably just my mom or Scott. Or Carter. Checking in." The excuse was pathetic.

The ringing stopped. The sudden quiet was somehow louder.

In the blanketing silence, Shane found a sliver of courage. Not enough for the truth. Just enough for a retreat. "Roza-" he started, his voice thin. "Can we... can we just talk in the morning? Everything's... my head's a mess. I can't... not right now."

The words hung there, weak and inadequate. He was pushing him away. Again. After pulling him in. After kissing him like he was drowning.

For a long, terrible moment,

Rozanov said nothing. He just watched him, his blue eyes scanning Shane's face, reading the panic, the evasion, the guilt. The heat in his gaze cooled, hardening into something opaque and unreadable. The man who had been kissing him with possessive fury was receding, replaced by the guarded, untouchable hockey star.

Finally, with a slow, controlled exhale, Rozanov pushed himself up. He didn't do it angrily. The movement was deliberate, almost graceful, as he swung his legs off the bed and stood. He looked down at Shane, who remained frozen on the mattress, a monument to his own indecision.

"Morning," Ilya repeated, his tone flat. He gave one short, uninterpretable nod. "Da. Okay."

He didn't say another word. He turned, walked to the door, and let himself out. The click of the latch engaging was the softest, most final sound Shane had ever heard.

Shane lay there, staring at the closed door, the ghost of Ilya's weight still pressing him into the mattress, the taste of him still on his lips, and the ringing silence of his own cowardice filling the room.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you all for reading ❤️

I am once again putting these two emotionally constipated disasters in situations and seeing what happens.

I'd love to hear what you thought of this chapter! Favorite scene? Biggest "oh no"? Are we defending Shane today or putting him on trial? And what do we think Ilya is about to do next? Hehe. He'd go to jail in most states for what he's about to pull.

Your comments genuinely make my day and help motivate me to keep writing faster 🥰

Chapter 12: Chapter 12

Chapter Summary

I had to split the chapter into two this time; some trigger warnings and the fact that I might have to reread the chapter and make some tweaks there and there for continuity and grammar.

dubious consent, violence and cray cray Ilya in this chapter

Last one until Shane grows a pair and really starts to stand up for himself.

Love love loved all the reviews of course - I appreciate each and every single one

They didn't get to talk the next morning. Ilya was called into a press conference that ran late and they barely saw each other leaving the village. The goodbye had been harder this time for Shane, the image kept replaying itself in Shane's head during boarding. Rozanov standing there in his Russian team jacket with his duffel slung over one shoulder, blue eyes fixed too intently on Shane's face while the hallway around them buzzed with departing athletes and staff. Shane still wasn't sure what expression he had been making at the time. Whatever it was, it must have looked bad because Ilya's mouth had tightened almost immediately.

"You text me before plane takes off," he had said finally texted.

Not asked, told.

Shane, exhausted beyond reason and emotionally too fragile to argue properly, had just typed 'Asshole.' but added a smiley face.

"You do not disappear again." Because beneath the rough demand sat something real. Something vulnerable enough that Shane had felt guilty all over again for how he had ignored Rozanov for so long. For the silence. For how badly he kept handling this thing between them.

"I won't," Shane had answered.

And he had meant it this time.

The flight attendants had started calling final boarding shortly after. Shane remembered standing there awkwardly for another second too long, giving Rozanov one final glance over his shoulder, Shane's stomach had flipped embarrassingly hard at that. For one brief second, Ilya's expression had softened in that rare way Shane was beginning to realize almost nobody else ever saw.

Then someone from the Russian staff had shouted something in Russian down the hall and the moment shattered.

Ilya looked irritated immediately.

IGR - You go before I decide Canada cannot have you back.

S - You're a jerk.

IGR - Da.

Shane had boarded his flight with a smile on his face. As promised, he texted Rozanov right before take off. For the first time, his parents weren't the ones he sent a message too. Now he had someone else. Now, nearly twelve hours later, stepping off the plane in Vancouver, he still felt wrung out from the entire Olympics and long flight.

His body ached with exhaustion that sleep had not fixed. His head still felt too full, too loud with his thoughts. Too much had happened in too short a time. Without Rozanov to focus on, his mind had begun to spiral. The terrifying realization that somehow, impossibly, Rozanov mattered now. Really mattered. Enough that Shane had spent half the flight staring at his phone, rereading all their messages.

S: Landed.

Three minutes later:

IGR: Good.

Followed immediately by:

IGR: Send picture when you are out of airport.

Which was objectively ridiculous.

Shane had smiled anyway.

By the time he exited customs, exhaustion had settled deep into his bones. The airport itself was chaos already, far louder than he felt prepared for. Fans crowded near the barriers with hockey jerseys and signs and phones raised high. Reporters clustered near baggage claim exits. Camera flashes hit almost immediately the second someone recognized him.

“Oh my God, Shane Hollander!”

“Shane! Over here!”

“How does it feel bringing home bronze?”

“Any comments on next season?”

The noise hit him all at once- bright lights, loud people rushing towards him and getting way too close. Shane froze for half a second beneath the overwhelming crush of voices and flashing cameras. His chest tightened instantly, irritation and exhaustion mixing into something dangerously close to panic. Someone shoved a jersey toward him to sign. Another person nearly walked directly into him while filming.

He swallowed hard and forced himself to keep moving. Smile, wave.

Be polite-normal.

The photographers kept shouting questions while following him toward arrivals. His medal suddenly felt unbearably heavy from his pocket. His backpack dug painfully into one shoulder. His suppressants and medication sat tucked safely in his carry-on and suddenly the entire airport felt suffocatingly crowded.

Someone grabbed lightly at his sleeve.

“Shane, one quick interview-”

His stomach turned unpleasantly.

Too close.

Thankfully, airport security finally intervened after noticing the crowd beginning to swell around him.

“Alright everyone, give him space please.”

Relief hit hard enough to make Shane dizzy.

One guard guided him quickly through a side exit while another blocked several photographers attempting to follow. Shane muttered exhausted thanks under his breath and escaped outside into the freezing Canadian air.

Cold immediately filled his lungs. Better. Much better. And then he spotted them.

His parents stood near pickup, both bundled in winter coats despite Vancouver not even being that cold compared to most Canadian cities. His mother spotted him first.

“Honey!”

Something in his chest loosened instantly.

Yuna reached him first, arms wrapping tightly around him before he could even properly drop his bag. Shane nearly sagged into her automatically, exhaustion suddenly feeling heavier now that he was safe.

“Oh honey,” she murmured immediately. “You look exhausted.”

“Love you too.” She laughed softly against his shoulder.

His father hugged him next, firm and proud and warm in the familiar steady way only his dad managed. "Olympic medalist," he said, sounding faintly emotional about it. "That sounds pretty good, kid."

Heat climbed into Shane's face immediately. "It's bronze."

"It's the Olympics," his father corrected instantly, pulling him into another hug.

Yuna pulled back just enough to cup his face between cold hands. "We are so proud of you." The sincerity of it hurt a little. Because suddenly Shane felt strangely fragile.

The drive home blurred together softly after that. His parents filled most of the silence naturally, talking about neighbors and interviews and family members losing their minds over seeing Shane on television. Apparently half of Vancouver had opinions about his rookie season now.

Shane answered where he could.

Mostly he just listened.

And texted Ilya whenever his parents weren't looking too closely.

S: On my way home.

IGR: Took too long.

S: Canada is far away from Russia actually.

IGR: Unfortunate.

That stupid warmth hit again immediately.

Dangerous. Very dangerous. By the time they reached home, night had already settled fully over Vancouver. Snow lined the edges of neighboring yards in soft frozen piles while warm yellow light spilled from windows across the quiet street.

Home.

The realization hit unexpectedly hard stepping through the front door.

Everything smelled the same.

Rice. Laundry detergent. His mother's candles. Winter. Safety. His chest tightened painfully.

"Are you hungry?" His mother asked after taking her coat off and reaching for Shane's to put in the closet.

"I could eat."

His old bedroom looked almost untouched upstairs. The same dark comforter. The same hockey trophies lining shelves. Photos from junior leagues and national teams still pinned to the wall. His childhood desk shoved beneath the window exactly where he left it.

Shane dropped onto the mattress heavily and exhaled long and slow into the familiar room.

God, he was tired. His phone buzzed almost immediately.

IGR: Show me your room.

Shane snorted quietly.

S: Why.

IGR: Curious.

S: About a bedroom?

IGR: About everything when it comes to you.

Shane ended up sending a blurry picture of the room anyway.

Three dots appeared immediately.

Then: IGR: Tiny bed.

Shane stared at the screen.

S: Fuck off.

IGR: You sleep there entire childhood?

S: Yes.

IGR: Explains many things.

Shane laughed despite himself, quiet enough that nobody downstairs would hear.

The conversation stretched through most of the evening after that. Strange little messages back and forth while Shane unpacked half-heartedly and lay sprawled across his childhood bed still wearing sweatpants and an old Team Canada hoodie.

Nothing overly serious. Nothing overly romantic either.

Just... easy.

Shockingly easy.

At one point, after nearly twenty straight minutes of silence, another text appeared.

IGR: I do not like when photographers touch you.

Shane blinked.

S: What?

IGR: Airport videos online already.

Of course he already looked. Possessive asshole. Heat crawled slowly up Shane's neck anyway.

S: They weren't touching me like that.

Long pause.

Then:

IGR: Still

Shane stared at the message longer than necessary before eventually locking the phone and pressing it against his chest like an idiot.

The next morning he woke to the song his mother usually played softly while cleaning. .

He smiled at the memories growing up - he would sneak out of his room and hide behind a corner, watching his parents dance around the kitchen or living room.

Now, he gave them a few extra minutes, coming out when his father pulled away to grab the insulated mug of coffee. His father left for work after breakfast, kissing Yuna's cheek before heading out while Shane remained curled half-awake at the kitchen island nursing his tea.

"You're still tired today," Yuna informed him immediately afterward.

"I'm alright, I just feel drained."

"You flew internationally after the Olympics, you should just have a lazy day honey."

"Maybe. I should go for a run though, then I can take it easy."

By early afternoon, exhaustion finally caught him fully. Shane ended up back in his bedroom beneath heavy blankets while winter light filtered softly through the curtains.

His phone rested against his chest.

Another unread text from Ilya waiting there.

IGR: Practice tomorrow.

IGR: Hate conditioning coach.

Shane smiled faintly. S- I go in tomorrow. Coach will have us doing bag skates.

Then sighed.

Because underneath everything else sat that awful heavy uncertainty again.

Mexico.

The almost-confession, the panic. The way Ilya had looked at him before leaving the room that night. Everything still sat unfinished between them. His chest hurt thinking about it too long. He was tried to avoid bringing it up until they were face to face, or at least until he knew exactly how to say what he really wanted to say.

The bedroom door opened quietly.

Yuna stepped inside carrying folded laundry before immediately pausing when she saw his expression.

“Mmm,” she hummed softly. “I’m going to sit out with a fire- would you like to join me?”

Shane frowned slightly. “Isn’t it too cold?”

“Not for you. Bring your blanket and it’s a date.”

Shane smiled-this was something they did all the time before he moved out.

He followed after pulling on some sweatpants and a hoodie, the old quilt in his arms. He saw her sitting down, the fire in the pit already started. She sat back on the chaise there and moved the cushions around to make room for him.

He walked over and laid down with his head in her lap and wrapped them both in the quilt. “Thank you, Mama.” he said after a few minutes.

“You don’t need to thank me, honey. I don’t know what’s going on, but you seem out of sorts recently.”

Unfortunately unbeatably true.

Her hand moved automatically into his hair, brushing slowly through messy strands.

“You’re carrying something heavy,” she said quietly.

Shane swallowed, suddenly, irrationally emotional.

Her fingers just slid slowly through his hair before trailing lightly down his back, nails scratching gently through the fabric of his shirt.

The touch nearly undid him immediately. Safe. Warm. Home. Shane closed his eyes. Yuna Hollander was like his North Star. No matter what, he knew that being near her would make everything alright.

“You want to talk about it?” she asked softly after a while.

Long silence as he fought to form the words. Then finally: “I think I messed something up.”

Yuna’s hand never stopped moving. “Hm.”

“I’m kind of…” Shane hesitated awkwardly. “Seeing someone. Maybe.”

Her fingers paused briefly. Then resumed. “A maybe?”

“Mom.”

“I’m listening.”

Shane stared at the wall. “I don’t know what we are yet.”

“Okay.”

“And I think I handled some things badly.”

“That happens.”

“Oh no,” she laughed quietly. “That serious?”

“I don’t know.” Which was the problem. Because somehow Ilya had become important frighteningly fast. Enough that Shane missed him already, enough that thinking about him with anyone else made something twist low in his chest.

Enough that Shane was genuinely terrified of ruining whatever this was becoming.

“I really like him,” Shane admitted finally, voice quieter now.

Yuna’s fingers slowed gently against his back.

“Then why do you sound so sad saying it?”

That one hurt. Because Shane didn’t fully know how to explain it.

The secrecy, the fear, the pressure. Not knowing if his feelings were real or if it just because Ilya Rozanov was an Alpha. It all could be just a trick of his secondary sex and he could have the same feelings for any other Alpha with the right mix of pheromones.

The impossible aching certainty that once Shane fully attached himself emotionally there would be no halfway point anymore. “He’s intense,” Shane whispered eventually.

Yuna laughed softly under her breath. “You always do like intense people.”

“That’s definitely not true.”

“You’re a professional hockey player. Part of the game is being intense.”

“...okay maybe.”

Silence settled again after that, comfortable and warm.

Then quieter: "I'm scared I'll hurt him- that he'll hurt me."

Yuna's expression softened immediately. "Oh, honey."

"I already kind of did."

"Did you mean to?"

"No."

"Then fix it."

"It's not that easy."

"It usually isn't."

Shane swallowed hard.

"What if everything gets complicated?"

Yuna looked down at him carefully then, fingers still brushing lightly across his hairline.

"Shane," she said softly, "all your father and I want is for you to be happy."

His throat tightened instantly.

"No matter what?"

"Of course no matter what."

Emotion climbed painfully fast into his chest.

Yuna smiled sadly then, like maybe she understood more than Shane realized.

"We would support you through anything," she continued quietly. "Anything. Do you understand me?"

Something in the way she said it nearly made him cry.

Because suddenly Shane wondered if she already knew. Or maybe mothers simply always knew when their children carried fear too heavy to say aloud.

He looked away quickly before emotion fully reached his face.

Yuna's fingers scratched lightly down his back again the same soothing way she used to when he was small and overwhelmed and frightened of things he could not explain yet.

And for the first time since the Olympics ended, Shane finally let himself breathe.

Two weeks passed faster than Shane expected, too fast but not fast enough at the same time. Somehow, despite daily practices, commercial deals, travel schedules, and the exhausting rhythm of NHL life settling back into place, Rozanov had quietly threaded himself into Shane's daily routine.

Texts came constantly, sometimes bossy, sometimes almost romantic:

IGR: Wake up.

At six-thirty in the morning.

Or: IGR: Eat breakfast.

Followed inevitably by: IGR: Send picture of you.

Which Shane refused on principle for nearly four days before eventually giving in because apparently Ilya Rozanov possessed the emotional persistence of a particularly aggressive guard dog.

Calls happened too- sometimes only to say hello, other times for hours on end talking about their days. Sometimes they barely spoke at all, but a call would be preferred over a text.

Sometimes Shane just listened to the familiar sound of Ilya moving around his house in Boston while muttering in Russian about coaches or teammates or whatever television show he had decided was "stupid but acceptable."

Shockingly, the distance had somehow made things easier, less overwhelming. No looming physical closeness to influence his moods. No terrifying chemistry waiting one accidental touch away.

Just conversation, slowly figuring things out and getting to know each other.

Slowly building something neither of them quite had words for yet.

Still, things sat unresolved between them.

Mexico, Shane ignoring Rozanov and leaving when things got complicated.

The interrupted confession. He thought about it more than he wanted to admit.

Especially after following his mother's advice.

Be truthful. Fix it.

It sounded annoyingly simple when she said it. Harder in practice. Especially when the truth had the potential to ruin things before they properly started.

And the entire hockey world collectively lost its mind. Tickets sold out within 3 minutes. Sports media practically treated the matchup like a war. Olympic aftermath. Boston versus Montreal. Rozenov versus Hollander. The rookie phenom against the Russian gold medalist. Every sports network suddenly had opinions. Analysts replayed Olympic clips side-by-side with NHL footage while debating who held the advantage now.

Commentators called it “the rivalry of the century.”

Locker room tension climbed steadily all week. Practices ran longer, harder. Every hit landed heavier. Every mistake got called out louder.

The Voyageurs locker room buzzed constantly with anticipation, reporters circling like sharks before and after practice.

“Biggest game of your rookie season?” someone asked Shane after morning skate.

“All games are equally important,” Shane answered automatically.

The reporter blinked.

“No?”

Professional. Boring. Yuna Hollander’s stellar media training on full display.

Internally?

Complete lie.

Because somehow this game felt massive. Not only because Boston always mattered. Not only because Rozenov always mattered.

But because for the first time since the Olympics, Shane would see him again. Would be face-to-face against the only player in the league who was a match for him in skill.

In person- actually see him.

Not through FaceTime.

Not through interviews.

Not through late-night calls that somehow stretched until two in the morning without either of them meaning to.

The flight to Boston somehow made Shane more anxious than actual game day. Which felt ridiculous. He should have been focused on hockey. Strategy. Game tape. Line changes.

Instead, his stomach twisted every time his phone buzzed.

Especially when one particular name appeared.

IGR.

He opened the message immediately.

IGR: Before game, you come home to me. I will send car to hotel to pick you up after your practice.

Shane blinked. Then immediately: S: You need to stop ordering me around.

Three dots appeared instantly.

IGR: I send car to hotel. You stay with me after the game.

Then: IGR: We talk. Spend time together.

The wording alone made Shane nervous.

Not bad nervous. Just... aware.

Aware that whatever this was between them probably shifted after tonight. Aware that unresolved things stayed unresolved too long already. Aware that he genuinely wanted to see where Rozanov lived. What his space looked like.

The weird little details people accidentally revealed in private. Whether he folded laundry. Whether he owned more than black hoodies. Whether his fridge contained actual food or only protein drinks and terrible life decisions.

Shane exhaled slowly and typed back.

S: Okay. I want to clear some things up too.

The reply came immediately.

IGR: Good.

Pause.

Then:

IGR: I miss you.

Shane froze.

Just briefly.

Because Ilya almost never said things like that outright.

The honesty landed strangely hard in his chest.

Embarrassingly hard.

S: I missed you too.

The typing bubble appeared.

Disappeared.

Appeared again.

IGR: Good.

Which somehow felt deeply him.

By the time Boston came into view beneath the plane windows, Shane's nerves sat uncomfortably high.

Not because of the game. Okay. Partially because of the game.

Mostly because today felt important. Like standing at the edge of something. Something that either got stronger after honesty or cracked entirely beneath it. His mother's words replayed quietly in his head. Did you mean to hurt him? No. Then fix it.

Simple.

Terrifying.

Necessary.

The black car slid to a silent curb in front of a sleek, modern single story house. Shane's stomach was a tight knot of anxiety and a treacherous, fluttering anticipation. The driver merely nodded as Shane slipped out, the heavy door thudding shut behind him before the car purred away along the driveway..

He rang the doorbell, not stopping from looking around. The hedges offered pricey all along the yard and the windows were treated with a reflective coating of some sort to prevent anyone from looking in. When the doors opened, the Ilya was there, shirtless, black low slung trousers making him look insanely sinful. He'd been waiting.

"You came," Ilya said, his voice a low rumble in the vast, open space.

"I said I was. We're supposed to talk," Shane replied, his own voice sounding too small.

For a long moment, they just looked at each other. Two weeks of waiting for this moment, of sold-out arena hype and journalists screaming their names in hypothetical battles, of lying awake in separate cities- it all condensed into the ten feet of polished stone between them. The tension wasn't hostile; it was a live wire, humming with everything left unsaid since the Olympics.

Then Rozanov stalked closer.

He crossed the space in a few strides, and his hands were on Shane's face, his mouth descending before Shane could form a thought. It wasn't a greeting kiss. It was a reclamation. Hard, desperate, and hungry, pouring two weeks of frustrated want into a single, consuming point of contact. Shane gasped into it, his own hands flying up to clutch at Ilya's hair, his body arching into the solid wall of him as if magnetized. The taste of him- spearmint, smoke and that unique, darkly familiar scent- unraveled Shane's resolve instantly. Logic drowned in a flood of pure sensation.

They stumbled further into the living room, a tangled mess of grasping hands and feverish kisses. Shane's back hit a wall, and he used it as leverage to grind against Rozanov, a low groan vibrating from his chest into Ilya's mouth. Shane's head was spinning, heat pooling low and urgent in his gut. This was easier. This was what his body screamed for. To lose himself in this, to let the physical need burn away the complicated, painful conversation they owed each other.

But a sliver of clarity, sharp as glass, pierced the haze. His mother's calm voice in his memory: Just be truthful, Shane. You can't build anything on a lie.

With a force of will that felt like tearing his own skin off, Shane wrenched his mouth away. He planted his hands on Ilya's chest and pushed, not hard, but with a definite finality. "Ilya. Stop."

Ilya stilled, his breath coming in ragged gusts against Shane's lips. His eyes, dark and dilated with desire, searched Shane's face, confusion and a flicker of irritation replacing the heat. "What?"

"We need to talk." Shane's voice was breathless but firm. He extracted himself from Rozanov's embrace, putting a precious foot of space between them. The absence of contact felt like stepping into a cold void. "We have to talk. Before... before this goes any further. It can't happen like last time."

Ilya's jaw tightened. The switch from passionate to frustrated was instantaneous. He raked a hand through his hair, his gaze sweeping over Shane with simmering intensity. "Fine. Talk," he said, the word a flat command.

Shane's heart hammered against his ribs. He walked a few unsteady steps into the living room, needing to move. The apartment was predictably stunning- all clean lines, expensive art, and a breathtaking view of the skyline- but it felt like a cage. He turned to face Rozanov, who had followed him, a predator waiting.

"In Mexico," Shane began, the words sticking in his dry throat. "I didn't tell you everything."

Ilya said nothing. He just watched, his stillness more unnerving than any movement.

“Chris Hill. He... he kissed me. At a bar. I was drunk, and he just... did it.” Shane forced himself to hold Ilya’s glacial gaze. “I turned my head away. I pushed him off. It lasted two seconds. But it happened.”

A muscle ticked in Ilya’s jaw. His hands, which had been loose at his sides, slowly curled into fists.

“And then later,” Shane continued, getting up and starting to pace back and forth, the words rushing out now, a toxic stream he had to fully empty. “I was a mess. I kept drinking. I was trying to forget everything, and... and a stranger. An alpha. He... he gave me a blowjob.”

The air in the room turned to iron.

“I was so out of it. I don’t remember saying yes. I don’t remember too much of anything clearly except the feeling of... of it happening, and feeling disgusted, and frozen. I didn’t want it. Not like that.” He was pleading now, needing him to understand the distinction. “But it still happened.”

The silence that followed was absolute, so deep Shane could hear the blood roaring in his own ears. Ilya’s face underwent a terrifying transformation. All the heat, the irritation, the intensity- it drained away, leaving behind a blank, terrifying slate. His eyes, fixed on Shane, saw right through him.

He turned, slowly, as if in a trance. His gaze landed on a tall, abstract crystal vase on a side table, a cold, sharp modern sculpture. Without a word, without a change in expression, he picked it up.

Then he spun and hurled it with the full, vicious force of a slapshot across his own living room.

It wasn’t aimed at Shane. It was aimed at annihilation. The vase sailed several feet past Shane’s head and exploded into the massive, floor-to-ceiling mirror that dominated one wall. The sound was catastrophic- a shocking, violent symphony of shattering glass that rained down in a glittering avalanche onto the marble hearth.

Shane cried out, flinching and throwing his arms up as if the devastation could reach him.

Ilya wasn’t done. A guttural, inhuman sound tore from his throat. He turned to the heavy, low-slung coffee table- a solid slab of polished walnut. He hooked his powerful hands under its edge and, with a roar of pure rage, heaved. The table flipped end over end, crashing onto its side with a sound like a bone breaking, skidding and gouging a deep scar into the pristine hardwood floor. Suddenly, Shane was yanked up by his arm and Ilya dragged him down the hallway and shoved him into a room, slamming the door closed and leaving Shane inside.

Shane pressed his ears to the door hearing glass breaking and heavy objects hitting the walls.

Then, stillness. After several minutes, Shane slowly opened the door and silently walked out.

Ilya stood in the center of the wreckage, his back to Shane, his shoulders heaving. The destructive fury had been terrifying in its precision and ferocity. Slowly, he turned. The calm on his face now was the most frightening thing Shane had ever seen. It was the quiet of a deep, frozen lake, hiding unimaginable currents beneath.

Shane stepped into the edge of the room, his hands clasped tightly in front of him, his eyes fixed on the floor between his feet. Ilya stood across the room, his arms crossed over his chest, his expression stormy. The air in the room was thick with tension, the scent of Ilya's anger heavy and overwhelming. Shane took a deep breath, steeling himself for what he was about to say.

The room went silent for a long moment. Ilya's expression cold, his eyes narrowing as he stared at Shane. "You let someone else touch you, Shane," he said, his voice quiet and dangerous. "After I claimed you. After I told you that you were mine."

Shane nodded, his eyes filling with tears. "I know. I know it was wrong. I'm sorry, Ilya. I didn't mean for it to happen. I was confused and scared, and I made a mistake."

Ilya's expression turned dark, his hands clenching into fists at his sides. "A mistake," he repeated, his voice mocking. "You think this is a mistake, Hollander? You think I'm just some lovesick puppy, crying over a lost toy?"

Shane flinched at the words, his voice barely a whisper. "No. No, I don't think that."

"Fuck!" Ilya shouted, his voice loud and angry as he kicked over a chair, sending it crashing to the floor. "You think you can just tell me this?"

Shane shrank back, his eyes wide with fear as he watched Ilya's anger. "I...I don't know. I just...I wanted to be honest with you. I didn't want to keep it from you anymore."

Ilya turned back to him, his expression dark and dangerous. "Honest," he repeated, his voice mocking. "You think this is honest, Hollander? You think telling me about someone else's hands on you, someone else's mouth on you, is honest?"

Shane nodded, his voice barely a whisper. "I...I thought you should know. I thought you deserved the truth."

Ilya's expression turned cold, his voice dropping to a low, dangerous growl. "The truth? The truth is that you betrayed me."

Shane's heart pounded in his chest, fear and something else, something dark and forbidden, coiling in his stomach. He knew he should be scared, should be running for the door, but all he could feel was the stress leaving his body, the relief of having confessed, of having finally told Rozanov the truth.

Shane flinched as Ilya advanced on him, but he didn't back down. He stood his ground, his expression turning defensive. "Ilya, wait," he said, his voice steady despite the fear coursing through him. "I didn't do anything wrong."

Rozanov stopped in his tracks, his eyes widening in shock. "What do you mean, you didn't do anything wrong?" he growled. "You let someone else touch you, Hollander. You let someone else's hands on you, someone else's mouth on you. How is that not wrong?"

Shane shook his head, his expression turning stubborn. "Because we're not mates!. We only slept together once. Our relationship isn't defined. I didn't do anything wrong."

Ilya's expression turned dark, his voice dropping to a low, dangerous growl. "You think this is about definitions, Hollander? You think this is about labels?"

Shane held his ground, his expression steady. "I think it's about honesty. And I was honest with you. I told you what happened."

Ilya's eyes flashed with anger, his hands clenching into fists at his sides. "You think this is about communication, huh? You think telling me about someone else's hands on you, someone else's mouth on you, is good communication?"

Shane shook his head, his voice firm. "I think it's about respect. I think it's about trusting me to make my own decisions. And I made a mistake, but it doesn't change anything. We're not mates. We're not even in a relationship. I didn't do anything wrong."

Ilya's expression turned cold, his voice dropping to a low, dangerous growl. "You think you can just decide what's wrong and what's not, Hollander? You think you can just decide what we are to each other?"

Shane hesitated, then shook his head. "No. I don't think that. But I think I deserve to make my own decisions. I think I deserve to have a say in what happens to my body. And I didn't do anything wrong. I don't need permission to go on vacation with my friends. You think I haven't seen you go out with men and women hanging all over you?"

Ilya's expression didn't change at Shane's words. The cold, frozen calm held, but his eyes, those arctic blue chips darkened, not with heat, but with a profound, chilling understanding. He took a slow, deliberate step forward, his boots crunching on the debris.

"You think this is about permission?" Ilya's voice was a soft, deadly scrape. "About definitions on paper? No, zaychik. This is about fact. You are an omega. I am the alpha who took you. That is the only definition that lives in your blood, whether you admit it to your boring little mind or not. You are mine until I decide I don't want you anymore."

He closed the final distance until he was looming over Shane, the scent of his rage now mingled with something else: a dark, possessive certainty. "You can say we are nothing. Your body knows the truth. It remembers. It wants. And it will learn its place."

Shane's heart hammered, pure rage gathering force. "Fuck-"

“You came here to be honest,” Ilya interrupted, his voice dropping to that low, terrifying growl. “So be honest now. You look at the wreckage of my home, and you tell me you feel nothing. You tell me my anger means nothing to you.”

Shane’s gaze flickered to the shattered mirror, the overturned table, the glittering, violent evidence of Ilya’s fury. He couldn’t lie. A treacherous, shameful heat coiled in his gut. It did mean something. It meant everything. It was proof, terrible and magnificent, that he mattered this much.

Seeing the conflict on Shane’s face, Ilya smiled. It was a cold, cruel curve of his lips. “There is your honesty.” He brought a hand up, not to strike, but to curl his fingers loosely around the base of Shane’s throat, his thumb resting on his pounding pulse. “Now, you will show your respect. And you will learn the cost of your... independence.”

He applied the slightest pressure, not choking, but guiding, turning Shane and walking him backward until his knees hit the arm of the heavy, overturned sofa. “On your knees.”

The command brooked no argument. It vibrated in the air, alpha-rough and absolute. Shane’s mind screamed a weak protest, but his body, traitorously, was already moving, sinking down onto the plush rug amidst the fine dust of broken glass.

Ilya unbuckled his belt with sharp, efficient movements, the rasp of leather and metal loud in the silent room. He didn’t hurry. He made a show of it, his eyes locked on Shane’s face, watching every flinch, every rapid blink. He freed himself, already thick and heavy, and took a step forward.

“You want to claim your body is your own?” Rozanov murmured, his voice deceptively soft. “Then use it. Use your mouth to apologize for letting another use what is mine.”

He didn’t push. He waited. The silent command was worse.

A sob caught in Shane’s throat, part terror, part something horrifyingly like arousal. His hands trembled as he reached out. The act felt less like sex and more like a ritual of surrender. He leaned forward, his lips parting.

The moment he made contact, Ilya’s hand fisted in his hair. Not to pull him closer, but to hold him in place, to control the pace. “Wider,” he growled, and then he pushed forward, not allowing Shane any tentative exploration.

It was rough, impersonal, and punishing. Rozanov set a brutal, driving rhythm, using his grip on Shane’s hair to steer him, his hips pumping shallow, sharp thrusts that hit the back of Shane’s throat. Shane gagged, tears springing to his eyes as he struggled to breathe through his nose, his own hands coming up to clutch uselessly at Ilya’s thighs.

“That’s it,” Ilya gritted out, his own breath becoming ragged. “Take it. This is what honesty earns you. This is taste of your freedom.”

There was no real pleasure in it for Shane, only a suffocating, overwhelming sensation of being used, claimed, and rewritten. The intimacy of the act was stripped away, leaving only the raw mechanics of dominance and submission. Yet, underneath the burn in his throat and the panic for air, that same dark, secret part of him thrilled at the absolute loss of control, at the sheer magnitude of Ilya's possession.

Ilya's movements became more erratic, his grip tightening painfully. A low, warning groan rumbled in his chest. With a final, deep thrust, he held himself there, pulsing, as his release flooded Shane's mouth. Shane swallowed convulsively, the bitter taste another layer of his punishment.

Ilya pulled out, his hand still tangled in Shane's hair, forcing his head back. Shane gasped, strings of saliva and cum clinging to his lips and chin, his eyes watery and dazed.

For a long moment, Ilya just looked down at him, at the ruined, obedient picture he made on his knees. The cold anger in his eyes had banked, replaced by a grim, satisfied exhaustion. He released Shane's hair with a slight push, letting him sway back onto his heels.

"The car is waiting," Ilya said, his voice flat, all emotion spent. He tucked himself away, fastening his belt with the same efficient coldness. "You will go back to your hotel and think about how we will move past this."

He turned and walked away, leaving Shane kneeling in the wreckage, the taste of him still stark on Shane's tongue, the lesson carved deep into his bones. The truth was out. And it had cost him a very high price.

The game itself passed in flashes of adrenaline. Boston fans somehow more unbearable than usual. Every hit between him and Ilya felt intentional. Every stare lingered slightly too long. The cameras loved it. Of course they did. The tension, the rivalry. The impossible chemistry neither of them hid particularly well anymore. Late in the third, after a brutal board battle, Ilya had leaned closer under the guise of repositioning.

"You will come back to my house tonight," he muttered low enough only Shane heard as the referees came to break them apart.

Shane just nodded, the warmth spreading embarrassingly through him. "Yes."

The certainty in his voice settled something uneasy in Shane. "I will send same car"

Because despite everything, despite the fear sitting heavy in his chest, he wanted this too.

He wanted answers. Wanted honesty. Wanted to stop feeling like something unfinished lived between them.

After media finally ended, after locker room cleanup and endless post-game obligations, Shane found the black SUV waiting exactly where promised outside the hotel.

The drive now was finished too quickly. Instead of dropping him by the front door again, They drove around to the back and in front of a smaller house.

That made sense since he was sure Rozanov had destroyed most of his living room.

He should have ran, but he needed to face this. He wasn't a child anymore to run away from his problems. If they needed to end whatever 'this' was, he would face it head on and have it be the end.

If they were to continue this thing at all, they needed to establish some type of boundary. The door opened and Ilya was there, an icepack in his hand. They stood close to each other for a while before Rozanov offered him a seat and the ice. "For your ribs. You took that last hit full on."

Shane nodded and was silently thankful for the ice on the said ribs. Shane's throat tightened. "Why am I here?"

Ilya exhaled once through his nose. Low. trying to establish control.

"You did nothing wrong." His thumb moved once against Shane's skin. "Nothing I'm sorry for what I did today."

The certainty of it nearly undid something inside Shane immediately.

"I should not have done that," Rozanov began, the words coming out in a low, strained rush. He didn't look at Shane; his gaze was fixed on a point on the wall past Shane's shoulder. "What I did..." He finally forced his eyes to Shane's face, and the raw shame in them was a shocking, vulnerable thing. "It was not... it was not right."

Shane said nothing. His arms were crossed tightly over his chest, a defensive barricade. The relief of confession had been incinerated by what followed. He waited.

Ilya's jaw worked. He looked like a man being physically torn apart by the words. "My anger... at what you told me... it was real. It is real." He was careful not to move, not to crowd him. "But it was mine to carry. Not yours to fix. Not like that. Using my strength, my... my position... to make you..." He trailed off, unable to say it. A muscle ticked violently in his cheek. "It was cowardice. It was cruel. I used your body when you were not willing." Shane could see him trying to find and use his words carefully.

The admission landed like a stone in the quiet room. It was the core of it, the unforgivable parallel he had drawn with his own hands.

"I wanted to break you," Ilya whispered, the confession so quiet it was almost inaudible. "To break your, your... your idea that you could be separate from me. To make you feel as shattered as I felt.” He finally looked down, his shoulders bowing under an invisible weight. “I disgust myself.”

Silence stretched, tense and fragile. Shane’s own anger was a cold, hard knot in his stomach, but beneath it, he could feel the sharp edges of Ilya’s pain. They cut in different directions.

“You don’t get to do that,” Shane said, his own voice quiet but clear. “You don’t get to be the judge, jury, and executioner for my mistakes. We are not mates. That isn’t how this works.”

“I know.” Ilya’s response was immediate, defeated. “I know this. In here,” he tapped his temple, “I know this. But in here,” he pressed a fist against his sternum, the gesture violent in its despair, “it does not matter. It feels the same. The thought of another alpha....” He shook his head, a sharp, pained motion. “It makes me animal. A stupid animal with no control. For that, I have no excuse.”

He took a slow, deliberate step back, increasing the space between them, making himself smaller. “I am not asking for your forgiveness, Hollander. I have no right to it. I am telling I am sorry. And I am telling you it will not happen again. If you want to leave me, I will leave. If you want to never see me after today, I will accept this. Choice is yours.”

He stood there, waiting for his sentence. The powerful, terrifying alpha from this morning was gone. In his place was a man standing in the ruins of his own honor, offering Shane the one thing he’d never truly given him before: a real, unimpeded choice when it came to them.

Shane looked at him - the exhaustion, the shame, the careful distance. The memory of the kiss that had started the morning, the desperate, hungry one before everything went to hell, flashed in his mind. The complexity of it all was a tangled knot he couldn’t unravel now.

“I should never want to speak to you again.” Shane said finally, his tone flat.

Ilya nodded once, a sharp dip of his chin. “Da.”

Another nod. Ilya turned toward the door, his movements heavy. His hand was on the handle when Shane spoke again.

“Rozanov.”

He stopped, but didn’t turn.

“Your apology,” Shane said. “It’s a start. But it’s just a start. It doesn’t fix what’s broken.”

Ilya’s head bowed lower. “I know,” he said. The silence was different this time. It wasn’t filled with the echo of shattering glass or choking humiliation. It was thick with the echo of an apology that had, against all odds, felt real. Shane stood frozen in the center of the room, the cold knot of anger in his stomach slowly unraveling into a confusing, weary ache.

Ilya was still there. He hadn’t gone to the elevators. He looked braced for a blow. “I cannot leave it like this,” he said, his voice still rough. “it will be like poison if we leave it like this.”

Shane wanted to say no. To tell him he’d had his chance to talk. But the hollowed-out look on Ilya’s face, the visible struggle, held him back. He sat down on the sofa.

This time, Ilya walked over turned to face him. He sat down next to Shane but still gave him space. He stood, hands deliberately held open at his sides, a conscious effort at non-threat. “The things you said. Before. That we are not mates. That it was only once.” He swallowed hard. “This is truth, as you see it?”

Shane hugged his arms around himself, his gaze dropping to the carpet. It was easier to talk to the floor. “It’s the truth, period. That’s what it was.”

“Look at me, Hollander.”

The command was there, but softer, frayed at the edges. Shane’s eyes flicked up, then away.

Ilya closed the distance between them, but slowly. He didn't grab. He lifted his hand and gently, firmly, took hold of Shane's chin, tilting his face up until their eyes met. His touch was unyielding, but not painful. It was an anchor. "Here. Look at me when you say these things. Do not hide from them. Do not hide from me."

Trapped in that blue gaze, Shane felt his defenses waver. It was terrifying, this forced connection. "Let go."

"I will. When you use your words. Properly." Ilya's thumb stroked once, a barely-there caress on his jaw. "You said it was only once. A single night. But you carry it. I see it in you. So do I. So why do you say it means nothing, just push me away?"

The directness, the physical insistence on eye contact, short-circuited Shane's usual retreat into mumbled deflection. The truth, pressured and hot, bubbled up. "Because its hard, Rozanov!" The words burst out, sharper than he intended. "You have no idea how hard it is for me to be like this. You dont know how it feel to have this secret that is eating me up inside. I dont know if one day I'm going to wake up and have everything taken away from me. If one day someone finds out about us or what I am.."

Ilya's gaze intensified, searching his face. The anger wasn't there. It was a painful, focused curiosity. "You think I haven't thought the same?"

"What else was I supposed to think? I saw magazines with you going out like nothing." Shane shot back, trying to twist his chin away. Ilya's hold tightened, just enough to keep him there.

"You were supposed to think I was giving you space you clearly needed. That I was... managing my own... feelings." Ilya's admission was gruff. "It was a mistake. A bad one. I see this now." He said the word as if it tasted foreign. "I will work on this."

Hearing his own chaotic feelings framed so clearly, so accurately, was disarming. Shane's struggle ceased. He just stared, exposed. "Yes."

Ilya's breath left him in a slow sigh. The fight seemed to drain from his own posture. "And then Hill. And then the stranger." He said it not as an accusation, but as a grim timeline of cause and effect. "You are right. We were not mates. We had no promises. But Hollander..." His thumb stroked his jaw again, the gesture now unmistakably tender. "You must see. For me, from the moment I had you, the promise was made. In here." He tapped his own chest with his free hand. "I did not know how to tell you. I only knew how to... want. And then to be angry when you wouldn't talk to me."

"I'm not a thing to be owned," Shane whispered, the heat gone from his voice, leaving only exhausted conviction.

"Nyet," Ilya agreed quietly, finally releasing his chin. His hand fell away. "You are not. But you are a man I want. There is a difference. One I have behaved very badly in forgetting." He took a half-step back, giving Shane space. "So. We start again. From here.. You tell me what you need. Truly. And I will try... I will try... to listen. Not as an alpha who owns you. But as a man who wants you."

Shane rubbed his jaw where Ilya's fingers had been. The phantom pressure felt like a brand, but a clarifying one. The fog of hurt and anger was beginning to clear, leaving a daunting, empty landscape where they had to build something new.

"I need you to not shut down," Shane said, the words feeling clumsy but necessary. "I need you to not use your strength or your... your alpha-ness... to scare me into agreement. Even if you're angry."

Ilya nodded, a single, sharp dip of his head. "Da. I can try this."

"And I..." Shane took a deep breath, forcing himself to meet Ilya's eyes without the physical prompt. "I will try to say the hard thing to your face. Before I run or... or let someone else distract me from it."

A ghost of something- approval, relief, hope flickered in Ilya's eyes. "This is good deal."

They stood there, two warriors in the aftermath, surveying the emotional wreckage. The path wasn't clean. The game loomed, a collision waiting to happen. But for the first time, they were standing on the side, looking at the same cracks, both willing to see where this could go.

The prepaid phone felt like an extension of his hand now. The first call had been to the man in Moscow. The second was to a different kind of specialist, one who operated in the digital shadows.

"The bar on Calle Humboldt. Four weeks ago, night of the twenty-second. Exterior and interior CCTV," Ilya stated, his voice devoid of inflection as he drove through the Boston night. "I need a face. A man who stepped out with an omega around 1:30 AM. The omega was drunk- dark hair, Asian, athletic build. Find the man."

The cost was higher. The process took forty-eight hours. An encrypted file arrived: grainy black-and-white stills of a man in his forties, leaving the bar's back alley exit alone, adjusting his clothes. A few clearer frames from a traffic camera a block away gave a license plate. From there, it was simple. A name. An address. A flight attendant connected out of San Diego with a layover pattern that had placed him in Puerto Vallarta that night.

Ilya's schedule was a weapon. Boston played in Anaheim in five days. It was perfect.

The logistics were handled by the first contact, the man who understood erasure. The day before the game, Ilya stood in a sterile, rented storage unit in an industrial park near Long Beach. The air smelled of concrete dust and rust. In the center of the empty space sat a single metal chair. He waited.

The door rattled up. Two large, silent men ushered in a confused, then terrified, flight attendant. He was shoved into the chair. One man zip-tied his wrists behind the back of the chair, the other his ankles to the chair legs. They left without a word. The door rolled down with a final, metallic thunder.

The man's eyes bulged, darting around the bleak space before landing on Ilya, who leaned against the far wall, arms crossed. He was dressed all in black—thermal shirt, sweatpants, no logos.

“What is this? Who are you? The interview -” the man stammered, his voice heavy with an accent and high with panic.

Ilya pushed off the wall. He didn't speak. He walked to a duffel bag in the corner and unzipped it. He pulled out a roll of heavy-duty duct tape.

“Please, you've got the wrong man! I have money-”

Ilya tore a strip of tape with a sharp, ripping sound that echoed in the unit. In three swift strides, he was in front of the man. He slapped the tape over his mouth, silencing the pleas. He stepped back, studying his work. The man's muffled screams were now just a weak, nasal hum.

Only then did Ilya speak, his voice a soft, deadly monotone. “You were in a bar in Puerto Vallarta. You found an omega in a corner. He was crying. You put your mouth on him.”

The man's eyes widened impossibly further, pure recognition and horror dawning. He shook his head violently, a frantic, negative jerk.

Ilya's expression didn't change. He reached back into the duffel and pulled out a crowbar. He hefted it in his palm.

“You did not ask. He could not consent.” Ilya took a step closer. “He belongs to me.”

The first swing was for principle. It cracked against the man's ribs. A choked scream fought against the tape. The second swing was for the memory Hollander carried. It shattered the man's collarbone with a wet, crunchy snap.

What followed was not rage. It was a grim, surgical dismantling. Ilya worked with the cold efficiency of a mechanic removing parts. The sap rose and fell, a brutal metronome. Strikes to the limbs- thwack- the knees- crunch- the forearms- snap. The man's body jerked and shuddered in the chair, his screams becoming wet, bubbling sounds behind the tape, then fading to whimpers, then to shallow, hitched breaths.

Ilya didn't target the head. Not yet. This was about pain, not immediate oblivion. This was about imprinting a lesson on every nerve ending.

Finally, the man hung slack in his bonds, head lolling, consciousness flickering. Blood soaked his shirt, dripped from his nose, pooled beneath the chair. Ilya dropped the now bloody crowbar. It landed with a dull thud.

He crouched in front of the broken man, grabbing a fistful of his hair to yank his head up. The man's eyes were glazed, unfocused.

"If you live," Ilya whispered, his face inches from the man's, "you will change your name. You will leave the country. You will never speak of that night. You will see an omega on the street and you will cross to the other side. If you do not, I will know. And I will finish this."

He released the man's hair, letting his head drop. He walked to the duffel, pulled out a towel, and meticulously wiped his hands. He tossed the towel onto the man's lap. He then retrieved a cheap, disposable phone and placed it on the concrete floor, just within the man's limited sight if he regained focus. "The door will unlock in one hour. The phone has one number. Call for an ambulance, or bleed out here. Your choice."

Ilya zipped the duffel, slung it over his shoulder, and walked to the rolling door. He didn't look back. He emerged into the California twilight, the salt air a stark contrast to the iron-and-copper scent now staining the storage unit behind him.

He drove to the team hotel, showered, dressed in a suit. At the arena the next night, he scored two goals and an assist in a 4-1 win over the Ducks. He played a clean, physical game. He was focused, brilliant, untouchable.

In the quiet of his hotel room after, he looked at his knuckles—unmarked, clean. He thought of the storage unit, the chair, the precise, rhythmic sound of the sap. He thought of Shane, who was now, in every way that mattered to Ilya's world, cleansed. The past had been cauterized. The future was his to shape.

He slept soundly for the first time in weeks. One more to go.

"It's Ivan's friend," Ilya said, his voice low and flat, using the old code. "The bar on Calle Humboldt. In Puerto Vallarta. The one with the blue neon scorpion."

A pause. The sound of a lighter flicking, a long inhale. "I know it."

"I want it gone. A complete loss. Electrical. Make it look like the wiring finally gave up. Tomorrow night, after closing. No one inside."

"Cost is twenty. Half now."

"Ten now. Ten after I see the news reports. The scorpion must be in the rubble." Ilya's tone brooked no negotiation. It was the voice of a man stating facts.

Another pause, then a sigh of acquiescence. "Wire the details to the usual account. It will be a smoking hole."

"Good." Ilya ended the call, powered off the phone, and placed it in the glove compartment. He felt nothing. It was a logistical task completed.

The other target required a more personal touch.

Chris Hill was not difficult to find. His routines were those of a professional athlete during the season: predictable, and public. Ilya observed for three days. The upscale gym in Back Bay where Hill trained at noon. The trendy coffee shop he visited afterwards. The bars in Seaport he frequented at night, always with a rotating cast of acquaintances, never alone for long. Ilya watched, a shadow in a rental car with tinted windows, his patience infinite.

He needed him alone. He needed him afraid.

The opportunity came on the fourth night. Hill, perhaps overconfident after a few drinks, decided to take a shortcut through a dimly lit parking garage near his condo, texting as he walked, headphones in.

Ilya moved like a current of cold air. He fell into step behind him, silent in soft-soled shoes. He'd chosen the weapon carefully: a heavy metal tube, dense, familiar, final. It felt right in his hands.

He tapped Hill on the shoulder.

Hill turned, annoyance flashing across his features, which then crumpled into confusion, then dawning, "Rozanov? What the f—"

Ilya didn't speak. He swung the bat in a short, vicious, horizontal arc. It connected with a sickening, wet CRACK against the side of Hill's left knee. Hill started to scream, a high, shattered sound, and collapsed, his leg buckling out at a grotesque angle.

Before the scream could fully escape, Ilya was on him, a knee planted in the center of his chest, driving the air from his lungs. He leaned down, his face inches from Hill's, which was contorted in agony and panic.

“You kissed him,” Ilya said, his voice a calm, conversational monotone that was infinitely more terrifying than a shout.

“What? Who? I don’t- ” Hill gagged, trying to suck in air.

Ilya shifted his weight, eliciting another choked cry. “Shane Hollander. In Mexico. You put your mouth on what is mine.” He said it as simply as stating the weather. “You touched him.”

“It was nothing! A drunk mistake! He pushed me away!” Hill babbled, tears of pain and fear streaking his face.

“I know he did,” Ilya said, almost gently. “This is not for his actions. This is for yours. For the thought. For the attempt.” He raised the bat again. Hill threw his arms up, sobbing.

“Please! I’m sorry! I’ll never go near him, I swear!”

“Nyet,” Ilya agreed. “You will not.” He brought the pipe down, not on Hill’s head, but on his other leg, just above the ankle. The sound this time was drier, more final. Hill’s body arched off the concrete in a silent, breathless seizure before he crumpled, whimpering.

Ilya stood up, looking down at the broken man. He felt a remote, clinical satisfaction. A problem was being corrected. He leaned the bat against the wall and crouched again, pulling a terrified Hill up by his collar until their eyes met.

“Listen very carefully,” Ilya murmured, his breath ghosting over Hill’s face. “You will tell the doctors you fell down the stairs. You are a drunk. You are clumsy. If one word about me, about Shane ever leaves your lips...” He glanced meaningfully at the metal pipe. “I find you again. And I will not stop at your legs. Do you understand the silence I require?”

Hill could only nod, his entire body shuddering with shock and pain.

“Good.” Ilya released him, letting his head thump back on the concrete. He picked up the pipe, pulled a handkerchief from his pocket, and meticulously wiped the handle clean of his prints. He dropped the cloth on Hill’s chest.

“Remember this one chance,” he said one last time, his voice fading as he walked back into the shadows of the garage, leaving the two sources of his rage-one destined for ash, the other for a long, painful convalescence-behind him. The world felt cleaner. More in order. Shane’s past had been edited, his future threats neutralized. It was, in Ilya’s mind, the purest form of an apology he was capable of making.

Now that his revenge was complete, he could go with a clear head to talk to his little omega.

Chapter Notes

Shane woke up to a text from Rozanov.

That should not have surprised him anymore. It should not have done anything to him at all, really, considering everything that had happened between them. The game, the house, the confession, the ruined living room, the apology, the conversation where they both sat too far apart but still somehow closer than they had been in weeks. It all sat heavy in Shane's chest when he opened his eyes, the hotel room dim around him, Hayden still asleep in the other bed with one arm hanging off the mattress. Over the past couple of weeks, they had been communicating better. He didn't let himself think too deeply on how his instincts had taken over when Rozanov had treated him roughly. Whether he liked it or not wasn't the point. He needed to be respected and he thought they were getting to know each other better so he would not have a problem expressing that next time they were face to face.

Shane reached blindly for his phone before he fully let himself think.

IGR: Are you awake?

Shane stared at it for a few seconds, thumb hovering over the screen.

S: Unfortunately.

The reply came almost immediately.

IGR: Ribs?

Shane glanced down at himself. The bruise from the game had darkened overnight, spreading ugly and tender along his side. It annoyed him that Rozanov had noticed. It annoyed him more that some part of him liked being noticed.

S: Just sore.

IGR: You should move faster.

S: He should be less massive.

IGR: Small omega cute like a kitten.

Shane snorted quietly into the dim room and immediately pressed his lips together, glancing toward Hayden to make sure he hadn't woken him. He hadn't. Good. Shane rolled onto his back and stared at the ceiling for a moment, phone resting against his chest, heart doing something stupid and traitorous behind his ribs. They were not fixed. Not even close. Whatever had broken in Boston had not magically repaired itself because Rozanov said sorry and Shane decided not to walk away. But somehow the apology had shifted something. The anger was still there. The fear too. The memory of what had happened still sat between them, sharp and ugly, but so did the choice Ilya had given him afterward. Real choice. Awkward, imperfect, probably still too late, but real.

His phone buzzed again.

IGR: Did you sleep?

Shane swallowed.

S: A little.

IGR: Bad dreams?

S: No.

IGR: Liar.

Shane rolled his eyes.

S: You don't know that.

IGR: I know many things about you.

S: Asshole.

IGR: Da.

Shane smiled despite himself, which was exactly the problem. Rozanov could be terrifying, impossible, possessive to a degree that should have sent Shane running directly into witness protection, he knew things about Shane that he shouldn't, and then somehow he would text one stupid little word and Shane would feel warmth bloom low in his chest like an idiot. He hated that. He hated how quickly his body and mind settled when Rozanov reached for him, even through a phone screen. He hated that the silence between them had felt like punishment and now the steady return of texts felt like something being carefully rebuilt brick by brick.

They did not talk about Boston again. Not directly. Instead, Ilya complained about his coach. Shane complained about the hotel food. Ilya asked what he ate for breakfast and called him pathetic when Shane admitted he had only had a banana and coffee. Shane told him he sounded like a Russian grandmother. Ilya said Russian grandmothers were powerful women and Shane should respect them. Somehow, by the time Montreal's bus left for the airport, Shane had actually ordered eggs because apparently being harassed into protein by a man who had destroyed his own coffee table counted as romance now.

It continued like that for days. Not normal exactly, because nothing about them had ever been normal, but steadier. Safer in small increments. Calls happened late, usually after practice or games, sometimes for hours, sometimes only a few minutes before one of them had to sleep. Shane learned that Ilya hated fruit unless it was baked into pastry, considered most American television "loud nonsense," liked black-and-white movies because the English was slower, and had once broken a teammate's nose in practice and still considered it "a misunderstanding." Ilya learned that Shane liked tea more than coffee but drank coffee when tired because it made him feel like a real adult, that Yuna still managed his calendar when his schedule got too chaotic, that he hated mushrooms with an intensity Ilya found unreasonable, and that Hayden could talk for forty straight minutes without requiring oxygen.

IGR: You are too skinny.

S: I am literally a professional athlete.

IGR: Skinny professional athlete.

S: You are banned from commenting on my body.

IGR: I like your body.

Shane nearly walked into a wall outside the practice facility.

S: That is not the point.

IGR: Is good point.

S: You're impossible.

IGR: You still answer.

That was also the problem.

He did still answer.

Every time.

Somewhere in Boston, Ilya noticed that too.

He noticed everything now- something between them had switched and had become a problem because if Ilya thought he was obsessed before, it was reaching new heights now. Hollander's practice schedule. Travel days. Morning skates. When his answers got shorter because he was tired. When he used sarcasm to hide nerves. When he said "fine" or "sure" and meant anything except fine. Ilya had always been observant on and off the ice, trained to read shoulders, hips, stick position, hesitation, weakness. Reading Hollander was different. Harder. More fun and engaging. More satisfying. There were no clean rules, no obvious systems, no coach explaining what to do when an omega looked at you like he wanted to stay but expected punishment if he did.

So Ilya began looking for rules.

First, he hired the English tutor.

That decision had been irritatingly practical. His self taught English was good enough for interviews, contracts, coaches, teammates, women, men, arguments, and threats. It was not good enough for Shane. Important things became too blunt in his mouth. Feelings came out sharp-edged, half-translated, stripped of the parts that mattered most. In Russian, Ilya could feel exactly what he meant. In English, everything became mine, stay, don't go, I'm sorry. Useful words, maybe. Not enough words. Not precise enough for someone like Hollander, who flinched at the wrong kind of force and still needed directness like oxygen.

The tutor, Olga, was a woman in her fifties with silver hair, sharp glasses, and absolutely no fear of him.

"You speak understandable English," she told him during their first session. "Not natural English."

Ilya stared at her.

"I speak fine."

"Yes, fine. But you are smarter than that. You shouldn't just want 'fine'."

He narrowed his eyes.

"That is true."

She gave him reading assignments. Articles. essays. Fiction. Dialogue exercises. She told him his phrasing carried unintended aggression. He told her sometimes the aggression was intended. She said that was exactly the problem.

The omega book had been an accident.

Mostly.

He found it in a bookstore after Meredith suggested he read longer nonfiction in English. He had intended to buy something normal, maybe a book about leadership or sports psychology-like the books Hollander read, something boring enough to look respectable on his coffee table. Instead, he saw the title tucked between relationship psychology and social development.

Understanding Omega Attachment in Modern Society

He stared at it for a long moment before taking it off the shelf.

It felt ridiculous. It also felt useful.

He bought it with three other books to make the purchase look less suspicious, which was stupid because the cashier did not care. Still, when he got home, he placed the omega book face down beneath a grammar workbook like it was contraband.

He started reading after practice.

The first chapters annoyed him. Too much history. Too much legal background. Too many descriptions of social progress written by someone clearly satisfied with progress happening on paper while real life remained much uglier. That and he needed to go back and forth with the translator app on his phone to understand certain words. Ilya skimmed several sections about the evolution of omega rights, workplace protections, suppressant access, and bonding law until he reached a chapter titled The Contradiction of Omega Independence.

Then he stopped skimming.

Modern omegas are frequently misunderstood through extremes. Traditional social models frame omegas as dependents requiring alpha protection and household stability, while contemporary political movements often respond by presenting omegas as indistinguishable from betas in social, emotional, and professional needs. Neither model is accurate. Most omegas interviewed for this study described themselves as existing in the tension between independence and instinct. They wanted careers, friendships, private finances, romantic choice, bodily autonomy, and full social respect. At the same time, many admitted privately that emotional security, physical safety, and reliable provision remained deeply soothing when offered by a trusted partner.

Ilya frowned. Read it again. Then continued.

This desire for care should not be confused with weakness. Several high-achieving omegas in this study owned property, managed businesses, served in high-level professional roles, or supported families financially. None described themselves as helpless. Yet many still spoke of an internal battle around care, often with resentment or shame. One omega surgeon masking as a beta throughout her career said, “I can pay my mortgage. I can manage my staff. I can stand in an operating room for sixteen hours and make life-or-death decisions. But there is still a part of me that wants someone to notice when I am tired before I have to ask. I hate that I want it. I dislike how much it calms me when it happens.”

Ilya leaned back slowly in his chair. Interesting.

Hollander hated help. He hated being managed. He hated anything that looked too much like being handled. But he also softened when someone noticed. He melted, then got embarrassed about it. He let his mother take the lead in business matters. He rolled his eyes when Ilya asked if he ate, but he answered. Sometimes even sent proof. Sometimes even admitted he was tired.

Ilya turned the page.

Omeegas raised in environments of secrecy or high performance often learn to distrust their own needs. In professional sports, politics, law enforcement, and military environments, disclosed omeegas report intense scrutiny, social isolation, and increased risk of alpha interference. Many choose suppressants not only for biological management but for social survival. One omega athlete interviewed stated, "People say the world has changed. Legally, maybe. But tell a locker room of alpha men what you are and suddenly every interaction changes. They stop seeing the player first."

That one made him stop entirely. Because Hollander was not only afraid, he was correct to be afraid.

The league would eat him alive. Not officially at first maybe since Hollander was insanely popular. Officially, there would be statements about inclusion, privacy, equal opportunity. Unofficially, every interaction would be questioned. Every bad game blamed on hormones. Every alpha opponent watched too closely or not closely enough. Media would circle like vultures. Sponsors would either drop him quietly or package him as something softer, prettier, more marketable. The sport would stop seeing Hollander as the dangerous little bastard who could slice through defenses and start seeing omega first.

Ilya hated the thought. Deeply. Violently.

He read on.

Alpha behavior varies considerably between individuals. Public narratives often divide alphas into two categories: civilized protectors or dangerous aggressors. In reality, most alphas display moderate instinct expression and maintain stable social bonds without significant possessive escalation, unless their mate is in heat or bred. However, a smaller subset demonstrates heightened attachment intensity, commonly referred to in behavioral studies as imprinting behavior. These alphas may develop obsessive focus on a chosen partner, disproportionate distress at separation, increased territorial responses, heightened protective instincts, and a tendency toward practical or financial overprovisioning. None of these traits are inherently abusive in isolation. Risk increases when possessiveness is paired with poor emotional regulation, entitlement, or disregard for the omega's autonomy.

Ilya went very still. Then read the paragraph again with growing irritation. Obsessive focus. Disproportionate distress at separation. Territorial responses. Practical overprovisioning. He shut the book, hard.

Judgmental. The book was judgmental. Also possibly correct. He reopened it after five minutes.

Omeegas paired with highly possessive alphas reported mixed outcomes. When the alpha demonstrated consistency, patience, emotional regulation, and respect for choice, omeegas described feeling intensely protected, deeply wanted, and unusually safe. Omega's naturally seek out the mate who would keep them safe-male omega's above all since when they are in heat, pregnant or pre-and post coitus-they are extremely vulnerable. An omega will not allow an alpha to mate with them who will not be able to offer the needed protections. When the same instincts were expressed through coercion, surveillance, punishment, or intimidation, omegas described fear, resentment, and emotional fragmentation. The distinction was not intensity itself, but trust. Without trust, protection becomes control. Without choice, care becomes captivity.

Ilya closed his eyes.

Memories of Boston came back to him in broken pieces.

Hollander flinching, arguing back. Hollander saying, I didn't do anything wrong. His face afterward. His own apology. The disgust he had felt once the anger drained out and left him with the truth of what he had done. His explanation that they weren't really a couple.

Without choice, care becomes captivity.

He hated that sentence.

He switched the cover of the book and kept it close to him after that. Not because he was embarrassed. Because he preferred strategy. There was no need for Hollander to know he was being studied if he had the chance to come over again soon. It migrated around the house over the next week, from kitchen counter to nightstand to the passenger seat of his car. He wrote notes in Russian in the margins whenever something felt relevant.

Too general.

Possibly H.

Not H.

Important.

The word important appeared more than he liked.

Especially in the chapter on courtship.

Courtship, in omega social development, is best understood not as a sequence of romantic gestures but as the creation of reliability. While public examples often emphasize flowers, formal dates, gifts, scent exchange, or family negotiation, the omegas interviewed in this study most frequently defined successful courtship through repeated proof. Does the alpha return after conflict? Do they remain emotionally steady when challenged? Can they provide physical protection without creating fear? Do they offer aftercare? Does their presence reduce the omega's need to remain constantly alert?

Ilya underlined the last sentence.

Then stared at it.

Many omegas resist courtship behaviors even while responding positively to them. This resistance is especially common in omegas who have spent years suppressing instinct, hiding secondary sex traits, or establishing professional identities in environments hostile to omega vulnerability. An omega may mock concern while secretly feeling soothed by it. They may reject financial or practical care on principle while unconsciously testing whether the offer remains available. They may argue against guidance while becoming attached to consistency. These contradictions are not manipulation. They are often the result of instinct colliding with learned self-protection. A true mate, a steady alpha will not give up their pursuit when faced with push back.

Ilya sat back. That was Hollander exactly. Annoyingly exactly.

He reached for his phone before he could think better of it.

IGR: Did you eat dinner or are you pretending coffee is soup?

The reply came faster than expected.

S: I'm a grown adult. Of course I ate dinner.

IGR: You are menace.

S: You like it.

IGR: Unfortunately.

S: Wow. Romantic.

IGR: Eat.

S: You eat.

Ilya looked at the empty kitchen counter.

He had not eaten.

S: Did you seriously ask me if I ate while not eating?

IGR: Different.

S: It is literally the same.

IGR: I am bigger. I survive longer.

S: That is the stupidest alpha thing you've ever said.

IGR: Not true. I say many stupid alpha things.

S: At least you're self-aware.

Ilya stared at the phone, smiling despite himself.

Then got up to make dinner. Because apparently being ordered around by Shane Hollander was tolerable.

The more Ilya read, the more his thoughts shifted from abstract care to logistics. Emotional safety was complicated. Physical protection was simpler. Financial security was simplest of all. Money made things easier. Money closed gaps, eliminated stress, bought privacy, created distance from people who asked too many questions. Money was not love, but it could clear space around love so nothing touched it.

The problem was that Shane was not poor.

Not even close.

The first financial summary Ilya received irritated him.

Shane's rookie contract was respectable but not as strong as Ilya's had been. Boston had wanted Ilya badly enough to overpay early, and his incentives had been negotiated by people who understood leverage. From a hockey perspective, Ilya made more. As it should be.

Then came the rest of the report.

Brand partnerships. Commercial campaigns. Licensing. Sportswear. A small but strategic luxury watch deal. Investment properties. Family-managed holding accounts. Carefully structured savings. Conservative growth strategy. No reckless spending.

Ilya frowned harder the longer he read. Yuna Hollander, obviously. She was terrifying. Efficient. Selective. Protective. Better than half the agents Ilya knew. Shane had the weaker rookie contract, but Yuna had made sure his money worked like a machine. Endorsements chosen for longevity instead of flash. Investments that assumed hockey could end at any time. Properties purchased quietly. Enough that Shane was far more secure than most players twice his age.

This should have pleased him. Instead, it irritated him. Because Ilya had ignored brand deals all year because shoots were annoying. He had turned down watch companies, car companies, sports drinks, skincare, training equipment, and one truly ridiculous cologne campaign after reading three words of the pitch and deciding everyone involved deserved prison.

Now that felt irresponsible. Because keeping an eye on Hollander was not cheap. Security was expensive.

Private drivers. Discreet surveillance around high-risk games. Background checks. Travel adjustments. Information. Quiet solutions. The occasional person who needed to be encouraged to leave certain places permanently. All that and he still provided for his family back home too.

Ilya called his manager.

“What happened?” his manager answered immediately.

“I need more endorsements.”

There was a long silence.

“...Are you dying?”

“No.”

“Are you concussed?”

“No.”

“You hate endorsements.”

“I changed mind.”

Another pause.

“You changed your mind.”

“Yes.”

“About money.”

“Yes.”

“Are you in trouble?”

Ilya narrowed his eyes.

“I am hanging up.”

“Oh my god, it is someone.”

“Stop it with questions. Find me endorsements”

“You already make millions.”

“Not enough.”

“For what?”

Ilya considered the question. Answering honestly felt unwise. “Expenses,” he said.

“What expenses?”

“None of your business expenses.”

His manager inhaled sharply.

“Jesus Christ.”

“Long-term deals,” Ilya continued, ignoring him. “Good money. Not stupid products.”

“You think every product is stupid.”

“You turned down six figures from a luxury watch company because you said time was a prison.”

“It is.”

“You’re impossible.”

“I pay you.”

“That is unfortunately true.”

When he hung up, Ilya opened the omega book again.

Financial provision remains one of the most culturally contested aspects of omega courtship. Many modern omegas reject traditional dependency models and resent assumptions that their secondary sex makes them financially incapable. However, interviews revealed that even financially independent omegas often responded strongly to proof that a partner could provide if necessary. Importantly, the desire was not always for money itself, but for the reassurance money represented: stability, continuity, and the ability to rest without catastrophic loss of control.

Ilya looked back at Hollander’s financial summary.

Then at the highlighted sentence. Stability. Continuity.

He could do that. He could do that very well. The accountant took longer than expected.

Not because the man was loyal. Because he was nervous and professionally cautious, which Ilya found irritating but not unexpected. There were layers between them, as there always were when Ilya wanted something done quietly. He did not call as himself at first. He did not ask directly. Information moved best through pressure and money, and the right people understood how to make cooperation feel like relief instead of risk.

Eventually, the accountant talked.

Carefully. Not giving everything, but just enough.

Hollander was financially responsible to the point of anxiety. He checked accounts obsessively, worried about injury, overplanned for career collapse, hated debt, carried credit card balances occasionally only because travel and property expenses stacked inconveniently before reimbursements cleared, and checked mortgage rates like they were hostile enemies plotting against him. The investment properties were good decisions, but they weighed on him. He liked having something separate from hockey. He hated owing anyone anything.

Of course he did.

Ilya transferred the first payment that night.

Small enough not to cause immediate notice.

Then another. Bribing the financial advisors was easy enough and he left it to them to come up with an excuse to tell Hollander if he noticed, just until Ilya figured out what exactly he wanted with the omega.

By the third payment, the accountant sent one nervous message through the chain asking whether Mr. Hollander had approved this activity.

Ilya sent back more money.

The protests stopped.

For two weeks.

Then Shane noticed.

S: Weird question.

Ilya stared at the message.

IGR: You ask many weird questions.

S: Did your contract or team pay for things?

IGR: Need more information.

S: My accountant sounds like he's being held hostage.

Ilya blinked. How unprofessional.

S: And one of my cards is paid off, one of the mortgages got a balloon payment.

Long pause.

S: Rozanov.

Ilya looked at the omega book sitting open on the counter.

Care without humiliation.

Hm.

He typed carefully.

IGR: Maybe bank likes you.

S: My bank does not like me that much.

IGR: Maybe accountant good at job.

S: My accountant keeps avoiding my calls.

Ilya closed his eyes briefly.

Very unprofessional.

IGR: You sound upset.

They went back and forth for a few minutes until Hollander had to leave to go to practice. Ilya was proud of himself for deflecting the conversation.

Svetlana found the book three days later.

She arrived unannounced, which was typical, carrying a bag of food and wearing sunglasses despite it being nearly dark outside. She walked into Ilya's kitchen like she owned it, took one look at the counters, and immediately began judging him.

"Please, you are too enthusiastic-please don't rush at me with all the love and kisses." she said sarcastically when Ilya stayed absorbed in the book.

"I did great you."

"Barely."

She opened his refrigerator, sighed dramatically, and began unpacking containers of food she had apparently brought because she did not trust him to keep anything edible in the house. Ilya let her. Svetlana had been in his life too long to argue with over small things. Family without blood. Annoying without being removable.

Then she saw the book.

It sat beside the coffee maker, facedown but not hidden well enough.

Svetlana picked it up. Read the title. Paused. Then looked at him. "Oh no."

Ilya took the book from her hand. "Do not touch my things."

"You're still chasing the omega." Not asked- stated.

He said nothing, which was answer enough.

Svetlana's expression shifted from teasing to something more serious. She leaned back against the counter and crossed her arms, the food forgotten for the moment. "Ilyushka."

“What?”

“You know what.”

He looked away first, irritated by that.

She sighed. “You never wanted this.”

“This?”

“A relationship. A real one. Long term. Permanent.” She watched him carefully. “You barely tolerated anyone past three months.”

“They became annoying.”

“You become annoying first.”

He frowned.

She ignored him.

“I’m serious. You get bored. You disappear. You don’t explain. You don’t care when they cry. You don’t like being needed.”

That was before though. He had only ever known demand from people. No matter how much he gave to his family, they always wanted more. Never sparing a thought of what he needed. No matter how hard tried or how much he gave, it wasn’t ever enough.

Before Hollander, need had always felt like a trap. A demand. A slow narrowing of the world. Everyone wanted more than he felt like giving, and eventually their wanting became irritating. He had never understood why anyone voluntarily folded another person into their daily life. Why they adjusted schedules, answered stupid texts, remembered small details, tolerated moods, apologized when they did not feel like apologizing.

Now he knew Hollander’s schedule better than his own. Now he hired a tutor because he wanted to say things correctly- but only to Hollander. Now he read an omega book in secret like some deranged academic stalker. Now he had bribed an accountant because the thought of Hollander worrying over debt made something unpleasant twist inside him.

Svetlana’s voice softened. “If you are not sure, stop.”

His answer was immediate. “No.”

“You can’t do this halfway with an omega like him.”

“I know.”

“Do you?” she asked. “Because omegas aren’t like our little fuck buddies. They spend so much time surviving that when they finally let someone in, it means something. If you push and push and push just because you want him, and then decide later that you don't actually want the work, you will destroy him."

The words hit him badly. Because Hollander was not fragile. But he was breakable - there was a difference. Ilya had already seen the cracks.

The way he hid. The way he got overwhelmed. The way he carried fear like discipline. The way he could be stubborn and sharp and brilliant on the ice, then go still when something touched the wrong place inside him. The way he had said, I'm scared I'll hurt him, that he'll hurt me, according to what little Ilya had managed to pry from him later through half-jokes and half-confessions.

"I want to be in his life," Ilya said finally. It was not the answer to her question. It was the only true thing he had.

Svetlana went quiet.

He looked down at the book in his hand.

"I want his mornings. Nights. The small things. I want to know when he eats and when he sleeps and when he is angry and why. I want him to call me when something happens. I want..." He stopped, jaw tightening around the words. "I want to be expected."

Svetlana's expression softened in a way he immediately disliked. "Oh," she said quietly.

"What?"

"You're in trouble."

"I am not."

"You are absolutely in trouble."

He turned away.

She let him, which meant she was feeling merciful.

For now.

Svetlana stayed that night. She changed into one of the oversized hoodies she usually borrowed, and declared that it was too late to drive home. They ate in the living room while some terrible reality show played on television. Ilya hated it immediately. Svetlana insisted this meant he had no taste. He told her all the people on the screen should be arrested. She said that was why it was good television. They kept teasing each other and by midnight, the argument had faded into familiar, comfortable silence.

Svetlana stretched out along the couch with a blanket over her legs, and Ilya moved without thinking. He lowered himself beside her and laid his head in her lap the way he had done a hundred times before, years of habit taking over before pride could interfere.

Svetlana snorted. "This omega has made you more cuddly then ever. You should have me bent over the table by now."

"I am tired."

"You only do this when you're in your head too much."

He closed his eyes. "Quiet."

Her fingers moved into his hair anyway, nails scratching lightly against his scalp in the familiar way that had always made his shoulders loosen despite himself. Outside, Boston was cold and dark, snow threatening but not falling yet. The television droned on in the background, voices rising and falling around some manufactured drama neither of them cared about. For a while, neither spoke.

Then Svetlana said, quieter, "You really don't know what you want?"

Ilya kept his eyes closed. That was easier. "I know pieces."

"Tell me."

He exhaled slowly. "I want him close. I want him safe. I want him to answer when I call. I want him to stop being afraid of wanting me. I want to be in his life so much that when something happens, he thinks of me first." His hand curled loosely against the blanket. "But I don't know what to call this."

Svetlana's fingers slowed.

"That sounds like a relationship."

He grimaced. "Terrible word."

She laughed softly. "Because you are twelve."

"I am not."

"You are emotionally twelve sometimes."

He opened one eye. "You are very rude in my house."

"Someone has to be." Silence settled again, softer now.

Then he said, quieter than before, "I do not know if I know how to do this."

That made her hand pause completely.

The admission sat between them, rawer than he wanted. Ilya hated weakness. Hated saying things that gave someone else room to pity him. But Svetlana only resumed touching his hair, gentle now.

"No," she said. "You don't."

He frowned.

“Not helpful.”

“You don’t know how because you never cared enough to learn. That is different from being unable.”

He looked toward the television without seeing it. “I am unwilling to let him go.”

This time, Svetlana did not joke. “I know. You might need to though.”

“I can’t. Not yet.”

“If it meant his safety? His happiness?”

“If I am bad for him you mean?”

“You might be.”

His jaw tightened.

“But,” she continued, “you might also be the only person stubborn enough to stay and make it worth the sacrifice.”

Svetlana looked down at him, expression thoughtful.

“I think if you two can figure out how to get there without destroying each other first, you will want him as a mate.”

He opened his eyes immediately. “No.”

She smiled. “Yes.”

“No. He said he did not want a mate.”

“You already act half-mated.”

“That is ridiculous.”

“You are working on your english.”

“It is useful since I live here.”

“You’re reading omega psychology.”

“Research.”

Svetlana stared at him.

He paused. Then scowled. “Do not make face. I am being practical.”

She laughed so hard his head shifted in her lap.

He scowled harder.

“You’re hopeless,” she said.

“I am not.”

“You are. And he’s going to yell at you so much.”

That, unfortunately, made him smile.

A little.

“He yells cute.”

“God help him.”

Later, after Svetlana fell asleep in his bed, Ilya stood alone in the kitchen with the omega book open again. He was not reading it anymore, not really. The words blurred together, but one passage remained underlined twice.

Courtship becomes meaningful, official, when care is repeated without erasing choice. The possessive alpha must learn that being chosen is more powerful than taking. The independent omega must learn that accepting care is not the same as surrendering selfhood. Between these two lessons, attachment either fractures or becomes a solid bond.

He stared at that for a long time. Then his phone buzzed.

S: Hayden says I’m being weird because I smiled at my phone. I hope you’re happy.

Ilya smiled.

IGR: Very.

S: You’re the worst.

IGR: You like worst.

S: Unfortunately.

IGR: Did you eat dinner?

S: There it is.

IGR: Answer.

S: Yes, Russian grandma. I ate dinner.

IGR: Good boy.

S: Delete that immediately.

IGR: No.

S: I'm blocking you.

IGR: No you are not.

S: Asshole.

He leaned against the counter, warmth spreading through him in a way that still felt unfamiliar. Not lust. Not victory. Something slower. Something domestic, maybe. He disliked that word almost as much as relationship, but there it was. The ease of it. The wanting. The fact that Shane could be hundreds of miles away and still somehow in the room with him.

IGR: Miss you.

He almost deleted it, but didn't.

The reply took almost a minute.

S: You saw me literally yesterday on Facetime.

Then after a minute:

S: I miss you too though.

Ilya stared at the message.

For a long time.

Then he placed the phone down carefully, like sudden movement might disturb something fragile.

Two weeks later, the schedule offered an opportunity.

Montreal would be in New York for a weekend stretch, Admirals on Friday, Islanders on Sunday, with a Saturday night gap. Boston had only one game on Friday and the rest of the weekend free, which meant Ilya had no logical reason to be in New York. This did not matter. He was desperate to see Hollander face to face.

He texted after practice.

IGR: You are in New York Saturday.

S: Ok...Creepy way to start a conversation.

IGR: I come see you.

S: You play in Boston.

IGR: Friday night. Then free.

S: But I am not free.

IGR: I come.

S: No.

Ilya frowned at the phone.

IGR: No?

S: I have plans.

That annoyed him immediately.

IGR: Cancel.

S: Absolutely not.

IGR: What plans.

S: Hayden got a bunch of us tickets to Hadestown.

Ilya stared.

IGR: What is Hadestown?

S: A Broadway show.

IGR: No.

S: What do you mean no?

IGR: Sounds boring.

S: You listen to Russian sad music for fun.

IGR: Is different.

S: It's not different.

IGR: Cancel.

S: I am not canceling plans with my teammates because you decided to appear.

IGR: I did not decide yet.

S: You absolutely decided.

IGR: Maybe.

S: Rozanov.

IGR: Hollander.

S: I'm serious.

IGR: Me too.

S: I said no.

IGR: I heard.

S: Did you understand the no?

IGR: Yes.

S: Great.

IGR: I come anyway.

S: Oh my god.

Ilya booked the flight ten minutes later.

New York was cold, loud, and irritatingly full of people, but the hotel was easy enough to find. His room was even easier to find with the implanted tracker. He had not told Hollander he was coming because he would have continued saying no, and while Ilya was learning many things about choice, he had not yet decided surprises counted as violations. Mostly.

The hallway outside Hollander's room was quiet when he knocked.

For one second, he wondered if Hollander had already left.

Then the door opened.

Shane froze completely.

He wore black jeans and a dark green sweater that made his eyes look even darker than usual, hair slightly messy, mouth parted in shock. For a moment, neither of them spoke.

Then Shane said, very slowly, "What the fuck?"

Ilya smiled.

"Hello."

"You're in Boston."

"No."

"I can see that."

“Good.”

Shane looked down the hallway, then back at him, panic and delight flashing across his face so quickly Ilya nearly missed it. Nearly.

“Oh my god,” Shane muttered. “You actually flew here.”

“Da.”

“I said no.”

“I know.”

“That usually means don’t come.”

“I interpreted as challenge.”

“That was not me daring you.”

Ilya considered that. “Fair.”

Shane blinked, thrown off by the easy admission. Then his mouth twitched like he was fighting a smile and losing. “You’re insane.”

“Maybe.”

“You’re lucky Hayden stepped out.”

“I know.”

Shane stared. “How do you know that?”

Ilya paused.

“Guess.”

“Rozanov.”

“Lucky guess.”

“That is not comforting.”

Still, Shane stepped back and let him in.

Ilya entered the room and immediately hated it. Too small. Two beds. The scent of another alpha intermingled with his omega’s things. Not enough privacy. Hollander shut the door and turned toward him, still looking like he could not decide whether to be angry or happy.

Ilya wanted to touch him. He did not, not immediately. This, apparently, was growth. “You look good,” he said instead.

Shane's face went pink. "You cannot just fly to New York and compliment me like that makes this normal."

"But I did."

"Not the point."

"Hadestown still stupid name."

"You don't even know what it is."

"Man goes to hell?"

Shane blinked.

"...Kind of actually."

"Sounds depressing."

"It's supposed to be good."

"I am better."

Shane laughed then, sudden and unwilling, and Ilya felt something inside him loosen. There. That. That was why he came. Not only to touch him, though he wanted that badly enough that standing still felt like effort. He came for the laugh. For the face Shane made when pretending not to be pleased. For the way his shoulders dropped when he realized Ilya was really there.

Then Shane's expression softened.

"You flew all the way here."

"Yes."

"Just to see me?"

Ilya frowned. "Yes."

Like there was any other possible answer. For a moment, the room went quiet. Then Shane stepped closer and couldn't help himself and closed the distance and kissed him.

Ilya spun Hollander around and pinned him to the wall. The smaller man's back met the cool, unyielding plaster of the wall with a soft thump. Ilya's hands came up to frame Shane's face, calloused thumbs brushing over his freckles, the touch shockingly tender against the implicit force of the pin.

The world narrowed to the small hotel room, to the heat radiating from Ilya's body, to the stormy blue eyes. Shane pulled back for a second to catch his breath. Shane felt the controlled frustration slip. There was no slow lean, no question. Ilya closed the final inch again and captured Shane's mouth with his own.

It wasn't a kiss. It was a conquest. The initial pressure was fierce, almost bruising, a release of weeks of pent-up tension. Ilya's lips were demanding, moving with a hungry, relentless rhythm that stole the air from Shane's lungs. A soft, startled sound - a muffled mmph escaped Shane, swallowed instantly by Ilya. One of Ilya's hands slid from Shane's face to wrap his hand around Shane's throat, tilting his head to deepen the angle. The other arm braced against the wall, caging Hollander in completely.

The taste of Hollander was overwhelming. Bitter coffee, a hint of spearmint, and something uniquely, essentially Shane, a dark, warm flavor that went straight to Ilya's head. Ilya smiled when he felt Shane's hands rise of their own volition, fists clutching in Ilya's hair, pulling him closer, or maybe he surged forward; the distinction melted away. The kiss deepened, turned wet and searching.

The quiet room was filled with the raw, intimate sounds of it: the slick, hot slide of mouths, the ragged pull of breath through noses, the soft, desperate whimpers Shane couldn't suppress. Ilya answered with a low groan from deep in his chest, a vibration Shane felt against their own. His body pressed Shane harder into the wall, the solid line of him from chest to thigh a brand of heat through their clothes.

Ilya could practically feel Hollander's emotions. Even over the scent suppressors, Ilya was drowning in Hollander's scent now, in the scent and the taste and the sheer rightness of it all. Their mind fogged, blissfully empty of everything but sensation.

Then, a sound. It was distant, the definitive ka-chunk of a door closing nearby. Maybe from the stairwell. Maybe from another room down the hall. It sliced through the haze like a shard of ice.

A bolt of pure, adrenal fear shot through Hollander's veins, freezing the fire in his blood. He tore his mouth away from Ilya's with a ragged, wet sound.

"Stop!"

The word was a broken whisper, shoved against Ilya's lips. Shane's hands, which had been clinging, now pushed weakly at his chest. The movement was frantic, bird-like.

Ilya stilled, but didn't pull back. His forehead rested against Hollander's, his breath coming in harsh, hot gusts that fanned over their wet, swollen lips. His eyes were heavy-lidded, dark with a hunger that was far from sated. "Hollander," he murmured, voice gravelly and thick.

"Someone," Shane gasped, their own voice trembling. They strained to listen, their body rigid with panic. The silence now felt predatory, listening back. "I heard a door."

The spell shattered. Ilya's eyes cleared, sharpening from lust to alertness. He pulled back, just an inch, his head turning to listen for any continuing sound. His jaw was tight, the muscles working. The loss of his heat was immediate and profound.

For a long, suspended moment, they stayed there, frozen in the aftermath. Shane's heart hammered against his ribs, a frantic drumbeat of fear and lingering desire. His lips felt bruised, sensitive, throbbing with the ghost of the kiss. Ilya looked back at them, his gaze dropping to his mouth, and Shane saw the conflict warring in him -the urge to reclaim what was interrupted, warring with the cold logic of the risk.

Slowly, with obvious effort, Ilya uncurled his fingers from Shane's hair. His arm lowered from the wall. He took a full step back, putting a foot of devastating distance between them. The space felt like a chasm.

The only sound was their labored breathing, slowly beginning to steady.

Shane slid down the wall an inch, his legs weak. He couldn't meet Ilya's eyes. He stared at the floor.

"You were about to try to make me stay."

Correct.

"I can do both."

"No."

"Hollander."

"Rozanov."

"I flew here."

"Obviously you asshole. You flew here after I told you I had plans."

"You should reward effort."

"I just kissed you."

"Its not enough. I want you."

Shane rolled his eyes, but he was smiling now, and that made it worse. "I'm not canceling plans with my teammates because you decided to ignore me and show up anyway."

"I can get better tickets."

"That is not the point."

"I can buy theater."

"You cannot buy the theater."

"Probably I can."

“Oh my god.”

Ilya moved closer, testing. Slowly enough that Hollander saw it coming. He let him, which felt like permission, so Ilya took another step until he could feel the warmth of him.

“Stay,” Ilya said quietly.

Shane’s expression flickered.

Want. Irritation. Resolve. “No.”

“You want to.”

“Yeah,” Shane admitted, and the honesty hit harder than refusal. “But I’m still going.”

Ilya hated that. He also liked it. That was new. “You are cruel. I need you, Hollander.” Ilya said, pulling Hollander so they’re hips met again.

“You’ll survive.”

“Barely.”

“You’re such an asshole.”

“I have feelings.”

Shane lifted an eyebrow.

“Do you?”

“For you. Bored ones.”

That stopped him. The teasing softened around the edges.

Shane looked at him for a long second before reaching up and fixing the collar of Ilya’s coat, a gesture so small and domestic that Ilya nearly forgot how to breathe.

“I’ll call you after,” Shane said softly.

“Come after.”

“Maybe.”

“Hollander.”

“I’ll call,” Shane repeated, firmer now. “And maybe after, if it’s not too late. But I’m going.”

Ilya stared at him.

Everything in him wanted to push. Complain. Seduce. Convince. He could. He knew that. Hollander wanted him. It was there in his face, in the way he kept glancing at Ilya’s mouth, in the way his hand lingered on his coat.

But the book had been annoyingly clear: Choice. Care without erasing choice.

He exhaled through his nose.

“Fine.”

Shane smiled.

“Was that painful?”

“Yes.”

“Good.”

Ilya grabbed him then, just enough to pull him into one more kiss. Shane made a startled noise but kissed him back immediately, hands briefly fisting in the front of his coat. This one was longer. Hotter. Enough that when Shane pulled away, his mouth looked soft and his eyes had darkened.

“Mean,” Ilya murmured.

“You’ll live.”

“Call me.”

“I said I would.”

“After show.”

“Yes.”

“Not after drinks.”

Shane narrowed his eyes.

“I’m hanging up on you later just for that.”

“You will not.”

“I might.”

“No.”

Ilya kissed him once more, quick and smug, then he watched as Hollander slipped out of his hold. He grabbed his jacket, checked his phone, and walked toward the door.

At the threshold, he looked back.

“Try not to break into anything while I’m gone.”

“No promises.”

“Rozanov.”

“I will try.”

“Good enough.”

Then he left.

Ilya stood in the hotel room alone, listening to the door click shut, irritated, amused, and deeply unwilling to examine the warmth settling inside him.

He had flown to New York.

Shane had said no.

And still kissed him before leaving.

Interesting.

Very interesting.

Maybe, Ilya thought, sitting down on Shane’s bed like he belonged there, this was what being chosen felt like.

Not obedience. Not surrender, something better.

The cold hit Shane immediately the second he stepped outside the hotel.

New York in winter felt different from Montreal. Wetter somehow. The city moved too fast even at night, headlights smearing gold across damp streets while people rushed by wrapped in coats and scarves, shoulders tucked against the wind.

Hayden was already waiting near the curb with two of the defensemen from the team.

“There he is,” Hayden said dramatically the second Shane approached. “Thought you might have been kidnapped.”

Shane nearly tripped.

“Shut up, I’m not late.”

“Right,” Hayden said dryly.

One of the defensemen snorted.

“You’ve been weird lately,” another added. “Way less miserable.”

“I’m not miserable.”

“Your world is hockey,” Hayden said immediately. “I’m surprised you even agreed to come out with us tonight.”

Shane rolled his eyes hard enough to hurt. “Can we just go?”

“Touchy,” Hayden muttered.

Shane ignored him.

Mostly because he could still feel Rozanov’s mouth on his. That was the problem.

No matter how stubborn Shane tried to be, no matter how much he reminded himself that Rozanov was difficult, possessive, occasionally terrifying, and objectively too intense for any reasonable person, his body still hummed faintly from the kiss. From the weight of him. From the ridiculous fact that Rozanov had flown to another city just because Shane said no.

Completely insane behavior. Completely unfair behavior. Also, if Shane was being painfully honest with himself, embarrassingly flattering.

The theater itself was beautiful in that New York way, all velvet and gold trim and soft lights reflecting against polished surfaces. Tourists crowded the lobby taking photos while theater staff moved people efficiently toward seats.

Hayden held up the playbill dramatically.

“Culture,” he announced.

“You cried during The Lion King,” Shane reminded him.

“That was emotional!.”

“You cried during Frozen too.”

“There were family themes!”

Shane laughed despite himself, settling into his seat while people slowly filtered in around them.

His phone buzzed.

IGR: You survive theater?

Shane immediately smiled before he could stop himself.

S: Barely. Hayden is already embarrassing me.

IGR: Good.

S: You're supposed to defend me.

IGR: No. You could be in bed with me right now.

Shane shook his head.

S: Are you seriously just sitting in my hotel room?

Long pause.

IGR: Maybe.

Shane narrowed his eyes.

S: Rozanov.

IGR: Watching television.

S: What television.

IGR: Bad cooking competition. Shane stared at the screen, then burst out laughing quietly.

Hayden looked over suspiciously. "Oh my god," he said slowly. "It is someone."

"No."

"That smile says yes."

Shane shoved the phone in his pocket immediately. "Shut up."

Hayden gasped dramatically.

"Oh my god. You like someone."

"No, I don't."

"You absolutely do."

The lights dimmed before Shane could argue, thankfully. Because he genuinely didn't know what to say to that.

The show started.

And unfortunately for Shane, Hadestown was really good.

Painfully good. The music settled somewhere under his skin almost immediately, haunting and beautiful in a way he had not expected. By the middle of the first act, Shane found himself leaning forward despite himself.

Loving someone enough to follow them somewhere dangerous. Loving someone enough to risk losing them. Loving someone and still being terrified they would turn around and disappear.

By intermission Shane felt strangely unsettled.

“You okay?” Hayden asked, eyeing him.

“Fine.”

“That didn’t sound fine.”

Shane exhaled.

“I just...” He rubbed at the back of his neck. “It’s sad.”

Hayden blinked slowly.

“You’re emotional over a play?”

“I’m not emotional.”

“You absolutely are.”

Shane ignored him and checked his phone instead.

Three unread messages.

IGR: Did boring thing start?

IGR: You alive?

Then:

IGR: Miss you.

Shane stared at that last one too long.

God.

He really was in trouble.

S: Intermission.

Reply instantly.

IGR: You survive.

S: It's actually good.

IGR: Impossible.

S: Its an interesting play.

Pause. Then:

S: I miss you too.

The typing bubble appeared immediately.

Stopped.

Appeared again.

IGR: Come to my room after. I got better hotel room for us.

Something warm settled low in Shane's chest. Not pressure. It didn't sound like a demand exactly.

Just wanting. And maybe that was the dangerous part. Because despite how messy and complicated they still were, Shane wanted to go back. Wanted to see him again, wanted another kiss. Wanted-

"You're smiling again," Hayden said flatly.

Shane nearly jumped.

"Oh my god," Hayden whispered like he'd witnessed a crime. "You're down horrendous."

"Shut up."

"You're gone."

"I'm literally sitting here."

"Not mentally."

Shane rolled his eyes and shoved his shoulder. The second half of the show passed slowly.

By the end, Shane sat unusually quiet while applause thundered through the theater. The ending sat heavy in his chest. Thoughts about love tangled up with fear. People hurting each other while trying desperately not to. People wanting too much and not enough at the same time.

The group filtered out into the freezing air afterward, everyone talking over each other about favorite songs and scenes.

Hayden bumped Shane lightly.

“So,” he said casually. “You disappearing tonight?” Shane looked over too quickly.

Hayden immediately pointed. “Oh my god.”

“Shut up.”

“It is serious.”

“You’re leaving.”

Shane hesitated. Then sighed. “...Maybe.”

Hayden grinned. “Wow.”

“Don’t make it weird.”

“You’re literally made heart eyes at your phone.”

“I did not.”

“You absolutely did.”

Shane ignored him. Mostly because his phone had buzzed again.

IGR: Finished?

S: Yeah.

IGR: Come back.

The simplicity of it made something in Shane soften.

Not Come now.

Not I’m waiting.

Just: Come back.

And Shane wanted to. Really wanted to.

Not because Ilya had pushed. Not because he felt guilty. Not because he was afraid of upsetting him. Because he missed him already. Which was ridiculous considering they had literally seen each other an hour ago.

S: Leaving now.

The reply came instantly.

IGR: Good.

Then:

IGR: I ordered food.

Shane blinked. S: What kind?

IGR: Food you actually eat.

Shane narrowed his eyes suspiciously.

S: That sounds threatening.

IGR: Protein.

S: Oh my god.

IGR: Small omega needs food.

Shane smiled helplessly.

And for maybe the first time, the decision felt entirely his.

Not surrender. Not giving in. Just... choosing. Which somehow felt scarier than anything else.

“Heading up. Dead on my feet,” Shane muttered to no one in particular, already turning toward the elevators.

A teammate clapped them on the shoulder. “C’mon man, we’re having beers before turning in.”

“Na man, thanks but I’m beat.” Shane lied, pressing the button for the twelfth floor.

The silence of the ascending car was a vacuum. Their reflection in the brass doors looked haunted, eyes too bright, the adrenaline of the game now a toxic, jittery static in their veins. The text burned in their mind.

Room 1217 had read the text. The keycard was under the mat. A silent, illicit permission. Shane swiped it, the green light flashing, and pushed inside.

The room was dark, cool, and smelled of sandalwood and Ilya's usual leather and pine smell and something rich - garlic, rosemary, seared meat. A room service cart sat by the window, silver domes covering plates, a bottle of red wine already breathing beside two glasses. Soft lamp light pooled on the bedside table.

Ilya wasn't there.

Shane stood just inside the door, taking off his shoes, he noticed his duffle bag by the closet door.

From behind the closed bathroom door, a new sound began: the rush of water into a tub. A long, pouring stream. Steam began to curl from the gap at the bottom of the door.

The sound was intimate, obscenely domestic in this clandestine space. It spoke of intention, of time, of a slow unraveling they had both been hurtling toward since the first check into the boards.

The water stopped. Silence, thick and heavy.

The bathroom door opened.

Rozanov stood in the frame, backlit by the soft, steam-hazed light. He was stripped down to a pair of black boxer briefs that clung to the heavy muscle of his thighs and the clear, thick outline of his arousal.

He moved slowly, shrugging off his jacket. He was on high alert when Ilya walked back into the room, shirtless of course. Rozanov pulled out a chair for Shane. He blushed as he walked over and sat down. They lifted the domes. Steak, frites, asparagus. Perfectly cooked. Shane's stomach clenched, but not with hunger. Ilya poured a glass of wine for each of them.

He didn't speak. They ate quickly, not saying much. His eyes, blue and unreadable, tracked from Shane's face to the full glass in their hand, to their still-clothed body. He jerked his head, a single nod toward the bathroom.

"Come on."

His voice was hoarse. Used.

Shane set the glass down. The clink against the table was deafening. They walked past him, into the wall of humid, perfumed air. The bath was deep, overflowing with bubbles. A few candles flickered on the wide ledge.

Shane felt Rozanov behind him, a solid wall of heat. Rozanov's hands came to his hips, then up, under the hem of his shirt. His fingers were hot, slightly rough. He peeled the fabric up and over his head, tossing it aside without a glance. His thumbs hooked into the waistband of his jeans and boxers, pushing them down in one firm, efficient motion. Shane stepped out of the puddle of clothes, naked, shivering despite the heat.

Rozanov's hands returned, sliding possessively over his ribs, his stomach, pulling them back against his bare chest. His mouth found the juncture of Shane's neck and shoulder. He didn't kiss it. He bit lightly, over the bite guard. The feeling was dulled but Shane still felt it- the claiming pressure that made Shane gasp and arch back into him. A low rumble vibrated against their spine.

"In," he ordered, his voice muffled against their skin.

Shane climbed into the scalding water, sinking down until it lapped at his collarbones. The heat was a shock, a seeping relief into aching muscles. A moment later, Rozanov stepped in opposite him, his body a landscape of defined muscle and fading bruises beneath the water. The tub was large, but not large enough. Their legs tangled immediately, his foot sliding between Rozanov's calves.

For long minutes, there was only the quiet slap of water, the crackle of candles. Rozanov watched him, his gaze a physical weight. He reached out, took the bar of soap, and began to lather his hands. The ritual was deliberate, slow.

"Turn around," he said.

Shane obeyed, presenting his back. His soap-slick hands landed on their shoulders, and the breath left Shane's body in a rush. It wasn't a massage. It was a reclamation. His thumbs dug into the knots left by checks and falls, his palms spread the lather in broad, firm strokes down the line of Shane's spine, over the curve of his ass. Rozanov washed him with a thorough intensity that was more devastating than any caress. He washed his arms, his neck, the backs of his thighs. Each pass of his hands stripped away not just the grime of the day, but the last pretense of why they were here.

When he was done, Rozanov pulled Shane back against his chest, his arms locking around his stomach, holding him tight. His chin rested on his wet hair. His erection, thick and insistent, pressed against the small of Shane's back.

"My turn?" Shane whispered, the first words either had spoken in what felt like hours.

Ilya's arms loosened. Shane turned in the confined space, water sloshing over the rim. They took the soap, worked it into a lather, and began on his chest. His hands mapped the hard planes, the puckered scar along his ribs, the tight muscles of his abdomen. Their touch grew less clinical, fingers tracing, exploring. When their hand slid lower, beneath the water, over the hair below his belly button, Ilya seized his wrist.

"Enough," he growled. But he didn't push Shane's hand away. He held it there, pressed against him, letting Shane feel the full, daunting length of him. His eyes were dark, his control a visible, fraying thread. "You are forgetting something tonight."

“I know,” Shane breathed.

A harsh, ragged sound tore from Ilya’s throat. It was triumph and surrender. In one fluid, powerful motion, he stood, water sheeting off his body. He hooked his hands under Shane’s arms and hauled him up, out of the tub, dripping and gasping, onto the bath mat. He shoved the towels off the rack with a sweep of his arm and pushed Shane down onto the plush pile.

He followed them down, a cascade of water and heat. His body covered Shane’s completely, skin to skin, steam rising between them. The air was gone. There was only his weight, his smell, the desperate, searching crush of his mouth.

“You’re sure?” he demanded against their lips, his voice shattered. His hand was between them, guiding himself, the broad, slick head pressing against Shane’s entrance. The sensation was blinding, a promise of ruin.

“Yes,” Shane choked out, spreading their legs wider, arching up. “Rozanov, please.”

He drove into him in one relentless, claiming stroke.

The cry Shane let out was guttural, torn from a place deeper than pain or pleasure. It was a release of every tense moment, every stolen glance. Ilya swallowed the sound with his kiss, his hips beginning a punishing, deep rhythm that shoved Shane up the mat with every thrust. The world dissolved into wet heat and friction, the slap of skin, the ragged symphony of their breathing.

Ilya fucked him with the same focused intensity he played hockey- all power, strategy, and relentless drive. He braced himself on one arm, the other hand fisting in Shane’s hair, angling their face to his, forcing the omega to watch him, to see the naked, hungry possession in his eyes.

“Mine,” he grunted, each word punctuated by a deep, rolling thrust. “You’re mine now. Everyone will see it soon.”

Shane could only clutch at his back, nails digging in, legs locked around his hips, meeting every drive with a desperate lift of his own. The pleasure was a coil, winding tighter and tighter, a white-hot wire of need centered where their bodies joined. They were babbling, half-formed words, his name, curses.

Ilya's rhythm began to falter, growing more erratic, deeper, more possessive. A new, swelling pressure began to build at the heart of each thrust, a stretching, profound fullness that made Shane's eyes fly open.

Ilya saw their realization. His face was a mask of agonized ecstasy, sweat and water dripping from his brow. "Fuck...fuck, Hollander, I'm-" His voice broke. He was trying to pull back, to retreat, to stop the inevitable biological crest, but his body was betraying him, seeking the deepest possible claim.

The first thick, pulsing release of his orgasm triggered Shane's. They came with a shattered cry, vision whiting out, body clamping down around him in rhythmic, vice-like waves. That seemed to destroy the last of Ilya's control. With a groan that was pure defeat and triumph, he buried himself to the hilt and pushed forward one last, impossible fraction.

The knot.

It swelled, locked, tied them together in a searing, exquisite stretch. Ilya collapsed onto him, his full weight a final anchor, his face buried in the damp mess of Shane's hair. They were fused, pulsing, utterly joined. Every slight, involuntary throb from him sent a corresponding shockwave through Shane's oversensitive nerves.

For long minutes, there was only the sound of their struggling breath and the distant drip of the faucet. The candles guttered. The steam began to clear.

Slowly, Ilya lifted his head. He looked dazed, wrecked, his eyes soft in a way Shane had never seen. He brushed a thumb over Shane's bitten, swollen lips.

“You forgot the condom,” he repeated, his voice wrecked and wondrous. A slow, devastating smile touched his mouth. “Good.”

He lowered his head again, settling in to wait, holding them through the long, binding minutes of their bodies’ unwillingness to part, in the cooling damp of the bathroom floor. The game was over. Something else, vast and uncharted, had just begun.

A slow, deep blush warmed Shane’s cheeks, visible even in the dim light. The intensity of Ilya’s gaze, the possessiveness in his voice, combined with the inescapable, intimate fullness of their joining, made the admission feel more vulnerable than the act itself.

“I’m on... it’s a better birth control,” Shane murmured, the words muffled against Ilya’s damp shoulder. “A stronger pill. So. We didn’t... we wouldn’t need them.”

The confession hung in the steamy air. It wasn’t an excuse. Ilya was disappointed, but it also made him internally smile. This was Hollander making a statement of fact that carried the weight of a thousand unspoken implications: I thought about this. I planned for this possibility. I made sure nothing would stop this.

Ilya went very still above him. Then, a shuddering breath racked his frame, and he pressed his forehead to Shane’s, his eyes closed. The knot, still holding them fast, gave a subtle, possessive pulse. “Clever,” he whispered, the word thick with a stunned, reverent heat. “Fucking clever, Hollander.”

They stayed locked together until the insistent swell finally began to soften and subside, a slow, tender unraveling that was its own kind of intimacy. Ilya was careful, so careful, as he finally withdrew, a low, sensitive whimper catching in Hollander’s throat at the loss.

He didn’t go far. Rising on shaky legs, Ilya fetched a clean washcloth, ran it under warm water, and returned to kneel beside Shane on the soaked bath mat. His touch, which had been all demand and possession minutes before, was now infinitely gentle. He cleaned Shane with a focused, tender thoroughness, wiping away the evidence of their joining from trembling thighs and stomach. His eyes were dark, observant, tracing every shiver, every flutter of Hollander’s lashes.

Shane floated in a warm, weightless haze. The sharp edges of the world were blissfully blurred. The fear, the constant alertness, the constant calculation- all of it had been burned away in the crucible of sensation, leaving him soft and pliant and quietly yearning. Shane watched Ilya's face, the fierce concentration in his brow as he tended to him, and a small, trusting sound escaped his lips.

Ilya's gaze snapped to Shane's. He saw it- the unfocused eyes, the profound relaxation, the utter surrender not just of body but of will. Hovering on the blissful edge of subspace. A new, different kind of possessiveness, fiercely protective, settled in Ilya's chest.

"Come here," he said, his voice a low rumble. He tossed the cloth aside, slid his arms under Shane's back and knees, and lifted him as if they weighed nothing. Shane's head lolled against his shoulder, a sigh ghosting over his damp skin.

He carried them into the bedroom, laying Hollander gently in the center of the cool sheets. The moment their back touched the mattress, he turned instinctively, seeking. His arms and legs wound around Ilya as he stretched out beside them, clinging with a sudden, frantic strength. A violent, uncontrollable shiver wracked Shane's entire frame, then another, a cascade of tremors born from crashing adrenaline, emotional overload, and the deep, vulnerable drop after an intense submission.

Ilya reacted on pure instinct. He gathered Shane closer, wrapping him up completely, tucking Shane's head under his chin. One big hand splayed across the shivering plane of Shane's back, holding him firmly, securely. The other came up to cradle the back of his head, fingers threading into the damp black hair.

"Shhh," he murmured into the crown of their head, his voice a vibration against Shane's skin. "I've got you. I'm here. Just breathe. Follow me." He took an exaggerated, deep breath, letting his own chest expand against Shane's, willing them to sync. He began to rub slow, firm circles on his back, a grounding, constant pressure. "That's it. Easy. You're safe. You're with me."

He didn't use many words. He used his body as a shelter, his touch as an anchor. He held Shane through the storm of tremors, his own presence a steady, unmoving rock. Gradually, the frantic shivering subsided into occasional trembles, then into deep, exhausted sighs. The desperate cling of Shane's limbs softened into a heavy, boneless drape.

Ilya felt the exact moment Shane slipped over the edge into sleep. The last vestige of tension melted away, their breathing deepening into a slow, even rhythm against his neck. A profound, quiet smile touched Ilya's lips in the darkness. He'd done that. He'd wound the smaller omega up to the breaking point and then, instinctively, known how to piece him back together into peace.

His gaze drifted down Shane's sleeping form. In the faint light from the bathroom, he saw the small, neutral transparent patches adhered to the delicate skin of his inner thigh and the side of his neck. The disgusting scent suppressors.

Holding Shane securely with one arm, he reached down with the other. With careful, deliberate fingers, he peeled the patch from Shane's thigh, then the one from his neck. He lifted them to his face, the adhesive side faintly gleaming.

He inhaled, deeply.

The clean, chemical smell of the patch gave way, and beneath it, unfiltered and true, was Shane. The scent was a complex, beautiful shock-crisp honeysuckle and underneath, a warm, sweet note of vanilla and the barest, tantalizing hint of something earthy and rich. It was the scent of the competitor who challenged him, and the vulnerable person who trusted him enough to fall apart in his arms.

Ilya closed his eyes, committing it to memory. He let the patches fall to the floor, unimportant now. He buried his nose against the warm skin of Shane's neck, breathing him in, surrounding himself in the truth of them. With his rival-turned-lover asleep and utterly secure in his embrace, Ilya finally allowed himself to relax, a deep, satisfied contentment settling in his bones as he held onto what, against all odds, was now unquestionably his.

Chapter End Notes

Well. 😊

Ilya read one omega book and immediately decided the solution was apparently financial crimes, emotional support, and stalking with feelings. Progress? Maybe?

Also yes, Hadestown was chosen on purpose. If you know, you know. 🙄

Curious where everyone stands right now:

Are we proud of Ilya for attempting growth or are we proud of Shane starting to stand his ground and going out with his friends even though Ilya came looking all hot and everything?

Or are we side-eyeing him because this man somehow made “flying to another city after being told no” seem romantic?

And most importantly... are we worried about how long these two can stay relatively stable before disaster strikes again?

Next chapter: more time together, more feelings, more problems, and unfortunately for Shane, Rozanov continues to believe boundaries are merely suggestions.

Chapter 14: Chapter 14

Chapter Summary

Some of you guys are REALLY not going to like this chapter, but it's in my outline. Trigger is dubious consent for this chapter because Ilya is 2 steps forward, 5 steps back. So is Shane to a certain point, but this wasn't the easiest to write and there's only one or two more crazy over the top moments for Ilya left I think if I follow the outline.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The first grey light of dawn was just etching the outlines of the windows when Ilya awoke. Shane was a warm, solid weight against his side, one arm flung across Ilya's chest, breathing deep and even. The scent of them mixed together- honeysuckle and leather and pine, filled the space, a balm to the hollow ache that had plagued him the night before when Hollander had fallen asleep. He turned his head, watching the slow rise and fall of Shane's ribs, the peaceful slackness of his face.

A fierce, quiet possessiveness rose in him, swift and undeniable. He wanted to claim this peace, to mark this soft, trusting vulnerability as his own doing.

He moved with the silent, deliberate grace of a hunter. Sliding down the bed, he pushed the sheets aside. The morning air was cool on Shane's bare skin, and he murmured, shifting slightly in his sleep. Ilya bent his head.

The first touch of his mouth was a ghost of pressure, a soft, worshipping kiss against the sensitive skin of Shane's inner thigh. Then another, higher. Shane's breathing hitched, a soft, confused sigh escaping his lips. Ilya didn't rush. He mapped the territory with his lips and tongue, gentle, teasing, until he felt the first stirring of interest against his cheek.

Only then did he take Shane fully into the wet, consuming heat of his mouth.

Shane woke not with a start, but with a slow, deep groan that seemed to be pulled from the roots of his soul. His hips twitched, a helpless little thrust into the sensation. "Roz...?" His voice was thick with sleep and instant, dizzying pleasure.

Ilya hummed in response, the vibration earning him a sharp gasp and a hand that fumbled down to tangle in his hair. Not pushing, not guiding, just holding on. Ilya worked him with a relentless, devoted focus, using his tongue, his throat, until Shane was trembling, his breaths coming in short, punched out whimpers, his heels digging into the mattress. Ilya could taste the precum- clean and sharp, and he drank it down, wanting every part of him.

Just as Shane's thighs began to tense, a broken warning on his lips, Ilya pulled back with a wet, obscene sound.

Shane cried out at the loss, his eyes flying open, dazed and desperate. "Please--"

"I know," Ilya growled, surging up over him. He kissed Shane, deep and filthy, letting him taste himself on Ilya's tongue. He positioned himself with a single, rough adjustment, and then he was pushing back inside, into the warm, clinging heat that was still loose and pliant from the night before.

This was different. Not the frantic claiming of the bath, but something deeper, more rhythmic and intent. He braced his weight on his forearms, caging Shane's head, and set a pace that was less about friction and more about depth, each slow, rolling thrust a deliberate search for the very core of him. He watched every flicker of feeling on Shane's face- the fluttering eyelids, the bitten-red lips parting on silent cries, the sheer, overwhelming acceptance.

"Mine," Ilya chanted against his mouth, the word a prayer and a command with every drive of his hips. "You feel that? You're mine, Hollander. Every part. Mine."

Shane could only nod, his legs locking around Ilya's back, his body arching to take him deeper, tears of overstimulation and bliss leaking from the corners of his eyes. The climb was slower, more immense, a tidal wave building in the deep. When it broke, it broke them both simultaneously. Shane's orgasm was a silent, seizing thing, his body clamping down in a series of endless, rhythmic pulses that milked Ilya's own release from him- a hot, flooding rush that seemed to have no end.

Ilya collapsed, spent, burying his face in Shane's neck as they both shuddered through the aftershocks. For a moment, there was only the sound of their ragged breathing.

Then, moving with a tenderness that belied the fierce possession of moments before, Ilya slid a hand between their still joined bodies before pulling out. He gathered the warm, slick evidence of his release as it began to seep out, and with a gentle, insistent pressure of his fingers, he pushed it back inside.

Shane jolted, a soft, overwhelmed sound catching in his throat. The intimacy of the act, the profound vulnerability of it, was the final key. Ilya watched as Shane's eyes, which had been hazy with pleasure, went completely soft and unfocused. The tension left his body all at once, leaving him boneless and pliant, floating somewhere far away. Subspace.

Ilya carefully withdrew fully, his heart pounding with a reverence that felt like fear. He shifted down the bed, laying his head gently on the flat plane of Shane's lower belly, his ear pressed to the skin. He closed his eyes.

The words that came were in the rough, guttural Russian of his grandmother, whispered into the warmth of Shane's skin, a secret for the darkness.

"Bozhe, Mama, sokhrani i zashchiti... Day kornyam vzyat'sya zdes', v etoy tishine. Pust' semya naydyot pochvu. Pust' ono uderzhitsya. Ya budu berech'. Ya budu okhranyat'. Pust' on dast mne eto "

God, Mama preserve and protect... Let roots take hold here, in this quiet. Let the seed find soil. Let it hold. I will cherish. I will guard. Make him give me this...

He knew the chances were astronomically low. The birth control Shane had mentioned must have been good. But hope, especially this desperate, secret kind, was a stubborn weed. He prayed to a god he rarely acknowledged for a miracle he had no right to ask for.

A tremor ran through Shane's body, then another - the delicate beginnings of the crash. Ilya's head snapped up. He saw the first tears slip free, the shivers starting in the slender hands.

Instantly, the prayer was forgotten. The alpha was gone; only the caretaker remained. He moved up the bed in one fluid motion, gathering Shane against him, pulling the blankets up around them both. He wrapped himself around the trembling form, skin to skin, a living shield.

"Shhh, moy zaychik, I have you," he murmured, his voice a low, constant rumble in his chest. He rocked them gently, his hands smoothing over Shane's back, his hair. "You are so good. So perfect. You let me have everything. I have you now. You're safe." He kissed the tears from Shane's cheeks, his temple, whispering praise and reassurance until the shivers subsided into exhaustion, and Shane lay heavy and quiet in his arms, utterly spent and trusting.

When the room was fully light, Ilya nudged him gently. "Shower. Then food."

They moved together under the hot spray, a quiet, domestic ritual. Ilya washed Shane's hair, his hands gentle on his scalp, and Shane leaned back against his chest, eyes closed. They traded the soap in silence, cleaning each other with a focus that was its own form of communication. For a few stolen minutes, the world was just steam and touch and shared warmth.

Then, from the bedroom, the first alarm blared, a harsh, electronic, relentless noise. A moment later, Shane's phone joined in.

The spell shattered.

Time, which had been suspended, came rushing back in a cold flood. Ilya reached out and shut off the water. The silence that followed was filled with the impending weight of separation, of public faces, of the world waiting outside the door that demanded they be rivals again.

The silence after the alarms was heavier than any check into the boards. They dressed in a wordless, efficient ballet, pulling on the uniforms of their public lives: jeans, hoodies, baseball caps pulled low. The intimate scent of each other was slowly buried under deodorant and the sterile, blanketing smell of fresh fabric.

Ilya watched Shane zip his duffel, his movements precise, his face carefully neutral. The omega from the bath, from the bed - pliant, trusting, his- was receding, replaced by Hollander, the formidable center of his team. It felt like a theft happening in broad daylight.

“Your flight is at noon?” Shane asked, not looking up.

“Da. Yours at one?”

A nod. More silence. The charged air between them crackled with everything unsaid: the whispered prayer, the upcoming three empty months, the terrifying possibility of change.

Ilya watched as Shane pulled out a small toiletry case and followed him back to the bathroom, watching the smaller man take out a few pills and a pair of sealed suppressants. Ilya couldn't stand it. He crossed the room in two strides, cupping Shane's face and forcing his gaze up. The eye contact was a shock, a lightning bolt of pure, unguarded feeling. Shane's carefully constructed mask wavered, his eyes swimming with a vulnerability that made Ilya's chest ache.

Ilya buried his nose right over the scent gland at the base of Shane's neck, inhaling the addicted scent one last time before it was masked and they separated. He took the patch out of Shane's hand and carefully applied it for him. “Two?”

Shane nodded nervously. “Precaution. I put the second one on my back.”

Ilya nodded, remembering from before. I put the second patch on Shane's spine then turned and slapped one of his own from his bag over his own neck.

“You will call,” Ilya stated, his thumb stroking the apple of Shane's cheek. “When you can. I will call you. No games.”

“The time difference. And your family...”

“I do not care. I will find a way.” He leaned in, pressing a hard, possessive kiss to Shane's mouth, not of passion but of branding. A seal. “You are mine. Across an ocean, you are mine. Remember that. No matter what.”

Shane's breath hitched. “Yours,” he whispered back, the word a sacred vow in the morning light.

The rideshare notification chimed on Ilya's phone - a cruel reminder that they were to be separated. Ilya's ride was five minutes away.

They walked to the door, both of their duffels over Ilya's shoulder, the ghosts of their night trailing behind them. Ilya stopped, turning Shane to face him one last time. He didn't kiss him again. Instead, he pulled him into a crushing embrace, his face buried in the scent-suppressed hollow of Shane's neck, inhaling deeply, trying to memorize a scent that was already being chemically muted. Shane clung back just as fiercely, fingers digging into Ilya's back.

“Be safe, zayka.” Ilya murmured, the endearment rough with emotion.

“You too.”

He pulled back, his hands sliding down Shane's arms to his wrists, holding on until the last possible second. Then, with a final, searing look that promised everything and feared everything, he turned and walked down the hall toward the elevator. He didn't look back. He couldn't.

Shane stood frozen at the door, watching the elevator doors swallow him whole. The emptiness that flooded the space was instant and absolute, a physical coldness. He wrapped his arms around himself.

Five minutes later, his own phone buzzed. His car was half hour away. The silence rushed in to fill the space Ilya's presence had occupied. It was a different quiet now- hollow, ringing with absence.

Shane stood there for a long moment, his bag ready by the door. The practical part of his brain, the part that always had a checklist, flickered on. Check the room. Don't leave anything.

He moved mechanically. He looked in the bathroom- no toothbrushes, no forgotten razors. Just damp towels and the ghost of steam. He checked the nightstand, the desk. Nothing.

His gaze landed on the bed. The sheets were a tangled monument to the night. His cheeks flushed hot, a wave of embarrassment that was entirely at odds with the acts themselves. He could still feel the press of the linens against his back, his shoulders. With quick, efficient tugs, he stripped it, bundling the evidence into a heap on the floor. I should leave extra money for housekeeping, he reminded himself, the thought a pathetic attempt at normalcy.

As he turned, his eyes caught the small, metal trash bin by the desk. It was empty. Clean. A fresh liner gleamed inside. It was that sterile emptiness that finally undid him. The memory slammed into him, vivid and sensory: the heat of the bath, the impossible fullness, his own voice muffled against Ilya's skin. "I'm on... a better birth control." He'd told the truth. Ilya was clean; the league had players tested constantly.

But as he stared at the empty bin where no wrapper lay, the real, shameful truth he hadn't voiced rose up like a flood. He hadn't just forgotten a condom. Some deep, hidden part of him had wanted its absence. He had wanted, with a craven, desperate hope that terrified him, for there to be a chance. However infinitesimal. A one-in-a-million defiance of medicine and reason.

The fantasy unfolded in his mind, swift and devastating: a positive test. Ilya's stunned, reverent face. A swell under his hand that was part of them both. A family. A name. A tiny, screaming, perfect reason that would fuse them into a single, unbreakable unit- Shane and Ilya- forever. Something bigger than hockey, bigger than rivalry, bigger than their own damaged selves.

He sat down heavily on the bare mattress, the cool plastic cover sticking to his jeans. He let himself fall back, staring at the ceiling. The fantasy was so beautiful it felt like a heart attack. Then, he got control of himself.

Insane. Irresponsible. Reckless. You're an athlete. He's going to Russia. It's a chemical impossibility right now. You're losing your mind. It would be the biggest mistake of your life.

The self-recrimination was a whip. He sat bolt upright, his breath short. This wasn't him. This was the scent in the room, their scent, layered and primal beneath everything -messing with his biology, twisting his logic into primitive, yearning knots.

He couldn't stay here. The four walls were saturated with the feeling, pressing in on him. He snatched up his bag, shouldered it, and cast one last, frantic look around the room that had shifted from a secret paradise to a chamber of terrifying revelations.

Then he fled, pulling the door shut behind him on the empty bin and the naked bed, trying to outrun the wild, hopeless want that had taken root in the silence.

Two months later Montreal was out for the rest of the season. Boston had been annoyingly good all year. Consistently good. The kind of team Shane hated playing because they never really seemed rattled no matter what happened. Down two goals? Fine. Overtime? Fine. Back-to-backs? Somehow still fine. They played like a team that expected things to eventually go their way, and worse, more often than not, they were right.

Then captain Elias Mercer got hurt. The replay spread across hockey media within an hour.

Florida game. Third period. Mercer dropping to one knee after blocking a shot near the crease, his jaw visibly tightening before trainers rushed the ice. The veteran defensemen didn't stay down unless something genuinely hurt. Shane knew that immediately. Everybody did.

The MRI results came three days later. Torn labrum, officially season-ending. The hockey world reacted like Boston's playoff chances had died overnight.

Mercer had worn the "C" for five years. Quiet leadership. Defensive backbone. One of those captains players naturally followed without much effort because he never really asked for attention, just consistency. Analysts suddenly flooded sports shows talking about Boston collapsing under playoff pressure without veteran leadership.

Apparently, nobody accounted for the fact that Boston's second biggest problem already lived in the locker room. Shane found out about the captaincy through social media. At first he genuinely thought it was fake. Then came the practice photos. Ilya standing at center ice in dark gear with the captain's "C" stitched against his chest. Expression unimpressed. Like leadership itself had personally inconvenienced him. Shane texted immediately.

S: Captain???

The response took eleven minutes. IGR: Temporary probably.

S: Since when.

IGR: Mercer says I yell at everyone already.

Shane snorted quietly to himself.

S: That is unfortunately true.

IGR: This is insult.

S: No. That means people listen to you.

Long pause.

Then: IGR: Mercer says same thing.

Shane could picture it too clearly: Mercer standing there, calm and practical, tossing responsibility toward the only player everyone would follow without hesitation. Because despite the terrifying personality, despite the intensity, despite the occasional inability to behave like a normal human being, people trusted Ilya when it mattered.

Probably because Ilya expected impossible things from himself before anyone else.

The leaked locker room speech happened before Tampa.

Nobody knew who posted it. Somebody inside the organization probably. Hockey locker rooms leaked eventually, especially during playoffs, but somehow this one exploded online immediately.

Shane watched it alone in his apartment after practice.

The camera quality looked terrible, secretly filmed from somewhere near the back of the room. Players sat half dressed, taping sticks or adjusting gear while nervous energy sat heavy in the air.

Then Ilya stood. Captain's "C" bright against dark gear from the jersey.

Tape wrapped around one hand. Expression sharp. "Alright," he said loudly. "Enough. Shut the fuck up."

The room quieted immediately. No hesitation. No resistance.

"You know what I tired of hearing?" he continued, crossing his arms. "Tampa this. Tampa that. Playoff experience."

An eye roll. "Congratulations." He shrugged. "They old." Laughter cracked through the room.

"No seriously. Half their knees probably sound like microwave popcorn." Even Mercer, sitting nearby in sweats with his shoulder strapped, laughed.

Good. The tension loosened. Then Ilya's expression sharpened again. "But listen." Silence. "I do not care what happened last game." A point toward the floor. "That is over."

"I do not care who scored. Who played like superstar." A pause. "Who played like complete idiot." Laughter again. "You know what matters?"

He pointed toward the tunnel. "Tonight. This building. Our fans. On our ice."

His voice dropped lower. "I do not want Game Seven in Tampa."

Immediate agreement echoed through the room. "Fuck that. I want them miserable on plane home. We send them crying back home to their mommies."

Sticks bang on the floor as the team got amped up. Then quieter.

More serious now. "You know what playoff hockey is?" Silence. "Not talent. Everybody talented."

He hit his chest once. "It this."

Then harder: "Deciding who willing suffer more."

The room went still. "You block shot. You skate when lungs hurt. You finish hit. You help teammate. You play for guy next to you."

Then, a grin. "And if somebody touches one of ours?"

Pause. "Make him regret having hands." The room exploded. Players yelling. Sticks slamming against the floor. Something electric settling over the space.

Boston beat Tampa in six. Then New York. Then Denver. And somehow, throughout all of it, Shane kept watching. Montreal didn't survive the first round.

The loss hurt more than Shane expected. The season had ended too quickly, too quietly, one week buried beneath playoff adrenaline and media obligations and the next sitting through locker cleanout interviews pretending disappointment felt manageable.

People kept saying rookie season like it was supposed to soften the loss.

Like success somehow made failure hurt less.

It didn't.

Still - Boston kept playing.

And somehow, despite himself, Shane found his nights quietly rearranging around game schedules.

Not because of Ilya. Obviously. Just hockey. Mostly.

The Stanley Cup Final was already being called a legendary game. Boston versus Edmonton.

Game Seven. Tied series. Everything on the line. Shane told himself he watched because it mattered. Because hockey mattered. Not because one particular player wore the captain's "C" now.

Definitely not because he was missing Rozanov and with his playing and practice schedule it was hard for them not to have more than a few minutes on the phone each day.

The third period happened.

And apparently Ilya Rozanov decided he needed to be the only player to watch.

First goal. Then another. Then a third with under ten minutes left.

A Hat trick during the final game. The Stanley Cup Final.

Three goals of Boston's four. The arena exploded.

Shane sat strangely still watching it happen. The jealousy hit first - sharp and ugly.

Because god, he wanted that too. Wanted the Cup. Wished it had been him. Wanted the impossible joy splashed across Ilya's face while teammates nearly tackled him into the glass.

Wanted- then the camera cut back to Ilya laughing. Actually laughing. Happy in that open, rare way Shane almost never saw. And suddenly pride settled over him bigger than jealousy.

Because Shane knew how hard he worked. Knew the impossible standards, the pressure.

Knew how badly Rozanov had wanted this. As Captain, Rozanov had gotten the trophy first, hoisting it up over his head while the rest of the team surrounded him. The ear splitting grin on his face still there, he was calling out something about his mother, Shane thought.

Eventually, after the celebration, cameras followed players taking laps around the ice with the Cup.

Confetti stuck damply against jerseys. Fans still screaming loud enough to shake the building. Then came Ilya back on screen for the interviews. He slowed near center ice, one hand resting against silver metal. For a second, he just stood there. Quiet, overwhelmed. Shane stayed still.

Something tightened painfully inside his chest. Because suddenly Shane could picture younger Ilya too clearly. Cold rinks, in Russia. Impossible expectations. Years of pressure, just like himself.

And somehow, despite everything difficult and complicated and overwhelming about him, Shane felt overwhelmingly proud.

Shane went to grab his phone, just in case Rozanov snuck away and was able to call him.

Two weeks later found Shane and Rozanov back in the same city finally for the NHL Awards. Shane felt out of sorts. Next season would be his third in the NHL had this one had rung him out to exhaustion. Which was ridiculous. He had played Olympic games. Sold-out arenas screaming loud enough to shake the ice. He should not have been pacing because he might see Ilya Rozanov in person after two months apart.

And yet. Here they were. Or rather - here Shane was.

Pacing. His mother noticed immediately. "You're nervous," Yuna said from the hotel sofa.

"No."

"You've checked your phone six times."

"I'm waiting for a text."

"Mhm."

Shane narrowed his eyes.

"What."

Yuna smiled.

"It's just unlike you to be nervous," she said quietly, "It's a 30 second blurb with Rozanov and you're nominated for the best awards."

Shane immediately looked away.

His phone buzzed.

IGR: Lobby.

Shane blinked.

Already?

The hotel lobby buzzed with players, media, executives, photographers.

He barely noticed any of it.

Because he saw him immediately. Of course he did. Ilya stood near one of the marble columns, hands in dark tailored slacks, jacket thrown casually over one shoulder.

Black suit.

No tie.

Looking devastatingly handsome. So completely unfair.

He looked older somehow after only a couple months. Sharper, more settled into himself. Then Ilya looked up and froze. Everything else disappeared. Because suddenly- there he was. Real, actually real. After months apart, they were within feet of each other. Not FaceTime, not phone calls.

He slowly made his way closer to Shane, casually while being stopped by others on the way. Shane quickly noticed his parents at the bar talking to some of the Voyageurs coaches.

“Hollander.”

“Hi to you too.”

“Hi.” Then quieter: “You cut hair.”

“It was too long.”

“Grow it back.”

“You don’t get a vote.”

“Yes I do.”

Shane rolled his eyes automatically. God, there it was. Easy. Familiar. Like nothing had changed. Like months apart somehow disappeared immediately.

“You look ridiculous,” Shane muttered.

“Handsome.”

“No.”

“Yes.”

Debatable, and somehow after months apart, it felt like nothing between them was tarnished.

If anything- It felt worse.

The awards ceremony itself turned out to be significantly more overwhelming than Shane expected. He hoped he didn’t embarrass himself reading the thank you speeches his mother had prepared for him. He tried to not stare to obviously at Rozanov when he was on stage with his team or alone while accepting his awards.

Too many cameras. Too many expensive suits. Too many executives pretending they had always believed in every player currently being celebrated. Everywhere Shane looked, somebody wanted something. Photos. Interviews. Handshakes. Soundbites.

And somehow, despite all of it, Shane remained painfully aware of one thing.

Ilya standing close to him during intermissions. Too close. He was thankful for the physical shields of Hayden, JJ, Carter and sometimes Scott because otherwise he feared he would have done something stupid.

Months apart apparently had done absolutely nothing to help with that. If anything, proximity somehow made everything worse. Because FaceTime lied. FaceTime did not properly account for presence. Did not account for how broad Ilya had gotten over the season. How his eyes glowed, not just blue but more teal sometimes in some lights. Did not capture how much sharper his features looked after playoffs, or the way confidence sat differently on him now after captaincy and winning the Stanley Cup. It definitely did not account for the stupid warmth radiating off him every time they stood near each other.

Which unfortunately seemed to be constantly.

Now he was pacing, angry that every time he looked over to Rozanov for the last half hour, he was awfully chatty with a pretty reporter from ESPN- watching as she pressed her chest to his arm, or how she gave him flirty looks.

He looked down at his watch, a new one for the Rolex deal that would start advertising tonight. They would have to be onstage any second now and Rozanov was nowhere to be found.

“Nice watch,” Ilya murmured quietly while stepping next to him.

“We’re about to walk out. What the hell were you doing?” Shane looked away immediately in anger. “Or who were you doing?”

Ilya heard of course. “Noone. Don't worry.”

Shane seethed as he walked behind Rozanov, seeing the alpha having to adjust his suit before they walked out under the spotlights.

Shane rolled his eyes hard enough it almost hurt.

“You fucking asshole.”

“No,” Ilya corrected calmly. “Winner. This whole night has been mostly about me, Hollander.”

That-that earned him an elbow. Unfortunately, it only made Ilya grin.

They walked out to present their segment. Shane felt himself tense but he plastered a smile on his face and walked next to Rozanov to the podium. He read the teleprompter at the right moments but he fully tensed as he felt the alpha pull him a bit closer by the back of his neck and he slowly caressed his way down Shane’s spine and he followed along with the gag of taking selfies.

After the player from Winnipeg finished his speech, the three walked off, the sound of applause hurting Shane’s ears. He made it off the stage, down the three steps, and into the shadowed wings before the composure shattered. His lungs seized. The air turned to syrup.

He shoved past a stagehand with a garbled apology, his dress shoes slipping on the polished concrete as he stumbled down a sterile hallway, bursting through the first unmarked door he found.

A bathroom. Empty, thank god. He braced his hands on the cool porcelain of the sink, head hanging, as his chest locked in a vise. Each gasp was a shallow, ragged thing that brought no oxygen. Black spots danced at the edges of his vision. Idiot. You're in public. Get it together.

The door opened and shut again. A lock engaged with a definitive click.

Shane didn't need to look up. The presence that filled the small room was unmistakable, a pressure change that made the air itself crackle.

"What the fuck was that out there?"

Ilya's voice was a low, dangerous whip. Shane flinched.

"Anyone could have seen you run. You looked terrified." Ilya stepped closer, his reflection appearing in the mirror beside Shane's pale, sweating one. He wasn't smiling now. His expression was cold, furious. "And before that. Sitting between Hayden and Scott Hunter. Surrounding yourself with other alphas. Was that a message, zayka? A little display of independence?"

"What? They're my friends," Shane forced out between clenched teeth, fighting for breath. "My parents' seats were... farther back. It was just easier-"

"It was a choice." Ilya cut him off, stepping into his space. "A deliberate one. Now, kneel."

The command, delivered in that tone, in this confined space, should have been irresistible. A shiver of instinctual response ran through Shane. But he stiffened, his hands curling tight around the sink's edge. "No, go fuck yourself, you asshole."

Ilya's eyes narrowed. He studied Shane's heaving shoulders, the wild, unfocused panic in his eyes in the mirror. The anger in his own face shifted, thawing by a fraction into sharp assessment. He recognized the signs - the hyperventilation, the tremor, the fight against a threat that wasn't wholly physical.

"Breathe," Ilya said, the order softening into something more imperative. "In. Hold it. Now out." He demonstrated a slow, audible breath. "Again. With me."

For a minute, there was only the sound of their synchronized breathing in the tiled room. The crushing pressure in Shane's chest began to ease, just enough for the world to solidify.

"You are a mess," Ilya stated, his voice quieter now, stripped of its razor edge. "You cannot stay like this. Come to my room later. The penthouse. We will have time. My flight is not until morning, but I will not leave you... unsteady."

Shane swallowed, finally lifting his head to meet Ilya's gaze in the glass. "Your English... it's a lot better."

A faint, surprised smirk touched Ilya's mouth. "I practice. I read New Yorker. I do word puzzles."

Despite himself, a weak smile pulled at Shane's lips. "My dad loves The New Yorker."

"Being boring must be genetic," Ilya replied, his tone dry.

Shane's smile grew, just for a second, but his eyes glazed over, going soft and distant, lost in the simple, surreal normality of the conversation. "Wow. Genetic." he repeated softly.

Ilya saw it. The slip toward that vulnerable, faraway place. He couldn't allow it, not here. In one swift motion, he turned Shane from the sink, gripping his jaw firmly, forcing his face up. Shane's eyes darted, struggling to land.

"Look at me."

When Shane didn't immediately obey, Ilya crowded him back, step by step, until Shane's shoulders met the cold tile wall. The physical dominance was absolute, anchoring, pulling him from the fog. "Look. At. Me."

Shane's gaze snapped up and locked onto his. Clear. Present. Challenged.

"Good," Ilya murmured, his thumb stroking once over the hinge of Shane's jaw. "We go back. We spend one more hour at this boring party. I leave first. You follow ten minutes later. Penthouse 2. We will have the night. I will see you settled before I go. Do you understand?"

Shane nodded, a slow, deliberate dip of his chin in Ilya's grasp.

Ilya held the gaze a moment longer, then released him, stepping back. He adjusted his own tuxedo jacket, the picture of composure. He moved to the door, unlocked it, and pulled it open a crack. He paused, looking back over his shoulder, his grey eyes like chips of winter ice.

"One more thing, Hollander," he said, his voice dropping to a conversational tone that carried lethal weight. "If I were you, I would not let any of those alphas touch you again. A hand on the shoulder, an arm around the back... it would be unwise."

Then he was gone, the door sighing shut behind him, leaving Shane alone in the sudden, ringing silence.

The relief that had begun to cool Shane's veins evaporated, boiled away by a fresh, clean surge of fury. The audacity. The sheer, breathtaking arrogance to issue a decree like that, about his friends, his teammates. To forbid him. As if he owned the very air Shane breathed with others.

A hard, defiant smile spread across Shane's face. He straightened his bow tie in the mirror, smoothed his hair. His eyes, now clear and blazing, met his own reflection.

We'll see about that.

The next major award came sooner than expected. The Hart Trophy. Predictably, Ilya won.

The room erupted into applause while cameras immediately cut toward his table. Shane found himself standing automatically before he really thought about it, clapping harder than intended while Ilya moved toward the stage.

The arrogant asshole looked even better under the stage lights. Taller and bigger. Confident in that terrifyingly natural way Shane had quietly realized translated to basically every environment. Hockey. In the media. Apparently award ceremonies too. His speech was great too, the noticeably improved vocabulary was a hit with the crowd, they were obviously charmed and Shane had a hard time suppressing the blush when he felt Rozanov's eyes brush past him.

Still rough around the edges, still occasionally clipped in that distinctly Russian way, but better.

Enough that his acceptance speech actually sounded comfortable. He of course thanked the coaches, team, his mother, and everyone who made him play better.

Something shifted unpleasantly warm in Shane's chest. The Art Ross came later. Less surprising but of course Rozanov would win again. It was inevitable.

Then came Shane's turn. The Conn Smythe trophy went to him. The applause hit louder than expected. Longer too. Enough that Shane actually blinked for a second, because part of him still occasionally felt like he didn't fully belong yet. Then he glanced sideways. Ilya stood first. Immediately. Before anyone else. Expression unreadable except for something quietly proud sitting beneath it. That- that got to him more than expected.

Enough that suddenly standing up felt strangely emotional. The Bill Masterton award came a few minutes after and he was truly shocked. This was a different kind of respect. Recognition for perseverance. Heart. Something deeper than statistics. Shane got the impression that Rozanov was proud of him too. Shane noticed it immediately. The way his expression softened slightly.

The way he looked genuinely pleased in a way that felt startlingly unguarded.

As he was talking to some of his teammates, he put a hand in his pocket and felt a card that definitely was not there before. He turned and found a P2 engraved so Rozanov must have slipped it in his pocket in the bathroom.

With no real reason, that made him angry. He'd thought they had improved on how they communicated for the most part and Shane had thought he made it quite clear that he did not appreciate being told what to do. He turned back and went back to his group, placing himself between JJ and Carter- the two most openly affectionate people he knew.

As expected, he could see Rozanov's look over several times-he gaze noticeably tense. He had no right to, though. Shane noticed that Rozanov always seemed to be surrounded by a group of people all the time. That, and the jerk seemed to be thriving about it. The total opposite of himself.

It was about another 45 minutes before he noticed Rozanov start to say his goodbyes. He excused himself to go to his parents, coming up with an excuse to leave too. He slowly made his way out of the ballroom, saying goodbyes to his friends on the way out briefly.

The door sighed shut behind Shane, sealing him into the penthouse's profound silence. The only light came from the wall of windows, framing the city's glittering grid far below. And there, silhouetted against that vast backdrop, stood Ilya.

He was shirtless, the hard lines of his back and shoulders etched in the ambient glow. A curl of smoke rose from a cigarette between his fingers. In his other hand, a glass of clear liquid caught the distant light. He didn't turn.

Shane hovered just inside the door, the keycard still in his hand. The defiance that had fueled him from before was a distant echo here, drowned out by the quiet power radiating from the man at the window.

Ilya took a final, deep drag, then stubbed the cigarette out in a crystal ashtray. He turned, the movement slow and deliberate. His eyes, dark and unreadable, swept over Shane from head to toe in one assessing glance. He raised his glass and took a large, punishing gulp of the vodka, his throat working as he swallowed. He spread his arms wide, a mockery of a welcoming gesture.

"Well?"

Shane's mouth was dry. He shook his head, not in negation, but as if to clear it.

"Congratulations," he managed, his voice quiet. "On everything."

A faint, humorless smile touched Ilya's lips. "Thank you, Hollander." He set the glass down with a soft click. "Come. I want my prize."

He turned abruptly, his gaze scanning the room. It landed on a heavy, upholstered armchair. He grabbed it, the muscles in his back and arms coiling, and dragged it with ease into the adjacent bedroom. Shane followed, a moth drawn to a controlled, dangerous flame.

Ilya positioned the chair a few feet from the foot of the massive bed, angling it precisely. He sat, the picture of indolent authority, spreading his arms along the rests as if on a throne.

"This hotel is very nice," he remarked, his voice conversational. "Very good vodka. And the rooms are soundproof." His eyes, now glinting with intent, locked onto Shane. "Come on, Hollander. Strip for me.”

Shane’s breath hitched. “Um... I haven’t... I’ve never-”

“I know, Hollander,” Ilya cut him off, his tone leaving no room for protest. “But I want to watch. Come on. Take your clothes off and get on the bed.”

He sat back, schooling his features into a mask of blank expectation. Inside, a cold fire burned. Hollander had intentionally goaded him today- looking devastating in his tuxedo, shining his attention on other alphas, pretending indifference after months of aching separation. After so long without him, Ilya knew his control was a frayed wire. Tonight, the lesson needed to be absolute.

He watched, unmoving, as Shane began. The shyness was genuine, and somehow that made it more potent. Shane unknotted his bow tie with trembling fingers, folded it neatly. The jacket came next, carefully laid over the back of a sofa. Each button of the dress shirt was a tiny agony of slowness. Ilya took another slow sip of vodka, the alcohol doing nothing to dull the sharp edge of his hunger.

Once down to his boxer briefs, Shane paused, a flush painting his freckled skin. Ilya motioned impatiently toward the bed. “On the bed.”

Shane climbed onto the crisp duvet, sitting stiffly against the headboard, legs crossed primly at the ankles. He looked exposed, young, waiting.

The command, delivered straight into Shane’s eyes, made the blush deepen, cascading down his neck and across his chest. “Come on, Hollander,” Ilya purred, shifting slightly in his chair. “It’s my special night, and this is my prize. Show off for me.”

He knew it was unfair, a psychological gambit of the highest order. To heighten it, he reached up, his fingers finding the edge of the scent patch at his own neck. He peeled it off slowly, letting it fall to the carpet.

The effect was instantaneous. His true scent- leather, pine and cold night air, and a dominant, possessive alpha musk- flooded the room. Across the bed, Shane’s pupils blew wide, his breath catching in a soft, desperate gasp.

“I... can I have a drink?” Shane whispered, his voice strained.

“No,” Ilya refused, his tone flat. “Touch yourself.”

He watched, a connoisseur of torment, as Shane’s hand began to move. He started on his own chest, stroking the skin in a poor imitation of the way Ilya touched him. Fingertips traced over his abs, shy and exploratory. Ilya sipped his vodka, his eyes a pendulum swinging between that trailing hand and Shane’s glazed, overwhelmed eyes.

When Shane’s fingers finally brushed the tented fabric of his briefs, Ilya’s voice cracked through the room. “Take them off. All the way.”

Shane obeyed, hooking his thumbs in the waistband and pushing them down, kicking them off the bed. He was fully naked now, beautifully, vulnerably exposed.

“Fuck,” Ilya mumbled into his glass, the word all awe and ache.

Shane’s hand closed around himself, giving a few tentative strokes. A shiver wracked his frame. After a moment, a broken whimper escaped him. “I need...”

“What?” Ilya asked, feigning indifference.

“You know...”

Ilya shook his head slowly. “Use your words. What do you need?”

The plea was torn from him, raw and honest. “I need you.”

Slowly, deliberately, Ilya drained the last of his vodka. He set the glass on the floor beside the chair. In one smooth, predatory movement, he stood up.

Shane scrambled, moving over on the bed as Ilya approached. As soon as Ilya was within reach, Shane turned, nuzzling his face against the fine wool of Ilya’s dress pants over his crotch, a wordless plea.

Ilya looked down, his expression hardening. “You teased me tonight. You tried to make me jealous.” His hand came down, not to caress, but to grip a handful of Shane’s hair, not quite pulling, just holding. “I will not go easy on you. This is the last chance you have to walk out of this room.”

In answer, Shane’s hips lifted off the bed, and he pressed his chest lower, arching his back, presenting himself in a way that was both submission and provocation. The view was exquisite, maddening.

He felt Shane’s shaking hands reach up, fumbling for the button of his pants. That was all the permission he needed.

In a blur of controlled violence, Ilya’s hands were on him. He manhandled Shane, flipping him, pressing his face down toward the headrest, arranging his body with brutal efficiency. There was no kiss, no gentle preparation. With a growl that was pure unleashed frustration, Ilya freed himself and pushed inside in one deep, claiming thrust.

Shane cried out, the sound swallowed by the duvet.

Ilya set a punishing rhythm immediately, each drive of his hips a punctuation to his anger. He pressed Shane’s upper body down with a heavy hand between his shoulder blades, using his own weight to dominate completely. He shifted an angle, pulled a hip back, manipulated Shane’s pliant body until he found the exact position that made Shane scream, a high, shattered sound. This was not love-making. It was a conquest, a reassertion of boundaries erased by time and distance, a physical answer to every flirtatious smile Shane had given another alpha that night. The soundproof room absorbed every gasp, every sob, every animal grunt of effort, holding their private war inside its walls.

The only sound in the penthouse was the distant hum of the city and the ragged, slowing pull of their breath.

Shane lay where Ilya had left him, pressed into the bedding, unmoving. The violent, claiming heat that had filled him was receding, leaving a deep, throbbing soreness in its wake. He felt hollowed out, scoured clean by the intensity.

He heard the soft pad of Ilya's bare feet on the carpet, the click of the bathroom light, the run of water. A moment later, the bed dipped, and the warm, damp washcloth touched the small of his back. Ilya's touch was different now- methodical, thorough, devoid of the fury that had driven him minutes before. He cleaned Shane with a silent, clinical focus, wiping away the physical evidence of their encounter. The tenderness of the act was somehow more devastating than the roughness that had preceded it.

Finished, Ilya tossed the cloth toward the bathroom door and lay down beside him, not touching, just sharing the charged silence. The space between their bodies on the large bed felt like a canyon.

Shane swallowed, his throat dry. He slowly turned his body to face Rozanov. He had to say something. The silence was strangling him. "What will you do? In Russia, I mean. For the summer."

Ilya was staring at the ceiling, his profile a sharp line in the dim light. His jaw was still tight. "Training. See family. The usual." The words were short, clipped, leaving no room for follow-up.

The dismissal was a clear wall. Shane knew he should leave. The party was over, whatever this was tonight, it had been. There was nothing more to do here but linger in the awkward, painful aftermath. But his body felt heavy, leaden with a fatigue that went beyond the physical.

Slowly, wincing at the protest in his muscles, Shane pushed himself up. Every movement echoed the recent violence- a twinge in his hip, a deep ache that made sitting up straight a challenge. He didn't look at Ilya as he swung his legs over the side of the bed.

Ilya didn't move. He remained on his back, one arm behind his head, watching Shane from the corner of his eye. He knew he should get up. To see him out, to say a proper goodbye, to offer some crumb of comfort before three months of being apart. But a heavier weight pinned him to the mattress- the cold, certain knowledge of the separation ahead, and the raw, angry wound of the evening that made any gentle farewell feel like a lie. Letting Shane walk out now, like this, was its own kind of punishment for both of them.

Shane found his clothes where he had folded them. Dressing was a slow, painful ritual. Each piece of fabric felt like a shield going back into place. He didn't speak again. There was nothing left to say that wouldn't shatter.

Finally, he stood by the door, keycard in hand. He glanced back once. Ilya hadn't moved. His eyes were closed now, but the tension in his body was a visible line in the semi-darkness.

Shane turned the handle and let himself out. The door clicked shut with a sound of profound finality.

In the silent room, Ilya finally opened his eyes. He listened to the faint echo of footsteps fade down the hall. The emptiness of the penthouse expanded, vast and chilling. He had won the confrontation, asserted his dominance, made his point. As the silence solidified around him, the victory tasted utterly, completely of ash.

He reached for his phone, struggling to find the words to say. "I am sorry. I am going to miss you and I don't know what to do about it."

He waited for five minutes and received no reply.

The last message from Ilya sat unanswered for almost fourteen hours. Which, considering the last two months, was unheard of. Usually, Shane answered immediately or within an hour or two if he was at practice. Never this. Never silence.

But every time his phone buzzed, something unpleasant twisted low in his stomach. Because the truth sat there now, ugly and unavoidable in a way Shane could not outrun. The awards had been good for his career. Seeing him again had been good. Dangerously good.

The whole situation was complicated. The kind of complicated Shane still didn't fully know how to explain even to himself.

The problem was that he had liked parts last night. Enough to make things confusing.

Because beneath frustration and irritation and the lingering discomfort of everything unsaid sat the humiliating truth that some awful part of him had wanted Ilya close badly enough to ignore things he probably shouldn't.

And that terrified him. Too much emotion wrapped around things that were already messy enough.

And Shane kept replaying it anyway. Replaying his own reactions. Questioning himself, questioning Ilya. Questioning what exactly this thing between them had slowly become over the season.

Hard enough that sometime around three in the morning, staring up at the ceiling of his childhood bedroom while sleep refused to come, Shane finally admitted something to himself:

Something had to change.

Because whatever this was between them- it could not keep happening like this. Not if every argument eventually turned into confusion and hurt and impossible feelings Shane still didn't know what to do with. Not if wanting someone this badly made him willing to overlook things he normally never would.

His phone buzzed again.

Another text.

He looked despite himself.

IGR: You awake?

Sent three hours ago.

Before that:

IGR: Going to the airport now.

Then: IGR: You are quiet. Don't do this again. I apologized.

And finally, sometime close to four in the morning:

IGR: Hollander.

No anger. No demands. No orders.

Just his name. Hollander.

Which somehow made everything worse, because Shane knew him now.

Knew enough to hear the things left unsaid.

Concern, frustration. Maybe guilt. Maybe fear.

Because for two months, no matter how busy they got, no matter how bad schedules became, no matter how ridiculous time zones felt-

Shane had always answered. Always. And now suddenly- nothing.

The silence stretched long enough to mean something.

The problem sat there anyway. No matter how much Shane missed him.

No matter how badly seeing him again had hurt in all the worst ways.

No matter how much humiliatingly soft, embarrassing affection had quietly grown roots somewhere inside him.

This could not happen again.

Not like that.

Not with anger tangled into things.

Not with Shane leaving feeling confused and guilty and quietly ashamed of how much he had let slide simply because he missed someone.

Because he did miss him. God. That was the worst part. He already missed him. And maybe that was exactly why distance needed to happen. Because if he still missed Rozanov after the way he treated him last night, what did it say about him? That he would be almost allowing someone to treat him that way.

Morning arrived pale and quiet.

Shane sat curled up in bed long after he should have gotten up, tea growing cold beside him while sunlight slowly stretched across his blankets.

His phone rested heavy in his hands. Three separate drafts sat deleted already. Too emotional, too mean, too soft.

Nothing sounded right. Nothing sounded enough.

Because despite everything-

He didn't want to hurt him.

Didn't want this to become ugly. But maybe they needed space, needed distance.

Needed time to figure out what exactly they were doing to each other before something broke in a way neither of them could fix.

Eventually, after nearly forty minutes of staring at the screen, Shane exhaled slowly and started typing again.

Carefully this time.

Slowly.

Forcing himself not to backspace every other sentence.

Because if he waited any longer-

He knew himself. He would answer the call. He would soften. And nothing would change. The cursor blinked once. Twice.

Then finally:

S: I do not accept your apology. You cannot keep treating me like this, Ilya. I think being apart for the next few months will be a good idea so we can reassess and figure out exactly what we are doing to each other, because I refuse to let something like what happened last night happen again. Have a good summer, Rozanov. I will reach out when I am ready. Until then, do not contact me.

Shane stared at the message for a long time afterward.

Heart pounding harder than made sense.

Because despite anger, despite the frustration. Despite how deeply complicated this had all become- sending it still felt a little like heartbreak.

His thumb hovered. Stopped. Hovered again.

Then finally- he pressed send.

Three dots appeared almost immediately.

And disappeared.

Then appeared again.

Gone.

Appeared.

Gone.

Like Ilya kept typing something and deleting it.

Again.

And again.

And again. The Shane decided to follow through and block him for now. Shane hated how much that hurt.

Eventually, before anything could come through, Shane locked the phone and dropped it onto the blankets beside him.

For the first time in months-

Silence felt terrifying.

And somewhere impossibly far away in Russia-

Ilya Rozanov had no way to reach him.

Chapter End Notes

Well.

I feel like I should maybe hide from all the Ilya defenders for a little while.

Before anyone asks: yes, Shane means it. Yes, blocking him was intentional. And yes... Ilya will be absolutely losing his mind right now.

Summer break has officially begun, so the boys are going no contact for a while which Ilya totally deserves.

As always, I love reading theories, emotional damage reports, and “I need to fight someone” comments. Tell me who you’re mad at this chapter 🙄

Thank you all for reading, commenting, and screaming with me every chapter. Your comments genuinely make writing this so much more fun ❤️

Next chapter will be posted Tuesday if y'all are still with me. We go to Russia, Ilya gets pissed off but we see more of why he is the way he is and Shane tries to find purpose outside of hockey and apart from Ilya.

Chapter 15: Chapter 15

Chapter Summary

Well, next chapter as promised. I lost some OG reviewers I think but hopefully they come back for the next chapter.

Thank you a million times for the comments and engagement-love y'all.

The drive home passed in a blur.

Shane remembered the airport vaguely. Remembered boarding, remembered somebody asking if the seat beside him was taken, remembered nodding without really hearing the question. He remembered forcing himself to smile at fans who recognized him, remembered signing something with fingers that felt disconnected from the rest of his body. A jersey, maybe. A hat. He wasn't sure.

Everything after the awards felt oddly muffled, like he was moving underwater. He answered his mother's questions with practiced ease when she texted to check if he'd landed.

Fine.

Tired.

Going to sleep for a while.

No, nothing's wrong.

The lies came easier than they should have.

By the time he unlocked the door to his apartment, exhaustion sat so deep in his bones that he could sleep for the next few days.

The familiar quiet greeted him immediately.

No teammates. No parents. No media obligations. No Rozanov.

Shane shut the door behind himself and stood there for a second, hand still resting against the lock.

Silence, actual silence. The kind he'd thought he wanted. The kind he had practically demanded. He should have felt relieved. Instead, something restless twisted beneath his ribs.

He dropped his duffel near the kitchen island and mechanically kicked off his shoes. His apartment looked exactly the same as he'd left it. Neat. Organized. Clean in the sterile way hotel rooms never quite managed to be.

Nothing was wrong. Nothing should feel wrong.

And yet, the hairs on the back of his neck prickled. Shane frowned. The feeling came slowly, quietly, impossible to explain. Like pressure, like a presence.

Like- he looked over his shoulder. Nothing. Empty apartment. Of course it was empty. The living room sat untouched, soft evening light spilling across the couch. The kitchen remained spotless. No movement. No sounds except the distant bird calls and the wind in the trees.

Still, something felt... off. His jaw tightened. This was stupid. He knew exactly where the feeling came from.

Too much stress. Too little sleep. Months of emotional whiplash and pheromone bullshit and whatever the hell had happened between him and Rozanov.

His body was probably just freaking out. But even knowing that didn't make the feeling disappear.

Didn't stop the strange, irrational sensation that if he turned quickly enough- someone might already be watching him.

His chest tightened.

"No," he muttered quietly to himself.

Get it together. You're fine. You're home.

Still.

His feet carried him down the hallway faster than usual.

Into the bedroom. Locking the door behind himself immediately. Only once the click sounded did some of the tension loosen from his shoulders. Shane stood still in the middle of the room. His own room, his own space.

And frowned harder, because somehow he still didn't feel alone. His eyes moved slowly around the familiar space. Over the furniture, the knick knacks he had placed around the room, the book on the nightstand he had forgotten to take with him last week.

Nothing out of place. Nothing that look like it was tampered with.

And yet the sensation lingered, crawling unpleasantly beneath his skin. Like invisible eyes. Watching, waiting.

His stomach twisted. It's in your head. You know it's in your head.

He knew that. God, logically he knew that. But logic had not exactly been winning lately. Especially not after last night.

Not after letting somebody get entirely too deep under his skin.

Not after realizing that in a sick and twisted way, he still would miss him anyway. The ache of that thought settled hard in his chest.

Shane scrubbed both hands down his face. He couldn't stay here. The realization arrived immediately. Absolute. He looked around again. The apartment suddenly felt too familiar.

Too quiet. Too full of memories he hadn't noticed collecting. FaceTimes in bed, late night calls, texts.

The stupid place on the couch where he always sat while talking to him.

The kitchen where Rozanov once made fun of the fact Shane somehow survived almost entirely on protein bars during playoffs.

The bed. God. The bed.

The same bed where he'd laid awake too many nights staring at his phone after hanging up, smiling like an idiot. Where he and Rozanov first-

No. Absolutely not. He made himself stop that train of thought. He would not back down, he would not become one of those pathetic omega's that his teammates made fun of all the time.

Movement snapped through him. Quick and focused.

Almost frantic.

He grabbed the duffel and yanked it open, dumping the contents on the floor.

Clothes. Whatever. Didn't matter.

He opened drawers without thinking, grabbing random hoodies, sweats, underwear, chargers.

Toothbrush.

Laptop.

Phone charger.

More clothes.

Half of it probably didn't even match.

Didn't matter.

He needed- Distance. Somewhere quiet. Somewhere that didn't feel haunted by his own terrible decisions.

An hour later, he stood in the elevator wearing a baseball cap pulled low and carrying enough stuff to disappear for a few days.

His phone buzzed twice.

Mom.

Then team group chat.

He hesitated.

Then typed quickly.

To his parents:

S: I just left home. Just overwhelmed. Going to decompress for a few days before training starts back up. I'm okay. Just want some quiet. Love you.

To the chat that he had with his friends:

S: Gonna disappear for a few days. Need to decompress after the season. Don't worry if I'm quiet. I'm fine.

He ignored the immediate flood of responses.

JJ: bro are u ok?

Hayden: Need company?

Scott: Call if needed.

Carter: Please don't become one of those weird forest men

Despite himself, Shane almost smiled.

Almost.

Then the elevator opened.

An hour later, he checked into a hotel far enough away that nobody would casually stop by.

Nothing fancy. Just anonymous. Neutral, forgettable.

Exactly what he wanted. The room smelled like industrial detergent and stale air conditioning. Perfect.

No memories. No ghosts. No Rozanov.

That last thought hurt worse than expected. Shane ignored it. He locked the door. Latched it too.

Then stood there in the middle of the unfamiliar room.

Still, waiting, listening.

Nothing. No strange pressure. No phantom awareness.

No sensation crawling up his spine.

Just quiet.

For the first time all day he finally felt alone.

The relief hit so hard it almost made him dizzy.

Slowly, he exhaled.

Then headed for the bathroom.

He turned the shower as hot as it would physically go.

Steam filled the room almost immediately.

Shane stepped under the water without waiting for it to cool.

Heat burned against already-sensitive skin.

He welcomed it.

Welcomed something sharp enough to interrupt the noise in his head.

He stood there unmoving for a long time.

Water running over his face.

His shoulders.

His closed eyes.

Trying—

And failing—

To process the last twenty-four hours.

Because every time he replayed it, his thoughts tangled worse.

The awards. Rozanov running his hand down back in front of hundreds of people. The bathroom, the panic attack.

The way Ilya had calmed him down.

The penthouse- he didn't know what to feel honestly. He'd be lying if he said it the whole experience was terrible-whether the omega in him or if it really was him that hadn't taken the out that Rozanov had presented before things got-the way things had still gone. The way part of him had still wanted Rozanov. Wanted the comfort, the closeness. He had wanted to please Rozanov, to make him see his worth as a person and an omega.

Wanted-

His throat tightened. No.

No.

Because wanting somebody didn't suddenly make everything okay. What happened with Rozanov wasn't okay. No matter how much Shane missed him. No matter how badly he still wanted to call him.No matter how much humiliating, stupid affection had rooted itself somewhere deep enough to hurt.

It wasn't healthy. It just wasn't. Shane braced both hands against the tile wall. The water burned hotter.

Good.

Because if he stood still long enough maybe things would make sense. But they didn't.

Because the alpha/omega relationships he'd actually seen, the few healthy ones, were not like this.

Not obsessive. Not possessive to the point of fear. Not constantly pushing boundaries until Shane didn't know what was normal anymore. Not confusing anger with care. Not making him feel simultaneously protected and trapped. Not making him question himself every five minutes.

His parents weren't like this. Scott and Kip, from what he'd heard, weren't like this.

Even some of the older mated players he knew- their relationships had softness.

Hayden and Jackie acted very similar to his parents. Not- whatever the hell this had become.

Because wasn't that the problem?

The terrifying part?

That Shane had started excusing things.

Making exceptions.

Overlooking behavior that would horrify him if it happened to literally anybody else.

Because it was Rozanov. Because he missed him.

Because underneath all the impossible intensity-, there was care too. Real care. Tenderness, protection. Moments that felt devastatingly genuine. And somehow, now it made it all seem worse.

Because if Ilya had just been cruel from the start, if he had just been awful, leaving would have been easy.

Instead he was complicated. When he wasn't in front of the crowds, or playing up a character version of himself, Shane had seen glimpses of him almost broken in ways Shane didn't fully understand. It made him want to take care of the alpha, to offer him tenderness in return.

And Shane, God. Shane still will miss him anyway.

He slid slowly down the shower wall until he sat against cool tile, knees drawn toward his chest.

Steam curled around him. Water beat relentlessly overhead. And somewhere beneath anger, confusion, guilt and hurt- something heartbreakingly soft still whispered the same terrible thing. I want to call him.

The water eventually turned lukewarm. Shane didn't notice at first.

He stayed sitting against the tile, forehead resting against damp skin, letting the spray beat endlessly against the back of his neck until the heat stopped burning and settled into something duller. His thoughts had long since looped themselves into exhaustion.

Eventually, practicality won. He pushed himself up slowly, immediately wincing.

His entire body protested.

A deep ache settled inside him, low in his hips and thighs, unpleasantly familiar and embarrassingly tied to memories he was actively trying not to replay. Even standing felt off somehow, his muscles sore in ways that made him flush despite being entirely alone.

"Great," he muttered under his breath.

The mirror had completely fogged over when he finally stepped out.

Steam curled around him in thick waves as he grabbed one of the stiff white hotel towels and wrapped it low around his waist. Water dripped steadily from damp curls, trailing down flushed skin.

His whole body was red.

His shoulders looked sunburned from how hot the water had been, fingertips wrinkled and prune-like from standing under it far too long. Probably not normal. Definitely not healthy. Whatever.

At least his brain had shut up for the duration of the shower. He grabbed another towel, rubbing roughly at his hair as he wandered back into the room.

Then stopped. Completely still. Because the thought arrived so suddenly it almost felt like whiplash.

Before last night, before the awards. Before everything had gone sideways, he had actually been looking forward to talking to Rozanov.

Because somewhere between awkward phone calls and stolen moments over the past two seasons he had started to feel differently. Shane had quietly started planning the conversation.

Not even intentionally. Just... thinking about it. The suppressants, the patch. The very reliable birth control.

The fact that they probably didn't need condoms anymore. A heat of embarrassment crawled up his neck. God.

He had actually been looking forward to telling him. He could still hear stupid locker room conversations from veteran alphas over the years, casually complaining about condoms like it was the worst inconvenience on earth.

Doesn't feel the same. Can't stand them. My wife switched birth control and thank god.

Shane had rolled his eyes every single time. But still- some stupid, embarrassingly domestic part of him had quietly thought Rozanov would probably be happy.

Would probably get that impossible smug look on his face. Would probably say something obnoxiously possessive and infuriating.

Shane had wanted that. Wanted the conversation. Wanted what it implied. Stability, something serious-official.

Something that maybe resembled a future.

His hand stilled against the towel.

Slowly, involuntarily, his eyes drifted downward.

To the flat plane of his stomach.

Lower.

His expression tightened.

There was absolutely no way.

Impossible.

Completely impossible.

It was only once, one night.

He knew that.

Logically, he knew that.

Still- for one humiliating second, the thought surfaced anyway. A tiny impossible maybe. A dangerous little fantasy. And what startled him most, what horrified him, actually, was the brief, sharp flicker of disappointment that followed logic.

Gone almost instantly.

But there.

Real enough to sting.

Shane stared hard at himself.

“You are actually losing your mind,” he muttered.

Because seriously.

A baby?

With Rozanov?

Absolutely not.

That would be catastrophic.

Career-ending levels of catastrophic.

Emotionally catastrophic. Practically catastrophic.

And still-

His chest tightened painfully.

Because some awful, embarrassingly soft part of him could picture it too easily.

Rozanov hovering. Protective to a ridiculous degree. Terrifyingly devoted. Possessive in ways that would probably become completely unbearable. And somehow, underneath all of that, happy.

Really happy.

The image disappeared as quickly as it came. Shane scrubbed a hand hard down his face. “No.”

Firmly this time.

“No.”

He wasn't doing this.

Not today. Not after everything. Not when he'd literally blocked him less than twenty-four hours ago.

He finished drying off quickly, pulling on a loose pair of workout shorts and ignoring how sore the movement made him.

The room still smelled faintly like detergent and hotel air-conditioning.

He dug through his bag until he found his toiletry kit buried beneath tangled chargers and half-folded clothes.

Pain relievers.

Thank god.

He shook two into his palm, swallowed them dry without bothering to grab water, and climbed onto the unfamiliar hotel bed.

The mattress dipped strangely beneath him.

Too soft.

Too cold.

Not home.

Which, right now was probably for the best.

He rolled onto his side and pulled the blanket halfway over himself. His body still ached. His thoughts still felt too loud. But exhaustion finally outweighed everything else.

The confusion. The anger. The missing him. The humiliating tenderness that refused to fully go away.

Shane squeezed his eyes shut. Hard. Determined.

He would rest. Sleep.

Ignore the world for a few hours.

Ignore the complicated, impossible mess sitting across the world in Russia.

No thinking. No spiraling. Just quiet.

Just rest.

And eventually despite himself, sleep finally started pulling at him.

The flight to Russia felt endless because every twenty minutes Ilya found himself checking his phone like a man possessed, rereading the same unanswered messages until he could practically recite them from memory. The last group he didn't think they even went through.

The airport lounge buzzed around him in a blur of movement and noise he barely registered. A few teammates still drunk on the high of the Stanley Cup, management talking schedules, media lingering too long hoping for one more quote from the newly crowned captain. Usually he loved being with his team, loved having a camera in front of him. Usually he could compartmentalize, push emotions into some locked corner of himself until hockey obligations were handled. Today, he wanted everyone to leave him the fuck alone.

Because Hollander had gone quiet. Again.

And Shane Hollander had promised not to do that again. Not with him, not anymore.

Even angry, Shane answered. Sometimes coldly. Sometimes stubborn enough to make Ilya want to drag him into the nearest room and argue until they understood each other again. Sometimes passive aggressive in a way that made him roll his eyes so hard it physically hurt. But he answered. Now there was just silence.

Ilya sat heavily in one of the leather airport chairs, broad shoulders tense beneath his jacket as he stared down at the thread on his phone. Three messages sat unanswered. Or maybe unread. Hard to tell. Airport signal flickered between terrible and nonexistent, the little delivery icon refusing to cooperate long enough for him to tell if Shane had actually blocked him or if the airport Wi-Fi was simply complete shit.

IGR: I am sorry. I know you angry.

Nothing.

Twenty minutes later:

IGR: You should not disappear like this.

Still nothing.

He frowned harder, thumb hovering over the keyboard. Shane had said he would block him. But Shane also said things when emotional. Usually, after enough time passed, there was some annoyed reply hours later, something clipped and irritated but still there. Shane cooled down eventually. They always figured it out eventually. Didn't they?

The uncertainty settled unpleasantly in his chest.

He scrubbed a hand down his jaw before typing again.

IGR: I am sorry. I was too rough.

The message sat there. Pending. Maybe delivered, Impossible to tell.

Fuck.

He leaned back harder in the chair, jaw flexing as frustration slowly gave way to something heavier. Because yes, he knew he had crossed a line. He knew that. He had let jealousy and possessiveness get the better of him after months apart, after seeing Shane wrapped up in other alphas' space all night while pretending none of this affected him. Watching Hayden lean too close, Carter drape himself around him, Scott hovering nearby in that irritatingly protective way, all while Shane looked devastating in that suit and acted like months apart had somehow meant nothing.

But Shane had still come to the penthouse.

Had still climbed into his bed.

Had still obeyed him. Needed him. Wanted him.

That mattered too. Didn't it?

"Mr. Rozanov?"

Ilya looked up sharply. One of the attendants stood nearby, professional smile fixed into place. "We're beginning boarding."

He nodded once, distracted already by his phone again. Still nothing.

Fine. One more. Short this time. Simple.

IGR: Text me when you calm down.

Still pending.

The walk through boarding blurred together. Security, quiet congratulations, fans somehow sneaking pictures despite private access. He barely listened to any of it. The moment he settled into his seat, his phone was back in his hand.

Nothing.

Still.

He typed again.

Deleted it.

Typed something longer.

Deleted that too.

Finally:

IGR: I miss you already.

His thumb hovered for a second.

Too soft, too honest. But Hollander might smile at it.

He sent it anyway.

Pending.

Still fucking pending.

“Sir,” the flight attendant said gently beside him. “We’ll need electronics switched off before takeoff.”

“One minute.”

She smiled patiently, already exhausted by passengers.

“One minute.”

Ilya stared at the thread one last time, frowning hard enough his temples started aching. No Shane. No reply. Something about that unsettled him more than anger would have.

Fine. Shane was upset, understandable.

He could be upset.

Ilya knew he had pushed too hard.

He would give him space for a few days. Let him cool off. Then they would talk properly. Like adults. Shane always got emotional first and rational later. Eventually he would answer.

They always answered each other.

Didn’t they?

The thought sat strangely hollow as he finally switched his phone off and tucked it away while the plane began taxiing.

The next morning, Russia came into view beneath pale clouds and muted gray skies.

Usually, seeing Moscow again settled something inside him. Familiar roads. Familiar language. Familiar cold. Home, in the complicated, bittersweet way it had always been home.

Today, he felt like absolute shit. He had slept maybe two hours. Maybe.

The rest of the flight had been restless shifting and half-finished sleep, repeatedly waking convinced his phone had vibrated only to realize it hadn't. The second inflight Wi-Fi became available, he opened his iPad.

Nothing. No messages. No FaceTime attempts.

No angry texts from Shane.

No annoyed I said leave me alone.

Nothing.

He refreshed.

Again.

Still nothing.

Tried sending another message.

Nothing went through.

He even checked email at one point, which felt pathetic enough that he almost closed the app immediately afterward.

Still nothing.

No delivered notification.

No response.

Just blank silence.

Fine.

Okay.

Shane was angry.

Understandable.

Ilya knew he had been too rough. Too possessive. Too angry. He knew that.

But also, Shane had not stopped him. Hadn't pushed him away. Hadn't told him no.

Hell, Shane had gone to the penthouse himself. Had sat on the bed looking flushed and shy and needy in a way Ilya still could not stop thinking about.

Shane had wanted him too. Needed him too.

So maybe this was just hurt feelings and distance and exhaustion making everything worse than it actually was.

Maybe Shane just needed time.

A few days. A week, maybe. Then they would talk.

Ilya could apologize properly. Explain himself better. Try harder.

Because yes, he had fucked up, but it could not have been unforgivable. Could it?

The uncertainty sat heavier than he wanted to admit.

The plane touched down with a soft jolt.

The second the seatbelt sign switched off, Ilya turned his phone back on.

Waited. Nothing, no delayed notifications.

No flood of missed messages.

No Shane.

His chest tightened. Because suddenly, for the first time in months, he genuinely could not reach him.

The airline quietly escorted him through disembarking while fans crowded barriers anyway, phones already out.

“Rozanov!”

“Captain!”

“Can we get a picture?”

“Congratulations!”

He barely looked up. Didn’t stop. Didn’t smile.

Just kept his head down, shoulders tense, phone already back in his hand as he restarted it once.

Then again. Still nothing. Fine.

He tried calling. Straight to voicemail.

His jaw flexed harder. Again. Voicemail.

No ringing. No FaceTime. No response.

That sharp discomfort in his chest deepened into something uglier.

Because suddenly, the ocean between them felt unbearably large.

Because he could not hear Shane. Could not see him. Could not even tell if he was okay. And he hated that.

By the time baggage claim started moving, unease had settled deep enough that he stopped trying to rationalize it.

Alright.

If Shane wanted space, he could have space. He could have his illusion of space for a few days. Did not mean Ilya had to stop worrying. He pulled out his second phone and made another call.

One Shane did not know about.

The private security detail. There only to watch from a distance. Because Shane was oblivious. Too trusting, too recognizable. Too easy a target.

The line clicked. “Mr. Rozanov.”

“Report.” A brief pause.

“Mr. Hollander checked into a hotel yesterday evening. Alone.”

Ilya straightened immediately. “Hotel?” His voice sharpened instinctively. “Why?”

“Unsure, sir. He left his apartment shortly after arriving home.”

That made something unpleasant twist low in his stomach.

“Anything unusual?”

“No visitors. Ordered food to room. Minimal movement. Appears alone.”

Ilya was already opening the tracker. The tiny interface loaded slowly. Then finally. There: Location.

Heart rate.

Movement.

Minimal activity for hours.

Heart rate lower than usual.

Sleeping.

Relief hit hard enough that he exhaled quietly through his nose.

Okay.

Sleeping.

Safe.

Fine.

He checked again anyway.

No elevated stress.

No strange movement.

Nothing alarming.

And yet the relief only settled halfway.

Because he still could not reach him.

Could not hear his voice.

Could not know if Shane was devastated, spiraling, furious, or simply exhausted.

The silence made him nervous. Deeply nervous.

Because for months now, no matter how busy they got, no matter how impossible schedules became, no matter how stupid the time zones felt, Shane had always answered eventually.

Always.

Now there was nothing.

Ilya stared at the sleeping biometrics far too long while airport staff quietly moved him through baggage claim. Eventually, softly enough that nobody nearby could hear, he muttered to himself in Russian,

“Wake up soon, zayka.”

His thumb hovered over the thread anyway.

One more try.

Just in case.

IGR: Please talk to me.

Pending.

Still nothing.

Something about not being able to see or hear him sat wrong inside his chest in a way he could not explain.

Because for the first time in months, Shane felt completely out of reach.

And Ilya Rozanov had never been good at losing access to the things he cared about.

Once outside the airport, Moscow greeted him with cold air and gray skies.

The city always smelled different than North America. Sharper somehow. Exhaust, wet pavement, distant cigarette smoke curling through the chill. Familiar in a way that sat deep in muscle memory.

Usually, coming home settled something inside him.

Today, everything felt heavier.

His duffel sat abandoned beside him in the backseat while the city blurred past the window in muted colors. Stopping at his apartment first would have made sense. Sleep would have made sense. Food. Maybe visiting his grandmother.

Instead, after ten quiet minutes staring blankly at traffic, Ilya leaned forward slightly.

“Na Kutuzovsky Prospekt,” he said quietly. “Kladbishche.”

The driver glanced at him through the mirror once and nodded.

“Da.”

The cemetery. His mother first. Always. Some habits never left.

The florist sat near an intersection he remembered from childhood. Small. Quiet. Mostly older women arranging flowers with careful hands. He stepped out alone, hood pulled up despite being recognizable enough now that somebody still paused halfway down the sidewalk and blinked in recognition.

“Hockey player,” someone whispered quietly.

He ignored it.

Inside, warmth greeted him immediately.

The scent of flowers settled thick in the air.

“Lilii?” the older florist asked gently after a pause.

Lilies.

Always lilies.

His mother had liked them because they looked elegant without trying too hard. Simple. Clean.

“Da.”

White. Of course. The bouquet sat heavy in his hands as he climbed back into the car. The drive grew quieter after that. Moscow slowly thinning. Buildings giving way to quieter roads. Memory settling in around him like fog.

He had been twelve the last time he saw his mother alive. Twelve and angry. Twelve and stupid enough to believe adults stayed forever.

Sometimes he still remembered little things at random. The way she tucked blankets around him when he was sick. The smell of tea. The way she touched his hair absentmindedly while reading.

The softness.

God. He barely remembered softness anymore.

The grounds sat quiet.

Still. Ilya told the driver to wait, then he walked alone.

He knew the path without thinking. Left turn. Up the small hill. Third row. He found her immediately.

The stone looked exactly the same.

Untouched by time in the way graves somehow always were.

He crouched first. Set the lilies carefully at the base.

Ilya sat in front of the headstone for a long time before he spoke. The lilies rested carefully against the base of the stone, white against gray granite, the cold creeping through his jeans where he sat on the hard ground with one knee drawn up toward his chest. Moscow remained quiet around him, muted beneath pale skies, the cemetery still in the way only cemeteries could be, his phone sat face down beside him on the ground, useless and silent, still empty of messages no matter how many times he checked it.

Finally, after several minutes, he scrubbed a tired hand down his face and exhaled slowly.

“Privet, Mama,” he said quietly, his Russian rough around the edges from exhaustion. “I won. Just like I promised”

The words sat strangely between them.

“We got the Stanley Cup. Then I won the Hart Trophy. I was named Captain at the last game.” His mouth twitched faintly, humorless. “Temporary first, but permanent enough now, I think.” He glanced down at the lilies. “You would probably pretend not surprised. You always did that - where impossible things somehow seemed expected.” A pause stretched. “You would yell at me for smoking though.”

The silence afterward felt familiar. Comfortable, even.

Because no matter how old he got, no matter how famous or successful or exhausted, this was still the one place where he let his guard down.

“I met somebody,” he admitted finally, quieter now. “He is very annoying.” The corner of his mouth lifted despite himself. “Stubborn. Does opposite of everything I say just because he know it irritates me. Bad texter too.” His expression tightened immediately after. “Actually, no. Usually he text back. That part is new.”

His eyes drifted toward the gray sky.

“You would like him, I think,” he continued softly. “He is quiet, but not weak. People mistake those things all time. He is stronger than most people I know.” His voice softened without permission. “He cares too much. About everyone. About hockey. About doing the right thing. He forgets to care about himself.”

He swallowed.

“He is beautiful too- so beautiful, but not in a shallow way. Just...” He searched for the word, frustrated by how impossible Shane suddenly felt to explain. “Good,” he settled on quietly. “He is still somehow good after people disappoint him. Still kind. Still soft underneath all that stubbornness.”

His chest tightened unexpectedly.

“He makes me want stupid things,” Ilya admitted after a moment, rubbing the heel of his palm against one tired eye. “Domestic things. Quiet things. I want to call him after games. Hear him complain. Sit in silence while he pretends not to be tired.” A small, humorless laugh escaped him. “I like hearing him laugh. He makes my apartment feel less empty.”

The admission lingered between gravestones. “I think maybe I love him. I am not sure though. What I feel has to be love.”

The words sounded strange spoken aloud. Too vulnerable. Too honest. “He hates me right now.”

That one hurt.

“I fucked up,” he admitted, voice roughening. “I was too rough. Too angry. Too jealous.” His jaw flexed harder. “Watching people touch him all night. Watching him laugh with other alphas after months apart like seeing him again did not completely ruin my fucking head.”

He shook his head once, frustrated with himself. “He looked too...” His mouth tightened. “I do not know. Too close and too far away at same time.”

The cold bit through his clothes. Still, he stayed.

“But he came to me,” he said quieter now, uncertainty slipping in around the edges. “He still came to my room. Wanted me too.” His gaze dropped. “Didn’t he?”

The silence gave no answers.

“That is the problem,” he muttered. “I cannot tell anymore when I make excuses.”

His hand curled tighter over his knee. “I have bad thoughts sometimes, Mama.” The confession came slower. Heavier. “Dark thoughts.”

“Not hurting him. Never.” The idea itself made something ugly twist in his stomach. “But controlling things. Keeping him close. Making sure he cannot leave.”

His throat tightened.

“Sometimes I think about mating him. Really mating him. Permanent.” Shame flickered briefly across his face. “Like maybe if he belonged fully to me, if a bond existed, he would stop running. Stop disappearing. Stop hurting both of us.” A bitter laugh escaped him. “Crazy, right?”

He dragged a hand over his face again.

“And the worst part...” His voice lowered. “Worst part is sometimes instinct tells me if I just pushed harder, if I stopped asking, stopped waiting for him to choose, everything would finally settle.” His jaw tightened immediately after. “But I know what will happen if I do.”

His eyes dropped toward the lilies.

“If I force him...” His throat worked once. “He would not be him anymore.”

The words hurt to say.

Because Shane, with his millions of questions, soft and stubborn and frustrating and nervous, mattered.

The eye rolls. The playful arguments. The quiet little moments where he chose him anyway, despite everything.

That mattered.

"If I take his choice away..." Ilya swallowed hard. "Something bright in him would die." His voice dropped lower, quieter. "He would stay, maybe. But it would not be him anymore."

And somehow, that scared him worse than losing him entirely.

Because Shane soft and difficult and complicated was the person he had fallen for.

Not obedient. Not broken. Not afraid.

"I think maybe that is what scares me," he admitted quietly. "That sometimes I sound too much like him." His father remained unnamed between them, especially in this place.

The belief that fear somehow meant loyalty.

The ugly instinct to possess instead of trust.

"I hated him for that," Ilya said softly. "And now sometimes I see pieces of him in me and wonder if maybe I am worse because at least he never thought he was wrong. I know it's wrong but I am tempted anyway."

The exhaustion settled heavier then. Not physical. Something darker. Something that had been growing quietly for months now.

"I'm tired, Mama."

His voice roughened. "I win everything." His mouth twisted faintly. "Everything twelve-year-old me would kill for."

His gaze drifted toward the silent phone beside him.

"And somehow none of it matters because one stupid boy in Canada is not answering me."

A humorless laugh left him. "Pathetic."

But his chest still hurt. Because the silence stretched too long. The ocean between them suddenly felt impossibly large. He leaned forward slightly, brushing a thumb over the edge of the cold stone.

"You would have liked him, I sometimes think you sent him to me." he said quietly after a long moment.

A tiny smile flickered. Then it disappeared.

"I think maybe he's too good for me." The admission sat heavier than expected.

And for the first time in months, Ilya genuinely had no idea how to get him back.

"Please do not let me ruin this," he whispered finally, voice quiet enough that it disappeared into the cold. "I do not think I will survive losing him."

The drive back from the cemetery sat heavy inside him.

Usually, seeing his mother settled something. Not fixed it, exactly. Nothing really fixed anything anymore. But it usually quieted the worst parts of his mind for a little while. Helped him separate the noise. Helped him remember who he was supposed to be underneath hockey and anger and the ugly instincts he spent so much effort trying to keep under control.

Today, even after spending more time than usual at her gravesite, everything felt worse. Because Shane still had not answered.

Every few minutes during the drive, Ilya checked anyway. The tracker loaded slowly each time, taunting him with tiny fragments of reassurance that somehow only made the anxiety sharper. Heart rate steady. Minimal movement. Location unchanged. Still inside the hotel room.

Sleeping.

Or resting.

Still. No signs of distress. No sudden spike in stress markers. Nothing alarming.

And yet something deep in him stayed restless. Shane had blocked him out. This wasn't running away. This was Hollander putting a wall in between them.

Even angry, he usually responded eventually. Maybe short. Maybe cold. Maybe stubborn enough to make Ilya want to shake him and kiss him in equal measure. But he answered.

The silence stretched too long now.

By the time the car pulled up outside his father's estate, gray afternoon had settled fully over Moscow. The house stood exactly the same as it always had, enormous and cold and somehow still trying too hard to impress people who had not mattered in years. Dark stone. Sharp lines. Too much money spent pretending wealth made people happier.

Ilya had always hated it. Even as a child, Especially as a child. It had represented his mother's prison.

He stepped inside without knocking.

Nobody stopped him. Nobody ever did.

The maid he had hired a few months ago to help Polina moved around him quietly, professionally, eyes lowered "Your father is in the study," Polina said quietly while taking his coat.

Of course he was. Where else? The office smelled exactly the same. Old books. Expensive liquor.

Grigory Rozanov sat behind the oversized desk, broad shoulders slightly more stooped than the last time Ilya had seen him. Older somehow. Smaller, though admitting that to himself felt strange. His father had always occupied too much space in memory. Too loud. Too imposing. Too impossible to ignore.

Now there were cracks.

Subtle ones.

But there.

Grigory looked up slowly when he entered.

"There he is," he muttered after a second. "The champion remembers family."

Ilya rolled his eyes automatically and leaned against the doorway. "Privet to you too."

His father gestured lazily toward the liquor cabinet without much enthusiasm. "Drink?"

"No."

"Too good now to share a drink with his father then, huh?"

"It's been a long day and I do not want alcohol tonight."

Grigory frowned faintly at that.

Did I?

The pause lingered strangely before he waved it off.

"You cut your hair."

“I did not.”

“You did.”

Ilya frowned, he hadn't had a haircut since before the olympics due to lack of time and his father had seen them then.

Another pause.

Then: “How is Sergei?”

Ilya blinked once.

Slowly. “Who?”

“Sergei.” His father frowned impatiently now. “From Kazan. Tall kid. Played wing.”

Something uncomfortable settled immediately in Ilya's stomach. “Papa,” he said carefully, “Sergei died.”

Ten years ago from a car accident.

Grigory just stared at him.

Blinked.

Twice.

Then frowned harder.

“No,” he muttered eventually. “No. That was...” His expression shifted strangely, confusion flickering briefly across it. “Another one.”

Silence stretched.

Something about it sat wrong.

Off. Then just as quickly, his father waved it away like the moment had never happened.

“Sit.”

So Ilya sat.

The argument started, predictably, less than ten minutes later.

“You disappear to America,” Grigory muttered while pouring whiskey despite it barely being afternoon. “Forget your family. You forget your duties to your country.”

“I call.”

“Not enough.”

“You don’t answer.”

“You should try harder!”

Ilya laughed once, humorless.

“There it is.”

His father narrowed his eyes. “What?”

“Impossible standards.”

“You sound disrespectful.”

“You sound drunk.”

That earned him a sharp look.

“Still arrogant.”

Normal.

Almost.

Except every few minutes something strange happened. His father repeated himself. Told the same complaint twice.

Mentioned old acquaintances like they were still alive.

Asked once how junior hockey was going before going oddly quiet when Ilya stared at him too long.

He forgot details.

Lost words.

Paused strangely in the middle of sentences.

The discomfort only deepened.

Enough that somewhere beneath irritation, worry quietly started growing teeth.

Then the office door slammed open.

Alexie stumbled inside already looking terrible.

Eyes glassy. Jaw too tight. Too much energy vibrating beneath his skin. Cocaine.

Again. Wonderful.

“Ilya!” his brother grinned too wide. “Big hot shot hockey player.”

The smell hit immediately.

Chemical.

Sharp.

Familiar enough to make Ilya grimace.

“Jesus Christ,” he muttered.

“Oh relax.”

“You look like shit.”

“You shut the fuck up.”

Their father barely looked up. “Brothers,” he muttered vaguely. “Sit.”

Neither listened.

The fight started quickly.

Too quickly.

“You think you better than everybody now?” Alexie snapped suddenly, pacing the office like he physically could not stop moving. “Big fucking hockey star.”

“No,” Ilya replied flatly. “I think you should stop doing cocaine before thirty.”

That escalated things immediately.

Old resentment surfaced fast.

Money.

Favoritism.

Their mother.

Who disappointed who.

Who left.

Who stayed.

Alexie accused him of abandoning the family. Ilya accused Alexie of slowly killing himself with the money he sent. Somewhere in the middle, Grigory tried joining the conversation only to derail halfway through, mentioning people none of them had spoken to in years before getting irritated when nobody followed.

Eventually Alexie shoved him.

Not hard, it didn't even cause him to move.

Still enough.

Ilya shoved back harder.

"You always think you know best," Alexie snapped.

"No," Ilya replied coldly. "I think somebody should care enough tell you truth."

"Fuck you."

"You fucking addict. Can't even use your own money to snort up your nose."

"Fuck. You."

Their father yelled something from behind the desk that made almost no sense.

Something about training camp.

Something about their mother making dinner.

The room went strangely quiet.

Because their mother had been dead for years.

Grigory frowned at both of them like they were children.

"Stop fighting before she gets upset."

The silence afterward sat heavy.

Wrong.

Uncomfortable.

Alexie looked away first.

Ilya's stomach twisted unpleasantly.

Something was wrong. Really wrong. He just didn't know how wrong yet.

Twenty minutes later, he was done.

Completely done.

"Call rehab," he muttered while grabbing his coat.

"Fuck you," Alexie snapped immediately.

"Eventually," Ilya replied flatly, "you kill yourself."

The silence afterward stretched ugly.

Then his attention shifted back toward his father.

Still sitting behind the desk.

Expression oddly distant.

Like he had drifted somewhere halfway through the conversation and forgotten how to come back.

“You visiting next week?” Grigory asked suddenly.

“I just got here.” A pause.

“Oh.” Ilya stood there another second longer than necessary before quietly saying, “Take care of yourself.”

His father only waved him off. By the time he got back into the car, exhaustion sat heavier than before.

Not physical. Something worse. Something deeper.

His family felt like rot lately. Slow. Inevitable.

And somehow he suddenly wanted Shane more than before.

Wanted the sound of his voice. Wanted the quiet steadiness of him. Wanted somebody soft after all this sharpness.

His apartment felt unbearable the second he walked inside. No texts. No missed call- nothing.

Just silence.

He dropped his bag near the couch and immediately pulled up the tracker again.

Still there.

Still inside the hotel. Still minimal movement. Heart rate lower than usual. Sleeping. Still. Relief mixed uncomfortably with unease.

He called security immediately.

“Anything?”

“No movement, sir.”

“No visitors?”

“No.”

“You sure?”

“Yes.”

Ilya paced slowly through the apartment, tension sitting visibly through his shoulders now.

“What about cameras?”

A pause.

“Hotel management is delaying access. Unsure if room itself contains internal surveillance.”

Good.

Probably.

Shane would hate that.

Still. Not knowing felt worse.

“What if something wrong?”

“No indication of distress.”

His eyes drifted toward the door.

He could leave. Book another flight, go back.

See him. Make him understand.

Fight if necessary.

Apologize properly.

Something.

Anything.

The temptation sat dangerously strong for several seconds before reality dragged his attention elsewhere.

The table.

Mail.

An absurd pile of it.

Government invitations.

Federation requests.

Media appearances.

Political dinners he hated but could no longer entirely avoid now that fame had made him useful.

Training obligations.

Endorsements.

Enough responsibility to keep him here whether he wanted it or not.

His jaw tightened hard enough to ache.

Fuck.

He couldn't leave.

Not yet.

Not without consequences.

The helplessness settled ugly in his chest.

He sat heavily on the couch, elbows braced against his knees while his phone stayed clenched tightly in one hand.

One more try.

Again.

Nothing.

IGR: Please answer.

Pending.

Still nothing.

The apartment suddenly felt too large.

Too quiet.

And for the first time in a very long time, Ilya Rozanov felt something dangerously close to helplessness.

A month and a half passed faster and slower than Shane expected. The first week after blocking Rozanov hurt more than Shane wanted to admit.

Mostly because he kept accidentally running into him anyway. Not literally- online. In headlines. On sports channels. On magazine covers. On social media.

Apparently winning the Stanley Cup and becoming the youngest championship captain in years had turned Ilya Rozanov into Russia's newest obsession. Articles flooded sports media first, celebrating him as some impossible symbol of discipline and national pride. Then politics quietly started creeping into the coverage in ways that made something uncomfortable settle low in Shane's stomach.

Rozanov: Traditional Strength in Modern Hockey

Russia's Golden Alpha

Captaincy, Masculinity, and National Values

One article in particular sat badly enough that Shane reread it twice.

Something about how Rozanov represented "proper alpha leadership" and "traditional social stability," followed by commentary around omega suppression policies and the growing pressure against omega visibility in professional spaces overseas.

The implication was ugly.

Worse, Rozanov had not publicly corrected any of it.

Hadn't denied anything. Hadn't pushed back. And somehow that bothered Shane more than expected.

Because he knew him. Or at least thought he knew him.

Knew the impossible tenderness that existed underneath all the possessive bullshit. Knew the man who carefully washed his hair in showers, who sat awake after panic attacks and counted breaths until Shane could breathe again. Knew the version of him who had rested his head against Shane's stomach whispering in Russian when he thought Shane was asleep.

That man did not fit the headlines.

But then again, the version of Ilya who had scared him that night in the penthouse did.

The contradiction sat unpleasantly in Shane's chest, because somehow he still could not decide which version had been real.

Then came the gossip magazines.

Those somehow made things worse.

Because apparently hockey fame translated into celebrity gossip frighteningly fast. Shane tried not to look, really tried.

But every now and then curiosity won. Or loneliness.

Ilya outside expensive Moscow clubs. Ilya leaving restaurants at two in the morning. Ilya with models, actors, other athletes, men, women.

Always beautiful people. Always too close. Sometimes laughing. Sometimes smoking.

Always looking devastatingly handsome in expensive clothes. Shane hated how much those pictures bothered him. Because logically, he had absolutely no right.

He had ended things.

He had blocked him.

He had explicitly said no contact.

And still, seeing strangers touch him made something unpleasant tighten low in his stomach. Maybe jealousy. The omega in him was humiliated that he hadn't been able to be good enough, to keep an alpha.

Especially because some stupid, irrational part of him had quietly expected Ilya to be miserable. Devastated. Waiting.

Not thriving in Moscow nightlife while Shane quietly spiraled in sweatpants eating cereal for dinner.

Though somehow, in some of the photo angles, Rozanov never actually looked happy. That part bothered Shane too.

Because every now and then, usually in paparazzi shots, Ilya looked exhausted. Sharp around the edges somehow. Like somebody had taken something important from him and he had not quite figured out how to function without it.

Shane actively stopped himself from wondering if that had anything to do with him.

The first few weeks still felt unbearable anyway.

Everything reminded him of Ilya in stupid, inconvenient ways. Russian accents overheard in restaurants. Leather scented anything. Teal eyes in advertisements that looked nothing like his but somehow still made Shane's chest ache.

He actively tried not to think about him.

Really tried.

Deleted the urge to check his phone before it fully formed. Stopped rereading old texts. Stopped opening old screenshots.

Ignored the humiliating instinct to wonder what time it was in Moscow. Or whether Ilya had eaten. Or if he was sleeping enough. Or if he missed him too.

The silence remained.

And Shane missed him against his better judgement. At night mostly.

When the apartment got too quiet.

When he caught himself instinctively reaching for his phone after practice to tell somebody about a stupid drill or frustrating coach moment before remembering there was nobody to call anymore.

Nobody he wanted to call.

That part hurt more than expected.

Eventually, after two weeks of not being able to fully settle his own thoughts, Shane made an appointment with his doctor and made the long drive down to New York.

The small home office looked comforting in the way therapists' offices always seemed to. Warm lighting. Soft furniture. Plants arranged intentionally.

Dr. B came back-still looking just like she did when Shane first met her three years ago. After the routine exam, they sat across from each other. "You mentioned concerns involving a partner?" she asked gently halfway through the appointment.

Shane hesitated.

Because suddenly saying things out loud felt dangerous.

Permanent somehow.

"He..." Shane looked down briefly. "Took advantage."

The wording sat heavier once spoken. Not entirely accurate. Not entirely inaccurate either.

Just complicated.

Dr. B's expression softened immediately.

"Do you feel safe now?"

Shane nodded quickly.

"Yes."

"Are you still in contact?"

“No.”

A pause.

Then carefully:

“Would you like to discuss reporting options?”

Shane frowned immediately. “Reporting?”

Her tone remained calm and careful.

“Based on what you described, particularly around coercion and power dynamics, there may be legal grounds for reporting under omega protection statutes.” She paused slightly. “In this state, omega-targeted abuse protections are broad. If coercion or exploitation was involved, it may qualify as an omega hate crime.”

The suggestion hit Shane like ice water. Police. Reports. An investigation.

Rozanov.

No.

Immediately no.

“No,” he said too quickly.

Dr. B didn’t react. Only nodded.

“Okay.”

Shane frowned harder, staring down at his hands. “I just...”

God. Everything felt complicated.

“I mostly just...” His throat tightened slightly. “Need confirmation.”

“Confirmation?”

“That I’m not pregnant.”

Understanding crossed her face almost instantly.

“We can absolutely help with that.”

The relief afterward felt strangely devastating.

Negative.

Of course negative.

Logically he had known that.

Still, some ugly, embarrassing flicker of disappointment hit before Shane shoved it away immediately.

Absolutely not.

That thought was insane.

Before he left, Dr. B took his hands.

“If you ever need support,” she said quietly, “for anything, I’m here. Even if you just need to talk.”

Shane nodded awkwardly.

“Thanks.”

He never told anyone about the appointment. Not Hayden. Not Scott.

Nobody.

Instead, life slowly shifted anyway.

Mostly because Hayden refused to let him isolate himself.

“You realize you need hobbies besides hockey, right?” Jackie asked one afternoon while everyone sat outside on Hayden’s deck.

“I don’t think he does,” Scott answered immediately.

“I think his hobby is more hockey, reading about hockey, talking about hockey, thinking about hockey...” Kipp added helpfully.

Hayden looked genuinely thoughtful. “No. His hobby is pretending to enjoy life while secretly thinking about hockey.”

Shane rolled his eyes hard enough it almost hurt.

“You’re all annoying.”

“We love you too,” Jackie replied sweetly.

The teasing became routine after that.

Because Shane kept saying no.

Dinner? No.

Boat day? No.

Weekend trip? No.

Drinks? Absolutely not.

At some point Hayden stopped even pretending to ask politely.

“You know,” Hayden said one morning while stretching before their run, “you’re kind of living like this monk.”

That conversation stayed with Shane longer than expected.

Especially when Hayden admitted, bluntly, that Shane had built his entire life around hockey.

So reluctantly, awkwardly, Shane started trying things.

And unexpectedly? Architecture stuck. Then real estate. Then cabin plans. Then construction.

And somehow, without fully realizing it, Shane slowly started becoming a person outside hockey.

He found himself spending hours looking at blueprints, floor plans, cedar finishes, oversized windows, heating systems, layouts. What had started as casual curiosity quietly turned into obsession.

His cabin near his parents’ property broke ground halfway through the summer.

And embarrassingly?

He loved it.

Loved seeing progress.

Loved talking to contractors.

Loved imagining the finished space.

Jackie nearly cried the first time Shane enthusiastically explained different wood finishes for twenty straight minutes.

“Oh my god,” she whispered dramatically to Hayden. “He has a personality.”

“Holy shit,” Hayden muttered. “He’s evolving.”

“Fuck off,” Shane said, though he was smiling.

And somehow, without fully realizing it, friendships settled deeper too.

Scott and Kipp became easy.

Comfortable.

Safe.

Hayden and Jackie somehow worse in the best way, constantly dragging him places until social settings slowly stopped feeling so exhausting.

He got better at conversations.

Less awkward.

Still quiet.

Still observant.

But less painfully uncomfortable.

Life slowly shifted.

Healing in strange, quiet ways.

Even if some nights still hurt.

Even if every now and then, standing inside the unfinished shell of the cabin while sunlight spilled through oversized future windows, Shane still found himself wondering stupid things.

Like whether Rozanov would have liked it.

Whether he would have stood there pretending the kitchen layout was somehow his business.

Whether he would have looked annoyingly at home there. Shane shut those thoughts down quickly. Usually. Mostly.

Ilya was not doing well.

At first, he told himself it was temporary. Shane was angry, understandably angry, and needed space. Time. Distance.

Eventually, he would calm down. Eventually, he would answer. Eventually, they would talk like they always did, because despite everything, despite the fight and the ugly things said and the silence afterward, Hollander had still cared about him. Hadn't he? Hollander had come to him that night. Had climbed willingly into his bed after months apart, had let himself soften again in that way he only ever did with Ilya. People did not just stop wanting somebody overnight. So fine, space. Time. He could do time.

Except somewhere around week three, the silence stopped feeling temporary.

By week five, it started feeling unbearable.

Because the problem was not just that Shane refused to answer him. The problem was that Ilya could not see him. Could not hear his voice. Could not tell if he was okay or angry or hurting or spiraling or sleeping enough. The security detail stayed in place, quieter now, subtle enough that nobody would notice, but their updates somehow only made things worse.

Small, useless fragments of a life Ilya no longer had access to.

Dinner with Scott and Kipp. Returned home 9:42 PM.

Construction site visit.

Stayed with usual group for three hours.

Every report somehow felt like a knife slid carefully between his ribs because Hollander was still living. Existing. Smiling, apparently. Building routines and friendships and habits that no longer included him.

The hotel surveillance had gone nowhere. Legal issues. Security refusing access despite increasingly unreasonable offers of money. No internal cameras. No confirmation on whether the room itself even had surveillance.

Nothing except the tracker and occasional glimpses on the street. Tiny moments caught by cameras or distant observation that only made the obsession worse. A baseball cap pulled low while Hollander laughed at something Hayden said. Hollander standing outside a restaurant with Scott and Kipp looking relaxed in a way Ilya had not seen in months. Jackie linking her arm through Hollander's while crossing the street, all of them looking comfortable together, safe together.

Safe.

Because irrationally, selfishly, some ugly thing inside Ilya had expected Hollander to be hurting too from this separation.

Not forever. Just enough. Enough to miss him. Enough to hesitate.

Enough to maybe stare at his phone late at night and wonder if blocking him had been a mistake.

Instead, Hollander looked...better.

That part slowly started hollowing something violent and terrified inside Ilya's chest.

Because the photos told a story he hated. Shane looked healthier somehow. Less tense. Softer around the edges. Like the constant nervousness had eased from his shoulders. Like he had started settling into himself in a way that had nothing to do with Ilya anymore. Worse, every report made it obvious Shane was changing. Socializing more. Going out. Staying places longer. Spending weekends helping build some stupid cabin near his parents' house. Making friends in ways he had never bothered to before.

And suddenly, every ugly thought got louder.

What if Hayden replaced him?

What if Scott replaced him?

What if Shane realized he liked his life better this way? Quieter. Safer. Without some obsessive Russian alpha constantly pushing too hard and wanting too much. It was irrational. Both Pike and Hunter had bonded mates.

The thought sat poisonous.

Because for the first time in a very long time, Ilya genuinely had no control over something important.

And he hated it.

The tracker probably became unhealthy somewhere around week four.

He knew that, logically.

Still, he checked it constantly anyway. First thing in the morning. Last thing at night. Every hour in between. Sometimes every twenty minutes if anxiety got bad enough. He memorized patterns without meaning to. Shane woke up around six-thirty most mornings now. Gym after breakfast. Certain restaurants repeated. More time spent with people. More weekends out. Less time alone. The realization that Shane had slowly stopped isolating himself felt unfair somehow. Like Shane was healing while Ilya sat frozen in place.

Russia only made things worse.

His father deteriorated quietly, subtly enough that it almost seemed cruel. Forgotten names. Forgotten conversations. Mentioning people dead for years like they had spoken yesterday. Asking about hockey games from decades ago. One awful night during dinner, Grigory asked when his wife would be home, voice absent and distracted, like he had genuinely forgotten she'd been buried for seven years. Nobody said anything for several seconds. Alexie looked away. Ilya left halfway through dinner because suddenly sitting there felt impossible.

Then his brother got worse too. The cocaine stopped being casual. Stopped being manageable.

Their fights became routine. Loud arguments in hallways. Shouting matches in front of staff. One particularly bad night ended with Alexie shoving him first and Ilya hitting back hard enough to split skin across his knuckles. Security intervened. Media quietly buried it before morning.

Private disagreement.

Stress-related misunderstanding.

Excuses.

Always excuses.

Meanwhile, Ilya unraveled quietly in ways nobody fully acknowledged.

Training turned violent. He pushed harder. Hit harder. Slept less. Smoked more. Picked fights easier. Teammates stopped joking with him the same way because the mood around him shifted, colder somehow. Meaner. One rookie clipped him accidentally during drills and Ilya nearly put him through the boards hard enough that coaches physically stepped in before things escalated.

“Jesus Christ,” someone muttered afterward.

“Calm the fuck down.”

He couldn’t.

Because nothing felt right anymore.

Winning felt empty.

Captaincy felt pointless.

The trophies sat displayed beautifully in his apartment and somehow only pissed him off every time he looked at it. Because none of it mattered if Hollander was gone. None of it mattered if all the things he had spent years chasing somehow still left him sitting alone in an apartment checking a tracker like a fucking lunatic because he could not stand not knowing where one person was.

The picture broke him.

One stupid picture.

Shane standing in front of a half-built cabin, hair messy from wind, oversized hoodie hanging off his shoulders while sunlight caught across soft skin. Smiling at somebody off-camera like he had forgotten how to be lonely. Like he had forgotten how much this was supposed to hurt.

Something cracked quietly inside Ilya’s chest.

Because suddenly he could see it too clearly.

The future.

Shane moving on.

Shane forgetting him.

Somebody else eventually stepping into all the spaces Ilya had carved out for himself. Somebody safer. Softer. Healthier. Some normal alpha who knew how to love Shane without frightening him. Somebody who got Shane's laugh after bad practice. Somebody who stood in that stupid cabin kitchen making coffee. Somebody who got Shane sleepy and soft and warm in bed.

The thought made him physically nauseous.

He booked the flight that night.

Enough.

Enough space.

Enough pretending distance was helping.

Enough acting like this was temporary when every day apart only made things worse.

He met with his father's doctors the next morning, he was exhausted, running mostly on nicotine and caffeine, signing paperwork with a detached efficiency that unsettled even him. Specialists. Nurses. Bills. Twenty-four-hour supervision if necessary. Whatever was needed.

"I want every invoice paid immediately," he said flatly. "I do not care what cost."

Alexie fought him afterward, of course. Called him controlling. Possessive. Arrogant. Accused him of trying to buy control over everybody.

Normally, maybe, Ilya would have fought harder.

This time, he barely listened.

Because all he could think about was time.

Seventeen hours.

Less now.

Sixteen and some change.

That was how long until he saw Shane again.

The thought settled feverish and sharp inside his chest.

By the time the car pulled toward the airport, Moscow blurred gray outside the windows while Ilya sat rigid in the backseat staring down at his phone. Still blocked. Still nothing. Still silence. His thumb hovered uselessly over their message thread anyway, half-written apologies typed and deleted over and over because suddenly he had no idea what to say anymore.

I miss you felt pathetic.

I'm sorry somehow felt too small.

Please forgive me sat dangerously vulnerable.

No.

He would fix this in person.

He had to.

He would apologize properly. Be softer. Try harder. Whatever Shane needed, whatever it took, he would do it.

The car turned toward departures.

Less than sixteen hours now.

And somewhere in Canada, Shane Hollander had absolutely no idea that by tomorrow morning, Ilya Rozanov would be standing in front of him.

This time, Ilya was not sure he could survive being sent away again.

Chapter End Notes

Well... 😬

Ilya is maybe, potentially, definitely not doing great.

Curious where everyone stands right now because I feel like opinions are going to be divided after this chapter. Are you rooting for them to reconnect, or do you think Shane actually needs more distance? And how badly do we think this reunion is about to go?

I read every comment and theory- thank you all so much! 💙

The two months had been a form of exile, carved not by distance but by silence. The blocked calls, the vanished digital footprint- it was a void Ilya had never known, more agonizing than any physical wound. The last time Shane disappeared, it was probably due to just sort of rebellion from the little omega. This time Ilya knew what Shane was really like. How they could make each laugh, how they could tease and push each other. How devastatingly precious Hollander truly was.

The guilt, a cold, leaden companion, had festered. The memory of that night in the penthouse, which had felt like rightful possession in the moment, now played in his mind on a loop, each frame revealing a new shade of his own brutality. Rape; had it been really been that? The word, once unthinkable, now echoed in the hollow of his conscience. He had been as rough as he had been with other partners in jest and it had been a rare treat, but this had felt different. He had taken what wasn't freely given in that moment, cloaked in anger and a twisted sense of lesson-teaching. Time had not softened the truth; it had sharpened it.

Enough. The need for forgiveness became a physical thirst. He knew where Shane would be- a secluded rental house in Vancouver, a place for quiet training and, Ilya suspected, for licking wounds far from familiar eyes.

He arrived under the cover of a coastal mist, the lock on the back door yielding to his practiced, quiet force. The house was still, smelling of clean linen, lemon cleaner, and, underneath it all, the faint, heartbreakingly distant trace of honeysuckle and vanilla, chemically muted.

He found him in the bedroom. Shane was asleep, one arm curled under his cheek, his face softened in a way Ilya hadn't seen since before the awards night. The sight punched the air from Ilya's lungs. For hours, he simply stood, then sat in a chair in the corner, a specter in the dark. He watched the slow rise and fall of Shane's chest. Finally, compelled, he moved to the bedside. He knelt, his breath stilling. With a reverence that felt like penance, he brushed the very tips of his fingers over the scatter of freckles on Shane's cheekbone, a map of constellations he'd once thought he owned.

His gaze drifted to the small, transparent patch on Shane's neck. The sight of it, as always, sparked a frown of displeasure- a barrier to the truth of him. But he left it. He had forfeited the right to remove it.

Gently, he tugged the duvet down to Shane's waist. Shane wore only a pair of soft sleep shorts. Ilya's eyes traced the lines of his torso, the defined muscles of a professional athlete at rest. And there, a shot of pure, irrational disappointment lanced through him- the flat, taut plane of Shane's abdomen. He hadn't realized, until this moment, how deeply that secret, whispered prayer had taken root in his subconscious. The fantasy of a tangible, living claim had become intertwined with his need for absolution. The reality was a quiet rebuke.

He returned to the chair, steepling his fingers before his face, a patient gargoyle in the pre-dawn grey. He would wait. He would explain. He would beg if he had to.

The first pale light of sunrise was bleeding into the room when Shane began to stir. A soft sigh, a shift of limbs. Ilya remained perfectly still, watching. Shane's eyes fluttered open, blinking at the ceiling, swimming with the last remnants of sleep. He started to sit up, pushing back the covers.

Ilya moved.

He didn't speak. He simply unfolded himself from the chair, a large, sudden shape materializing from the shadows.

Shane's reaction was instantaneous and visceral. A raw, animal sound of terror ripped from his throat. He didn't scream words; he screamed pure panic. His hand flew to the nightstand, grabbing the first thing it found- a heavy glass of water. He hurled it. Ilya didn't flinch as it shattered against his shoulder, cold water soaking his shirt.

"Get out!" The words were a ragged shriek now. A book followed, then a lamp, which Ilya deflected with a raised forearm, sending it crashing to the floor in a shower of ceramic and dead light.

Ilya kept advancing, his expression grim, determined. "Hollander! Stop. Listen-"

"GET OUT!" Shane scrambled back across the bed, but there was nowhere to go. As Ilya reached the bedside, Shane launched himself not away, but at him. This wasn't flight; it was fight.

A fist connected with Ilya's jaw, a sharp, surprising crack of pain. A knee drove toward his groin, which he twisted to take on his thigh. Shane was a whirlwind of fear-fueled violence, every movement taught by years on the icefast, efficient, desperate. He punched, kicked, clawed.

Ilya let the first few blows land. He took the pain, each impact a stone on the scale of his atonement. The metallic taste of blood filled his mouth from a split lip. But when Shane's nails raked toward his eyes, he caught the wrist. When a heel aimed for his knee, he trapped the leg.

"Stop," he growled, his voice low, trying to envelop, to contain rather than strike back. He wrapped his arms around Shane's torso, pinning his arms to his sides, trying to quell the frantic thrashing.

Shane didn't stop. He couldn't. Trapped in the cage of Ilya's arms, he writhed, he bucked, he threw his head back in an attempt to break Ilya's nose. Sobs now tore through the punches, a horrible symphony of rage and terror. "Let me GO! Don't touch me! You don't get to touch me!"

He was strong, fueled by adrenaline and trauma, and for a moment, he almost broke free. Ilya had to use real strength then, hauling him back, wrestling him down onto the edge of the ruined bed, using his greater weight and size to finally immobilize him, though Shane's body still vibrated with the effort to fight, every muscle coiled and trembling under Ilya's restraining grip.

They were locked there, chests heaving, the room a wreckage around them. Ilya's face was bleeding, his shirt torn. Beneath him, Shane stared up, wild-eyed, tears of fury and fear cutting tracks through his freckles, his breath coming in shattered, silent hitches where the screams had been. The scent of his panic, sharp and acrid beneath the suppressor, filled the space between them. The quiet was worse than the chaos. It was the silence of a chasm, freshly torn open, and Ilya stood on the wrong side of it, his hope for forgiveness already lying shattered among the broken glass on the floor.

The silence that followed was deafening, thicker than the mist outside the window. It was broken only by the ragged, hitched gasps Shane couldn't control, each one a tremor that ran through his entire pinned body. Ilya could feel the frantic hammer of Shane's heart against his own chest, a wild bird trapped against ribs.

Ilya held him, but it wasn't the embrace he'd imagined during his long, guilty vigil. This was a containment of pure panic. He could see the whites all around Shane's irises, the sheer animal terror that had eclipsed any recognition, any remnant of the challenging, stubborn man he knew. The scent of it- sharp, sour, and utterly devoid of the warm vanilla-honeysuckle-clawed at Ilya's senses, a punishment more severe than any punch.

"Shane," Ilya said, his voice low and gravelly, trying to pour every ounce of desperate sincerity into the name. "Zayka. I am not here to hurt you. I swear it."

A violent shudder was the only reply. Shane's eyes darted around the room, looking for an escape that didn't exist, anywhere but at Ilya's face.

"I came... I need you to understand. What I did..." Ilya's words, rehearsed a thousand times on the flight over, felt clumsy and grotesque in the face of this tangible fear. "It was wrong. It was a breach of trust. I see that now. I have...I have thought of nothing else."

He loosened his grip, just a fraction, an offering of space. The moment the pressure eased, Shane twisted like an eel, his elbow jamming back into Ilya's sternum. It wasn't a trained move; it was pure, frantic instinct. The air left Ilya's lungs with a pained grunt, and his hold broke.

Shane scrambled off the bed, stumbling over the wreckage of the lamp, putting the ruined mattress between them. He stood, chest heaving, arms wrapped around himself. He wasn't crying now. He was shaking, his gaze fixed on Ilya with a focused, crystalline hatred that was somehow worse than the blind panic.

"Get out," Shane said, the words flat, final, and colder than the Pacific water outside. "You don't get to explain. You don't get to say my name. You don't get to be sorry here. Get out, or I will call the fucking police. Get out now."

Ilya slowly rose from the bed, holding his hands up, palms open. The taste of blood was still in his mouth. He saw himself reflected in Shane's eyes: not a lover, not a rival, but a monster who broke locks and watched people sleep. His grand plan- the explanation, the begging, the hope for a crack of forgiveness- lay in ashes around him. His very presence was the injury.

"I will go," Ilya said, the words ash in his mouth. He took a step back toward the bedroom door, then another, his eyes never leaving Shane's rigid form. "I am... I am going."

He backed into the hallway, through the living room, to the shattered back door he'd forced. The morning light was stronger now, illuminating the damage he'd caused. He paused on the threshold, looking back into the shadowed interior of the house that smelled of lemon cleaner and fear.

Shane hadn't moved. He stood silhouetted in the bedroom doorway, a statue of defiance and trauma.

There was nothing more to say that wouldn't be another violation. Ilya turned and walked out into the damp Vancouver morning, the chill seeping through his torn, water-stained shirt. The door hung open behind him, a broken mouth. He had flown across the world to bridge a chasm, and all he had done was widen it with his own two hands, leaving only silence and the echo of shattered glass in his wake.

The moment the broken back door swung shut, cutting off the sight of Ilya's retreating back, the strength bled from Shane's legs. He didn't so much sit as collapse, his back sliding down the wall until he hit the floor of the hallway, knees drawn to his chest. A great, silent shudder wracked him, and then the tears came- not the furious tears from the fight, but a deep, silent river of despair that felt like it was tearing something loose inside his ribcage.

He pressed the heels of his hands into his eyes, but it was useless. The images flashed: Ilya's bleeding lip, the darkening spot on his shoulder from the thrown glass, the raw, desperate guilt in his eyes that had looked so much like love it made Shane's stomach twist. A part of him, a stupid, traitorous part that still lived in the memory of bathwater and whispered Russian, screamed to run after him. To call him back. To use the first aid kit under the sink and clean the cut, to press a cold cloth to the bruise he'd put on that jaw, to ask if his ribs were okay from the elbow strike.

He choked on a sob, disgusted with himself. No. No, you don't get to do that. He hurt you. He just broke into your house. He watched you sleep.

The two truths warred, a sickening civil war in his soul. The monster and the man were the same person, and his body didn't know how to reconcile it. His knuckles were throbbing, scraped from connecting with Ilya's face. He stared at them. He'd hurt him. The thought brought no satisfaction, only a heavier wave of nauseating confusion.

He couldn't fall apart. Not now. The practical part of his brain, the survivor, began to pipe up through the static of panic. Hayden. Jackie. The baby. They're coming in a few hours. I have to be ok for them.

The reality was an ice bath. He couldn't let them see this. He couldn't let them see the broken door, the shattered lamp, the water stain on the carpet, the wild terror in his eyes. They'd ask questions. They'd want to help. They'd call the police. The thought of explaining, of saying the words, of making it all real in a police report or in the pitying eyes of his friends... it was unbearable.

With a physical effort that made his muscles scream, he pushed himself up. He went to the sink first, splashing icy water on his face, scrubbing at the tear tracks. His reflection was ghastly- pale, freckles standing out in stark relief, eyes red-rimmed and hollow. He looked like a victim. He couldn't be a victim. He was Shane Hollander, one of the best fucking hockey players in the world. He had a life, a career, friends coming over.

He moved on autopilot, the training of a lifetime taking over. Crisis management. Clean the mess.

He found the broom and dustpan. The glass from the water tumbler was easy. The ceramic from the lamp was more difficult, tiny shards glittering in the carpet pile. He picked through it on his hands and knees, his mind a blessed blank. He sopped up the water with towels. He righted the nightstand, re-stacked the books. The room began to look orderly again, though it felt like a stage set, a lie built over a fault line.

Neither the front or back doors were surprisingly broken. He didn't know how Rozanov had gotten in, but he flipped the deadbolt on and he'd think of something else later.

As he worked, one thought circled, cold and sharp: How did he find me?

This house wasn't on any team listing. He'd paid in cash through a friend of a friend. Only a handful of people knew the address. Had Ilya had him followed? Had he hacked something? The violation of it was profound, a different layer of sickness beneath the physical fear. His safe place was breached. His privacy was an illusion. That question, the how, was a ticking bomb he'd have to defuse later. For now, it just sat in his gut, a cold stone of dread.

Finally, the house was quiet and orderly. The only evidence was the chair against the door and the faint, lingering scent of Ilya's leather-and-night air scent, which Shane attacked with a can of citrus-scented air freshener, spraying until his lungs burned.

He stood in the center of the living room, breathing hard. He looked normal. The house looked normal. He willed his hands to stop trembling.

When the doorbell rang, it was a normal, cheerful sound. Shane took a final, deep breath, forced his mouth into the shape of a smile, and went to greet his friends, to coo over their baby, to pretend with every fiber of his being that his world hadn't just been shattered and hastily glued back together, with the man who broke it still out there, knowing exactly where he lived.

He forced air into his lungs, past the tightness. Normal. You are normal. You got this.

He opened the door. The bright, coastal sunlight framed Hayden and Jackie on the step, a picture of casual contentment. Hayden held a carrier seat with a tiny, sleeping bundle. Jackie had a diaper bag and a warm, easy smile that faltered for a microsecond when she saw him.

“Hey, you!” Hayden said, his voice a little too loud, a little too cheerful for the quiet street. “Ready for some uncle duties?” He reached over the door and gave Shane a quick brotherly one armed hug.

“Hey,” Shane said, and was relieved when his voice didn’t crack. He stepped back, gesturing them in. “Always. Come in.”

As they shuffled past, Shane’s senses, frayed and hyper-alert, scanned them. Did they smell the citrus air freshener, so aggressively floral? Could they see the faint, damp patch on the carpet if the light hit it just right?

“Place looks great,” Jackie said, her eyes doing a gentle sweep. She was always perceptive. “Quiet out here. Perfect for your pre-season reset.”

“Yeah,” Shane agreed, shoving his hands into the pockets of his sweatpants to hide the scraped, trembling knuckles. “That was the idea.”

They settled in the living room. Hayden expertly unclipped the baby- Emma- from his carrier, cradling the drowsy infant against his chest. The sight was a physical ache in Shane, so pure and so far removed from the violence of the morning it felt like watching a scene from another planet.

“So,” Hayden said, lowering himself onto the sofa with the care of someone holding nitroglycerin. “How’s the solo training going? You beating the crap out of the imaginary competition?”

Shane's laugh was a short, brittle sound. "Something like that." He could still feel the impact of his fist against Ilya's jaw, the sickening give of flesh and bone. He flexed his hand under the fabric of his pocket.

Jackie was watching him, her head tilted. "You okay, Shane? You seem a little... jumpy."

Jumpy. The word was so inadequate it was almost funny. "Just tired," he said, the lie smooth from practice. "Time change still messing with me a bit. And you know, the quiet. I just needed some time to think."

Hayden nodded, buying it. "Tell me about it. First week home, I kept waking up at 4 a.m. ready for a pre-game meal." He looked down at the baby, his expression softening into a wonder that was still new. "This girl's schedule is its own kind of chaos, though."

They talked. They talked about the baby's sleep (nonexistent), about mutual friends, about the league gossip. Shane contributed where he could, nodding, smiling when it seemed required. He held Emma when Jackie offered, the warm, solid weight of the sleeping infant a shocking comfort. He smelled of powder and milk and utter innocence. Shane traced a tiny, perfect ear with a finger that had, hours ago, been curled into a fist.

But his mind was a split screen. On one side: Jackie's story about her mother visiting. On the other: the sound of shattering glass. Hayden's joke about their goalie's new haircut. The image of Ilya's blood, dark against his pale lip. The warm weight of Emma in his arms. The cold, assessing look in Ilya's eyes as he watched him sleep.

He was a ghost at his own gathering, smiling at the right moments, making the right noises, all while screaming silently inside the shell of himself.

"You sure you're okay?" Jackie asked again, later, as she was packing the diaper bag. Her voice was lower, meant only for him. "You seem... far away."

He met her gaze, willing his own to be clear. “I’m good, really. Just... offseason brain. You know how it is. Decompressing.”

She searched his face for a beat longer, then squeezed his arm. “Okay. But call if you need anything. Anything at all.”

The promise, so full of genuine care, was a knife twist. He couldn’t call. He could never tell them. This secret, this shame and fear, was a wall between him and the people who loved him.

He saw them out, the cheerful farewells echoing in the now-empty house. He closed the front door- the locked front door- and leaned his forehead against the cool wood.

The performance was over. The silence rushed back in, but it was different now. It wasn’t just empty. The only thing standing between him and the knowledge that Ilya had been here. That he knew. That he could come back.

The tidy living room, the clean carpet, the smiling face he’d presented to his friends- it all felt like a diorama, a fragile scene constructed over a gaping hole. He was alone again, but he wasn’t. The ghost of the morning haunted every corner. The question pulsed in the quiet, a second heartbeat: How did he find me?

And the more terrifying, unanswerable question that followed: What does he want now?

Shane slid down the wall once more, his back to the chair-blocked door, and wrapped his arms around his knees. He didn’t cry this time. He just sat in the manufactured citrus scent and the deepening afternoon shadows, waiting for a threat he could no longer see, but whose presence had seeped into the very foundations of his safe house.

His hands only shook a little as he pulled his phone from his pocket. He didn’t go to his contacts. He went to his notes, finding the number for the project manager overseeing the construction of his new house- the one he’d been carefully planning for years, a forever home meant for a life he’d once vaguely imagined. Its most important feature had just been radically re-prioritized.

The call connected. “Michael? It’s Shane Hollander.”

“Mr. Hollander! Hey, we got your notes on the kitchen finishes. The quartz you picked is actually back-ordered by about six- ”

“I don’t care about the quartz,” Shane interrupted, his voice firmer than he felt. He walked to the front window, peering through the blinds at the empty, sun-drenched street. Nothing moved. “I’m calling about the timeline. I need it finished. Yesterday.”

There was a pause on the other end. “Well, we’re already on a pretty aggressive schedule for the custom work. The security system integration alone- ”

“Hire more crew. A larger crew. Work double shifts. Whatever it takes.” Shane’s mind raced over the blueprints. “Prioritize the master suite enclosure and the security system. I want the exterior cameras, motion sensors, and the reinforced door on the master wing operational before anything else. Cost is not an issue.”

Another, longer pause. Michael was a good architect, used to the whims of wealthy clients, but this was a sudden, sharp pivot. “Shane, is everything okay? This sounds... urgent.”

Oh, nothing much. Someone broke in. Someone who knows me. Someone I can’t stop. Shane thought to himself “I just need it done, Michael. My pre-season window is shorter than I thought. I want to be in by fall. Make it happen. Please.”

The ‘please’ was the only crack in the veneer. Michael heard it. “Alright. I’ll re-sequence the trades and get more bodies on site Monday. I’ll email you a revised, accelerated schedule by end of day.”

“Thank you.” Shane hung up before his voice could betray anything else. He stared at the phone. One concrete action. A fortress, ordered. It felt pathetic and necessary all at once.

Next, he scrolled to a different contact. This performance required a different tone. He took another steadying breath, forcing his shoulders down from around his ears.

His mother picked up on the second ring. “Shane! Sweetheart, I was just thinking about you. How’s the rain out there?”

Her voice, warm and familiar, was an anchor and an agony. He could tell her. The words bubbled up, acidic, in his throat. He swallowed them. “It’s misty. Not too bad. How are you and Dad?”

They talked of mundane things: his father’s garden, a cousin’s graduation. Shane leaned against the kitchen counter, he made the right sounds, the light laughs.

“So,” his mother said, shifting gears into what he called her ‘team manager’ voice. “I was looking at the preseason schedule they sent. You start camp in what, seven days? And you’ve got that charity golf thing before that. Have you booked your flight east?”

“Not yet,” Shane said, his eyes tracking a flaw in the ceiling texture. A crack. He hadn’t noticed it before. Was it new? “I’ll do it this week. The training facility here is good. I’m just... getting my head right, you know? Quiet time.”

“Of course, honey. You work so hard. Just don’t get too quiet on us.” She meant it as a joke. It landed like a diagnosis.

They talked dates, logistics. He promised to send his travel plans. The entire conversation was a masterpiece of normalcy, a broadcast from a version of himself that felt like a recording. All the while, a part of his brain screamed in a soundproof room.

“Okay, I’ll let you go, Mom. Love you.”

“Love you too, sweetie. Call anytime.”

He ended the call and let the phone clatter onto the counter. The silence in the house was now a living thing. It pulsed with the memory of violence, with the phantom scent of leather and cedar.

He had taken two steps: one toward a fortified future, one toward maintaining the illusion of a peaceful present. Neither solved the immediate problem standing in his kitchen, the terrifying knowledge that the man who broke into this home, his hunger for forgiveness curdled into something darker, and he knew exactly where Shane was.

The rental car smelled of damp wool and the coppery tang of his own blood. Ilya sat behind the wheel, the engine off, staring at the mist-shrouded house growing smaller in the rearview mirror. The adrenaline that had propelled him across an ocean and through a locked door was gone, leaving a hollow, aching fatigue. And a strange, perverse thrum of pride.

He prodded his split lip with his tongue, wincing at the fresh sting. The knuckle-mark on his jaw was a hot, promising throb. He'd have a spectacular bruise.

Good. The thought was immediate, unbidden. A dark bloom of satisfaction in the wreckage of his failure.

Shane had fought. Not just the frantic, slapping panic of a cornered animal, but with real, trained violence. Those weren't the wild swings of someone who'd never thrown a punch. The hook to his jaw had been compact, brutal, the weight of Shane's body behind it. The knee had been aimed with vicious, knowing precision. He'd used his leverage, his speed, every ounce of his athlete's strength.

Ilya had known, abstractly, that Shane didn't fight on the ice. It was one of the things that set him apart in their league of enforcers and agitators- a cool, almost disdainful refusal to drop the gloves, as if the mere scrum was beneath his strategic mind. Ilya had assumed it was a lack, a softness.

He was wrong. The omega hadn't lacked the skill; he'd been choosing not to use it. He'd been saving it. For this.

A grim, bloody smile touched Ilya's mouth. His omega could throw a punch. Could fight like a demon when truly threatened. The knowledge was a hot, possessive thrill. He had seen a part of Shane no one else on earth had ever witnessed- not his coaches, not his teammates, not the fans who thought they knew the unflappable defenseman. That raw, survival-level fury belonged to Ilya alone. He had provoked it. He owned it.

The pride curdled as quickly as it had risen, poisoned by the memory of what followed.

The fight had been one thing. It was the collapse after that was seared into him. The way Shane had slid down the wall, the soundless, body-wracking sobs that had stolen the air from the room. Ilya had seen him take brutal hits on the ice, get stitched up, and return with ice in his veins. He had never seen him break like that. Shatter.

The scent in the room hadn't been anger or challenge. It had been pure, undiluted terror, sharp as ammonia beneath the chemical suppressor. It was the scent of a creature that believed it was going to die.

And Ilya had put it there.

The satisfaction iced over. He looked down at his own hands, resting on his knees. They were the hands that had pinned those trembling wrists, that had gripped and restrained and manhandled. They were the hands that had, months ago, touched those same freckles with a reverence he hadn't known he possessed.

He had come for forgiveness.

He started the car, the engine's growl too loud in the quiet street. As he pulled away, the phantom scent of something heavy and almost tar-like seemed to cling to his clothes. The pride was gone, fully extinguished. In its place was a colder, heavier understanding.

He had wanted to see the fighter in Shane. And he had. But in drawing that fighter out, he had finally, irrevocably, become the monster Shane needed to fight against. The locked door was no longer just wood and metal. It was a boundary drawn in blood and fear, and he was permanently on the wrong side of it. The knowledge sat in his gut, heavier than any trophy, and far more hollow.

The hotel was a mid-tier chain, chosen for its anonymity and its proximity- close enough to feel the magnetic pull of Shane's distress, far enough to be a ghost. Ilya bypassed the lobby, took the stairs, and let himself into a generic suite that smelled of lemon cleaner and stale air.

Silence.

It was worse than the aftermath of the fight. This was the silence of consequence. He set the room key down with a soft click that echoed in the empty space.

His face throbbed. He touched his split lip, the coppery taste of blood still on his tongue. The sting was a welcome focal point. In the bathroom's harsh fluorescent light, he examined the damage. The bruise on his jaw was already blooming, a dark testament to Shane's surprising, potent strength. A grim, proud smile tugged at the wound. His omega could hit. He'd always known there was steel beneath the quiet focus, but to feel it, to have it aimed at him... it was perversely exhilarating. It made the wanting worse.

His phone buzzed. He pulled it from his pocket. His father's name glared from the screen, a demand from another life. The Initiative. The ambassador role. The proper Russian alpha with a compliant omega on his arm. The future they'd laid out for him over expensive vodka felt like a sick joke now.

He rejected the call. Then, with a cold, final tap, he blocked the number. Let the old man rage. Ilya would fund his care from an ocean away- the best doctors, the most comfortable silence money could buy. That debt was paid. His only debt now was to the man twenty minutes away, who saw him as a monster.

He found the minibar. The vodka was cheap, but it was cold. He poured it over ice, the clink loud in the quiet, and took the glass to the window. The city lights blurred in the rain-streaked glass, a smeared painting of a life he wasn't part of.

The first swallow was fire over the cut, a clean, clarifying pain. He closed his eyes.

Calm. He needed Shane calm. Rational. Able to listen to him. But how do you calm a creature you've just cornered and attacked? You don't approach again. You change its entire environment.

The realization uncoiled in his mind, not as a flash of insight, but as a cold, settling certainty. Forgiveness was a naive fantasy. Trust was ashes. Apologies were words, and words had failed him spectacularly.

What remained was possession. Not the frantic, physical claiming of before, but a deeper, more absolute form. He didn't just want Shane in his bed. He wanted to be the axis on which Shane's world turned. The unseen hand that guided his fate. The source of his safety and his peace. He wanted to be so essential, so inextricably woven into the fabric of Shane's existence, that the idea of a life without him would become unthinkable.

It was wrong. He knew it was wrong with a clarity that was almost peaceful. It was a violation on a scale that made what he had been doing seem like petty misdemeanors. It was monstrous.

He didn't care.

The refusal was absolute, a stone wall in his soul. Let it be monstrous. Let it be wrong. He had tasted what it was to have Shane- his spirit, his body, his trust- and the emptiness without him was a void that promised madness. He would not live in that void. And he would not share. The sight of Shane sitting between Hayden and Scott Hunter, the easy camaraderie, the touches... it flashed behind his eyes, a fresh spike of fury. No. That ended now.

He took another long drink, the plan crystallizing with each burning sip.

He would need information. Everything. The new house Shane was building- its location, its blueprints, its security schematics. He would know its weaknesses before the foundation was finished. He would know Shane's daily routines, his friends' habits, his fears, his small comforts. He would become a scholar of Shane Hollander.

And then, he would become his guardian.

A problem with the construction crew? A reliable new foreman would appear, recommended by a mysterious benefactor. A suspicious fan lurking near his training rink? Security would be subtly, permanently increased. A bureaucratic hurdle with a permit? It would vanish. He would smooth every path, eliminate every annoyance, shield him from every conceivable threat. He would weave a net of security so seamless, so comfortable, that Shane would sink into it without ever noticing its strings.

He would make himself the answer to every unspoken need, the solution to every problem Shane didn't even know he had. He would be the reason Shane's life ran smoothly, the invisible source of his peace. Dependence would be his foundation. Gratitude would be the lock.

And when the time was right, when Shane was settled, secure, and quietly wondering who his unseen protector could be... Ilya would step from the shadows. Not as a supplicant begging for forgiveness. Not as a threat breaking down doors. But as the architect of his peace. The only one who could possibly understand and provide for him so completely.

It was a long game. A patient game. It required a level of control and foresight he'd never needed on the ice. It meant disappearing, becoming a ghost, a whisper, a feeling of safety.

He drained the glass, the ice cubes clicking against his teeth. The hollow fatigue was gone, burned away by the vodka and the new, chilling purpose. The pain in his lip was a familiar companion now, a reminder of the cost of brute force.

Brute force had failed. So he would use strategy. He would use patience. He would use the vast, invisible machinery of the world itself.

He set the empty glass down. The reflection in the dark window was no longer a man haunted by failure. It was a man with a plan. His eyes were clear, hard, resolved.

He would not let Shane go. He would make Shane's world so perfectly, irrevocably his, that leaving would never again be a thought that crossed his mind.

Every creak in the wood sounded deliberate. Every shifting shadow caught in the corner of his eye felt watchful.

Shane checked the locks.

Again.

Then the windows.

His phone buzzed hard against the kitchen counter, nearly making him jump out of his skin.

He grabbed it too fast.

Scott Hunter

Shane blinked.

"Hey man," he answered.

"Hey kid," Scott said.

Something in Shane loosened despite himself.

"How's it going? You two get settled ok?"

"Yes, we're alright. But, important business." Scott paused dramatically. "Kip's first art show is this weekend in Brooklyn."

Shane frowned. "Art show?"

In the background, he could hear Kip groan.

"Don't say it like that," Kip said, voice suddenly louder through the speaker. "It sounds embarrassing when you say it like that."

Scott ignored him. "We're forcing you to come."

“I have training.”

“I have a flight Sunday night.”

“You’ll make your flight,” Scott said immediately. “I literally already looked. We’ll get you back to Canada on time.”

“And,” Kip added reluctantly, “I guess it would be nice if you came.”

The silence stretched. Shane looked around the rental.

The too-clean floor where glass had shattered. The bedroom doorway.

Suddenly, the thought of staying here another night made something cold slide down his spine.

He didn’t want to sleep here.

Didn’t want to wonder if every sound was a footstep. Didn’t want to wake up and check shadows. “Okay,” Shane said suddenly.

Scott paused.

“...Wait, seriously?”

“Yeah.” Shane was already moving toward the bedroom. “I’ll come.”

“Holy shit,” Scott laughed. “Who are you and what did you do with Shane?”

“Shut up.”

Kip sounded pleased in the background.

“I’ll text you details.”

“Cool.”

The call ended.

Shane stood in the middle of the bedroom for exactly three seconds before grabbing his duffel bag.

Fast.

He packed fast. Clothes, toiletries, chargers. Everything.

The sooner he got out of this cabin, the better.

He told himself it was for fun. For Kip.

For normalcy.

But deep down, beneath the excuses, sat a quieter truth he refused to examine too closely:

He didn't want to be alone here anymore.

The gallery was louder than Shane had expected.

Not loud in the way that he was used to at games and such, but a softer, denser kind of noise. The murmur of expensive conversations layered over quiet jazz, glasses clinking, shoes tapping against polished concrete floors. Warm lighting reflected off white walls and oversized abstract pieces, everything curated into something that felt impossibly adult and intimidating.

Shane had almost backed out twice before even coming inside.

Scott hadn't let him.

"Relax, kiddo. Kip said to make sure you were ok," Scott had said bluntly outside the entrance, straightening Shane's jacket without permission. "Which means I'm not leaving you alone."

"I'm not weird."

"You look like you're about to bolt."

"I'm fine."

Scott had given him a long look. "Sure you are."

And then, without making a thing of it, he'd stayed close.

Not suffocating, just... nearby.

Close enough that Shane could glance across the room and find him talking to someone, drink in hand, always keeping one eye casually in Shane's direction like it wasn't obvious.

It should've annoyed him. Instead, Shane found himself strangely grateful.

The crowd pressed too close sometimes. Too many strangers. Too many people brushing shoulders, laughing too loud, standing behind him unexpectedly.

Every unexpected movement made his nerves jump.

The last twenty-four hours had scraped him raw.

Still, he tried. For Kip. The walls were lined with his work, and honestly, Shane was kind of blown away.

Some of it was abstract, layered textures and dark colors that somehow still managed to feel emotional. Others were startlingly realistic portraits, all sharp shadows and soft expressions, the kind of pieces that made people stop walking.

“You actually did all this?” Shane asked earlier, genuinely stunned.

Kip, already halfway through pretending not to care, shrugged awkwardly.

“Yeah.”

“This is insane.”

“No, seriously,” Shane interrupted. “Like... good good.”

Kip had looked weirdly embarrassed after that.

Now, hours later, Shane stood near one of the larger pieces with a small paper paddle in hand, staring at the bid number he’d scribbled down.

Three pieces. One was a dark ocean landscape that reminded him strangely of Vancouver. Another was a black-and-white city piece Scott claimed looked depressing as hell.

The last was smaller.

A quiet painting of winter trees beneath soft gold light.

Something about it had made his chest ache.

“You realize you’re becoming an art guy now,” Scott said, appearing at his elbow with another drink.

“I’m supporting a friend.”

“You bought half the wall.”

“I did not.”

Scott snorted.

“You absolutely did.”

Shane rolled his eyes, but his attention drifted toward the crowd again.

Too many people.

Too warm.

Too many voices overlapping.

His chest tightened.

Someone laughed too sharply nearby and Shane startled before he could stop himself.

Scott noticed immediately.

His expression shifted.

“You okay?”

“Yeah,” Shane said too quickly.

Scott didn’t look convinced.

“You sure?”

“Just need air.”

The answer came automatically.

Scott hesitated.

“You want me to- ”

“No.” Shane forced a small smile. “I’m good. Stay with Kip.”

A pause.

Then Scott nodded slowly.

“Text me if you disappear.”

“I’m 20 years old. I’m not a child.”

“Fuck off.”

That at least earned the laugh Scott had clearly been aiming for.

Shane slipped through the crowd toward the balcony doors before anyone else could stop him.

The cold night air hit him immediately.

Quiet.

God.

He exhaled hard, stepping into the shadows near the far side of the balcony, pressing lightly against the wall.

The city stretched below in glittering lights.

His pulse still felt too fast.

Too much noise.

Too many people behind him.

Too many places someone could appear unexpectedly.

He closed his eyes.

Just for a second.

Breathe in.

Out.

In.

Out.

“So,” a soft voice said a few feet away, calm enough not to make him jump, “you don’t like crowds either, Shane Hollander?”

His eyes snapped open.

A woman sat near the balcony railing, one leg crossed over the other, a champagne glass balanced loosely in her hand.

Dark coat.

Soft makeup.

A face he recognized instantly.

Shane blinked.

Then blinked again.

“Oh my god,” he said before he could stop himself.

She laughed quietly.

“Well, that’s usually either a good reaction or a really bad one.”

“You’re- ”

“Hopefully not about to be accused of stalking,” she said dryly.

“Rose Landry,” Shane finished, slightly horrified at himself.

Her smile widened.

“Guilty.”

Jesus.

He knew exactly who she was.

Thrillers mostly. Fun damsel in distress movies he’d see a million times on airplanes and hotel rooms at two in the morning because sleep never came easily during road trips.

She tilted her head slightly.

“You okay?” she asked after a moment. “You look like the crowd in there tried to kill you.”

Something about her tone made him laugh unexpectedly.

Small, but real.

“Feels a little like that,” he admitted.

“Ah,” she said knowingly. “You’re hiding.”

He hesitated.

“...Maybe.”

“That’s okay,” she said simply. “I hide too.”

She gestured vaguely toward the doors.

“Too many people pretending to be interesting.”

That made him laugh again.

And somehow, without meaning to, he found himself staying.

At first, it was awkward. Small comments.

Jokes. She asked how he knew Kip. He asked how she knew Kip.

Apparently, an indie film she’d done years ago had used one of Kip’s early pieces, and they’d stayed friendly.

“You bought anything?” she asked eventually.

“Three pieces.”

Her eyebrows lifted.

“Damn. Rich hockey player behavior.”

“Supporting local artists,” Shane said defensively.

She smiled.

“Very noble of you.”

Hours slipped strangely after that.

Easy. Unexpectedly easy.

They talked about movies. About terrible hotel coffee. About travel. About weird fan encounters. Rose admitted she sometimes wore hats and sunglasses specifically to grocery shop unnoticed.

Shane told her about getting recognized at gas stations in the middle of nowhere by aggressively enthusiastic Canadian dads.

At some point, Scott appeared briefly through the doors, clearly looking for him.

His eyes narrowed instantly at the sight.

Shane gave him a look.

Don't.

Scott mouthed: Are you ok?

Shane shooed him off.

Rose laughed so hard she nearly spilled her drink.

“Protective friend?”

“Yea, kind of.”

“Mhm.”

Scott lingered suspiciously for another thirty seconds before disappearing again.

And for the first time in what felt like forever, Shane realized something strange.

He hadn't checked over his shoulder once in almost an hour.

Hadn't thought about the cabin.

Or the broken lock.

Or the smell of citrus covering fear.

For one night, standing beneath soft balcony lights with an actress whose films he'd watched alone too many times to admit out loud, Shane felt something dangerously unfamiliar.

Safe.

Chapter End Notes

Well... 😊

I feel like I need to sit in a corner after writing this chapter.

A lot happened here, and I know emotions are probably VERY mixed right now. Shane finally stopped running and fought back, Ilya got a reality check (sort of...), and somehow we also ended up at an art gallery with a certain actress 🙄

I'm genuinely curious where everyone's head is at after this one:

Were you surprised Shane fought back the way he did?

Do you think Ilya actually understands the damage he caused, is causing and will cause?

Thoughts on Rose?? Unexpected friendship? Potential chaos? 🙄

And most importantly... if you were Shane right now, would you ever trust Ilya again?

As always, comments make my entire day and I LOVE reading your theories (even when they stress me out 😂). Chapter 17 is already in progress and things are definitely shifting.

Thank you all for reading ❤️

Chapter 17: Chapter 17

Chapter Summary

A lighter chapter before we get into something not so nice as a fair warning. Personally, I love Rose so hope y'all like her too.

Next chapter will be up tomorrow night. Maybe earlier.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The morning after Kip's art show, Shane woke up with his phone still in his hand and the strange, unfamiliar sensation of having slept well.

Not well, exactly. Not peacefully all the way through. His body still felt heavy in that bruised, hollow way it had for days, like his muscles had been scraped from the inside and then packed back into the wrong places. But there was no violent lurch awake this time. No hand flying toward an empty nightstand. No phantom shape unfolding from the corner of the room before his eyes were even open. For one suspended second, lying on Scott and Kip's guest bed beneath soft blankets that smelled faintly like detergent and someone else's home, Shane simply blinked at the pale morning light leaking through the blinds and realized he had made it through the night without checking the lock once.

The realization should have been comforting. Instead, it made his throat tighten. Because he knew exactly why.

He had not slept because he was 'healed' or because the fear had finally loosened its teeth from the back of his neck. He had slept because Scott had been down the hall. Because Kip had been moving around the apartment late into the night, still too wired from the gallery to settle, his voice drifting through the walls in excited bursts as Scott listened and laughed and told him for the fourth time that yes, most of the paintings selling actually did count as a successful show. Shane had slept because he wasn't alone in a quiet rental house with too many shadows and a man somewhere in the world who knew how to get through locked doors without making a sound.

His phone screen had gone dark. When he pressed the side button, nothing happened for a second, and a cold needle of panic slid under his ribs before the screen finally lit up.

No new messages.

Not from Rose.

Not from anyone else.

He told himself that was fine. It was normal. It was morning. She had probably gone home and gone to bed like a normal person after spending half the night hiding on a balcony with him. He had sent the message from Scott's phone anyway, not his own, so maybe she had answered Scott and Scott hadn't checked yet. Or maybe she thought he was weird. Maybe sending screenshots of nonfiction books at one in the morning after knowing someone for five hours was, objectively, insane.

Shane stared at the ceiling.

"Fuck," he muttered.

The bedroom door cracked open without warning, and Shane nearly launched himself through the mattress.

Scott stood there in sweatpants, hair a mess, mug in hand, eyebrows raised.

"Jesus," Scott said. "Relax. I knocked."

"No, you didn't."

"I thought about knocking."

"That's not the same thing."

Scott's gaze sharpened for half a second, too quick for most people to catch. Shane caught it anyway. The little assessment. The way Scott's eyes moved over him, taking in the phone clutched too tightly in his hand, the stiff line of his shoulders, the breath he had not fully managed to get back under control.

Then Scott ruined it by smirking.

"You sleep with your phone now?"

Shane threw a pillow at him.

Scott dodged badly, mostly because he had a mug in one hand and refused to sacrifice the coffee. The pillow clipped his shoulder and slid uselessly to the floor.

"Stop opening doors like a serial killer."

"Stop sleeping like a convalescent Victorian child."

Shane sat up slowly, rubbing both hands over his face. His head felt thick. Not hungover, because he hadn't actually drunk much the night before, but wrung out and overused. Like his brain had been running through crisis drills all night even while his body slept.

Scott leaned one shoulder against the doorframe.

"You okay?"

There it was again.

The question everyone kept asking in slightly different voices.

Jackie, soft with worry. His mother, warm and unsuspecting. Scott dry but too careful underneath.

Shane looked down at his phone.

“Yeah,” he said. “I’m fine.”

Scott did not move.

Shane sighed. “I slept, okay? That’s something.”

That, at least, seemed to ease whatever Scott had been bracing for. His expression softened just a little.

“Good,” he said. Then, because apparently sincerity could only exist in his body for five seconds at a time, he added, “So you and Rose Landry talked for a good while.”

Shane groaned and fell back against the pillow.

“Yes, she was nice.”

“Oh my god,” Scott said immediately, delighted. “You like her.”

“I like people who don’t annoy me before nine in the morning.”

“That rules me out.”

“Exactly.”

Scott grinned into his coffee.

From somewhere in the apartment, Kip called, “Is he awake?”

“No,” Shane called back. Scott looked at him. “I’m asleep.”

Kip appeared behind Scott a moment later, hair still damp from a shower, dressed casually in jeans and a sweater. He was holding his own coffee mug with both hands and looked softer than he had the night before, the glow of the show still clinging to him, but quieter now. Almost shy in the aftermath of being celebrated.

“Morning,” Kip said.

“Morning.” Shane pushed himself upright again. “Still famous?”

Kip rolled his eyes, but the smile gave him away.

Scott bumped his shoulder against Kip’s. “Very famous. Insufferable already.”

“I sold paintings, I didn’t win an Oscar.”

“You sold most of them.”

Kip looked down into his mug, pleased despite himself.

Shane felt something warm flicker in his chest at the sight. It was easier to focus on that than on anything else. Easier to be happy for Kip. Easier to sit in this sunlit room with someone else’s coffee smell drifting through the apartment and pretend the world had not split open under him two days ago.

“It was a beautiful exhibit.” Shane said after a moment. “I meant what I said. You should be very proud, I loved we brought.

Kip’s face changed. Not dramatically, but enough. The guarded edges softened, his mouth pressing into a line like he was trying not to let the compliment land too hard.

“Thanks,” he said, quieter.

“I want that one shipped to my parents’ house, if that’s okay.”

Scott blinked. “You bought one for your parents?”

“My mom likes trees.”

Scott stared at him for a beat, then put a hand over his chest.

“Your mother is terrifying. I met her once last year. She’s intense.”

“Don’t make it weird.”

“I should be getting ready to leave..”

“Your flight isn’t for another few hours.”

“I have a few errands and then I can sit at the airport.”

Kip laughed softly. “Honestly, that sounds like something he would do.”

It did. And, as soon as the words settled, Shane realized he actually wanted to.

Not because he liked airports. He didn’t. Airports were terrible, all noise and lines and stale coffee and people who had apparently never learned how to walk in straight lines. But airports were public. Crowded in a way that felt annoying rather than threatening. Full of cameras, security, movement. No quiet bedrooms. No chairs in dark corners. No private silence where someone could wait for him to wake up.

Scott must have seen the decision forming.

“You really are going to the airport early.”

Shane shrugged, reaching for his duffel bag on the floor.

“Might buy a new phone.”

Scott’s amusement dimmed. “Because yours was acting weird?”

“It deleted her number.”

“Rose’s?”

“Yeah.”

“And the message.”

Scott’s eyes narrowed.

Shane kept his own face carefully casual as he stood and started stuffing clothes into his bag with more force than necessary. “Probably a glitch.”

“Phones don’t usually just delete one number.”

“Shane.”

He hated the way Scott said his name sometimes. Not teasing. Not kiddo. Just Shane, like he was gently but firmly putting a hand against a door before Shane could close it all the way.

He zipped the bag.

“I’m getting a new one.”

Scott watched him for a long moment, then nodded once.

“Okay.”

No more questions.

That was what almost cracked him.

Not the pushing. Not the concern. The fact that Scott, loudmouth, irritating, boundary-stomping Scott, looked at him and chose not to push because something in Shane must have looked fragile enough to make him stop.

Shane swallowed hard and swung the duffel strap over his shoulder.

“I’ll text you when I land.”

“With the new phone.”

“With the new phone.”

“And you’ll give me the number.”

“Yes, Dad.”

Scott’s mouth twitched, but his eyes stayed serious.

“Good.”

Kip walked him to the door with Scott, still looking pleased and tired and a little overwhelmed. Before Shane could step out, Kip surprised him by reaching forward and giving him a quick hug. It was awkward because Kip was awkward sometimes and Shane was worse, but it was real.

“Thanks for coming,” Kip said against his shoulder. “I know crowds aren’t really your thing.”

Shane froze for half a second, then forced himself to hug back.

“Yeah,” he said quietly. “It was good. I’m glad I came.”

He meant it. That surprised him too.

Scott hugged him next, less awkwardly and more aggressively, thumping him once between the shoulder blades.

“Don’t be a stranger,” Scott said. “And text the girl.”

“She’s not the girl.”

“Sure.”

“She’s my friend.”

“You met her yesterday.”

“And somehow she’s still less annoying than you.”

Scott grinned. “Low bar.”

Shane left before the warmth in his chest could become something harder to swallow.

The ride to the airport was grey and wet, the city sliding past the cab windows in streaks of glass and concrete. Shane kept his hood up and his cap low when he stepped out at departures, moving through the automatic doors with his duffel held close and his phone gripped in one hand. The old phone. The compromised phone, though he refused to call it that, even in his own head. Compromised sounded paranoid, compromised sounded like he was the kind of person who believed in ghosts in mirrors and footsteps that weren’t there.

But the number had vanished. The message had vanished.

And Ilya had found a house he should not have known existed.

So Shane went straight to the electronics kiosk before checking in, bought the newest phone they had without looking too closely at the price, and paid extra to have them transfer only the basics. Photos, some contacts, nothing else. No weird apps. No old permissions. No saved passwords. He listened to the employee explain cloud backups and privacy settings with the intense, grave focus of someone being told how to defuse a bomb.

“Do you want everything restored from the old device?” the guy asked.

“No,” Shane said immediately.

The employee looked up.

Shane forced a shrug. “I want a clean start.”

“Sure. We can do that.”

A clean start. He liked the sound of that.

It was stupid, obviously. A new phone didn’t erase anything. It didn’t fix the rental house or his dreams or the way he still flinched when someone came up behind him too quietly. But when the employee handed him the new device, smooth and blank and unmarked, Shane felt a small, almost embarrassing rush of relief.

Something new.

Something Ilya had never touched.

He sat at his gate with his duffel under his knees, coffee cooling on the little table beside him, and stared at the blank message screen longer than he wanted to admit.

Then stared at Rose’s contact until the letters started to blur. This was ridiculous.

He crashed into grown men twice his size on the ice without thinking. He could stand in front of reporters after a loss and say the right meaningless phrases about structure and effort and needing to be better. He could handle hostile crowds, playoff pressure, screaming coaches, cameras shoved in his face after overtime losses.

But texting one actress who had been nice to him on a balcony felt like stepping onto thin ice.

He finally typed.

Shane- Hey, it’s Shane. New phone. Apparently mine decided to become haunted.

He stared at it. Too weird? No, she liked weird.

Maybe.

He sent it before he could overthink himself into deleting it. The response came less than a minute later.

Rose Landry- I knew it. You absolutely had haunted phone energy.

Shane smiled before he could stop himself.

Shane- That's a real thing?

Rose Landry: Oh, definitely. It's when someone stares at their phone like it personally betrayed them and/or contains an ancient curse.

Shane- It did delete your number.

Rose Landry- How rude! I'm unforgettable.

He laughed quietly, and an older woman sitting across from him glanced over with mild curiosity.

Shane ducked his head, still smiling.

Shane- Clearly the phone was jealous.

Rose Landry- That's the only logical explanation.

He hesitated, then opened his photos and found the screenshots of the books he had tried to send the night before. Nonfiction. History. Psychology. Ocean exploration. A biography of a polar expedition he had read during a long road trip when everyone else on the team had been playing cards. He selected them and sent them before he could decide it made him look like a sixty-year-old man trapped in a twenty-year-old hockey player's body.

Shane- You said you needed something to read on set. These are some of my favorites. Ignore the fact that two of them are depressing.

The typing bubbles appeared immediately.

Then disappeared.

Then appeared again.

Shane's stomach did something embarrassing.

Rose Landry- Deep ocean exploration, wartime codebreaking, trauma psychology, and doomed Arctic expedition. Shane Hollander, are you a skin walker in a hot body but really a million years old?

He bit the inside of his cheek to keep from smiling too wide.

Shane- You watch psychological thrillers for fun.

Rose Landry- I'm IN psychological thrillers. That's different.

Shane- Worse, probably.

Rose Landry- Fair.

A boarding announcement crackled overhead for a different flight. Around him, people shifted bags and wrangled children and complained into phones. Shane barely heard any of it.

Rose Landry- The ocean one actually looks good.

Shane- It is.

RoseLandry- Give me the non-hockey-player review.

He paused.

Then typed slower.

Shane- It's about how much of the world exists where no one can see it. Kind of terrifying. Kind of peaceful.

The message sat there after he sent it, more honest than he had expected. For a second, he wished he could snatch it back and replace it with something easier, something dumb about fish.

Rose did not make it weird.

Rose Landry- That might be the best book recommendation anyone has ever given me.

His face went hot.

Shane- Is the bar set low?

Rose Landry- Extremely. Most actors recommend memoirs by people who are still alive and already annoying.

He laughed again.

It was easy after that.

Too easy, almost.

They texted about airport food and set food and how both were crimes in different directions. Rose sent him a photo of the giant sunglasses she was apparently wearing indoors because she claimed the outside world had become "aggressively bright." Shane sent her a photo of his coffee cup with his name spelled "Sean," which made her declare the barista his enemy. He told her about Scott calling her balcony girl, and she responded with a string of laughing emojis followed by,

Rose Landry- Please tell Scott I accept this title but expect a better one by next week.

By the time his flight began boarding, Shane had forgotten to watch the gate entrance.

Not completely. He did not want fear to be his new default. He did not want safety to feel like a borrowed thing he could only hold when someone else distracted him well enough.

He stood with the boarding group, duffel over one shoulder, phone in hand, and sent one last message before stepping onto the jet bridge.

Shane- Boarding now. I'll text when I land.

Her reply came before he lost service.

Rose Landry- Safe flight, haunted phone boy.

He stared at it until the line moved.

Haunted phone boy.

It was stupid.

It made him smile.

The plane felt too small once he was seated. Not because he disliked flying, but because there was nowhere to go once the doors closed. He had always found airplanes easy before. A controlled space. A few hours suspended outside responsibility, where no one could ask him to do anything except sit still. Now, strapped into the window seat with a businessman already typing on a laptop beside him and rain tracking thin lines across the oval glass, Shane felt the old pressure creep back into his chest.

He turned the new phone over in his hands.

Clean start.

He had texted Rose. He had laughed in an airport. He had slept. Those were facts. Small ones, maybe, but real.

The plane lifted through the grey.

Somewhere above the clouds, exhaustion caught him again.

At first, the dream was sweet.

That was the worst part.

He was warm. Warm in that deep, boneless way he had only ever felt once, in a bath gone lukewarm around them, Ilya's chest solid against his back and those large hands so careful on his skin that Shane had not known what to do with it. In the dream, nothing was broken yet. There was no locked door forced open, no terror slicing through sleep. Only the low murmur of Russian near his ear, soft enough to be private, and Ilya's thumb tracing the inside of his wrist like he was memorizing the beat of Shane's pulse.

Zayka.

In the dream, Shane did not flinch, he leaned back.

He let himself be held.

Ilya's mouth brushed the curve of his shoulder, barely there, reverent, and Shane felt the old, traitorous ache bloom low in his stomach and high in his throat all at once. The wanting. The safety he had believed in for those few impossible hours. The strange, helpless certainty that no one had ever looked at him so completely and wanted every hidden, inconvenient part.

Then the water went cold.

The arms around him tightened.

The bathroom tiles stretched into the bedroom wall of the rental house, shadows pooling in the corners. Shane tried to move and couldn't. Ilya's breath was still at his ear, but the words changed shape, becoming something he could not understand, something low and possessive and endless. The hands that had been careful became restraints. The mouth at his shoulder became teeth. Shane opened his mouth to tell him to stop, but no sound came out.

Then Ilya was in the chair. Watching, waiting.

Shane woke with a violent jerk, the seatbelt cutting across his hips and his breath trapped halfway up his throat.

The businessman beside him startled awake and glared.

"You okay?" he muttered.

Shane nodded too fast.

"Yeah. Sorry."

He turned toward the window and pressed his forehead lightly to the plastic shade, eyes squeezed shut, willing the tremor in his hands to stop before anyone else noticed. The cabin lights were dim. The engines hummed steadily. Around him, people slept or watched movies or scrolled through phones, unaware that Shane's heart was trying to claw its way out of his chest.

It had been sweet. Then it had not. That was what made it so unbearable. He missed the sweet.

If Ilya were only the monster, maybe Shane could hate him cleanly. If every memory were fear, every touch poison, every word a lie, then maybe he could cut him out like a bad piece of himself and leave nothing behind but scar tissue. But his brain would not let him. His body would not let him. Sleep kept bringing him both versions as if they belonged to each other because they did.

The man in the bath.

The man in the chair.

The same hands.

The same voice.

The same impossible ache.

Shane swallowed hard and wiped at his face with the sleeve of his hoodie before the wetness at the corner of his eyes could become anything more obvious. He hated himself for missing him. Hated that some broken, confused part of him still wanted to know if Ilya's lip had healed. If the bruise on his jaw had darkened. If his ribs hurt from the elbow Shane had driven into him. He hated that he could still remember the look in Ilya's eyes when Shane told him to leave, the devastation there so naked it had almost looked human enough to forgive.

Almost.

He pressed his fists against his thighs until his knuckles ached.

No.

He had a new phone.

A flight home.

A season to train for.

Friends.

Rose.

He had things that were not Ilya.

He repeated that silently until the plane began its descent, until the clouds broke open beneath them and Montreal appeared in patches of grey and green and glass, until the wheels hit the runway hard enough to jolt everyone forward.

When the plane reached the gate, Shane turned on his phone with fingers that were mostly steady.

A message appeared almost immediately.

Rose Landry- Did the haunted phone survive the sky?

He stared at it for a long second.

Then typed back.

Shane- New phone survived. I did too. Not that you asked. I come second to a phone in your life.

Her reply came while passengers were standing and dragging bags from overhead bins.

Rose Landry- Good. I'd hate to have to haunt the airline on your behalf. And you're too pretty to come in second. That face of yours needs studying.

Shane let out a breath that was almost a laugh.

Not fixed. Not safe. Not whole.

But alive.

And for the first time in days, when he stepped off the plane and into the noise of the terminal, he did not feel entirely alone.

A week later, Shane had become very good at not being alone.

He never consciously decided it. It just... happened.

Like muscle memory.

Like survival.

Training took up most mornings. Long hours on the ice until his legs burned and sweat soaked through his gear, because exhaustion helped. Exhaustion dulled things. When his body hurt enough, when every muscle screamed from drills and skating and preseason conditioning, his brain got quieter. Hockey had always been that for him. Structure. Rules. Predictability. The ice made sense in ways people never really did.

JJ noticed first.

"You're overtraining," he said flatly one morning, pulling off his gloves after practice.

Shane frowned.

"No, I'm not."

"You stayed for an extra hour yesterday."

"So?"

"You were here before the staff."

Shane shrugged, avoiding eye contact while unlacing his skates.

"I'm getting ready for the season."

JJ leaned back against the stall.

“You always get ready for the season.”

A pause.

Then quieter:

“This feels different.”

Shane hated how observant everyone suddenly seemed.

“I’m fine.”

JJ snorted. “Sure.”

Thankfully, Hayden arrived before the conversation could become dangerous.

Emma strapped to his chest, coffee in hand, somehow looking more exhausted and more annoyingly happy than any human should be allowed.

“Hey, superstar,” Hayden said. “You wanna come over later? Jackie made enough food to feed a village.”

Shane said yes immediately.

Too quickly.

JJ looked at him. Then at Hayden. Then back again.

The expression on his face made Shane want to throw something.

“You know,” JJ said slowly, “for someone who likes being alone so much, you’ve suddenly become very clingy.”

“Shut up.”

“I’m serious.”

“You just don’t want me around. I’m supposed to be the captain now so I need to be more present.”

“No,” JJ said. “I’m saying I haven’t seen you voluntarily socialize this much since-, well since ever really.”

Shane looked away first. “I’m hungry,” he muttered. Smooth, very mature.

JJ sighed.

“Okay.”

But his voice had softened.

That was somehow worse.

The dreams didn't stop. That part frustrated Shane more than anything.

He could handle the fear. Sort of. Fear made sense. Fear was rational. What didn't make sense were the good dreams.

The sweet ones. Those felt cruel. Sometimes it was little things.

A hotel bed somewhere during playoffs, half asleep while Ilya pressed sleepy kisses against the back of his neck and muttered irritated Russian because Shane kept stealing the blankets.

Sometimes it was the bath. Always the bath.

Warm water gone lukewarm around them while Ilya held him like something precious instead of breakable, broad hands tracing lazy patterns against damp skin. In dreams, Shane always relaxed eventually. Always leaned back against that solid chest. Always let himself believe, just for a few impossible minutes, that he had finally found something safe.

Those dreams hurt the worst.

Because they felt real. Because they had been real. And then, inevitably, something shifted.

The water turned cold. The room darkened. The tender caresses changed. A hand gripped too tightly. The shadows stretched too long.

Sometimes he woke up gasping because dream-Ilya had suddenly become the thing from the chair again. Silent. Watching. Waiting in corners.

Sometimes he woke up reaching for him. That was the worst of all.

The first time it happened, Shane sat bolt upright in a hotel bed at three in the morning, horror crashing through him so violently he nearly threw up.

Because for one split second, before memory caught up, he had wanted him there.

Wanted warmth. Wanted the familiar heaviness beside him, a heavy arm holding him closer.

Wanted- no. No.

He sat in the dark for an hour after that, TV on low volume just for noise.

He never slept in silence anymore.

His parents noticed something was wrong too. Of course they did. Mothers especially seemed biologically incapable of missing things.

“You’re staying another night?” his mom asked carefully one evening while he hovered in the kitchen pretending to help.

“Maybe.”

“You’re always welcome.”

He nodded.

“I know.” And he meant it. But even there, in the house he’d grown up in, with familiar creaking floors and his dad asleep in the recliner watching hockey reruns, Shane couldn’t fully settle.

He checked the windows without meaning to. Checked locks, paused when floorboards creaked at night. Sometimes he woke up and forgot where he was for a terrifying second, heart pounding before recognition settled.

Home. You’re home. Safe. But the feeling never fully left. Like someone standing just outside your peripheral vision. Like waiting for something terrible to happen again. Eventually, staying there started feeling unfair.

He didn’t want his mom watching him too closely. Didn’t want his dad hovering awkwardly in the way dads did when they knew something hurt but didn’t know how to fix it.

So hotels became easier. Temporary, anonymous.

Busy. Never too quiet.

The apartment building had been impulsive. Or at least that was what he told himself.

An investment. A project.

Privacy.

He wanted security. He wanted control. He wanted somewhere no one could accidentally find him. No shared hallways. No random neighbors. No front desk gossip.

He bought a smaller luxury apartment building quietly, intending to renovate the penthouse and eventually move in once construction finished. He controlled who rented the units.

High security, a private garage only accessed through fingerprints. Full surveillance and modern digital locks.

He spent stupid amounts of money changing plans. He told himself it was because he was famous. A few articles had come out of him that had gotten him more attention. Rose had sent them to him when he was name 'People's Sexiest Man'. He had given his mother an incredulous look but she shrugged it away and said he was too handsome for his own good.

Because hockey players needed privacy. Because fans got weird sometimes.

But every contractor meeting felt suspiciously like building a bunker. Even he knew it.

Through all of it, somehow, Rose became... his constant. Unexpectedly one of his best, closest friends.

It started with texts. Small, random things. A photo of terrible craft services coffee from set. A picture of a bookstore shelf captioned:

Rose Landry- You've made me eighty years old. Looking for ocean books now.

Shane sent back- Proud of you.

Somewhere along the line, texting became calls. Calls became FaceTimes. Sometimes short, sometimes hours.

Sometimes Shane would finish training and sit in his hotel room eating takeout while Rose rambled about directors and wardrobe disasters and bizarre actor behavior.

Sometimes she called him from makeup trailers looking objectively ridiculous. One afternoon she answered looking vaguely possessed. Dark circles under her eyes. Fake blood near her temple.

Shane blinked. "...You look um-different."

"Thank you."

"No seriously."

"I'm playing an emotionally unstable teen daughter," she said solemnly. "So naturally they made me look horrifying."

He laughed harder than he had in weeks. Real laughter, the kind that left his stomach hurting.

Rose pointed accusingly. "Oh wow. You actually have emotions."

"Barely."

"You know," she said thoughtfully, "I'm kind of obsessed with making hockey players laugh now."

“Hockey players?”

“You specifically.”

Something warm lodged quietly beneath Shane’s ribs.

Uncomplicated. Easy. Safe.

Hayden noticed first.

“You seem better,” he said casually one afternoon while Emma slept against Shane’s chest.

Shane looked up. “What?”

“Lighter.”

He frowned. “I’m fine.”

“You keep smiling at your phone.”

Jackie looked up immediately from the couch.

“Oh my god.”

Shane groaned.

“No.”

“There’s a person,” Hayden said immediately.

“There’s absolutely a person,” Jackie agreed.

“There is not.”

JJ, traitor that he was, didn’t even look up from where he sat at the kitchen island.

“You’re always texting someone now.”

Shane nearly dropped his drink. “I hate all of you.”

Emma made a tiny sleepy noise.

Jackie grinned. “Oh, he’s blushing.”

“I’m leaving.”

“You smile now,” Hayden said, quieter this time. “That’s all I’m saying.”

That stopped him. Because he hadn't realized, not really. But maybe he did, a little. Less checking over his shoulder. Less dread in the mornings.

Not gone, never gone. But softer around the edges. Sometimes.

Especially when Rose called.

The best call came late on a Thursday.

Shane had just finished practice and collapsed into his hotel bed, still damp-haired and exhausted, when his phone lit up.

Rose Calling

He answered immediately.

"You look terrible," she said.

"Hi to you too."

"You're sweaty."

"Hockey."

"Disgusting. I could smell the fumes from here."

He smiled despite himself.

"What are you doing?"

Rose brightened.

"So."

That tone immediately worried him.

"What."

"I have a shoot."

"Congratulations?"

"Outside Montreal."

He sat up.

"What?"

"Tiny town like... twenty minutes out," she said. "Three weeks."

Shane blinked.

Something stupidly excited unfurled in his chest before he could stop it.

“Oh.”

Rose narrowed her eyes.

“Was that enthusiasm?”

“No.”

“That was absolutely enthusiasm.”

“Nope.”

“Wow,” she said. “You actually like me.”

“You’re okay.”

She gasped dramatically. “I’m okay?”

“Maybe slightly above average.”

“You’re obsessed with me.”

Shane rolled his eyes so hard it hurt. “When are you getting here?”

Rose smiled. Soft, easy.

“Few days.”

The excitement sat in his chest long after the call ended. Warm. Strange. Somehow hopeful.

For the first time in weeks, Shane found himself actually looking forward to something.

And when sleep finally came that night, the dream was soft again.

Just warmth.

Russian murmured sleepily against his skin.

A hand tangled loosely with his beneath blankets.

No fear, no chair. No shadows. Only grief when he woke up alone.

The first time Shane saw Rose in person again, he returned the tight hug, he’d missed her.

Which felt ridiculous, considering she was objectively impossible to miss.

She stood outside arrivals in oversized sunglasses despite the cloudy weather, dark hair pulled back messily beneath a baseball cap that absolutely did not disguise who she was. A coffee balanced in one hand, phone in the other, one foot tapping impatiently against the concrete.

She looked... normal. Not a movie star.

Just normal, comfortable.

Real. And somehow that made the strange burst of nervousness in Shane's chest worse. He had not expected to be nervous.

They texted constantly. Called constantly. He knew what she sounded like when she was tired, when she was laughing too hard, when she was annoyed with directors, when she was secretly anxious before filming. He knew she hated mushrooms for reasons she refused to elaborate on and that she cried at documentaries about sea animals.

He knew her. Sort of. Still, standing there suddenly felt different. Real. His grip tightened unconsciously around the handle of her suitcase.

Before he could second-guess himself, Rose looked up.

Paused.

Then immediately grinned.

"Oh my god," she said, loud enough that two nearby people looked over. "Haunted phone boy!"

Shane rolled his eyes so hard it almost hurt.

"That's really sticking?"

"Forever."

Then she was walking toward him, easy and casual like they had been friends for years instead of weeks.

No awkward pause. No weirdness. No uncertainty.

Just: "There you are."

Something in Shane's chest loosened.

"You're dramatic," he muttered.

"You text me fourteen photos of rain yesterday and I'm dramatic?" She laughed immediately.

God. There it was again.

Easy. Everything with her felt weirdly easy. They fell into conversation without even trying.

About filming. Training camp. How she had already gotten lost twice in a tiny Canadian town somehow.

“How?” Shane asked. “There’s like three roads.”

“I have no sense of direction,” Rose said unapologetically. “If you dropped me in my own neighborhood I’d probably die.”

“That feels concerning.”

He snorted. “Confident.”

“Accurate.” By the second day, they had already fallen into a rhythm.

Rose texted him whenever filming wrapped.

Shane met her when practice ended.

Coffee. Dinner. Bookstores.

Random drives because Rose liked looking at houses she would never live in despite coming to Canada often for filming. “And why would I buy anything when I can just live with you?”

They talked constantly. Sometimes nonsense. Sometimes deeper than Shane expected. She never pushed. That was the thing he kept noticing. She noticed everything without making it feel like she was noticing.

Like the way he sat facing doors automatically. The way crowds made him tense. How loud places slowly wound him tight until his shoulders crept higher and higher. The first time she realized something was wrong happened accidentally.

A restaurant downtown they had decided on for dinner that catered to Shane’s strict diet but also had something for her to pick from. It had been too loud, too many people.

Someone recognized him halfway through dinner. Then someone else. Then another. Phones started coming out. A group lingering too close. Not aggressive, just... too much.

Too many voices. Too many people behind him. Shane felt himself slipping before he even understood it. The buzzing started first. Then the heat. Then the feeling of his skin being suddenly too tight. His knee bounced hard beneath the table. He kept scanning exits.

Too many people, too many-

“Hey.” Rose’s voice cut through gently. Not sharp or demanding. Just steady, serving as his anchor.

He blinked. “What?”

“You okay?”

“Sure.” Too fast, too automatic.

She tilted her head but didn’t call him out. Didn’t press.

Instead, she quietly stood. “Come on.”

“What?”

“Walk with me.”

Outside air helped clear his mind. He hadn’t realized how hard he was breathing until the wind hit his face.

Rose said nothing for almost a full minute. Then, casually, like it meant nothing, she looped her arm through his. Just there, warm, grounding.

Something in Shane eased instantly.

His shoulders loosened before he could stop them. The buzzing quieted.

“Oh,” Rose said quietly after a minute. He looked at her.

“You calm down when someone’s touching you.”

Shane frowned. “I do?”

“Little bit.” She squeezed his arm lightly.

“There.”

Weirdly enough- She was right. He felt... steadier. He brought his hand up to hold her fingertips, keeping her hand in the crook of his elbow.

Less like he was trying to crawl out of his own skin.

Rose smiled softly. “Huh.”

Then immediately ruined the moment.

“You’re basically a nervous rescue kitten.”

“Fuck off.”

“You absolutely are.”

After that, she just... adapted. Never made a thing of it. Never asked invasive questions.

But crowds? She linked arms automatically.

Busy streets? Hand lightly against his shoulder.

Too many people nearby? She'd quietly steer him somewhere calmer without comment.

And embarrassingly- It worked.

Every time.

Sometimes Shane didn't even realize he was spiraling until her hand brushed his sleeve or her shoulder bumped his and suddenly breathing became easier again. He tried not to think too hard about why.

A few days before the season opener, Rose decided he apparently needed "real clothes."

"You dress like a divorced suburban dad. You're way too pretty to be dressed like that."

Shane looked down at his hoodie. "This is offensive. I'm dressed ok."

"You own fourteen versions of the same sweatshirt."

"That's efficient. I'm always at practice or on the way to a game."

"You're twenty. You should dress like a twenty year old. You wear a black on black suit for every game."

"I'm tired."

"You're impossible."

Still, he went. Mostly because saying no to Rose felt weirdly impossible once she decided something. The shopping district was packed. Busier than Shane liked. The kind of place where people moved too close and noise echoed weirdly off buildings.

At first, it was okay. Manageable. Rose made everything easier somehow. She talked enough for both of them.

Made fun of ugly jackets. Threatened violence over cargo pants. Made him try things on he would never normally wear.

"You're hot," she declared casually outside one fitting room.

Shane nearly tripped.

"What?"

"I said what I said."

"You can't just say that."

“Why?”

“Because it’s weird.”

“You being objectively attractive isn’t weird.”

He stared.

Rose shrugged. “You hockey boys are so emotionally constipated.”

He hated how hard he laughed. Then someone recognized them. A pause, a whisper.

Then another. Phones lifted. Someone shouted Rose’s name. Then Shane’s.

And suddenly- Too much. Too fast. People moving closer.

Questions overlapping. Cameras.

“Are you dating?”

“Shane, over here!”

“Rose!”

His chest tightened instantly. Too many bodies.

But Rose was right there, a charming smile. She offered to take some selfies and signed some autographs so Shane relaxed and did the same to the people who came towards him. After a few minutes, they asked the gathered people if they could finish their day before posting the location on socials. Surprisingly, they agreed.

Someone stepped too close behind him. Shane froze, then- warm fingers slid around his wrist.

Rose.

“C’mon,” she said calmly.

Her hand tightened. Not pulling. Grounding again.

“Stay with me.”

He followed automatically.

Her arm linked through his as security finally moved in.

People pressed too close.

Questions louder now.

But Rose kept talking like nothing was happening.

Shane barked out a startled laugh. “You’re worried about shoes?”

“Yes.”

“You’re insane.”

“You knew this.” The laughter made breathing easier.

So did the way she kept holding onto him.

Steady, present.

Safe.

By the time they reached his car, both of them were half-laughing, half-out-of-breath.

“Oh my god,” Rose said, collapsing into the passenger seat. “That ended better than expected.”

“You looked weirdly calm.”

“I was lying.” He laughed again. Actually laughed.

The kind that made his ribs ache.

And for a second- everything felt normal.

Halfway to Rose’s rental, the sky opened.

Rain slammed against the windshield hard enough that Shane swore.

“Oh my god,” Rose laughed. “Canada is trying to kill me.”

“You wanted the weather.”

“This feels personal.” By the time they parked, the rain had somehow become worse.

“You ready?” Shane asked.

“No.”

“Cool.”

Neither moved.

Then Rose grinned suddenly. “Three...”

“No.”

“Two...”

“Rose-”

“One!” She shoved the door open.

Shane cursed and ran after her.

By the time they made it to the porch, both of them were soaked.

Completely soaked. Hair dripping. Clothes sticking. Rose doubled over laughing while Shane fumbled with her keys.

“This,” she said through laughter, “is your fault somehow.”

“How?”

“I haven’t decided yet.”

Inside was warm.

Quiet. Safe.

And for the first time in weeks, Shane realized something strange.

He wasn’t checking windows.

Wasn’t scanning exits.

Wasn’t waiting for something bad.

Because Rose was there. Talking, laughing.

Alive in the space. He stood there, trying not to spread water onto the floor. He watched as she put some of the bags down and then without a care, took off her shirt and let her pants drop. Shane quickly turned to give her some privacy but she laughed and went over to him.

“Now, don’t take this the wrong way, but I wouldn’t be a woman if I didn’t take this chance.” She said, leaning up a few inches and placing a soft peck right on his lips. “There, that’s out of the way. But if anyone asks, it was the longest, tongue filled, orgasmic kiss of your life.”

He just laughed as she ran upstairs and grabbed them towels. “Now, lets try on some of these clothes. Then we can watch that houseflipping show you like.

And somehow, impossibly- That made it feel safe.

Outside, across the street, hidden behind rain-streaked glass- A camera lens flashed once.

Then disappeared into the dark.

The next morning started normal. They had fallen asleep on the couch. Coffee was brewing and they were working on making fruit bowls together. Well, Shane was cutting the fruit as Rose looked through her phone.

Complaining about weather. Rose making fun of Canadian milk bags. Then her phone buzzed. She frowned.

“Oh no.”

“What?”

Rose turned the screen. A gossip account.

Blurry photos from yesterday. Them leaving the stores.

Laughing. Running through rain.

Headlines already speculating.

HOCKEY’S GOLDEN BOY & HOLLYWOOD’S NEW FAVORITE?

Shane groaned. “Great.”

“Could be worse.”

Then Rose stopped. Her expression changed.

“What?”

Slowly- She zoomed in.

One photo.

Different angle.

Not paparazzi crowd.

Farther away.

Through rain, through glass.

Taken from across the street.

Too close. Way too close.

The angle-

The house.

Shane went cold. Because he knew exactly where that photo had been taken.

Across the street. Watching. His stomach dropped.

No. No, no-

That wasn't normal.

Wasn't paparazzi.

Wasn't-

The mug shook slightly in his hands.

Rose looked at him. Then back at the screen.

And for the first time since meeting him-

She looked worried.

The silence that settled over the kitchen afterward felt wrong in a way Shane couldn't immediately explain. Heavy. Too aware somehow, as if the room itself had suddenly started paying attention. Rain still tapped softly against the windows, quieter now than the night before, but Shane found himself hearing everything again. The hum of the refrigerator. The old rental house creaking quietly as it settled. The faint sound of distant traffic somewhere farther down the road. His pulse, suddenly too loud in his ears. The mug trembled slightly in his hands before he carefully set it back down against the counter, fingers tighter around the ceramic than he realized.

"No," he said too quickly, the word coming out before he had really thought it through. "It's probably just paparazzi."

Even to him, it sounded wrong.

Thin.

Practiced.

Like something he had already rehearsed privately, trying to convince himself before anyone else could question it.

Because paparazzi took photos outside restaurants. Outside airports. Outside stores. Walking into buildings. Leaving buildings. Smiling in parking lots. They didn't sit across residential streets in the rain taking pictures through windows.

At least-

He didn't think they did.

Suddenly, terrifyingly, Shane wasn't sure anymore.

Rose stayed quiet for a moment longer than usual, not staring exactly, but watching him in that way she somehow had, the kind that felt observant without feeling invasive. Her eyes flicked briefly to the way his hands kept flexing unconsciously against the countertop, to how rigid his shoulders had become again, to the way his gaze had started drifting instinctively toward the front windows every few seconds.

“You’re shaking,” she said finally, voice soft enough not to feel accusing.

“I’m fine.” Too fast again.

Rose tilted her head slightly but didn’t argue. Didn’t call him on it. Didn’t do the thing people always did when they thought he was lying, where concern suddenly became pressure.

“Okay,” she said quietly.

Just okay. No push.

No demand.

And somehow, that made the knot in Shane’s throat tighten harder.

Because if she had pushed, maybe lying would’ve felt easier.

Instead, Rose stood from the table and quietly moved his tea farther back from the edge before he could accidentally knock it over.

“I’m gonna ask exactly one question,” she said after a moment, leaning lightly against the counter across from him. “And if you don’t want to answer, you don’t have to.”

Shane looked down at the grain of the countertop instead of at her.

“...Okay.”

Her voice stayed calm. Casual almost.

“Has someone scared you? Has someone hurt you?”

The question hit him harder than he expected. Not because it was invasive.

Because it wasn’t.

She hadn’t asked who.

Hadn’t asked what happened.

Hadn’t asked for details or explanations or names.

Just- Had someone scared you?

And god.

The answer was so obviously yes that it almost hurt.

For a second, Shane could see it all too clearly again. The chair in the dark. The shape unfolding from it while his body still struggled to wake. The metallic taste of fear flooding the back of his throat when realization hit. The awful confusion of recognizing someone you once trusted while your body screamed danger anyway.

He swallowed hard. "I..." His voice caught awkwardly. "It's complicated."

Rose held his gaze for a second, then nodded once. "Okay." That was it.

No pressure. No disappointed expression.

No gentle you can tell me. Just acceptance.

That almost made him tell her everything. About everything. The terrifying part where some awful, traitorous piece of him still missed Ilya sometimes. Still dreamed about warmth and Russian murmured half asleep against his skin before memory turned sharp again.

Instead, Shane rubbed both hands over his face.

"I probably sound insane."

"You absolutely don't," Rose said immediately.

He glanced up.

She shrugged lightly.

"I'm an actress," she said. "You'd be amazed what people do when they get weirdly obsessed."

Something in his stomach dropped.

The word sat strangely between them.

Obsessed.

Shane looked away first.

Rose seemed to catch herself a second later, expression softening.

"Hey," she said gently. "No spiraling."

"I'm not spiraling."

"You absolutely are."

Fair. She pushed off the counter and reached for her phone.

"Okay," she said, slipping effortlessly into action mode. "We're gonna be practical."

Shane frowned slightly.

“What does that mean?”

“It means we check security footage because production insisted on cameras, thank god. And it means I tell set security there might be someone weird nearby because I professionally hate creepy men.”

Despite everything, a quiet laugh escaped him.

“You say weird things.”

“You like weird things.”

Unfortunately- also true.

The footage ended up being frustratingly useless. Rain blurred most of the camera angles into streaks of movement and distorted headlights. Shadows shifted strangely. A dark figure might have stood near the curb at one point, or it might have been nothing more than tree branches moving in the wind. Every frame somehow made Shane feel worse instead of better, because uncertainty felt more dangerous than proof.

He hadn't realized he'd stopped breathing properly again until Rose quietly appeared beside him.

“You're doing the thing.”

“What thing?”

“The thing where you forget oxygen exists.”

Only then did he notice how tight his chest felt.

Rose linked her arm casually through his, like it meant nothing, warm and grounding and familiar enough now that Shane's body relaxed before his brain could catch up. It happened embarrassingly fast. The tension in his shoulders loosened. His breathing evened out slowly. The panic receded around the edges enough to feel survivable again.

“There,” Rose said softly, squeezing his arm once. “You're okay right now.”

Right now. Not forever. Not everything's fine.

Just right now. Present tense, manageable.

And somehow, that mattered more.

“You make everything quieter,” Shane admitted quietly before he could stop himself.

The words slipped out too honestly. Too quickly.

Rose paused. Then lightly bumped her shoulder against his. “Cool,” she said. “You make everything weirder.”

He laughed despite himself. “There’s the haunted phone boy smile,” she said immediately.

“You’re never letting that go.”

“Absolutely not.”

The rest of the morning passed strangely normal after that. Shane laughed hard enough at one point that he had to lean against the kitchen counter, tears threatening at the corners of his eyes while Rose dramatically argued that milk should “have dignity.”

And somehow, beneath the lingering discomfort of the photo, beneath the uneasy feeling crawling quietly under his skin, Shane realized something uncomfortable.

He had not laughed like this in weeks.

Maybe months.

Maybe longer.

Long enough that it felt unfamiliar.

By the time afternoon came, he knew he had to leave. Practice. Meetings. Real life waiting impatiently outside the temporary little bubble they had somehow built inside this rental house.

Still- he lingered near the front door longer than necessary.

Rose noticed immediately. “You’re being weird again.”

“I’m always weird.”

“True.”

She grabbed her jacket and linked arms with him automatically while walking him outside, like it had already become habit.

No awkwardness.

No big gesture.

Just easy.

And embarrassingly- Shane already knew it helped.

The moment her shoulder bumped lightly against his, something inside him settled again.

“You good?” she asked quietly before he climbed into the car.

He hesitated.

Then honest before he could stop himself:

“...Better.”

Rose smiled softly.

“Cool.”

The hotel felt wrong the second he walked inside. No laughter. No easy warmth filling space. Just silence pressing quietly against the walls. Shane checked the lock twice without meaning to, then hated himself for doing it. Showered. Tried watching game footage. Failed.

His thoughts kept circling.

The photo.

The angle.

The rain.

Too close.

Way too close.

The knock at the hotel door nearly made him jump out of his skin.

His stomach dropped instantly.

No.

No one should-

The phone rang before panic could fully take hold.

Front desk.

Shane stared at the screen for three full rings before finally answering.

“Hello?”

“Mr. Hollander?” the receptionist asked politely. “Someone dropped off a package for you.”

Everything inside him went cold.

“...A package?”

“Yes, sir.”

His pulse slammed hard against his ribs.

“Who dropped it off?”

A pause.

“I’m sorry, they didn’t leave a name.”

The room suddenly felt smaller. “I’m sorry, can you get rid of it please?”

Ilya had been trying. That was the humiliating part. For over two weeks, he had been trying so hard it physically hurt.

No calls. No showing up uninvited. No crossing oceans because panic told him distance meant disaster. He had even stopped texting after the last message, the one that had sat unanswered for days until eventually the silence itself began to feel like punishment.

I will wait until you are ready.

He had meant it.

Mostly. Or at least he had been trying to mean it.

Because every instinct inside him screamed that this was wrong. Space felt wrong. Silence felt unbearable. Loving Shane from thousands of miles away while pretending not to know whether he was sleeping or eating or overwhelmed or hurting somewhere without anyone noticing felt impossible in a way Ilya had not known another person could make him feel.

He had gone to meetings. Sat through dinners with his teammates.

Signed papers for his father’s care. Tried to behave like a functioning human being while something restless and ugly paced endlessly beneath his skin.

Svetlana had even told him, two nights earlier over too much vodka, that he seemed calmer.

He had lied and said she was right.

Then the article appeared. He had not even been looking for Shane.

The notification flashed briefly across his phone while one of his father’s doctors spoke in endless circles about his care plan, and for one stupid second Ilya almost ignored it.

Then he saw Shane’s face.

Smiling.

Actually smiling.

Something in his chest seized so violently it hurt.

He clicked the article before he could think better of it.

Rain blurred most of the photos, the quality grainy and poor, but it did not matter. He knew Shane instantly. Knew the shape of him in ways that had become humiliatingly instinctive. The curve of his shoulders beneath damp clothes, the way he tilted his head when he laughed, the slight pinkness in his cheeks from cold.

Laughing.

Shane was laughing.

And beside him- A woman. Red hair. Beautiful.

Too close. Her hand wrapped around his wrist.

Another photo. Shane smiling at her.

Soft.

Relaxed.

Happy.

Happy.

The word landed like something sharp lodged suddenly between his ribs.

He stopped hearing the lawyer.

Stopped hearing anything, really.

Another photo.

Them leaving a store together.

Her arm looped casually through Shane's.

Another.

Running through rain, bodies too close, both of them laughing hard enough Shane's head tipped back slightly, mouth open in a way Ilya had only seen a handful of times.

God.

God. He looked happy.

The article title blurred strangely beneath his vision.

HOCKEY'S GOLDEN BOY & HOLLYWOOD'S NEW FAVORITE?

“She is touching him.”

The words came out quietly enough at first that even Ilya barely registered saying them.

Across the conference table, the doctor paused mid-sentence.

“...Mr. Rozanov?”

Ilya looked down again.

Another photo.

Closer now.

The woman touching Shane’s shoulder while Shane looked at her with something easy in his expression. Comfortable. Familiar. The next one was of a kiss. Shane, his Shane, his omega, out kissing some woman.

Something hot and violent ripped straight through his chest.

Because Shane hated people touching him.

Shane tolerated people.

Endured crowds.

Flinched when strangers got too close. Tensed when people moved unpredictably around him. Even with Ilya, even after everything between them, Shane had taken time. Careful little moments of trust built slowly and reluctantly until eventually Shane leaned against him in hotel beds without thinking, let Ilya press sleepy kisses into his shoulder, let himself be held when nightmares woke him shaking.

And now-

This.

No.

The chair hit the floor hard enough to echo through the room.

Papers slid. Someone said his name. Ilya barely heard it.

“She is kissing him,” he said again, louder this time, staring at the screen like if he looked hard enough the pictures might rearrange themselves into something less unbearable. “Why is she touching him?”

His chest felt too tight.

Wrong. Everything suddenly felt wrong.

Because Shane had asked for space.

Space.

Not a replacement, not this.

Not someone else making him laugh.

Not someone else standing close enough to touch.

He had waited.

He had stayed away.

He had tried so fucking hard.

“Ilya- ”

He was already moving.

Phone.

Keys.

Passport.

The thought arrived fully formed before he could stop it.

Canada.

He needed to go.

Needed to see Shane.

Needed to explain.

Needed-

The whiskey tumbler shattered against the kitchen wall before he consciously registered throwing it.

Glass exploded across marble.

Someone cursed.

The lawyer stood abruptly.

“I think we should- ”

“Leave,” Ilya said quietly.

Nobody argued.

The apartment door slammed behind the last person.

Silence rushed in hard and ugly.

Ilya stood there breathing too fast, hands shaking badly enough he nearly dropped his phone. Another picture stared back at him. Shane soaked through from rain, laughing so hard he looked breathless while that woman grinned up at him.

Happy.

The word would not stop.

Happy.

Happy with someone else.

Something cracked painfully inside his chest.

Because maybe-

Maybe Shane really was done.

Maybe space had been rejection all along and Ilya had been too stupid, too desperate to understand it.

His hands shook harder.

No.

No.

Shane had wanted him.

Didn't he?

Hadn't he?

He grabbed his passport.

The apartment door opened hard enough to bounce against the wall.

"Ilya?"

Svetlana froze immediately.

The room looked wrecked.

Glass scattered across the floor.

A chair overturned.

And Ilya-

Jesus Christ.

He looked terrifying.

Not angry.

Worse.

Ruined.

Like someone had cut him open and forgotten to stitch him back together.

“Ilya.”

He barely looked at her.

Already moving.

Wallet. Keys. Jacket.

Fast.

Too fast.

“Ilya,” she repeated carefully, stepping further inside. “What happened?”

“Move.”

The word came rough. Strained.

Not sharp at her exactly.

Just-

Desperate.

Her stomach dropped.

“No.”

He exhaled sharply through his nose, visibly trying and failing to hold himself together.
“Svetlana.”

“What happened?”

“She is touching him.”

The sentence made no sense.

“What?”

He shoved the phone toward her hard enough she nearly dropped it.

Photos.

A woman.

Shane.

Rain.

Laughter.

Oh.

Oh no.

She looked back up.

Ilya was shaking.

Actually shaking.

“He asked for space,” he said, voice cracking strangely now. “I gave him space.”

The devastation in his voice hit hard enough to hurt.

“I waited.”

God.

“He thinks I left.”

“Ilya- ”

“He thinks I stopped caring.”

His breathing turned sharp, erratic. Like he couldn’t get enough air.

“He doesn’t let people touch him,” he said suddenly, quieter now, voice unraveling around the edges. “He gets overwhelmed. He hates crowds. He- ” His jaw tightened hard enough to hurt. “He doesn’t...”

He stopped. Swallowed hard. And suddenly- Svetlana realized he was crying.

Barely. But enough.

Enough to make her chest ache.

Because Ilya didn’t cry. Not after his mother. Not after anything.

“I have to go,” he said suddenly. Fast.

Too fast.

“He- ”

“No.”

His head snapped up. “What?”

“No,” she repeated carefully. “You are not getting on a plane like this.”

“I have to fix this.”

“No.”

“He is replacing me.” The sentence came out so quietly it almost didn’t sound like him.

Like heartbreak itself had scraped him hollow.

“I scared him.”

And there it was.

The awful thing sitting underneath all of it.

Not rage.

Fear.

Grief.

Devastation.

“Ilya,” she said softly.

He moved toward the door anyway.

Fast.

Frantic.

Pure instinct.

And something about him scared her suddenly- not because she thought he would hurt someone, but because he looked completely gone, like panic had swallowed everything rational whole.

So she grabbed him.

Hard.

Around the waist.

“No.”

“Svetlana- ”

“No.”

“I have to- ”

“You need to breathe.”

He fought her for a second.

Not violently.

Not at her.

Just-

Panic.

Like something trapped.

Eventually exhaustion won.

Because he had barely eaten.

Barely slept.

Had been quietly unraveling for weeks.

Hours later, they laid in bed the way they had years ago after funerals, after grief, after nights too ugly to survive alone. Svetlana stayed on top of the blankets while Ilya faced the wall beside her, silent in a way that felt frightening.

For a long time neither of them spoke.

Then quietly-

“She makes him laugh.”

The sentence sounded ruined.

Svetlana turned her head slightly.

Ilya still stared blankly toward the dark.

“He never laughed with me like that.”

Something about the heartbreak in his voice made her chest tighten painfully.

“He smiled,” he whispered after a while. “Like he was happy.”

The silence stretched.

Then softer:

“I tried so hard to give him space.”

And god- that hurt to hear. Because for the first time since she met him all those years ago, Ilya sounded completely, devastatingly heartbroken.

Chapter End Notes

Okay SO 😭

First of all: welcome to the Rose era. Before anyone panics, I need everyone to know that Rose and Shane are very much platonic soulmates with concerning levels of emotional support and mutual chaos and she won't be an Ilya fan-she's 100% in for Shane. Shane deserves a friend who makes him laugh, okay??

Second... yes. We are officially entering the “Ilya is not doing well” portion of the story.

I know some of you are probably feeling conflicted right now (honestly, same), but I promise there's a reason I'm taking things in this direction. The Shane/Ilya dynamic is about to get much messier before it starts becoming something more understandable. Not healthy yet. Definitely not healthy. But understandable.

Also... thoughts on Rose? 🙄 And how worried are we about that picture?

As always, comments make me feral and feed my soul

EDIT Very serious question:

Would anyone be interested in being an ARC/beta reader for the next chapter?
Because... uh.

How do I say this.

Things get a little emotionally catastrophic 😭

Like “I sat there staring at my document for a while afterward” levels of dark, and I want a couple people to sanity-check pacing/emotional impact before I traumatize the entire comment section.

(You have been warned.)

Chapter 18: Chapter 18

Chapter Summary

A little chapter to try to get into Ilya's mind before the next heavy part.

NO!!-this is not excusing him, only explaining part of the reason he is the way he is, just a little bit.

Ilya - 12 years old

It was an accident.

Grigori made him say it until the words stopped catching in his throat. He made him say it in the kitchen while the tea went cold on the table. He made him say it in the hallway where Ilya had stood barefoot and shaking the morning before, staring at his mother's bedroom door while two of his father's men moved around inside with lowered voices. He made him say it before the doctor came out with his face carefully blank. He made him say it before the archbishop arrived. He made him say it while Ilya could still see the bottle of pills tipped over beside her hand, white tablets scattered like tiny bones across the rug.

It was an accident.

His mother had been tired, Grigori said. She had taken too much medicine. She had not known what she was doing. She had been fragile after being sick for so long. It was a tragedy. A private family tragedy. Nothing more.

And because Grigori Rozanov was high enough in the police department that men lowered their eyes when he walked into a room, no one asked questions loudly enough to matter.

By the time they brought her to the church, the truth had already been buried once.

The church was small, older than it looked from the street, with dark wood worn smooth by generations of hands and a gold iconostasis that glowed behind the priest like a wall of fire. Icons watched from every direction, Christ solemn and sorrowful, the Mother of God holding her child with eyes full of grief, saints painted thin and severe with halos catching the candlelight. The air was hot from bodies and flames, thick with beeswax and incense, the sweet smoke curling upward from the censer as the deacon swung it in slow, silver arcs. Each time the chains chimed, Ilya flinched. The sound was delicate, almost beautiful, but it went through him like a warning.

The coffin stood open in the middle of the church, facing the altar.

His mother lay inside it in white.

Someone had placed a narrow embroidered crown, a venchik, across her forehead, sewn with gold thread with holy words Ilya could not make himself read. An icon rested in her hands. A cross lay nearby. Her blonde curly hair had been arranged carefully around her face, and a cloth covered part of her body so neatly that she looked arranged instead of resting. Near the head of the coffin sat a small dish of koliva, wheat and honey shaped beneath sugar, with a candle pressed into it and burning steadily. Ilya stared at that candle because it was easier than looking at her mouth.

They had painted her lips. That was the part he hated most.

His mother had not worn lipstick in weeks before she died. Months, maybe. She had stopped caring about pretty things. She had stopped caring about food and dresses and music and whether the curtains were open. She had moved through the apartment like someone listening to a voice no one else could hear, one that kept calling her farther and farther away. But now they had painted her, powdered her, dressed her, crowned her, and everyone around him murmured about how peaceful she looked.

Peaceful.

Ilya wanted to scream every time he heard it.

She did not look peaceful to him. She looked stolen.

The priest began the prayers, his voice low and rhythmic, rising and falling with the choir's responses until the whole church seemed to breathe around them. There were psalms, litanies, the repeated pleas for mercy, the mournful singing of "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy on us." People crossed themselves again and again. Forehead. Stomach. Right shoulder. Left. They bowed. They held slender candles in trembling fingers, little flames reflecting in wet eyes. The priest walked around the coffin with the censer, and incense spilled over his mother's body, over the icon in her hands, over Grigori's dry face, over Ilya's clenched fists.

Grigori stood beside him in a dark suit, tall and straight and terrifyingly composed. He looked every inch the grieving husband, solemn enough for the room, respectable enough for the priest, important enough that no one dared wonder why the dead woman in the coffin had grown so thin before God finally received her. Men from the department stood near the back. Ilya recognized some of them. They had come to their home before. They had drunk with Grigori. They had laughed too loudly in the sitting room while his mother kept her eyes lowered at dinner. Now they stood with their hats in their hands and grief on their faces as if grief was another uniform they knew how to wear when commanded.

Svetlana was not supposed to be standing with him.

She had just turned 13 and was not family, though she had been in Ilya's life since they were five years old and, in all the ways that mattered, she was closer than blood. Their mothers had known each other. They had grown up in the same courtyards, sat at the same kitchen tables, passed childhood illnesses back and forth, learned secrets before they had words for them. Svetlana had been there when Ilya's mother still laughed. She had been there when the laughing became quieter. She had been there the first time Grigori's voice turned cold enough that Ilya went silent without understanding why.

Grigori had tried to send her to the other side of the church with her own parents.

She had come back anyway.

Now she stood close enough that her sleeve brushed Ilya's, her candle held in one hand, the other hidden between them where Grigori could not easily see it. Her fingers found Ilya's and squeezed. Not hard. Just enough to keep him standing.

Do not fall apart, that squeeze said. Or maybe, fall apart if you have to. I am here.

Ilya did not know which one he needed more.

The prayers went on and on. The priest spoke of rest, forgiveness, the resurrection, the soul departing from the body and finding mercy in the hands of God. At some point, he read the prayer of absolution, holding the gilt bible over her face as the words moved through the church. Ilya watched his mother's face and wondered whether God listened to prayers for women no one had protected while they were alive. He wondered if God knew it had not been an accident. He wondered if God had seen the pills too. He wondered how God would let the sweetest, most gentle omega be treated so harshly by the alpha that had been meant for her.

He had found her before anyone else.

That thought came like a blow, as it always did. One moment he was in the church, and the next he was back in the hallway, calling for her because she had not come to his game. She never missed a hockey game where he was playing and he had perfected a move just to see her smiling again. The door had been cracked open. The curtains had been drawn. The room had smelled stale and medicinal, and she had been lying on her side as if sleeping, one hand near the rug, the pill bottle tipped beside her. For one impossible second he had thought she had dropped something and would wake if he cleaned it up before Grigori saw. He had crouched, fingers reaching for the little white tablets, and then he had seen her face.

He did not remember screaming.

Grigori said he had.

At the funeral, Grigori's hand closed around the back of his neck.

To anyone watching, it might have looked like a father steadying his son during a moment of unbearable grief. But Grigori's fingers pressed into the soft places beneath Ilya's skull with exact, punishing pressure.

"Stand still," he murmured without moving his lips.

Ilya froze.

Svetlana's fingers tightened around his.

When it came time for the final farewell, people began moving toward the coffin one by one. They crossed themselves, bowed, kissed the icon, kissed the cross, and some bent to kiss his mother's forehead or hand. The last kiss, the old women whispered. The final goodbye. Their black scarves dipped as they leaned over her. Some sobbed openly. Some whispered apologies that came too late. Some touched Grigori's arm afterward and told him she was with God now, that he had done everything he could, that no one could have known.

No one could have known.

Ilya felt the words crawl over his skin.

Everyone had known something.

They had known she had stopped leaving the house. They had known Grigori answered for her when people asked questions. They had known she flinched at sudden sounds. They knew her hands shook when she poured tea. They had known her son watched the doors before he spoke. They had known enough to lower their voices. Enough to pity her. Enough to do nothing.

Then it was Ilya's turn.

He could not move.

The candle in his hand had burned low enough that melted wax touched his fingers, but he did not feel it until Svetlana gently took it from him and set it aside. "Ilyusha," she whispered, using the name only she and his mother ever used. "Come on."

Grigori heard.

His jaw tightened.

Ilya stepped forward because Svetlana's hand was at his back and Grigori's was at his neck, one touch trying to hold him together and the other reminding him who would decide whether he was allowed to break. He crossed himself because that was what a good Orthodox boy did. He bowed because everyone watched him. He looked at the icon in his mother's hands, then at the little crown around her forehead, then at her face.

She had been beautiful once.

Not in the painted way she looked now, not this waxen imitation arranged for mourners, but truly beautiful. Warm. Soft-eyed. Hair coming loose from its pins while she made breakfast. Bare feet tucked beneath her on the sofa. Laughing quietly when Ilya tracked snow into the hall and Grigori was not home to see it. She used to cup his face between both hands and tell him he had her eyes. She used to kiss his forehead and say softness was not weakness, no matter what his father believed. She used to pull him beneath the covers during storms and whisper stories against his hair until the thunder passed.

Now her skin was cold beneath his lips.

A sound broke out of him.

It was small. Not a wail. Not anything dramatic enough to satisfy the grief tearing through him. Just a wounded, helpless sound from a child who had found his mother dead and then been ordered to lie about it.

The grip on his neck became unbearable.

“Enough,” Grigori whispered. “Do not embarrass me.”

Not her.

Me.

Ilya swallowed the next sound so hard it hurt.

At the cemetery, the sky was low and gray, the kind of heavy Russian gray that made the whole world seem made of ash. The priest continued the prayers beside the grave, his vestments moving in the wind, his voice thinner outside than it had been in the church. The coffin was lowered. Someone gave Ilya a handful of earth. He stared at it in his palm, black and damp and freezing cold, while the adults crossed themselves and murmured for him to throw it down.

He could not make his hand open.

Grigori leaned close.

“Accident,” he said quietly.

Ilya looked up at him.

His father’s face was calm, but his eyes were dead and flat and waiting.

“You understand me?” Grigori asked. “If anyone asks. The priest. Your coaches. Svetlana. Anyone. It was an accident.” Ilya’s mouth trembled.

Grigori’s hand came to rest on his shoulder, heavy as iron. “Your mother was ill. She made a mistake with her medicine. That is all. You do not shame this family with ugly stories.”

Ilya looked past him to where Svetlana stood with her parents, crying silently into her scarf. She was watching him, and even from several feet away he knew she did not believe the lie. She had always been too sharp. Too loyal. Too good at seeing the things adults tried to hide.

“I found the pills,” Ilya whispered.

Grigori smiled.

It was worse than anger.

“And you will forget what you saw.”

Ilya did not forget. He threw the earth into the grave. The sound it made on the coffin lid stayed with him for the rest of his life.

After the funeral, people came back to the apartment for the meal. Kutya on the table. Black bread. Fish. Pickled things. Tea no one drank before it cooled. Vodka poured and swallowed by men who spoke too low, too carefully, whenever Grigori passed. The mirrors had been covered. His mother’s chair sat empty. Someone told Ilya to eat because children needed strength, and he stared at the food until his vision blurred.

Svetlana found him in the hallway outside his mother’s locked bedroom.

Grigori had taken the key.

She did not ask if he was all right. She was thirteen, not stupid. Instead, she stood beside him with her shoulder touching his and said, “I do not believe them.”

Ilya’s throat closed.

Svetlana looked at the door. “I do not believe it was an accident.”

He turned his head sharply, terror cutting through the grief. “Do not say that.”

Her eyes filled again. “Ilya.”

“Do not say it,” he whispered, and he sounded so frightened that her face changed. “He said not to say it.”

Something old died in Svetlana’s expression then. Some last childish belief that fathers, even cruel ones, had limits. “What did he do?”

Ilya could not answer.

He only shook his head.

She took his hand and held it between both of hers. “I will not say anything,” she promised. “Not where he can hear.”

That was the beginning of the second life.

The first life had been before. Before the pills. Before the funeral. Before the lie. Before Grigori became the only voice in the apartment and his mother became a locked room no one was allowed to mention.

The second life was all lessons.

Grigori taught him that grief was self-indulgence. That crying was manipulation when women did it and weakness when men did it. That his mother had been soft and softness had killed her. That Ilya looked too much like her, which meant he would have to work twice as hard to overcome what she had put into his face, his voice, his nature. He said it as if resemblance was an infection. As if his mother had left behind something contaminated inside him.

“You have her eyes,” Grigori told him one night, standing behind him in front of the bathroom mirror, one hand gripping his jaw hard enough to ache. “That is unfortunate. People will see them and expect softness from you.”

Ilya stared at his reflection. Pale. Too pretty, Grigori always said, like it was an accusation. His mother’s fair hair. His mother’s mouth. His mother’s eyes red from crying he had tried to do silently into his pillow.

Grigori squeezed his jaw tighter. “So you will give them something else to remember.”

The beatings were not constant.

That might have made them easier to explain.

They came like the weather. Sometimes after a loss. Sometimes after a win, if Grigori decided arrogance had crept into Ilya’s posture. Sometimes because Ilya answered too slowly, or looked away too fast, or said his mother’s name in the wrong tone. Grigori was careful where he left pain. Careful enough that coaches saw a tough boy, not a frightened one. Careful enough that doctors saw bruises and believed hockey. Careful enough that Ilya learned the difference between injuries that could be hidden beneath pads and injuries that would cost him ice time.

He also learned that Grigori did not hit him when he performed well enough to be useful.

So Ilya became useful.

He went back to hockey too soon because Grigori decided the house had indulged grief long enough. The first time he stepped onto the ice after the funeral, he nearly vomited from the cold smell of it, from the scrape of blades and shouts echoing off the boards, from the terrible realization that the world had continued while his mother had stopped. Then someone checked him hard into the glass during drills, and pain flashed clean and bright through his shoulder.

For one second, he felt nothing else.

No coffin. No pills. No church. No lie.

Only pain.

Then rage.

Then movement.

Hockey saved him because it gave him somewhere to put the thing Grigori was making inside him. Every bruise became proof he could take more. Every goal became a few hours where Grigori watched him without contempt. Every fight became a language adults rewarded instead of punished. Coaches called him intense. Determined. Mature. Fearless. They said grief had sharpened him. They said his father was doing a good job keeping him disciplined after tragedy.

No one understood that Ilya was not fearless.

He was simply more afraid of going home weak than he was of bleeding on the ice. He didn't really care about the game anymore. But his mother loved that he played-that he was so much better than anyone else on the rink.

The first envelope of prize money came after a tournament when he was fourteen. It was not much, but to Ilya it felt impossible. His own money. Earned by his own body, his own talent, his own refusal to stay down. He held it all the way home inside his jacket, fingers brushing the edge of the envelope again and again. For one reckless afternoon, he imagined buying better tape, maybe a used stick he had been looking at for months. He imagined sending something to Svetlana at boarding school, because she had left the year before and the distance had nearly gutted him. A book, maybe. Chocolates. Something small enough that Grigori would not notice.

Grigori noticed before dinner.

"Give it to me."

Ilya froze in the kitchen doorway.

His father did not look up from the table, where police files sat stacked beside a glass of vodka. "Ilya."

Slowly, Ilya took out the envelope.

Grigori opened it, counted the bills, and set them beside his papers. "This goes to the family."

"But Coach said it was mine."

Grigori looked up then.

Ilya knew immediately that he had made a mistake.

"Yours?" Grigori repeated softly.

Ilya said nothing.

"Who pays for your training? Your skates? Your travel? Who feeds you? Who keeps a roof over your head?" Grigori leaned back in his chair, studying him with that cold police stare that made grown men confess to things. "You think because someone clapped for you, you are now a man?"

Heat crept up Ilya's neck.

Grigori tapped the envelope. “You are not earning treats. You are beginning to repay what you cost.”

After that, every prize went to Grigori. Tournament money. Small sponsorship gifts. Cash slipped to him by men who liked backing promising boys before anyone else knew their names. Some of it went back into hockey, because Grigori understood investment. Better camps. Better coaching. Better blades. Things that made Ilya more valuable. Some went to bills. Some to vodka. Some disappeared into places Ilya was never allowed to ask about. When Svetlana needed something at school, Ilya learned to bargain with performance. A hat trick could buy her a birthday parcel. A tournament win could buy permission to call her longer than ten minutes. Obedience could sometimes purchase mercy, if Grigori was in the mood to feel generous.

By fifteen, Ilya no longer asked to keep anything.

By sixteen, he understood that his body was not his either. It belonged to the ice, to Grigori’s ambition, to every scout watching from the stands, to the family name his father cared about more than the family itself.

By seventeen, people said tragedy had made him strong.

Ilya let them believe it.

The truth was uglier.

Tragedy had made him obedient first.

Violence came later.

Present

Ilya woke in the dark with the taste of incense in his mouth and Shane’s photograph glowing in his hand from his phone. He hadn’t had that dream in years.

For several seconds he did not understand where he was. The bedroom ceiling above him was too high. The bed was too large. The silence was too expensive. No covered mirrors. No church bells. No police men in the hallway lowering their voices because Grigori Rozanov had told them what the truth was allowed to be. Just his apartment, dark and airless, curtains drawn against the city, the room smelling of stale coffee and sweat and food he had ordered but never eaten.

His phone screen had dimmed, but Shane was still there.

Shane walking beside Rose.

Rose touching his arm.

Shane smiling like his world had not ended.

Ilya stared at the picture until his vision blurred, until the shape of Shane's face became less an image and more a wound he could press on whenever the numbness got too complete.

He had not slept properly in days.

Or maybe he had slept too much.

Time had started moving strangely. He lost whole afternoons and then woke at midnight with his heart trying to break his ribs. He missed meals, then forced himself to eat and felt sick after two bites. He stood in the shower and forgot whether he had washed his hair. He went to practice and heard nothing his coach said, only Grigori's voice in memory telling him stronger, tougher, again, again, again. He checked his phone until his thumb ached. He opened Shane's messages and typed apologies he deleted before sending, because every apology sounded like another way to ask for something.

I am sorry.

Delete.

I miss you.

Delete.

I think I am becoming something terrible.

Delete.

He could not send Shane his damage and call it honesty. He had already given Shane enough reasons to be afraid.

A knock came at the apartment door.

Ilya ignored it.

The knock came again.

Then keys.

Only one person had keys.

Svetlana let herself in like she had been doing since they were teenagers and she had decided his life was something she had partial custody over, no matter what blood said. She found him in the bedroom ten minutes later, still sitting in the dark, still holding the phone, still not moving.

She did not gasp.

That was Svetlana. She had seen too much of him to waste breath pretending to be shocked.

“Oh, Ilyusha,” she said quietly.

The childhood name nearly undid him.

He turned the phone face down.

Too late.

She had seen.

For a long moment, neither of them spoke. Then she crossed the room and opened the curtains. Gray Montreal light spilled in, exposing the empty cups, the untouched plates, the clothes on the floor, the man in the bed who looked nothing like the charming, dangerous thing the world thought it knew.

“You smell terrible,” she said.

A laugh dragged itself out of him, thin and dead. “You always know what to say.”

“I learned from you.”

He looked away.

Svetlana sat on the edge of the bed, close but not touching. She had been his best friend since they were five years old, and she was still careful with him in ways that made him feel both loved and ashamed. She had known him when he was soft. That was the awful thing. She had known him before Grigori finished carving him into something useful. She had known his mother’s laugh, the real one, not the quiet nervous one from later years. She had stood beside him at the funeral when everyone else accepted the accident because Grigori told them to. She had written to him from boarding school every week after she left at fifteen, pages and pages of gossip and complaints and jokes and little pieces of normal life folded into envelopes like offerings.

She was the only person alive who remembered him before.

And now she was looking at him like she was afraid of what after had become.

“You missed practice,” she said.

“I had practice yesterday.”

“That was three days ago.”

He went still.

Her face softened, which was worse. “When did you last eat?”

“I eat.”

“When?”

He said nothing.

She reached for the phone.

His hand snapped out and caught her wrist.

The movement was too fast. Too hard.

They both froze.

Ilya let go first.

Svetlana looked down at the place his fingers had been, then back at his face.

Horror moved through him, immediate and nauseating. “Sveta.”

“I know,” she said quietly.

“No.” He sat up, his heart slamming. “No, I did not mean-”

“I know you did not mean to hurt me.”

“I did not hurt you.”

“No,” she said. “You scared me. There is a difference.”

The room seemed to close around him. There were words he could have used. Defenses. Explanations. He was tired. She had startled him. He did not like people touching his phone. Any of them could have been true enough to pass for truth.

Instead, all he heard was Grigori.

You are making me do this.

You make things difficult.

You force my hand.

Ilya pressed both hands over his face.

Svetlana did not move closer. That was how he knew he had frightened her badly.

“Ilya,” she said, and her voice was careful now. Not cold. Never cold, but careful. “Yesterday, when you called me, you said Shane needed to be controlled before he ruined himself.”

His stomach turned.

“I was upset.”

“You said he did not know what was best for him.”

“Stop.”

“You said if he would just listen to you, everything would be fine.”

“Stop.”

“My mother used to say that your father said that about your mama.”

The words went through him like a blade.

He stood too quickly, dizziness washing black over the edges of his sight. For a moment, he had to grip the dresser to stay upright. “Do not compare me to him.”

“I am not trying to hurt you.”

“You think I am him?”

“No.”

“You just said-”

“I said you are using his words.”

Silence fell so hard it felt physical. Svetlana stood too, slow and cautious. “You made me promise once,” she whispered. “Do you remember? We were seventeen. You had just won that junior tournament, and Grigori took the money before you could even call me. You were so angry you could barely speak. You told me if you ever sounded like him, I had to tell you.”

Ilya remembered.

Of course he remembered.

He had been sitting on the floor of his bedroom with a split lip and an envelope torn open beside him, the money gone. Svetlana had been on the phone from boarding school, whispering under her blanket so no one would hear. He had told her he would rather die than become Grigori. He had meant it then with the absolute sincerity of a boy who still thought hatred was a cure.

“I am telling you,” she said.

Ilya turned away from her.

His reflection stared back from the dark window. Pale face. Hollow eyes. His mother’s mouth. His mother’s eyes. Grigori’s posture. Grigori’s rage wearing grief like a coat.

“I love him,” he said, and it sounded pathetic even to him.

“I know.”

“No. You do not.” His voice cracked. “You think it is only an obsession.”

“I think you love him and you are obsessed with him. Both can be true.”

He laughed once, ugly and broken. “Very comforting.”

“I am not here to comfort you with lies.”

That almost made him smile, because she never had been. Not even at twelve. Not even beside his mother’s locked bedroom when she told him she did not believe the accident.

Then the smile died.

“When I found her,” he said.

Svetlana’s eyes filled instantly.

“I never told you everything.”

“I know.”

“I saw the pills.” His voice went distant, scraped hollow. “They were on the floor. Some of them had rolled under the bed. I remember thinking I should pick them up before Papa came in, because he hated mess. Is that not funny?”

“No.”

“I thought she would wake up and he would be angry about the mess.”

Svetlana covered her mouth.

“He made me say accident before she was even cold.”

“Ilya.”

“And I did.” His throat tightened. “I said it. At the church. At the cemetery. To you. I lied to you.”

“You were a child.”

“I lied.”

“You survived.”

The word struck him strangely.

Survived.

Was that what this was?

He looked around the ruined bedroom, at the phone turned face down because Shane's smile beside someone else had been enough to send him under, at his best friend standing several feet away because he had grabbed her wrist too hard without thinking, at his own hands shaking like they belonged to someone else.

Survival looked too much like haunting.

"I don't know how to stop," he whispered.

Svetlana's face broke.

Not completely. She was too practiced for that. Too formed by her own years of watching Grigori from the edges of rooms, of seeing what men like him did and learning when to speak, when to wait, when to run. But the crack was there.

"I know," she said.

"No," Ilya said. "You don't understand. I know I am wrong. I know. I can hear myself sometimes, and it is like-" He stopped, swallowing hard. "It is like his voice in my mouth. But then I think about Shane away from me, scared or lonely or with someone touching him, and everything in me says to bring him back. Keep him safe. Make him understand. And in the moment it feels true. It feels like the only true thing."

Svetlana stepped closer.

This time, he stepped back.

Pain crossed her face, but she stopped.

"I cannot be near you if you are afraid of me," he said.

"I am afraid for you."

"That is not what I asked."

She did not answer.

That was answer enough.

Ilya closed his eyes.

There it was, then. The final cruelty. Grigori had not only made him afraid. Grigori had made him frightening.

For the rest of the evening, Svetlana stayed anyway. She cleaned because she needed something to do with her hands and because the apartment had begun to look like the inside of his head. She threw away old food, opened windows, changed sheets, poured out the alcohol without asking, and counted the pills in the bathroom with a face so pale he wanted to be angry just to make her stop looking like that. He did not have the energy. Or maybe, worse, he had the shame.

She made him soup and sat across from him until he ate half.

She called his coach and lied beautifully.

She texted his agent.

She placed his phone on the kitchen counter between them like a weapon they had agreed not to touch.

After midnight, she fell asleep on the couch, still wearing her boots, refusing the guest room because neither of them was pretending she trusted him alone. Ilya stood in the doorway and looked at her for a long time. She was not his sister. Not blood. Nothing bound her to him except history and choice and the stubborn loyalty of a girl who had once stood beside a twelve-year-old boy at his mother's coffin and decided he was hers to keep alive.

That made it worse somehow.

Family could be an obligation.

Svetlana was choosing this.

He went back to the bedroom and picked up his phone.

Shane's messages waited.

For a long time, Ilya only stared at the empty text box. Then he typed:

I am sorry.

Deleted it.

Typed:

There is something wrong with me.

Deleted that too.

Typed:

I miss you so badly I am scared of what I become without you.

His thumb hovered over send.

Then, slowly, he deleted every word.

Because it was true. Because it was cruel. Because Shane did not owe him the burden of keeping him human.

Ilya set the phone down and looked toward the window. The city below glittered cold and distant, indifferent to ruined men in expensive apartments, indifferent to boys who found their mothers dead and fathers who taught them to lie about it, indifferent to love that curdled into possession when left alone too long in the dark.

“Mama,” he whispered, the word barely audible. “Tell me how to stop.”

There was no answer.

There had never been an answer.

Only the memory of incense. Only the taste of smoke. Only the sound of earth hitting a coffin lid. Only Svetlana slept in the next room because she was afraid to leave him alone. Only Shane’s name burning silently in his hand.

And beneath the grief, beneath the shame, beneath the horror of recognizing Grigori’s voice inside his own, the wanting remained.

Patient. Hungry. Waiting for weakness.

By the next week, Svetlana had stopped pretending this was only depression.

She wanted it to be. Depression was terrible, yes, and dangerous in its own quiet ways, but it was human. It had language. It had doctors and pills and therapy and plans people could say aloud without their voices lowering. Depression could explain the darkness under Ilya’s eyes, the weight loss, the missed practices, the way he sat on the edge of his bed staring at nothing for so long that she sometimes had to say his name twice before he heard her.

It did not explain the rest.

It did not explain how he went still whenever Shane’s name appeared on the television, not tense, not angry, but fixed, like some buried animal instinct had seized him by the throat. It did not explain the scent of him changing, sharper and wrong beneath the stale sweat and exhaustion, grief and aggression curdled together until even she could feel her shoulders tightening when she came too close too quickly. It did not explain the way he refused food until she mentioned, carefully, that Shane would hate seeing him like this, and then he forced down three bites with the bleak obedience of a man swallowing broken glass. It did not explain why he had nearly put his fist through the wall when a sports commentator laughed about Shane looking “comfortable” in Montreal’s new line combinations, then five minutes later folded over the kitchen sink with his hands braced on the counter, breathing like he was going to be sick.

Svetlana had seen pining before, though never this close. Everyone knew the old stories. People dressed them up in romantic language when they wanted to make it sound beautiful, like it was proof of devotion instead of a biological collapse. Alphas found their mates and, if separated too long before the bond settled, something in them began to misfire. At first it looked like heartbreak. Restlessness. Sleeplessness. Irritability. Possessiveness getting sharper around the edges. Then the body started following the mind down. Appetite disappeared. Sleep became unreliable. Their temper shortened until violence sat beneath the skin waiting for any excuse. Some became reckless. Some became paranoid. Some fixated so completely that friends and doctors had to step in before longing turned into something uglier.

Omeegas pined too, but differently. Later, usually. Their bodies held out a few weeks longer, as if biology gave them one last chance to stay sensible before grief dragged them under. They became quieter first. More withdrawn. More pliant in ways that could be mistaken for calm if no one looked carefully enough. They slept too much, ate too little, nested compulsively or stopped nesting at all. Their scents thinned. Their instincts turned inward, submissive and sorrowful, less explosive than an alpha's but no less dangerous if ignored.

But alphas burned outward.

And Ilya had always burned hotter than most.

Svetlana stood in his kitchen with a mug of coffee going cold in her hand and watched him sit at the table without touching the toast she had made. He was wearing sweatpants and a shirt from yesterday, hair damp from the shower she had bullied him into taking, face clean enough that the hollowness of it was worse. His cheekbones looked too sharp. His eyes kept moving to his phone even though she had placed it facedown beside her instead of beside him.

"You need help," she said.

His mouth twisted. "You have said."

"No. I mean more help than me."

That got his attention. Not much. Just a flick of his eyes.

Svetlana pulled out the chair across from him and sat. "Should I call your agent?"

"No."

"Ilya."

"No."

"You cannot keep playing like this."

"I can play."

"You missed practice for three days."

"I said I can play."

"You almost broke your hand on the wall last night because someone said Shane looked comfortable."

His face closed.

There it was again. That frightening, Grigori-like shuttering. The emotion did not leave him. It only disappeared from the surface, shoved down so violently she could almost hear the lock turn.

Svetlana softened her voice. "I am not saying this to shame you."

"You think I am pining."

She did not answer quickly enough.

He laughed, low and humorless, and rubbed both hands over his face. "Jesus Christ."

"I think your body is doing what alpha bodies do when they are under too much separation stress from someone they have already chosen."

"He did not choose me."

The words came out flat.

Svetlana's heart twisted. "That is not what I said."

"He did not." Ilya stared at the untouched toast like it had personally offended him. "He left. He stopped answering. He is in Canada with his friends and his team and Rose fucking Landry touching his fucking arm, and I am here acting like some pathetic animal because my body decided something he never agreed to."

"It does not make you pathetic."

She could not lie to him. So she said, "It means we have to be careful. Maybe find a new mate."

He looked up then, and the misery in his face was so raw she had to grip the mug tighter to keep from reaching for him. He looked younger when he was stripped down like this. Not softer, exactly. Ilya had not been allowed to keep softness in any uncomplicated way. But younger. Like the boy at the funeral was still inside him, still waiting beside a coffin, still being told to swallow the truth until it poisoned him.

"What do you want to do?" he asked.

"I want to call your agent and say you need to be evaluated. Physically, mentally, whatever language gets them to listen. You could go on IR."

"No."

"You are injured."

"I am not telling them I am pining."

"I did not say we tell them that."

“They will know.”

“Not if they are stupid.” That almost got a smile from him. Almost.

Svetlana leaned forward. “You need time off the ice.”

“I need Shane.” The words landed between them with terrible simplicity.

Neither of them moved. Ilya looked away first, jaw flexing. “Forget I said that.”

“No.”

“Sveta.”

“No,” she repeated, gentler this time. “That is the problem. You keep trying to make the honest thing disappear after you say it.”

He closed his eyes.

She reached for his phone, and this time he did not stop her. That, more than anything, frightened her. Ilya had always fought for control even when it hurt him. He had always preferred anger to helplessness. Now he only sat there, shoulders rounded, hands loose on the table.

“I am going to look at the schedule,” she said.

His eyes opened immediately. “Why?”

“Because before I call anyone, I want to know what the next two weeks look like.”

“Svetlana.”

She ignored the warning and opened the NHL app. His passcode was still her birthday, which made her chest ache in a way she did not have time for. She navigated Boston’s, her thumb moving quickly while Ilya watched with the stillness of a starving wolf pretending not to smell blood.

Then she stopped.

“Oh,” she said.

His gaze sharpened. “What?”

Svetlana did not answer right away. She looked again, certain she had misread it, but there it was. Montreal and Boston. Not once. Not some distant future possibility she could manage him around.

Three games.

Three games in two weeks.

A strange, almost ugly hope moved across Ilya's face before he could hide it.

Svetlana hated it.

Not because she wanted to deny him Shane. God help her, maybe Shane was the only thing that could interrupt the collapse before it became irreversible. But hope in Ilya, right now, did not look like relief. It looked like hunger given direction.

"Show me," he said.

"Ilya."

"Show me."

She turned the phone toward him slowly.

His eyes dropped to the screen.

Boston at Montreal.

Montreal at Boston.

Boston at Montreal again.

Back to back in the way only a brutal schedule could be, games stacked close enough to feel less like coincidence and more like temptation. His breathing changed as he read the dates. Not calmer. Not exactly. Deeper, maybe. Focused. The terrible loose edges of him pulling inward around a single point.

Shane.

Svetlana watched him carefully. "This does not mean you get to do anything stupid."

He did not look at her. "Define stupid."

"I am serious."

"So am I."

"Ilya."

His fingers brushed the screen, not quite touching Shane's team name. "Three games."

"Yes."

"In two weeks."

"Yes."

His mouth parted slightly, and for one second his face did something that broke her heart. Not a smile. Not even close. It was worse than that. It was a man drowning who had just seen land, even if reaching it meant tearing through everyone in his way.

Svetlana took the phone back.

He let her.

Again, terrifying.

“You are going on injured reserve,” she said.

His head snapped up. “No.”

“You are not stable enough to play against him.”

“I am more stable if he is there.”

“No. You are more focused. That is not the same thing.”

“I need to see him.”

“I know.”

“You do not.”

“I do,” she said, and her voice cracked. “I know more than you think I know. I know what it is to watch you disappear when he is not near you. I know you have lost weight. I know your hands shake when his name comes up. I know you sleep with your phone in your hand like a child holding a blanket. I know you are scared, and I know that could make you snap.”

He flinched.

She kept going because if she stopped now, she would lose her nerve. “And I know if you get on the ice with him like this, with cameras everywhere and other alphas around him and adrenaline already in your blood, you might do something you cannot take back.”

His expression hardened.

For a moment, Grigori looked out through his eyes.

Then Ilya looked down.

“I would never hurt him.”

“No,” Svetlana said softly. “But you might hurt everyone around him.”

His silence was answer enough.

She stood, taking the phone with her. “I am calling your agent.”

“No.”

“I am calling him.”

Ilya rose from the chair so fast it scraped hard against the floor.

Svetlana froze.

So did he.

The room held its breath around them.

He looked at her hand gripping the phone. Then at her face. Then at the few careful feet of space between them, space she had not meant to put there but had. Shame moved across him, devastating and immediate.

He stepped back first.

“I’m sorry,” Ilya said, voice rough.

Svetlana blinked.

He swallowed, throat working. “Call a doctor. Tell them I need something to stabilize me.”

Relief nearly made her knees weak.

Then he added, very quietly, “But I am not missing all three games.”

There it was.

The compromise that was not a compromise.

Svetlana stared at him.

Ilya looked back, pale and hollow and frighteningly calm. “Make them think whatever you want. But if Montreal is coming here, if he is going to be in the same building as me, I am not staying away from him completely.”

“Ilya.”

“I need to see him.”

“No.”

“Once,” he said, and the word broke in the middle. “Just once, Sveta. I will not touch him. I will not go near him if he does not want me. I will not do anything. But I need to see him with my own eyes and know if he is all right.”

Svetlana wanted to believe him.

That was the worst part.

She wanted to believe him because the boy she loved was still in there somewhere, buried beneath Grigori's lessons and alpha instinct and the terrible ache of an unfinished bond. She wanted to believe him because he sounded so sincere, so ruined by the simple fact of wanting, and because she remembered him at twelve years old promising over his mother's grave that he would never become his father.

But she also knew sincerity had never made dangerous people safe.

So she held the phone against her chest and said, "Then we make rules."

His eyes lifted.

"You do not go near that hotel alone. You do not text him without showing me first. You do not follow him. You do not corner him. You do not talk to anyone on Montreal's roster. You do not start a fight because someone stands too close to him."

His jaw tightened.

"Ilya."

"Yes."

"I mean it. If you cannot agree to that, I call your agent, your coach, and whoever else I have to call, and I tell them enough to keep you away from those games completely."

For a second, she thought he would rage.

Instead, he laughed once, empty and miserable. "I just need to be near him."

"You became very stupid in love."

He looked down, and there it was again, the almost-smile. Faint. Painful. Gone too quickly.

Then he nodded.

"Rules," he said.

Svetlana did not relax.

Not really.

Because when she looked back down at the schedule glowing on his phone, those three games did not look like salvation.

They looked like a countdown.

The change terrified Svetlana more than the breakdown had.

Three days after Boston hit Montreal's schedule, Ilya started acting almost normal.

Not truly normal. She had known him too long to mistake performance for recovery, but close enough that people stopped asking questions. He went back to practice. Showered without being told. Ate enough food that she no longer had to sit across from him counting bites like he was an injured animal relearning survival. He laughed with teammates again, low and dry and sharp in the familiar way that made people relax around him. He showed up to training early. Stayed late. Watched film. Slept more than four hours at a time.

Everyone praised the improvement. The coach said the time off from media pressure must have helped.

His agent sounded relieved.

Teammates slapped him on the shoulder and joked that Rozanov had finally crawled out of whatever cave he disappeared into.

Only Svetlana knew better. Because none of it happened until Boston got closer. It was not healing.

It was anticipation.

The closer the game came, the calmer Ilya became, as though his body had finally been promised water after weeks in the desert. The sharp, ugly edge of the pining softened into something more focused. Dangerous in a quieter way. He stopped pacing at night. Started sleeping again. Ate without argument. Practiced harder than she had seen him practice in months.

But every evening, after dinner, he sat on the couch with game footage open on the television.

Not just Shane.

Everyone near Shane.

Montreal defense, their lines.

Who protected him. Who touched him after goals. Who stood too close during scrums.

Landry showed up twice in media clips.

Svetlana pretended not to notice the way Ilya rewound those clips until his jaw hurt.

She also pretended not to notice the list.

Small.

Folded once.

Tucked inside his wallet.

Not names exactly.

Observations.

Protective tendencies.

Habits.

Weaknesses.

Who Shane leaned toward. Who he smiled at. Who seemed trusted.

That frightened her most.

Not rage.

Focus.

By the time game day came, Ilya looked almost healthy.

He dressed carefully.

Shaved.

Styled his hair.

Put on the expensive coat Shane had once quietly complimented months ago without realizing Ilya had remembered every word.

Svetlana watched him button the sleeves.

“You look like you are going on a date.”

The corner of his mouth twitched.

“Maybe,” he said quietly.

Her stomach dropped. “You remember the rules?”

“Yes.”

“No touching.”

“Yes.”

“No cornering him.”

“Yes.”

“No following him.”

His expression flickered.

“I said yes.”

“And if he does not want to talk to you?”

The silence lasted too long.

Then: “I leave.”

She searched his face.

He looked sincere. That somehow worried her more. The arena felt wrong before warmups even started. Too loud. Too bright.

Too much energy vibrating through the concrete like something alive.

Ilya walked beside her through restricted access with terrifying stillness, headphones around his neck but not playing anything, jaw tight enough to ache. He barely spoke. Barely blinked.

Svetlana touched his wrist once.

“Breathe.”

He did, slow. Controlled.

Like he was holding something enormous inside himself with both hands.

When Montreal finally stepped onto their side of the ice for warmups, she saw it happen.

The moment.

The exact second Shane stepped onto the rink.

Everything in Ilya stopped. His shoulders., his breathing, his expression. Even the restless movement that had lived under his skin for weeks. Gone.

Like something in him had finally aligned.

Shane skated onto the ice laughing at something a teammate said, visor catching arena light, hair damp from the locker room, jersey hanging familiar and devastating across broad shoulders.

For one terrible second, Ilya looked younger.

Not happier. Relieved. Like pain had briefly loosened its grip.

“There he is,” he said, so quietly she almost missed it.

The words did something awful to her.

Because he sounded reverent.

Hungry.

Broken.

Shane moved through warmups, stick handling lazily, glancing around the stadium every few seconds.

Ilya smiled before he could stop himself.

“He is looking for me.”

Svetlana turned sharply.

“You do not know that.”

But then Shane looked again.

And again.

Toward the visiting family section.

The smile disappeared from Ilya’s face.

Slowly, inevitably, his eyes followed Shane’s line of sight.

And stopped.

Rose Landry. Wearing Shane’s jersey.

Laughing with someone beside her, waving once when Shane glanced over.

Shane smiled. Small. Easy, familiar.

Ilya stopped breathing. Something inside him seemed to collapse inward all at once.

The relief vanished. The softness was gone.

Only emptiness remained.

“Oh,” he said.

Just that. Quiet. Flat. Like he had been hit somewhere no one could see.

Svetlana immediately reached for him. “Ilya-”

He turned before she could finish.

No anger, not yet.

Just devastation sharp enough to make him move.

“I need a minute.”

“Ilya.”

He was already walking.

Fast.

Too fast.

By the time he reached the locker room, the devastation had become something uglier.

He paced in full gear, skates carving short violent lines into the rubber flooring, helmet abandoned somewhere behind him. Gloves off. Back and forth. Back and forth.

Rose fucking Landry in Shane’s jersey.

Shane smiling at her.

Shane looking for her.

Months.

Months of breaking apart.

Weeks of starvation and humiliation and wanting so badly it made his ribs ache.

And Shane had moved on.

Or worse.

Chosen.

The locker room door opened.

One teammate.

Then another.

Conversation died quickly.

Because everyone knew Rozanov’s moods.

And this one felt dangerous.

Ilya stopped pacing.

Turned slowly.

His expression had gone cold.

Too calm.

The kind of calm teammates learned not to interrupt.

When he finally spoke, his voice was low.

Controlled.

“The Voyageurs runs through number twenty-four.”

Shane.

Nobody needed clarification.

“They protect him too much,” Ilya continued. “Defense keeps lanes open for him. They give him room to breathe. I want that gone tonight.”

A few players exchanged looks. Something about Rozanov’s tone felt personal.

“Pressure him every shift,” Ilya said. “Do not let him settle. Keep him moving. Keep him working. Push him into the glass if you have the chance. Separate him from support. Make him uncomfortable.”

One defenseman snorted. “And if he gets kicked out of the game?”

Ilya smiled. It did not reach his eyes.

“I do not want comfortable,” he said smoothly. “Then I get the check, just set me up. The refs won’t kick me out of the game.”

The room went quieter.

Then:

“Keep their defense off him,” Ilya said. “If he wants ice, he earns every inch.”

He reached for his helmet.

“And if he ends up against the boards,” he added, voice going softer in a way that somehow felt worse, “I’ll keep him there a little longer.”

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Note:

Rose Landry hive, how are we feeling???

Also... um.

I will probably have a partition in the next chapter so if people do not want to read that section it possibly can be skipped. Working on it today.

About Ilya.

So, funny story: when I said he wasn't doing well, I may have been dramatically underselling the situation. Maybe...probably...

Next chapter gets dark. Like "someone please put this man in therapy and maybe temporary supervised housing" dark. We're diving harder into Ilya's mental state, pining, trauma, obsession, and unfortunately the man has discovered the dangerous combination of heartbreak + hope + zero coping skills.

Shane, sweetie, I'm so sorry in advance. But I promised a happy ending and will deliver.

Please scream in the comments. The emotional support is mutual at this point.

Chapter Summary

Please mind the tags and content warnings for this next chapter. Things are going to get significantly darker before they get better. I'll provide a brief summary on chapter 20 incase people are triggered and dont want to read this one-I think its the last crazy crazy chapter.

As always, thank you for every comment, bookmark, kudos, theory, and emotional breakdown in my inbox. I read every single one and love seeing what everyone thinks.

The stale, recycled air of the hotel corridor tasted like anonymity, a flavor Ilya Rozanov had come to despise. He leaned against the wall opposite the service elevator, the picture of casual patience, one ankle crossed over the other. His target emerged a moment later: a young man in a too-large Montreal polo, his arms laden with a crate of bottled water that shimmered under the fluorescent lights. The kid's nametag read 'Leo.'

"You are Leo," Ilya said, not a question. His voice was a low, pleasant rumble, the one he used for sponsors and polite interviews.

Leo startled, juggling the crate. "Oh, uh, yeah. Wow. Hi. You're Ilya Rozanov."

"I am." Ilya pushed off the wall, his height becoming an implicit pressure. "You are new with team."

"Started last week," Leo said, a flicker of pride in his eyes. It was that pride Ilya would use.

“Good. Is important job. Help the team so much.” Ilya nodded at the bottles. “You know which room is Shane Hollander?”

Leo’s expression turned cautious. “Yeah, but I can’t really- ”

Ilya’s hand was already moving, smooth as a card trick. A few folded bills, substantial enough to feel thick, slid into the breast pocket of Leo’s polo. “Is a prank. Between rivals. You understand? Like... tradition.” Ilya’s smile was a conspiratorial slash, charming and utterly false. “His water only. The blue bottle, yes? You mark it. A special electrolyte mix. Very funny. He will be... drowsy. Sleep well and be fine for morning practice. Harmless.”

Leo’s throat worked. His eyes darted to the crisp edges of the money peeking from his pocket. The internal war- professionalism versus the allure of easy money from an NHL star- was brief and pathetic. Ilya watched it conclude. “Harmless?” Leo echoed, voice thin.

“Konechno. Of course. A joke.” Ilya’s gaze held his, a blue anchor. “You do this, you put bottle in his room with others, you say nothing. Or...” He let the alternative hang, a silent vacuum filled with the threat of unspecified consequences. The kid was eighteen at most. A paycheck-to-paycheck life was written in the fraying threads of his sneakers.

Leo swallowed, nodded once, a sharp, jerky motion. “Blue bottle. Got it.”

“Good man.” Ilya clapped him on the shoulder, a gesture that felt like a seizure. He melted back into the corridor’s shadows before Leo could exhale, his own pulse a steady, satisfied drum against his ribs. The mechanism was in motion.

Across the city, in the quiet gloom of a downtown wine bar, Shane stared into the crimson vortex of his untouched Merlot. Rose sat across from him, her presence a solid, warm anchor in the swirling sea of his dread. The game was over, a messy, physical loss where every shift had felt like a confrontation with a ghost. Ilya had been a constant, a dark star on the ice whose gravity Shane had felt in every turn, every blocked shot. The final buzzer had been a reprieve.

“You’re somewhere else,” Rose said softly, not a reproach, but a lifeline thrown.

Shane’s finger traced the stem of his glass. The noise of the bar- the clink of glass, the low hum of conversation- faded into a distant murmur. He had practiced this confession in the mirror, in the shower, during endless sleepless nights. The words had fossilized in his throat. Now, with the alcohol a gentle loosening agent in his veins and Rose’s patient silence an invitation, they broke free.

“Can I tell you something that has to stay between us?” He asked, not looking directly into her eyes.

At her nod, he paused for a few seconds before gathering his courage. “I’m an Omega.”

The words dropped between them, absolute, like a stone into a still pond. Rose didn’t flinch. Her eyes, sharp and kind, remained on his face. She waited.

“It’s not public. It’s... it’s a secret. The league, my team... it’s- I’m having a hard time.” The explanation tumbled out, clinical and defensive. The suppressants, the quarterly checks, the constant, low-grade fear of a scent, a slip, a rumor. From the outside he looked exactly like he was supposed to. Inside he was getting tired of hearing himself talk. The platitude about improving and helping the team win echoed hollowly in his memory, a script he was so fucking tired of reading from.

Rose listened, her head tilted. When he finished, she reached across the table and covered his hand with hers. “Okay,” she said, simple and profound.

The simplicity undid him. The next confession was a raw, torn thing, hauled up from a place that was all bruised and longing. “Boston wasn’t... it wasn’t just a fight, with who I was kind of seeing... It wasn’t just him being an asshole. He... he knew. He scented me. And he...” Shane’s voice hitched. He couldn’t name the room, the wall, the terrifying, exhilarating certainty in Ilya’s eyes. “It was messed up. It was so far over the line, Rose. I didn’t want- it doesn’t even start to cover it.” He thought of the door clicking shut, sealing him in a room saturated with the ghost of a mouth that had unraveled him completely, the promise of weeks apart that had felt like a chasm even then.

He took a gulp of wine, the bitterness fitting. “And I think I’m in love with him anyway.”

There it was. The rotten, glorious truth of it. He expected shock, revulsion, a lecture. Rose sat back, her gaze turning inward. After a long moment, she sighed, a sound of deep understanding. “Oh, Shane. The heart wants what it wants, even when it’s terrible for us.”

“It’s not wanting,” Shane whispered, desperate. “It’s... it’s a sickness. It’s just part of my brain forcing me to think that he’s meant to be like this perfect partner for me. It’s bullshit. It’s like he carved a space out inside me and now everything else just... echoes. He texts me about protein and I feel cared for. He looks at me across a crowded elevator and I feel... seen. In a way that scares the shit out of me. After what he did, how can we be anything after?” He missed the attention, missed being noticed. Missed the strange certainty of someone remembering small things about him without being asked. That alone felt dangerous enough.

“Am I the first person you’ve told? Other than him and your parents.” She waited for his nod. Rose swirled her wine. “You’ve spent your whole life hiding a core part of yourself. He saw it. Instantly. That kind of recognition... it’s a drug. Even if the delivery system is a wrecking ball.” She leaned forward. “But love isn’t a referendum on his behavior. It’s just a fact. The question is, what are you going to do with it?”

Tears pricked hot at the corners of Shane’s eyes. He blinked them away, furious. “I don’t know,” he admitted, the sound hollow. “I don’t know what I want. I want to not want him. I want to be normal. I want to not feel my heart stutter when his name comes up on my phone. I want to not remember what his hands feel like.”

They talked until the bar staff began wiping down nearby tables, the conversation a winding path through fear, biology, trauma, and the stubborn, illogical persistence of affection. Shane confessed the sleepless nights, the way his mind replayed every interaction on a loop, searching for a clue, a reason, an off-ramp from this feeling. Rose offered no easy answers, only the solid ground of her listening, the absence of judgment a balm on the raw nerve of his shame. When she finally glanced at her phone and winced- her 5 AM call time for the film shoot looming- Shane felt a pang of loss. Her clarity was a temporary shelter, and now the walls of his own life were closing in again.

“You’ll figure it out,” she said, standing and pulling on her coat. “Not tonight. Maybe not for a while. But you will. And I’m here, no matter what you figure out.”

He hugged her tight, a lump in his throat. “Thanks, Rose.”

“Text me when you get back to the hotel.”

He nodded, watching her go, the space she left behind feeling immediately colder, larger.

Back in the sterile silence of his hotel room, the emptiness was a physical weight. The conversation replayed in his head, a dizzying loop. He shucked his jacket, his movements automatic. There, on the desk beside the standard-issue coffee maker, was the cluster of water bottles. One of them, a blue-tinted sport bottle, sat slightly apart from the others. One of the new team assistants had asked everyone what flavor they liked for the electrolyte powders the coach had them drink before games.

His throat was parched from talking, from fear, from everything. He opened the bottle and drank half of it in long, deep pulls, trying to get rid of the taste of the wine. The water was cool, faintly metallic. He finished it, tossed the empty bottle towards the trash can (it missed, rattling against the wall), and fell onto the bed without bothering to undress.

The drowsiness hit him not with a wave, but with a stealthy, rising tide. One moment he was staring at the textured hotel ceiling, the next his thoughts were unraveling into warm, woolly strands. His limbs grew heavy, as if filled with sand. A distant, rational part of his brain fired a warning flare- he hadn’t realized he’d been that tired- but the signal couldn’t traverse the sudden, syrupy void of his consciousness. His last coherent sensation was the faint, phantom trace of cedar and cold air in his nostrils, a scent-memory that felt more real than the room around him. Then, nothing.

The keycard reader gave a soft, green-eyed blink and a click that was deafening in the silent hallway. Ilya slipped inside, closing the door with infinite care until the latch engaged with a sound no louder than a heartbeat.

Darkness, split only by the faint orange bleed of city lights around the edges of the blackout curtains. The room smelled of clean linen, stale air, and him. Shane. That honeysuckle, rain-on-concrete Omega scent, now laced with the chemical tang of the drugged water and the deeper, more vulnerable aroma of utterly defenseless sleep.

Ilya stood still, letting his eyes adjust. There was Shane, a dark shape on the king-sized bed, one arm flung over his eyes, his breathing deep and unnaturally even. The drugs had worked. A cold thrill, sharp and possessive, shot through Ilya's veins. This was wrong. He knew it was wrong. The knowledge was an intellectual ice chip in the furnace of his need. He crossed the room, his steps silent on the plush carpet.

He looked down at the sleeping man. Shane's face in repose lost its usual guarded tension. He looked younger, softer. Beautiful. Ilya's hand lifted, trembling slightly not from fear but from the intensity of the hunger that roared to life within him. His fingers hovered just above the pulse point on Shane's exposed neck. The skin there was pale, delicate. He saw the translucent bite guard around his neck. It would be so easy to rip it away now. The urge was primal, a deep, atavistic roar in his blood: Bite. Claim. Mark. Make him yours in the way that cannot be undone.

His own breath came short. He imagined the press of his teeth, the sharp, bright pain that would wake Shane into a dazed, bonded confusion, the flood of bonding hormones that would seek and soothe and addict. It would be so easy. Shane was his for the taking, right now. His rival. His Omega. Moy. His.

He let his fingers brush the warm skin. Shane made a soft, sleepy sound- a faint "mmph"- and turned his head slightly into the touch, a trust given in absolute unconsciousness.

The trust was the knife that severed the primal cord.

Ilya snatched his hand back as if burned. A low curse hissed between his teeth in Russian. "Cyka." This wasn't winning. This wasn't even possession. This was spoliation. It was the act of a coward and a villain, and while Ilya was many things- ruthless, obsessive, whatever it was- he was, in his own twisted calculus, not that. Not with Shane. Not like this. The ghost of Sveta's imagined critique- that he was going too far- flickered, not as a deterrent, but as a point of pride. He would be as crazy as he needed to be, but even his madness had lines, and this, in the silent dark with Shane pliant and unaware, was one.

The fight left his body in a rush, leaving behind a hollow, aching need. The predatory tension melted into something worse: a yearning so profound it felt like grief. He sank onto the edge of the bed, the mattress dipping under his weight. Gently, carefully, he rearranged Shane's limp form, pulling him from the center of the bed. Shane went willingly, a warm weight in his arms. Ilya stretched out beside him, on top of the covers, and gathered the unconscious man against his chest.

Shane's head settled with a sigh. Ilya held him, one arm a firm band across his back, the other hand cradling the back of his head. He buried his face in Shane's soft hair, inhaling the scent that drove him to madness and moments of shocking clarity. Here, in the silent dark, with the world held at bay, he could pretend. He could pretend this was earned. That this surrender was given, not taken. That the steady thump of Shane's heart under his palm was a rhythm meant for him, a counter-beat to the frantic, lonely tempo of his own.

He held him for what felt like both an instant and an eternity. He memorized the weight, the heat, the perfect fit of Shane's body against his own, the way his breathing deepened and evened out as if recognizing, even in sleep, the shape of the one who held him. Finally, with a resolve that cost him dearly, he leaned down and pressed his lips to Shane's forehead. The kiss was chaste, lingering, a sacrament offered in the church of his own delusion.

"Moy prekrasnyy," he whispered against the warm skin. My beautiful one. Then, he untangled himself.

He slipped off the bed, straightening the covers Shane had disturbed. At the door, he paused, looking back. His eye caught a small, gift-wrapped box on the dresser he'd missed on his way in. It had a small tag in flowing script: For Shane. A teammate, probably. The whole floor was reserved for Montreal. It was unimportant, a speck of normalcy in the abnormal vacuum of this room. He left it.

He exited as silently as he had entered, the corridor swallowing him whole. The door clicked shut, sealing Shane inside with only the ghost of his presence, the memory of a held breath in the dark.

Shane woke to a headache that was a dull, insistent throb behind his eyes, a vise slowly tightening. Sunlight, fierce and accusatory, stabbed around the edges of the blackout curtains, painting sharp lines on the ceiling. He groaned, pushing himself up on his elbows. The room spun lazily, a nauseating carousel. He felt thick-headed, groggy, as if he'd slept for a century and yet not at all, his body heavy with an odd lethargy.

And then he froze. The scent.

It was faint, a whisper clinging to the collar of his own shirt, imprinted on the pillowcase beside him- the side of the bed that felt vaguely, unsettlingly warm, as if a body heat had just recently vacated it. Leather. Cigarette smoke. The faint, clean sharpness of expensive soap. Rozanov's scent.

His heart slammed against his ribs, a frantic bird in a cage. He scrambled upright, his eyes darting around the empty room. Nothing was out of place. The door was locked, the chain engaged from the inside. Impossible. A hallucination. A cruel trick of his longing-hazed brain, conjured from the depths of a drugged sleep. He brought the pillow to his face and inhaled deeply. There- gone. A phantom. It had to be.

But the conviction, the eerie, visceral feeling of not having been alone, clung to him like a chill. He replayed the night: the blue bottle, the sudden, overwhelming fatigue. A prank from Hayden? It felt different. This sleep had been absolute, a void. He touched his forehead where a strange, lingering warmth seemed to pulse, a sensation entirely separate from the headache.

He showered until the water ran cold, scrubbing at his skin as if he could erase the sensory memory, the feeling of phantom arms. It didn't work. The scent, or the ghost of it, seemed baked into his sinuses.

The morning team workout was a special kind of torture. The bright lights of the hotel gym felt surgical, exposing. Every shout from a coach, every clang of a weight plate, was amplified and abrasive, grating against the raw edges of his nerves. He moved through the drills mechanically, his body obeying while his mind splintered. He replayed the faint scent, the crushing weight of his confession to Rose, the helpless, drowning feeling of not knowing what he wanted. Just to keep improving. Do what I can to help the team win. The empty script played in his head, a taunt. How could he improve when he was coming apart at the seams? How could he help anyone when he couldn't even decide if he wanted to be near the man who haunted him?

Back in his room, the silence was a tomb. He ignored the gift box on the dresser. It sat there, a quiet accusation. He ordered room service- a bland chicken where he threw the bread out and salad- and picked at it without tasting, the food like ash in his mouth. The melancholy was a heavy, liquid lead, filling the hollows of his bones, weighing down his limbs until even lifting the remote felt like a Herculean task. He spent the day in its grip, curled on the bed in a pair of sweatpants, staring at his phone as the sunlight tracked its slow arc across the carpet.

Texts came, little digital intrusions from a world that expected Shane Hollander to be functional.

Mom- Hope you're resting up for tonight! We're watching! Love you!

He stared at the message, the cheerful exclamation points like tiny stabs. He typed back, his thumbs clumsy: Thx. All good. The lie was a pebble in his shoe, a constant, minor agony.

Dad- Tough loss last night. Shake it off. Focus on the next one.

He replied: Yep. On it.

Two words that felt like lifting stones.

Rose Landry- Filming running late. Might miss puck drop. So sorry. You okay?

He stared at this one the longest. The concern was a pinprick of light in the gloom. He could tell her. He could say he felt haunted, sick, wrong. He could say he woke up feeling like he'd been held, and now the emptiness was crushing him. He could ask her to come, to be his tether, to talk him down from this ledge of paralyzing confusion. The weight of asking felt immense. He was a burden. He was a mess. He was the future captain of Canada's best team, crumbling in a hotel room because he could still smell his rival on his pillow.

His thumbs moved, independent of his heart.

Shane- Don't worry. Get your rest. I'm ok.

He sent it. The silence from her end felt heavier than any response. He imagined her on set, worrying anyway, and hated himself a little more.

He put the phone down, the lie sitting heavy in his stomach. He wouldn't call. He couldn't drag her into this spiral. He needed to move, to outrun the ghost in the room and the one in his head.

He pulled on running gear, the familiar ritual of lacing his shoes a small comfort. He texted Hayden.

Shane: You up for a run? Need to clear my head.

Hayden's response was almost instantaneous.

Hayd: Already in the lobby. Was about to head out. You're buying post-run coffee.

The city air was a cold slap, a welcome shock to his system. He fell into step beside Hayden, their sneakers hitting the pavement in a steady rhythm along the riverwalk. Hayden, bless him, didn't ask questions. He launched into a detailed, passionate complaint about the hotel's "cardboard disguised as wheat toast," and for a few miles, Shane could almost pretend he was normal. The burn in his lungs, the sweat cooling on his skin, the mundane sound of Hayden's voice- it pushed the scent, the feeling, the haunting to the edges of his mind.

But it was still there, a low-grade hum beneath everything, like a radio tuned to a station just out of range. His body felt different. Not sore, but... aware. As if his skin had been mapped by hands he couldn't see. He ran harder, trying to outpace the sensation, until his breath sawed in his chest and Hayden shot him a concerned look.

Hayden nodded, not pushing. They finished the loop in a companionable, breathless silence. Over coffee, Shane managed to laugh at Hayden's stories, to contribute to the debate about the best power-play formation. He performed Shane Hollander so convincingly he almost fooled himself.

Almost.

As game time approached, the leaden feeling solidified into a cold, hard decision. He couldn't do it. Not tonight. The thought of lining up across from Rozanov, of the puck dropping between them, of that intense, focused gaze locking onto his from mere inches away... his stomach turned over, a slick wave of panic that had him swallowing hard against a rise of bile. The memory of that proximity- in Boston, in elevators, in his own damned dreams- was too fresh, too charged with the confession he'd made to Rose. I think I'm in love with him. To stand that close now would be to offer himself up, naked and trembling, on the altar of his own weakness.

He found Coach Williams outside the locker room, amidst the pre-game chaos of equipment bags and shouted conversations. "Coach. Got a sec?"

Williams turned, his face already in game-mode sharpness. "Hollander. What is it?"

"Tonight... can we switch? Put me on D. Let Hayden take the face-offs." The words came out in a rush, too fast.

Williams frowned, the lines around his eyes deepening as he assessed him. "You're our best in the circle, Hollander. You know that. It's our best weapon."

"I know." Shane forced himself to meet his coach's gaze, to not look away like a guilty thing. "Just... not tonight. Please." The raw edge in his own voice surprised him, a crack in the facade. He saw the moment Williams registered it- not just the request, but the shadows under his eyes, the pallor of his skin, the tight set of his jaw that had nothing to do with game focus.

Williams studied him for a long, silent moment. The noise of the hallway faded into a buzz. He was weighing the weapon against the soldier holding it. Finally, he gave a curt, almost imperceptible nod. “Fine. Second pairing with Petrov. He’ll cover your ass if your head’s not in it. But you’re back in the dot next game. Understood? This isn’t a permanent vacation.”

“Understood.” The relief that washed through him was thin and bitter, tainted with shame. It wasn’t a solution. It was a retreat. A white flag waved from the battlements of his own psyche.

As he pulled his jersey over his pads later in the buzzing locker room, the familiar fabric felt like a disguise, a costume for a role he could no longer fully play. The red and blue crest hung over his heart, a symbol of everything he was supposed to be: strong, dependable, unshakeable. He was stepping onto the ice not as Shane Hollander, center, cornerstone of their entire playing strategy, but as a fugitive. He was putting a few more precious feet of frozen distance between himself and the inevitable, terrifying collision he both feared and craved, the collision that felt more like a homecoming every time he tried to run from it.

Defense was still too close. Ilya would still be there, a force of nature on the ice, and the boards were a small world. But for tonight, hiding in plain sight on the blue line would have to be enough. It was the only move he had left.

Ilya let himself into his condo, the door clicking shut behind him with a finality that echoed in the vast, minimalist space. It was cold, sterile. A showroom. It held nothing of him, except one thing.

He didn’t bother with lights. He went straight to the secure laptop in his study, booted it up, and navigated through encrypted layers to the live feed. The apartment in Montreal was dark, empty. As it always was. He’d watched it for hours after he’d left Shane there, a silent witness to his own absence. He’d watched Shane pace, sleep, finally leave. He’d watched nothing happen for months.

Now, he scrolled back through the archived footage, his fingers steady on the trackpad. He knew the time stamps by heart. He found the segment he wanted: Shane, alone in the gray light of morning after their first night. He was sitting on the edge of the disheveled bed, head in his hands. Ilya zoomed in. The resolution was high enough to see the tremor in Shane's shoulders, the way he dragged his palms down his face, the lost, shattered expression he thought no one could see.

Ilya watched it. Then he watched it again. He watched the moment Shane found the tank top, the way his fingers clenched in the fabric. He watched him bring it to his face, just for a second, eyes closed. A current of pure, undiluted possession shot through Ilya, hot and bright. This was his. This moment of vulnerability, this secret grief, belonged to him. He had put it there.

He lost track of time, sitting in the dark, replaying the same few minutes of digital memory. The ghost of Shane's weight was still in his arms, the feel of his hair against Ilya's lips, the steady proof of his heartbeat. The real, living man was across the city, probably awake now, confused, maybe scared. The thought should have troubled him. It only made the feeling sharper, sweeter. He had been a ghost in Shane's room, and now he was a ghost in Shane's mind. It was a start.

He skipped the team's optional morning workout. The disciplined part of his brain, the part that had built his career, protested weakly. He silenced it. What were wind sprints compared to the echo of a heartbeat against his palm?

He arrived at the arena with the rest of the crowd, slipping through the players' entrance at the last possible second. The familiar pre-game rituals- the tape, the stretches, the sharp smell of analgesic cream- felt distant, like he was performing them through a pane of thick glass. His mind was elsewhere, in a quiet hotel room, holding the shape of a sleeping man.

Then he stepped onto the ice for warm-ups.

His eyes found Shane immediately, a flash of red against the white. But something was wrong. Shane wasn't lining up for the face-off drills in the center position. He was gliding along the blue line, taking passes from Petrov, settling into a defensive stance.

A cold, sharp dislocation speared through Ilya's chest.

He skated to the center circle, his movements automatic. Pike was there, not Shane. Pike, who was good, but who wasn't him. The puck dropped, and Ilya won the draw cleanly, but the victory was ash. His gaze tracked Shane, who was deliberately not looking at him, who was mirroring Petrov with a focus that felt like a physical wall.

The game began.

It was a disaster. A slow-motion car crash that everyone in the building could see.

Ilya's passes were a half-second off, his timing scrambled. He overskated pucks, fumbled routine receptions. He was a step behind every play, his legendary anticipation utterly absent. His body was on the ice, but his mind was trapped in a loop: He moved. He's hiding. From me.

Every time he looked up, Shane was there, but not where he was supposed to be. Not in the place Ilya had carved out for him in the geometry of the game. He was a defenseman, hanging back, blocking shots, making safe, short passes. He was avoiding the center of the ice, avoiding the collisions, avoiding him.

On the bench, Ilya sat staring straight ahead, unseeing. His coach's voice was a distant buzz. A teammate clapped him on the shoulder; he didn't feel it. The score ticked against them. He took the next shift, and it was worse. He tried to force it, to hunt for the spark through sheer will, but his focus was shattered. He took a stupid penalty- a lazy hook born of frustration- and sat in the box, watching Shane.

The final buzzer was a mercy. They'd lost, decisively. Ilya was a non-factor on the scoresheet. In the handshake line, he kept his gaze forward, his expression a mask of blank indifference. But when he reached Shane, his hand extended automatically, he couldn't help it. His eyes flicked up.

Shane's gaze met his for a fraction of a second. There was nothing there. No anger, no fear, no challenge. Just a flat, professional distance. It was a void. It was a wall higher than any he'd ever faced on the ice.

Then Shane's hand was gone, and he was moving past, heading for the tunnel without a backward glance.

Ilya stood frozen for a moment in the midst of the dispersing line, the roar of the crowd a meaningless din. The hollow ache from the morning was back, but it had been filled with a new, chilling substance: a certainty. He had miscalculated. The visit, the holding- it hadn't drawn Shane closer. It had sent him scrambling for the farthest corner of the chessboard.

He had wanted to be a ghost in Shane's mind. He hadn't considered that a ghost could be ignored.

Skating off the ice, the weight of his own failure was a physical thing. He had played a horrible game. But that was just the score. The real loss was the look in Shane's eyes- the utter, complete absence of the connection Ilya had felt thrumming between them just hours before in the dark. He had traded a moment of stolen closeness for a chasm that now stretched across the ice, wide and cold and silent.

For Shane, the ice had become a minefield of his own making. Playing defense had been a tactical retreat, but it offered no peace. Ilya's presence was a constant gravitational pull, warping plays, drawing Shane's eye even when he fought not to look. Every time Ilya carried the puck over the blue line, Shane felt a jolt of adrenaline that had nothing to do with defense and everything to do with the man skating toward him with that focused, predatory intent. He played adequately. He was a ghost in red and blue, performing his role by rote.

The texts came within minutes of each other, after the final buzzer of the third game.

Shane's phone buzzed as he sat in the quiet of the locker room, a towel over his head.

Unknown Number: Shane, it's Margot Silva from HNL Communications. We're scheduling a joint press conference for you and Ilya Rozanov for tomorrow, 11 AM at the arena offices before your flight. You're the new captains, we want to drum up some positive excitement for the season. Your agent has the details. See you then.

His stomach dropped through the floor. A joint press conference. Trapped at a table, microphones between them, forced to perform camaraderie. The thought made his skin crawl.

Ilya received the same text. His first reaction was not dread, but a fierce, sudden spark. A press conference. A controlled, League-sanctioned environment where they would be placed together, expected to interact. It was a chance. An opening. He stared at the message, the noise of the room fading. Maybe, he thought, a dangerous hope tightening in his chest. Maybe there will be a moment. A room. A way to speak.

Shane became a nervous wreck. The few hours were a blur of misplaced anxiety. He called Rose three times that night, his sentences fragmented.

“It’s just a presser,” she said, her voice calm through the speaker. “You’ve done a thousand.”

“Not with him,” Shane said, pacing his living room. “Not... after everything. They’ll ask about the rivalry. They’ll want soundbites. I can’t... I can’t look at him and do that.”

“Then don’t look at him. Look at the reporters. Give them your standard captain answers.”

“You don’t understand.” His voice broke. “He sees me. Even when I’m hiding. I shouldn’t even be captain. They only gave it to me because he made captain.”

There was a long pause. “Do you want me to come? I can shift some things.”

The offer was a lifeline. He ached to grab it. To have her there, in the front row, a steady presence. But the guilt was immediate and crushing. She was in the thick of her shoot, exhausted, doing the work she loved. “No,” he said, forcing conviction into his tone. “No, you’re busy. I’m being stupid. I can handle it.”

He couldn't. He slept in fits, the phantom scent of leather waking him. He rehearsed answers in the shower, his reflection pale and anxious in the steam.

Ilya's approach was more direct. Hope was a plan, and a plan required logistics. The arena offices were a maze of conference rooms and greenrooms. He needed a guarantee. A young, harried-looking intern from the events team was identified, cornered near the coffee station during the venue walk-through the day before. The transaction was quicker, smoother than the one with Leo. More money, less explanation. The request was simple: find a reason to get both captains into the designated greenroom alone, just for a few minutes before the press conference. A "technical check" for their mics, a "last-minute briefing" that only concerned them. The intern, wide-eyed at the cash and the intensity in Ilya's blue gaze, nodded.

The next morning dawned cold and bright. Shane arrived early, wearing a suit that felt like a straitjacket. He was ushered by a fluttering assistant into a small, bland greenroom. There was a couch, a water cooler, a screen showing a muted news feed. He was alone. He poured a water, his hands trembling so badly the bottle clicked against the rim of the paper cup.

Then the door opened, and Ilya walked in.

The assistant mumbled something about "audio setup" and "be right back," closing the door behind her. The click of the latch was deafening.

They were alone.

Shane froze, cup halfway to his lips. Ilya stood just inside the door, his own posture uncharacteristically still. He looked... prepared. And nervous. Shane had never seen him look nervous.

“Hollander,” Ilya said, his voice low.

“This is a mistake,” Shane whispered, not moving. “They’ll be in any second.”

“We have few minutes. I made sure.”

The admission should have angered him. Instead, it just made the room feel smaller, the air thinner. Of course Ilya had orchestrated this. He always did.

Ilya didn’t move closer. He stayed by the door, as if reading the panic in Shane’s stance. “I need to say this. I... I am sorry. For Boston. For what happened. For all of it. It was not...” He struggled, his English fracturing under the weight of the emotion. “It was not right. What I did. What I took. I had no right.”

The apology hung in the air, raw and stark. It wasn’t the flippant, arrogant thing Shane had expected. It sounded carved out of him. Shane’s breath hitched. He wanted to throw the water in his face. He wanted to scream. He set the cup down on the table with a shaky hand, the water sloshing.

“Your apology,” Shane said, the words scraping his throat. “It’s a start. But it’s just a start. It doesn’t fix what’s broken. It’s not enough. Nowhere near enough.”

“I know,” Ilya said, his head bowing slightly. The silence wasn’t filled with anger this time, but with a vast, aching chasm of everything unsaid. “It is like poison, leaving it like this.”

“You think I don’t know that?” Shane’s voice cracked. He hugged his arms around himself, his gaze dropping to the industrial carpet. “It is poison. I drink it every day. I think about you, and it hurts, Ilya. It physically hurts. Because I don’t know how to... how to put what you did in one box and what I feel in another. They’re all mixed up. The fear and the... and the want.” He finally looked up, his eyes bright with unshed tears. “And I can’t forgive you for that. I don’t know how.”

Ilya flinched as if struck, a full-body recoil that he couldn't suppress. The desperate, tentative hope that had been burning in his eyes guttered and dimmed, replaced by a bleak, horrified understanding. He had broken this. He had taken something rare and fragile and stepped on it, and now Shane was showing him the pieces, and they were too shattered to be put back together. "What can I do?" The question was barely audible, a whisper torn from somewhere deep and wounded. "Tell me. Please. What can I do to earn it?"

"There's nothing!" The words burst out of Shane, a sob he'd been holding back for weeks, for months. A tear finally spilled over, tracing a hot path down his cheek. He didn't wipe it away. "Don't you get it? You can't earn this! You broke a trust that didn't even exist yet, and now anything that could have been... it's twisted. It's broken glass. Any relationship between us wouldn't work. It would be built on that. On me being afraid of you and... and wanting you anyway. That's not a foundation. That's a trap. For both of us." His voice dropped to a shattered whisper. "It would destroy me. And you'd get bored of the pieces."

A sharp rap sounded at the door, making them both jump. A voice called through, "Ten minutes to stage, gentlemen!"

The interruption was a guillotine. The real world, with its cameras and expectations, rushed back in.

Ilya's eyes never left Shane's face. He saw the tears, the tremor, the utter defeat. And he saw, as Shane wiped angrily at his eyes, the way his gaze momentarily lost focus, glazing over not with fear, but with a dazed, almost hypnotic pull, when Ilya took two small, unconscious steps forward.

That tiny, involuntary reaction was a spark in the desolation. It was a crack in the door Shane was trying so hard to slam shut.

"There is always a way to earn it back," Ilya said, his voice firming, a new resolve hardening in his blue eyes. The apology was given. It was not enough. He saw that now. He needed a new strategy. "You just have not seen it yet."

"I don't see any possible way, Rozanov. I think it's easier for us just to pretend none of this ever happened. I can't live like this anymore and the best solution I see is just be done with it all."

Before Ilya could respond, the door opened, and the assistant was back, all efficient smiles. “Ready to head to the stage?”

Shane turned away, blindly grabbing his cup of water, his heart a shattered, conflicted mess in his chest. Ilya followed, his own expression settling into the cool, unreadable mask of the public figure, but inside, the gears were already turning. Forgiveness was not a gift to be given. It was a prize to be won. And he had just seen, in the glazed-over sheen of Shane’s beautiful, tormented eyes, that the game was far from over.

Ilya’s expression, which had been open and ravaged, smoothed over, settling into the cool, impenetrable mask of the public figure. But his eyes, as they held Shane’s for one final, searing second, were not resigned. They were calculating, focused, alive with a new, ferocious purpose. The apology was given. It was heard. It was not enough. He saw that now, with devastating clarity.

The press conference was a special kind of torture.

Shane sat ramrod straight in his chair, his smile a fixed, polite thing that felt carved from wood. He answered questions about “team culture” and “season expectations” with the smooth, rehearsed cadence of a veteran, but his delivery was stiff, airless. He could feel the heat of Ilya’s body beside him, a constant, low-grade radiation that made the fine hairs on his arm stand up. Every time Ilya leaned forward to speak into his microphone, the subtle shift in the air, the faint leather-and-soap scent, was a tiny explosion in Shane’s periphery.

Ilya, for his part, was the picture of relaxed, charismatic control. He joked with the moderators, gave thoughtful answers about adjusting to captaincy, and even managed to pay Shane a perfectly bland, professional compliment about his two-way game. It was flawless. It was a lie so convincing it made Shane’s stomach twist. This was the man who had held him while he slept, who had just minutes ago been raw and pleading in a greenroom. Now he was the Ilya Rozanov, NHL Star, all easy smiles and clever quips. The whiplash was nauseating.

Shane kept his gaze firmly on the reporters, on the back wall, on his own hands folded on the table. He did not look to his left. Not once. But he felt Ilya’s eyes on him during his own answers, a heavy, assessing weight. Like Rozanov was not just looking at him but comparing him against some private version he had kept all this time.

When it finally ended, Shane was out of his seat before the moderator had finished thanking them, a murmured “excuse me” lost in the shuffle of rising bodies and clicking cameras. He didn’t wait for the league handlers. He moved with single-minded purpose through the back corridors of the arena, a path he knew from countless visits. His heart was a frantic bird against his ribs, his skin feeling too tight, too hot. He needed walls. A lock. Silence.

He found a staff bathroom in a disused hallway near the equipment bays, far from the media scrum. He slipped inside, flipped the lock, and leaned back against the cool metal door, dragging in deep, shuddering breaths. The fluorescent light buzzed overhead. He pressed the heels of his hands into his eyes, trying to push out the image of Ilya’s face in the greenroom, the sound of his shattered apology, the terrifying promise in his final words.

Outside, Ilya endured the final handshakes and photo ops with a smile that was starting to feel like a crack in porcelain. The second he was free, he pulled out his phone. His thumb moved with practiced efficiency, bypassing lockscreens to open a simple, unmarked mapping app. A single pulsing blue dot glowed on the grid-like schematic of the arena. Not moving. Deep in the bowels of the building.

He stared at it, his chest tight. Shane had run. Of course he had run. Ilya had seen the rigid line of his spine during the conference, the way he’d practically fled the stage. The urge to go after him was a physical ache, a magnetic pull stronger than reason. He forced himself to take a few slow breaths, leaning against a concrete wall in a quiet corridor. He couldn’t go in hot. He couldn’t let Shane see the jagged edge of his own need, the desperation that had him tracking his phone like a stalker. Act normal. Give him some distance. Give him space. He needs to feel safe.

It was the hardest performance of his life.

He followed the dot’s signal, his footsteps echoing in the empty service hallway. He stopped outside the indicated door- a utility bathroom. He hesitated, his hand hovering over the handle. Then, schooling his features into a mask of calm indifference, he tried the knob. Locked.

He knocked. A short, firm rap. "Hollander."

A beat of silence, then the sound of the lock sliding back. The door opened just enough to reveal Shane's face, pale and tense under the harsh light. His expression, which might have been relief at the end of his panic, instantly hardened into exasperated weariness when he saw who it was. He let out a short, humorless breath and rolled his eyes, a gesture so familiarly Shane it sent a pang through Ilya's chest.

"I thought I made myself clear," Shane said, his voice flat. He didn't open the door wider.

"You did," Ilya said, keeping his own voice low, even. He kept his hands in his pockets, his posture loose, non-threatening. "Clear you are hurt. Clear you are angry. Not clear how to fix." He met Shane's gaze, trying to project a calm he didn't feel. "We cannot... leave it like this. In poison. Meet me. Somewhere public. A coffee shop. A park. Anywhere you choose. You set place, you set time. We just talk. No touching. No... demands. Just talk."

Shane's jaw tightened. He looked past Ilya's shoulder down the empty hall, then back, his eyes guarded. "There's nothing to talk about, Ilya. Talking just... reopens it. I said everything in there."

"You said you could not forgive. You did not say why I cannot try." Ilya's mask of calm strained at the edges. The frustration, the helplessness of being so close yet held at arm's length by nothing more than Shane's will, began to seep through. "You want me to just... disappear? To pretend you are not all I think about?"

"Yes!" Shane shot back, a flash of real anger in his eyes. "That's exactly what I want! I want you to leave me alone!"

The words, spoken with such vehemence in this cold, concrete space, were a direct blow. Ilya's careful control snapped. "I could make you talk to me," he said, the words leaving his mouth before he could cage them, low and dark. It wasn't a true threat; it was the frustrated, childish cry of someone denied what they wanted most.

The effect on Shane was immediate and devastating. All the color drained from his face, replaced by a look of cold, utter betrayal. He didn't flinch back. He seemed to grow stiller, harder. "You could," Shane said, his voice dangerously quiet. "You could, couldn't you? Because you're not opposed to using force to get your way. We've established that."

It was the truth. The unvarnished, ugly truth Shane had learned in a Boston room. Ilya had shown his hand, and now Shane would forever hold it against him. The accusation landed with the precision of a surgeon's knife, severing the last of Ilya's momentum. All the fight drained out of him, leaving behind a hollow, aching cold.

He took a full step back, putting more of the gloomy hallway between them. The tracker in his pocket felt like a condemnation. Shane's eyes, sharp and unforgiving, saw right through his performed calm to the obsessed, unstable core beneath. There was no winning this. Not here. Not like this.

Ilya's expression closed off completely, becoming as impassive and cold as the walls around them. The hope from the greenroom was ashes. The carefully constructed plan was dust.

"Fine," Ilya said, the word final and brittle. "We see each other in two months, then. When the schedule says we must."

He turned and walked away, his footsteps the only sound in the corridor. He didn't look back. Behind him, he heard the soft, definitive click of the bathroom lock re-engaging. A door shutting, once and for all.

For now.

The silence after the bathroom door clicked shut seemed to vibrate in Ilya's ears for days. The flight back to Boston, the practices, the empty condo- all of it was filtered through the cold, final sound of that lock. He had replayed Shane's words on a loop. You're not opposed to using force. They were a verdict. A life sentence. He had tried to box the feeling away, to channel it into the punishing routine of training, but it leaked out as a brittle, sharp-edged focus that made his teammates give him a wide berth.

A week later, in the visiting locker room at Madison Square Garden, the noise was a physical thing- tape tearing, blades being sharpened, the thump of gear bags. Ilya was methodically layering on his armor, the ritual usually a calming prelude to battle. Then his phone buzzed with a specific, programmed tone.

A text from the lead operative on Shane's security detail, a man named Kieran.

Kieran- Boss - subject has a follower. New pattern. Leaving small packages at the new construction site of his house and slipping them to hotel staff during away games. Seems like a fan. They know the travel schedule and how to get items close to the team. We tried to tail after a drop at the Montreal hotel last night but lost them in the crowd. Description: tall build, pronounced limp on the right side. Wears hood up, face covered. Methodical.

Ilya's blood went cold, then hot. Most of Shane's fans were respectful, if passionate. This was different. This was a breach. The new visibility- the People magazine spread, the constant paparazzi shots with Rose Landry- had drawn out something darker. A predator who knew how to move in the shadows, who knew where Shane was building a home.

His first, primal instinct was to demand the body-cam footage, to see the threat with his own eyes, to dissect every frame. His thumb hovered over the call button. Then he stopped.

You're not opposed to using force.

He had promised Svetlana he would try to be better. Had promised Shane. More than that, he needed to prove to the hollow, aching part of himself that he could respect a boundary. Even this one. Even when every cell screamed to take over, to control, to eliminate the threat personally.

He typed back, each word feeling inadequate.

Ilya- Follow him closer. Make sure he is safe. Report any change.

Kieran- Copy.

He put the phone away, the weight of the threat settling in his gut alongside the older, familiar weight of his failure. As he finished lacing his skates, a new, more personal anger began to burn through the cold concern. Scott Hunter. The calm, steady veteran who had been a buffer in the elevator, whose hand had rested on Shane's shoulder. Who had Shane's ear. Who knew what he was whispering into it. Shane was too quiet, too internally chaotic for this kind of stubborn, walled-off rejection. This wasn't just Shane's hurt. This was the influence of others. People like Hunter, like Landry and Pike who must be painting Ilya as a monster and building a fortress around Shane to keep him out.

The team spilled out of the tunnel for warm-ups, the roar of the New York crowd a wall of sound. Ilya's eyes scanned the ice, finding the red and black of the Admirals. And there he was.

Shane. In the family section of the crowd.

He looked the same. That was the first terrible, beautiful thing Ilya noticed. The same efficient stride, the same focused set of his shoulders as he took a pass. He was laughing at something Pike said. The sight was a punch to the sternum.

Then Ilya's gaze slid left, and the simmering anger ignited.

Scott Hunter was skating around his team, saying something, gesturing with a gloved hand. A closed circle. Ilya's hands tightened around his stick. Of course. Who else would Shane listen to? The respectable older captain, the pillar of stability. The anti-Ilya. Hunter, who had never lost control, who had never wanted anything with a desperate, ruinous hunger.

Ilya forced himself into motion, taking a lap, firing pucks at the net with a force that made the goalie flinch. His professional composure, usually an impenetrable shield, felt thin, cracked. Every glance toward the Admiral's end was filtered through a lens of dual obsessions: the phantom of a limping man in a hoodie leaving packages in the dark, and the solid, infuriating reality of Scott Hunter's easy camaraderie.

During a line rush drill, fate- or the cruel mechanics of the game- brought them into proximity. Ilya cut across the slot as Hunter drifted back to defend. For a fraction of a second, their paths intersected. Ilya didn't look at him. He kept his eyes forward, his face a mask of cold indifference. He knew Shane was looking at him.

He allowed himself one glance back as he circled toward the crowd. Shane was watching him, his expression unreadable from this distance. Then Hunter skated up, tapping the glass in front of Shane's seat with his stick, drawing his attention away, and said something that made Shane's head bow in a short nod.

The gesture, so simple, so proprietary, sent a white-hot wire of fury straight through Ilya's core. The stalker was an abstract threat, a shadow. This was concrete. This was a man physically inserting himself between Ilya and what was his, reinforcing the walls Ilya was locked out of.

He slammed his stick against the boards in a sharp, frustrated crack as he stepped over the bench. A teammate glanced at him; Ilya ignored him.

The game was a distraction, a blur of checks and whistles. His body played, but his mind was elsewhere- tracking Shane's movements with a different kind of intensity, watching Hunter, calculating the invisible influence that had turned a complex, painful connection into a simple, solid "no."

In the second period, they collided legally in the corner, a hard, clean check that pinned Hunter against the glass for a moment. Hunter shoved back, his visor tilted up, and their eyes met through the cage.

Ilya stayed against the glass for a second too long. The cold certainty settled over him again, colder than the ice. The stalker was a problem to be managed by professionals he'd hired. But Scott Hunter? The influence of friends? The narrative being built around Shane that excluded him?

That was a different kind of war. And waiting two months to fight it was no longer an option. The game, the rules, the boundaries- they were all just glass waiting to be shattered. The only thing that mattered was the man in red and blue, and the dangerous, limping shadow that knew where he slept.

The game against New York was never just a game. It was an exorcism Ilya couldn't perform, a rage he couldn't name, all channeled into sixty minutes of sanctioned violence. And Scott Hunter, the venerable Admiral's captain, became the living, breathing proxy for every wall Shane had built.

The last period was a simmer. Ilya shadowed Hunter, a deliberate shift in focus that confused the coverage. Early on, after a whistle, Ilya glided past the Boston bench, his voice a low, carrying sneer meant only for Hunter's ears.

"They keep you on for your wisdom, da? Or because you are too slow now?"

Hunter, wiping his visor, didn't even glance over. "Focus on your own game, Rozanov."

The dismissal stung. It was the calm, paternal tone that made Ilya's teeth grind.

The chirps escalated with the physicality. In the corner, Ilya finished a clean, hard check on Hunter that drove him into the glass. As they untangled, Ilya leaned in, his breath fogging Hunter's cage. "He looks to you for advice? What do you tell him? How to be a good little follower? How to hide?" The words were vile, meant to wound.

Hunter shoved him back, a flash of real anger in his eyes. "Shut your mouth."

"Make me," Ilya hissed, a feral grin behind his own cage.

The officials kept a close watch, but Ilya was a master of the grey area. A cross-check to the small of the back after a puck was gone. A "stumbling" knee-on-knee collision in the neutral zone. Each infraction was just barely on the wrong side of legal, each accompanied by a verbal dagger.

“Does your mate know you spend so much time with Hollander?” Ilya taunted during a line change, his voice dripping with false curiosity. “Or does he trust that the old dog has no teeth?”

That one earned him a glare that could have frozen the ice. It also earned him his first penalty, a tripping call that was as much for the accumulated nuisance as the specific infraction. In the box, Ilya didn't simmer. He vibrated, his eyes locked on Hunter, who was calmly directing the New York power play. The respect he commanded, the unflappable steadiness- it was everything Ilya was not, and everything he irrationally believed Shane had been taught to want.

“You're chasing ghosts, kid,” Hunter spat, getting to his feet slowly, a hand going to his shoulder.

“I am chasing what is mine,” Ilya shot back, his English fracturing under the emotion. The referees converged, sending him to the box for charging.

Two minutes in solitary silence, watching Shane. Shane, who did not look at the box, who was speaking intently with Pike. The jealousy was a black, toxic smoke in his lungs.

His third penalty was pure frustration. Hunter made a simple, elegant outlet pass to start a breakout. Ilya, beaten, stuck out his leg in a lazy, reckless slew-foot that sent the older man crashing to the ice in a heap. It was a dirty, dangerous play. The arena booed. The referees didn't hesitate: a five-minute major for kicking.

As he skated to the box, the Admiral players hurled abuse. Ilya ignored them. His eyes were on Hunter, who was being helped up, testing his ankle. And on Shane, who had finally, finally looked over. There was no concern for Hunter in that glance. It was a look of pure, horrified recognition- This is what you are. This is the unhinged thing you become.

In the penalty box, serving for the last few minutes of the game, the cold reality of that look settled over him. He had not just hurt Hunter. He had proven Shane right. The victory, when it came- a narrow, gritty Boston win- tasted like ashes.

The handshake line was a formality Ilya usually endured with blank indifference. Tonight, it was a gauntlet. He moved robotically, nodding at opposing players, his grip loose. Then Scott Hunter was in front of him.

The older man's hand was extended, his face a mask of professional courtesy, though his eyes were cold. Ilya took his hand. And then he pulled.

It wasn't a violent yank, but a firm, inexorable tug that brought Hunter a crucial half-step closer, breaking the flow of the line. Ilya leaned in, his voice a bare, guttural whisper meant for Hunter alone, the Russian accent thick as blood.

"Stay away from Hollander." The words were ice and venom. "First and final warning."

He released him as suddenly as he'd pulled, the ghost of a snarl on his lips. Hunter stared back, shock and then a dawning, steely anger tightening his features. He said nothing. He didn't need to. The line moved on, the moment swallowed by the crowd's roar and the shuffling of tired players.

Ilya skated off, his heart a battering ram against his ribs. He hadn't reached Shane. All he had done was plant his flag in the middle of a war he was now fighting on two fronts: against a phantom with a limp, and against the living, breathing man Shane actually trusted. And as the tunnel darkness swallowed him, the chilling certainty was that he was losing them both.

The month that followed was a slow, corrosive descent into the architecture of obsession.

Ilya's world narrowed to two focal points: the pulsing blue dot on his tracker app and the barren landscape of his own mind, where he drafted and discarded increasingly extreme blueprints for reconciliation. The cold finality of the bathroom door, the warning to Hunter- they weren't endpoints. They were catalysts.

The idea of kidnapping him to Russia came to him first, fully formed and shockingly plausible, as he stared at a map on his wall. He had resources, connections, properties in remote locations. The legalities there... could be bent. An Alpha and an Omega, found together, could be compelled toward a bond for “public harmony” under certain archaic, region-specific statutes he knew existed. He imagined it: Shane, confused and furious in a dacha surrounded by snow-pines, cut off from everyone, with only Ilya to rely on, to talk to, to eventually... understand. The fantasy was vivid, cinematic. He spent an entire day mentally designing the sequence- the intercept after a game, the private jet, the isolation. He dismissed it by nightfall. It would be a bond of captivity, of resentment. He would own a shell. He didn’t want a shell. He wanted the fire, the fight, the want that he had seen glimmering beneath Shane’s fear.

The fantasy of the mating bite was more visceral, a constant, throbbing temptation. He’d wake from dreams with his teeth aching, the phantom taste of Shane’s skin- that clean, rain-swept scent mixed with the copper tang of blood- lingering on his tongue. It would be so fast. One moment of surrendered control during a check, in a hallway, and it would be done. The biological imperative would take over, flooding Shane with bonding hormones, rewriting his fear into dependency, his anger into a desperate, primal need for the Alpha who had claimed him. Ilya’s body ached with the simplicity of it. But he remembered the trust in Shane’s unconscious sigh when he’d held him in the hotel room. To violate that so completely... it wouldn’t be a bond. It would be a biological prison sentence for them both. He wanted Shane to kneel for him, not because chemistry forced him, but because he could no longer bear the distance.

The threat was the coldest, most calculating option. A single, anonymous tip to the league’s medical board, a leaked “rumor” to the right gossip columnist. Shane’s carefully constructed life- the captaincy, the endorsements, his pristine public image- would unravel. The scrutiny, the prejudice, the invasive tests. In that chaos, who would Shane have? His friends? His family? They would be powerless against the machine. Ilya could be the only one who understood, the only one who had ever truly seen him. He could be Shane’s sole refuge in the storm Ilya himself had summoned. It was elegant in its cruelty. He drafted the email in his head a dozen times. He never typed a word. Because the look that would follow- not just hurt, but a final, absolute extinction of any lingering warmth- would be a victory colder than the Siberian ground. He didn’t want a broken prisoner. He wanted a willing counterpart.

He wanted Shane to choose him. To walk across the gap, eyes open, and choose the chaos, the hunger, the realness Ilya offered over the safe, curated life he was clinging to.

So he watched. The security reports came in daily, clinical and detailed.

Report 17- Subject attended team charity event with teammates Dagenais and Pike. Prolonged physical contact observed (backslapping, shoulder clasps). Subject appeared relaxed. Laughter frequency high.

Report 22- Subject spent off-day at private residence of S. Hunter. Duration: 4 hours 17 minutes. No visual. Vehicle remained parked.

Report 29- Subject accompanied by R. Landry to film premiere. Red carpet. Significant physical proximity, hand-holding for photographers. Returned to her apartment building. Did not emerge until 0700 the following morning.

Ilya's eyes would skim these lines, his brain performing a selective filtration. He absorbed the data about potential threats, about the limping figure who had not been seen again but whose pattern suggested patience. He memorized routes, schedules, vulnerabilities.

The rest- the laughter with Pike, the hours at Hunter's, the nights with Rose- he consciously, violently skipped over. The words entered his vision and dissolved into static before they could reach the part of him that would trash another hotel room. They were irrelevant. They were the scenery of the prison Shane had chosen. They were not the man himself. The man himself was still the one who had trembled when Ilya stepped closer, whose eyes had glazed with a want that belonged to Ilya alone.

The unhinged ideas were a pressure valve, a dark playground for his desperation. Each one was a path to possession, and each was ultimately a dead end leading to a version of Shane he did not want. The realization did not calm him. It made the waiting more excruciating. He was left with only the raw, unadorned need, and the fragile, terrifying hope that the thread he had seen- the one in Shane's glazed-over eyes- was stronger than the walls being built by everyone else.

He was banking his entire, fractured future on a single, silent look exchanged in a greenroom. Everything else was noise.

The blueprint was beautiful. Clean lines, generous windows facing the lake, a thoughtful flow between rooms. Shane traced a finger over the rendering of the great room, the cedar finishes warm and inviting even in the digital image. He should feel something- pride, anticipation, something. He felt like he was reading the specs for a building that belonged to someone else.

He closed the laptop. The silence of his apartment pressed in, thick and expectant. He had done everything right. The architecture courses were challenging, engaging his mind in a way hockey drills no longer did. The cabin construction was progressing on schedule; he'd just approved the timber for the exterior cladding. He'd had dinner with Rose and the team last night, laughing at Hayden's stories, listening to Jackie's latest drama. He'd nodded, smiled in the right places, asked questions.

His heart just... wasn't in it. It felt like he was operating a very convincing puppet of Shane Hollander. The strings were in his hands, he knew the motions, but the connection between action and feeling was severed. He moved through his days with a meticulous, joyless efficiency. Even the time with friends, which did provide a genuine, fleeting lightness, was followed by a deeper crash- a bone-tired desire to just be horizontal in the dark, alone, where he didn't have to perform.

The call to the coaches' office the next morning was a cold shock to the system.

He stood in front of Coach Williams' desk, with the head trainer, Gary, leaning against the filing cabinet. The air smelled of stale coffee and the stick tape.

"Shane," Williams began, his voice uncharacteristically careful. "We're not here to rake you over the coals. We're concerned."

Gary nodded, his eyes kind but clinical. "Your body composition metrics from this week show a drop. Not huge, but it's a trend over the last month. Your reaction times in the high-intensity drills are a fraction off. Your power output is maintaining, but your recovery heart rate is elevated."

"It's the middle of the season," Shane said, his voice tighter than he intended. "Everyone's tired."

“This isn’t ‘everyone’ tired, Hollander,” Williams said, leaning forward. “This is you tired. And ‘you tired’ is still better than ninety percent of the league on their best day. But it’s not your standard. We notice the gap.”

The words ‘the gap’ echoed in the hollow space inside his chest. They saw a gap in his performance. They didn’t see the canyon inside him.

“I’m fine,” Shane insisted, the lie automatic. “It’s just a rhythm thing. I’ll adjust.”

“Are you sleeping?” Gary asked.

“Enough.”

“Eating?”

“Yes.”

“Anything outside hockey stressing you? The endorsements? The media?”

“No.” The answer was too quick, too sharp. He saw the glance they exchanged. He was bristling, a cornered animal. He forced his shoulders down. “Look, I appreciate the concern. Really. I’ll... I’ll focus on nutrition. Get more sleep. I’ll be back to baseline by next practice.”

He left the office before they could ask more questions, the heat of shame crawling up his neck. They’d noticed. He was slipping. He couldn’t slip. Slipping meant questions, meant scrutiny, meant someone looking too close at the pills in his bag, the scent patches he replaced with ritualistic precision, the way he sometimes stiffened for a fraction of a second when a teammate clapped him on the back without warning.

He didn't go home. He went straight to the team's performance center, empty in the mid-afternoon lull. The silence was a challenge.

He started with weights, loading the bar past his usual working sets. The burn in his muscles was a clean, simple pain. It erased the more complicated one. Rep after punishing rep, he chased the feeling of total exhaustion, the point where his body would be too spent to host this buzzing, empty anxiety. He moved from the rack to the leg press, to the cables, a relentless circuit. His breath sawed in his chest, his vision spotting at the edges. On the final set of weighted pull-ups, his grip failed. He dropped the last few inches, his knees buckling as he hit the floor, one hand slamming against the rack to steady himself. He stayed there, head bowed, sweat dripping onto the rubber mat, his whole body screaming.

Not enough.

He forced himself upright, legs trembling, and walked to the cold plunge pool. The shock of the ice water was a violence that stole his breath. He submerged to his chin, teeth chattering, his muscles seizing then going numb. He counted to three hundred, the numbers a lifeline in the blinding, electric cold. When he climbed out, his body was a foreign, heavy thing, the pain blunted to a distant ache. Good. Now he could continue.

He did another hour of cardio, a brutal, mindless interval session on the bike until the clock on the wall swam in his vision. Only then, when he was certain every ounce of energy was extracted, did he allow himself to stop.

At home, he stood under a cold shower until his skin was numb. He leaned his forehead against the tiles, the water pounding his shoulders. He felt off. Not sick, not injured. Just... wrong. A fundamental disconnection. The scent patches were secure. The suppressors were working; he wasn't feeling any pre-heat agitation, no unusual sensitivity. It was something else. A quiet, persistent void in the back of his mind, a silent alarm that something vital was missing. He had dismissed it as stress, as the grind of the season.

But as he turned off the water and faced the condensation-filled bathroom, the truth was in the profound, aching loneliness that remained, even when his body was too exhausted to feel anything else. It was in the way his first instinct, bone-deep and humiliating, was still to reach for his phone after a day like today. To tell someone. And the only someone he viscerally wanted to tell was the one person he could not, would not, ever call.

He went to bed early. When Rose texted later, a funny picture from her set, he made himself type back a laughing emoji, a few words. The exchange was warm, and for a moment, he did feel lighter. But as he put the phone down, the silence rushed back in, heavier than before. The comfort of friendship was real, but it existed on the surface. Beneath it, in the deep, private water where he actually lived, he was still just... alone. And part of him, the part that scared him most, was starting to prefer the solitude. At least there, no one could see the gap.

The morning light felt abrasive. Shane woke with a hollow, gnawing pit in his stomach that rejected the very idea of food. The thought of choking down a protein smoothie made his throat close. He pushed himself out of bed, the movements automatic, and pulled on running gear. The world needed to be blurred, the static in his mind drowned out by the rhythm of his feet and the burn in his lungs.

He shoved in his earbuds, selected a playlist of aggressive, wordless electronica, and ran. He pounded the pavement of his neighborhood, past manicured lawns and quiet houses, a ghost in motion. He ran until his legs burned and his breath heaved, until the empty feeling was at least matched by a physical exhaustion he understood.

Returning, sweat-soaked and momentarily numb, he almost missed it. It was on the front step, partially hidden by a potted fern. A small, flat box, wrapped in plain brown paper. No postage. Hand-delivered. Yet again another package.

His heart didn't just skip a beat; it stuttered, a frantic bird trapped against his ribs. Ilya. It had to be. The timing, the stealth, the sheer, unsettling persistence. This made... four? Five? He'd lost count. He never opened them. He couldn't. Opening it would be an acknowledgment, a thread pulled that would unravel the fragile containment he'd built.

A cold wave of nausea, distinct from his earlier hunger, washed over him. He wasn't ready. Not for gifts, not for apologies wrapped in paper, not for whatever carefully chosen artifact Ilya thought could bridge the chasm between them. Rage, quick and hot, flashed through the fatigue. How dare he? How dare he keep inserting himself into the quiet spaces Shane was trying to claim for himself?

He bent, picked up the entire box between thumb and forefinger as if it were contaminated, carried it straight to the large black trash bin at the side of the house, and dropped it inside.

The dull thud it made was unsatisfying. He slammed the lid closed, the sound final in the quiet morning.

In the shower, he scrubbed his skin raw, as if he could wash away the psychic imprint of the box, the run, the lingering scent of his own panic. The water was scalding, then ice-cold. He felt no cleaner.

Lunch with his parents was a performance in minimalist appetite. He pushed roasted chicken and asparagus around his plate, constructing little architectural piles he then dismantled.

“Not hungry, sweetie?” his mother asked, her eyes missing nothing.

“Just a headache coming on,” he murmured, avoiding her gaze. “Pre-game nerves.”

The car ride to the stadium was its own special torture. His father drove, the radio off, leaving a silence his mother filled with a cheerful, oblivious commentary that felt like needles under Shane’s skin.

“I saw that interview with that Russian boy- Rozanov- on the sports channel this morning,” she said, adjusting her scarf. “So confident! He said he’ll win the MVP again, no question. And did you know he’s already eight goals ahead in the scoring race? Eight! At this stage!”

Shane stared out the window, watching the city blur past. Each word was a tiny hammer tap on a bruise he was trying to ignore. That Russian boy. A scoring race he was no longer even close to leading. The MVP Ilya claimed as if he was entitled to it again this year. It was all a reminder of the gap- the one his coaches saw in his metrics, and the vast, uncrossable one that now existed between him and the man who was supposedly his rival.

The game was fine. Montreal beat New Jersey easily enough. He played a solid, unspectacular sixty minutes. He celebrated goals with a brief, closed-lipped smile. The win didn’t settle him. It was just another data point in a season that felt increasingly like it was happening to someone else.

Back at his parents' house, the emptiness in his chest expanded, becoming a yawning, quiet ache. The adrenaline of the game had faded, leaving behind the familiar, weary residue. He stood in the doorway of the living room, watching his mother read. The words came out softly, almost childlike. "Mom... would you mind?"

She looked up, set her book aside, and understood without him having to finish. She patted the couch beside her. He didn't sit beside her. Instead, he lay down, curling onto his side, and gently rested his head in her lap, just as he had as a little boy chased inside by a thunderstorm. Her hand came down, cool and gentle, smoothing his damp hair back from his forehead.

They spoke softly, about nothing. The pattern of the upholstery. A movie she wanted to see. The neighbor's new dog. Her voice was a balm, her touch a grounding wire. The frantic, scattered energy of the day began to settle, the sharp edges softening into a manageable melancholy. He calmed, his breathing deepening, soothed by the oldest, safest familiarity he knew.

But as he lay there, safe in the circle of her arms, a truth whispered up from the depths of the calm. This was comfort, but it was not the exact comfort he wanted. The hollow space inside him, the one that food couldn't fill and wins couldn't celebrate and a mother's love could only temporarily soothe, remained. It had a shape, a scent, and a name. And the terrible, silent confession he made to himself in the dark, quiet safety of her lap, was that the something else he still, desperately wanted, was the very thing that had broken him.

The dream didn't start with a scene. It started with a sense- a heavy, familiar weight pinning him to the mattress, the smell of cedar and sweat and something darker, metallic, like ozone after a strike. He was in his own bed, but the room was wrong, shadows too deep, the air too hot and thick to breathe.

Ilya was above him, but not as he was. This was Ilya distilled to his most elemental: a silhouette of pure, predatory intent. Shane couldn't see his face, only the gleam of eyes in the dark and the hard line of a smile. He was naked. Shane was naked. The feeling of skin on skin was so lucid, so hyper-real, it bypassed thought and went straight to his nerve endings.

“You know we were destined. Before we were even born, we were meant to be together,” the dream-Ilya murmured, his voice a vibration Shane felt in his bones. A large, calloused hand smoothed over Shane’s hip, a touch that was both possessive and curiously admiring. “Even in your head, you try to be such a good boy for me.”

Shane tried to speak, to protest, but his mouth wouldn’t work. His body was pliant, liquid, arching into the touch against his will. This wasn’t the frantic heat of memory; it was slower, more perverse. It was a ceremony.

Ilya’s hands were everywhere, not in passion, but in cataloging. They mapped the dip of his spine, the span of his ribs, the sensitive skin of his inner thighs, with a clinical, worshipful attention that made Shane burn. He was being studied like a specimen, and his body sang under the examination.

Then the dream shifted, turned dirty. Ilya’s mouth was on him, not with desire, but with a devastating, focused purpose. There was tenderness, a relentless, perfect expertise that dismantled Shane piece by piece. He was laid bare, spread open, not just physically but in some core, private way. The pleasure was a sharp, unbearable wire pulled taut, a sensation so intense it blurred into pain. He heard himself making sounds- whimpers, choked-off pleas- that were utterly foreign.

“You see?” Ilya whispered against his skin, his breath scalding. “You can try to hide. You can throw my boxes away. But here? This is where you are real. This is where you belong.”

The dream-Ilya didn’t ask. He commanded. He turned Shane onto his stomach with effortless strength, one broad hand splayed between his shoulder blades, holding him down. The position was one of utter submission, and Shane’s body melted into it, a sob catching in his throat. What followed was a blur of overwhelming sensation- a claiming that was less about sex and more about eradication. It was being rewritten from the inside out, each deep, punishing thrust a correction to his resistance, a searing brand of ownership. The words were a dark chant in his ear: “Mine. You are mine. This is all you are for.”

He came in the dream with a violence that felt like his soul was being torn out, a white-hot rupture of shame and absolute, catastrophic pleasure. And through it, Ilya held him, kept him together even as he was being shattered, until the world dissolved into a profound, velvety blackness that felt like both death and home.

He woke with a gasp so sharp it hurt his throat.

The room was his room. The gray pre-dawn light filtered through the blinds. He was alone. The weight was gone. The scent was gone.

But the feeling was there, a full-body echo so potent it left him trembling. The sheets were tangled, damp with sweat. An embarrassing wet spot that horrified him. His skin was hypersensitive, every brush of the cotton a torment. And between his legs, a throbbing, urgent ache- a hard, insistent reality that was a brutal punchline to the dream's psychological violation.

A wave of heat, unrelated to the dream's fever, washed over him. It was his own biology, responding to the phantom, kicking into gear. His heart hammered, a frantic, trapped rhythm. His hand twitched toward the nightstand, toward his phone.

The impulse was so strong it was a physical pull. His fingers actually brushed the cool edge of the device. He could call. He could say nothing. He could just breathe into the line, and Ilya would know. Ilya would come. He would finish what the dream started, and in the harsh light of reality, maybe it would feel the same. Maybe the real thing would finally fill the void that ached like a fresh amputation.

He snatched his hand back as if burned.

"No," he rasped into the empty room. The sound was pathetic.

He threw the covers off and stumbled to the bathroom. He didn't turn on the light. He fumbled for the shower controls and cranked the handle all the way to the left.

Ice-cold water exploded from the showerhead, a shocking, brutal cascade. He gasped, his body seizing, every muscle locking against the assault. He stepped under it anyway, letting the needles of cold hammer his head, his shoulders, his dream-sensitive skin. He stood there, shaking violently, teeth chattering, forcing himself to endure.

His gaze fell to the small, discreet cabinet under the sink. Inside, still in its packaging, was the silicone plug. He'd bought it online after the last close call, a clinical, pragmatic preparation for a heat he feared was coming, a heat that would be worse, more desperate, because of the obsession poisoning his system.

He didn't move.

He stood under the freezing spray until his shivering stopped, replaced by a deep, penetrating cold that reached his bones. Until every residual tremor from the dream was silenced. Until the frantic beat of his heart slowed to a weary, mechanical thud. He stood there until the only thing he felt was the cold, and the only thing he wanted was the emptiness it brought.

Finally, he turned the water off. The silence was absolute. He stepped out, towed himself with rough, efficient strokes, avoiding looking at his own reflection in the dark glass. He was in control. The dream was just synaptic garbage. The craving was a chemical lie. The plug in the cabinet was a contingency, not a destiny.

He walked back to his cold, empty bed. And quickly changed the bedding. He curled onto his side, pulling the covers up to his chin. The hollow feeling was back, but it was a clean hollow now, scoured out by ice. It was better than the alternative. It was the only victory he had left, and he clung to it in the dark, waiting for a few hours to start the day..

The two games in Winnipeg were a blur of white noise and screaming joints. Every shift felt like dragging his skeleton through wet concrete. The puck was a distant, irrelevant thing. His mind was a single, screaming vector pointing southeast, towards Montreal. Towards the pulsing blue dot that hadn't moved from the new construction zone in hours. Shane's new house. He'd never seen it. The security there was a notch above anything else- a professional, integrated system that had, so far, defied his usual methods of ingress. No cameras. No eyes inside. It was a blind spot, and the darkness of it was a physical itch behind his eyes.

He was in his hotel room after the first game, calculating drive times, weather windows, the precise logistics of a visit, when his phone rang. SVETA. It was as if she had a psychic tether to his worst impulses.

He answered, his voice flat. “Sestra.”

“Do not ‘sestra’ me with that tone, Ilyanusha” she said, but her voice was tight with worry, not anger. “I am looking at summer. If you are going back to Russia, arrangements must be made. Flights for me and I need to let them know I’m taking a vacation. The dacha needs to be opened. Or are you staying in Boston?”

He stared at the city lights of Winnipeg through his window. Summer was an abstract concept, a future that didn’t exist. There was only now, and the distance between here and there. “I will think about it closer to the end of the season.”

A pause. He could hear her disbelief. “Ilya, the season ends in a few months.”

“Then I have weeks to think.” He pinched the bridge of his nose. “What do you need?”

“What I need is for my friend not to sound like a ghost.” She took a steadying breath, changing tactics. “The holidays next week. What are you doing? You will come to New York, yes?”

Another lie, smooth and cold on his tongue. “Some of the guys without family. We are having something. Team bonding.”

“Which guys?”

“Does it matter?” he snapped, then immediately regretted it. He heard her sharp intake of breath. The concern radiating through the phone was a weight he couldn’t bear. They all felt it- Svetlana, his coaches, his teammates with their sidelong glances. The great Ilya Rozanov, shrinking inside his own skin, playing the worst hockey of his career. They will know, he’d told Svetlana once, afraid they’d discover he was pining. Now, he was pretty sure they just thought he was breaking. It was more humiliating.

“I have to go,” he said, his voice softening despite himself. “Early practice.”

He hung up before she could dissect another lie.

His room was a sterile box. The only thing of note was the large television, angled precisely toward the bed. For months, it had been a window. He would lie there, in the dark, and watch the silent, grayscale feeds from the Montreal apartment. Shane making coffee. Shane staring at his laptop. Shane sleeping. It was a sacrament and a torture. He hadn't done it in weeks. It hurt too much to only be able to see the omega from so far away. The memory of Shane smiling at Rose Landry, wearing his jersey, was a fresh burn over an old wound. The feeds just made the distance feel infinite.

He played the second game against Winnipeg like a man underwater. He was slow, a step behind, his legendary anticipation utterly absent. He took a stupid, lazy penalty and sat in the box, not with rage, but with a hollow indifference that was worse. The final buzzer was a mercy. In the locker room, still in his gear, he looked at the team doctor.

“My knee,” Ilya said, his voice devoid of inflection. “It is not stable.”

An examination revealed nothing conclusive- some general inflammation, consistent with the grind of the season. But Ilya was insistent, his eyes flat. “I cannot push. It will go.”

The doctor, wary of the star player's demeanor as much as the potential injury, agreed to list him as day-to-day. The team would fly to the next city. Ilya would stay, “rehab,” and join them when cleared.

As soon he was alone, the performance ended. The “injury” vanished. He rented a nondescript sedan with cash, using a false ID from a compartment in his bag he hoped he'd never need. The drive was four hours of tense, silent focus. He didn't think. He drove. The tracker was his compass.

The house was not what he expected. It was modern, all sharp angles and dark wood, rising from a wooded lot still raw with construction. It was a fortress. Shane's fortress. Ilya parked a quarter mile down the road, in the shadow of a large delivery van, and watched through high-powered binoculars.

He saw him. Just once. Shane emerged onto the back deck, a silhouette against the sliding glass doors. He was holding a mug, looking out over the scraggly, unfinished yard. He stood there for a long time, perfectly still. Ilya's breath caught. Even at this distance, through lenses, the sight of him was a physical blow. The line of his shoulders, the tilt of his head- it was all Shane, and it was all impossibly far away.

He watched until the sun dipped below the trees and the chill of a Canadian spring night seeped into the car. Lights came on inside, moving from room to room. A warm, golden glow in the kitchen. A softer light in what must be the living room. Finally, an upstairs light- a bedroom. Ilya's grip on the binoculars was so tight his knuckles ached.

He saw Shane's shadow move across the drawn blinds. Then the main light went out. Only a dim, amber lamp remained, casting a faint halo through the fabric.

He is in bed. He is right there.

The impulse was a tidal wave, crashing over the crumbling seawall of his restraint. It would be so easy. The security system was external, designed to keep out casual threats. Not him. Not someone who had studied, who wanted this more than he wanted air. He could be inside in minutes. He could be in that room. He could finally, finally close the distance. He could take the confusion from Shane's beautiful face and replace it with the simple, devastating truth of touch. He could remind him. He could make him see. He could have the submission that was his right, the surrender that lived in the glazed-over look in Shane's eyes.

He saw it all in a flash: the startled gasp, the struggle that would melt into shuddering recognition, the way Shane's body would arch into his, finally, finally home. The fantasy was so vivid the car seemed to hum with it.

He closed his eyes.

You're not opposed to using force to get your way.

Shane's voice, cold and clear, cut through the fever-dream.

Ilya's head dropped forward, resting against the steering wheel. A low, ragged sound escaped him, part groan, part sob. The war inside him was a silent, devastating rout. The starving animal lunged, and the man, the pathetic, lovesick man who wanted to be chosen, beat it back with the only weapon he had left: the memory of Shane's disgust. He turned the car on and drove back to the hotel. He called down to the lobby and extended his stay for another two weeks. This was as close as he could be to the omega, so he'd rather just die there.

He had stopped eating two days ago. The thought of food was repulsive. He'd forced down water in his hotel room, and it had sat in his stomach like a lead weight. His body was consuming itself, and he let it. It felt fitting.

On the third morning, a sliver of morbid practicality cut through the fog. He called his lawyer, his voice a dry rasp.

"Draw up a will," he said, no preamble. "Simple. Everything to Shane Hollander. The Montreal player. Sole beneficiary. No conditions."

The lawyer, used to the eccentricities of wealthy clients, asked if he was sure. Ilya ended the call. It was dramatic, he knew. A final, grand gesture from a man who only knew how to operate in extremes. But if the nothingness swallowed him whole, at least something of his would go to Shane. A posthumous claim. A final, silent I was here, and you were everything.

Svetlana arrived the next day, her key turning in the lock. She found him in the same position on the bed, still in the clothes he'd worn for the past few days. She didn't cry or fret over him. She got angry. She brought broth, threatened, cajoled, sat on the edge of the bed and spoke softly of home, of summer plans, of anything to spark a reaction. He drank water to make her stop talking. He got up, showered mechanically because she stood in the bathroom doorway until he did. The world moved on without him. Rumors swirled in the sports blogs: Rozanov's mysterious ailment... Career-worst slump... Without him, Boston's playoff hopes fade...

A week into the nothingness, his phone rang on the nightstand. The sound was alien. He ignored it. It stopped. Then it rang again, persistent. Family from Russia, maybe. News of a death. His father. His brother. It would be a fitting endnote.

He fumbled for the phone. The name on the screen punched the air from his lungs.

SHANE

He scrambled, the phone slick in his trembling hand, nearly dropping it as he swiped to answer. He brought it to his ear, his voice a raw, desperate gasp.

“Shane?! Are you ok?” The only possibility that could explain this call was danger, threat, the limping man from the reports.

There was a beat of silence on the other end, filled with the faint sound of Shane’s breathing. It was the most beautiful sound Ilya had ever heard.

“I’m... I’m fine,” Shane’s voice came, quiet, tense. “I just... I got some papers. From a law firm. Representing you.”

Ilya closed his eyes. The will. It had been fast. Of course it had. He’d paid a premium for urgency. “Oh.”

““Oh?”” Shane’s voice sharpened, a crack in the calm. “Ilya, it’s a will. It names me as... everything. What is this? What’s wrong?”

The concern in Shane’s voice, however anger-tinged, was a spark in the void. It hurt. “Nothing is wrong,” Ilya murmured, the lie effortless and transparent. “It is just... practical.”

“Bullshit.” The word was sharp, final. “This isn’t practical. This is... this is a cry for attention or help from another planet. Talk to me. What’s happening?”

Ilya let his head fall back against the headboard. He was so tired. “Nothing matters anymore, Hollander. That is what is happening. I feel... dead inside. The game, food, breathing... it is just noise. So I put the noise in order. In case the feeling becomes real.”

The silence from Shane’s end this time was different. Heavier. Ilya could almost hear him thinking, wrestling with the magnitude of what he was hearing. When he spoke again, his voice was lower, strained. “You don’t get to do that. You don’t get to just... give up.”

“Why not?” Ilya asked, genuinely curious. “What is left to fight for?”

“Everything!” The word burst out of Shane, charged with a frustration that felt like life. “Your career, you idiot! Your team! Your... your life! You fight because that’s what you do. You’re the most stubborn, relentless person I’ve ever met. Since when do you just lie down?”

“Since you told me to leave you alone,” Ilya said softly, the truth a simple, devastating stone dropped between them. “That is the fight I cannot win. So what use are the others?”

Shane was silent for a long moment. Ilya heard him take a shaky breath. “Then find a new fight. I don’t know... get help. See someone. But don’t you dare send me paperwork like this again. Do you understand me? Fight.”

The command, coming from Shane, was a ghost of the old dynamic. It stirred something- not hope, but a faint, reflexive response. “How are you, Hollander?” Ilya asked, turning the focus, craving any detail of his existence.

A deflection, immediate and practiced. “I’m fine. That’s not what this is about.”

“Please,” Ilya begged, the word leaving him in a broken whisper, all pride incinerated. “Talk to me. Just once. Not about wills or fights. Just... talk. Tell me about your day. Anything.”

He heard the conflict in Shane's breathing, the internal war. He could picture the exact expression- the clenched jaw, the eyes screwed shut, the war between self-preservation and that damned, inherent compassion that Ilya loved and relied upon.

"I can't," Shane finally said, the words thick. "Not... not yet. Just... please. Eat something. See your team. Fight."

"For what? There is nothing left to fight for in me." Ilya pressed, a prisoner grasping at the terms of his release.

A long pause. "Give me some time."

It wasn't yes. It wasn't forgiveness. But it wasn't the final, slamming door. It was a crack of light under a threshold. It was a thread.

"Khorosho," Ilya whispered. Okay.

The line went dead.

Ilya held the phone to his ear for another minute, listening to the empty dial tone as if it might carry the echo of Shane's voice. Slowly, he lowered it. He looked around the room, the same room he'd been dead in for days. Fight.

He pushed himself to the edge of the bed. His limbs felt like they were made of rust and lead. He stood, the floor solid under his feet. Find a new fight.

He didn't know what that was. But Shane had called. Shane had told him to fight. And for now, that was the only compass point he had in the gray, endless waste. It was enough to make him take one step, then another, toward the kitchen, and the terrifying, simple prospect of a piece of bread.

The silence in the new house was different. It wasn't the empty quiet of his old apartment, which had felt temporary, a placeholder. This silence was deeper, soaked into the raw drywall and the new hardwood floors. It was a silence he'd built for himself, and it was crushing him.

Shane moved through the rooms like a ghost in his own home. The construction was nearly done, but it felt less like a sanctuary and more like a beautifully designed cage. He'd tried everything. He studied blueprints until the lines blurred. He met with the foreman, making minute decisions about faucet finishes and grout color that felt absurdly meaningless. He went to team dinners, smiled at Hayden's jokes, listened to Rose's stories from set. He performed life.

But his heart wasn't in it. It was a cold, heavy stone in his chest. He'd stopped checking his phone for a specific name, but his body hadn't gotten the memo. Every buzz sent a jolt through him, followed by a sickening drop when it wasn't him. The news alerts were worse. He'd told himself he wouldn't look, but his thumb would swipe on its own accord.

Rozanov Placed on IR with Undisclosed Injury.

Mystery Surrounds Boston Star's Sudden Decline.

Without Rozanov, Playoff Hopes Fade for Bears.

Each headline was a twist of the knife. Undisclosed. That was the word that haunted him. In the dark, quiet hours, his mind supplied the worst possibilities. A career-ender. Something chronic. Something... self-inflicted. He remembered the hollow look in Ilya's eyes in that greenroom, the terrifying flatness of his voice in the bathroom corridor. What is left to fight for?

He'd never known Ilya to simply give up. To be injured and not fight through it. The Ilya he knew- the Ilya that lived in his bones, infuriating and magnetic- would play on a broken leg out of sheer spite. This withdrawal was something else. It was a surrender. And Shane, against every instinct of self-preservation, felt responsible for it.

The legal pages had felt heavy as lead in his hands. This was the ultimate, perverse gift. The final box he couldn't throw away. It was Ilya saying, If I cannot have you in life, you will have all of me in death.

For hours, he paced the empty rooms, the envelope burning a hole on his counter. He thought of calling Rose, of calling his parents. But how could he explain this? The man who assaulted me just left me his entire fortune because he seems to be giving up on living. It was a madness no one else could navigate.

The silence of the house became a scream. The carefully chosen tiles, the perfect sightlines to the trees, the whole peaceful future he'd blueprinted- it all felt like a joke. A beautiful, empty set for a play that had already ended.

The fear curdled into a desperate, angry resolve. He couldn't let this stand. He couldn't be named the beneficiary of a ghost. He had told Ilya to fight. On the ice, in life. This was the opposite of fighting. This was a white flag made of legal parchment.

Finally, as dusk painted the bare trees outside in shades of charcoal and gold, he stopped pacing. He picked up his phone. His thumb hovered over Ilya's name, the one he'd sworn never to call again. The panic was now a sharp, clear point of action.

He pressed call.

He listened to it ring, each tone a hammer strike against his ribs. He almost hung up. Then it connected, and the raw, desperate gasp on the other end- "Shane?! Are you ok?"- told him everything. The worry wasn't for himself. It was still, always, for Shane.

And in that moment, holding the damning paperwork, listening to the voice of the man who'd seemingly decided to will himself out of existence, Shane knew the fight wasn't over. It had just changed forms. And he was now, irrevocably, in the middle of it.

The silence after the call was worse than the silence before.

It wasn't empty anymore; it was thick with the echo of Ilya's voice- that raw, hollow whisper that bore no resemblance to the arrogant, unstoppable force Shane had spent years battling. I feel dead inside. The words coiled in the air of his new, pristine kitchen, a toxic vapor seeping into the clean lines and fresh paint.

He looked down at the legal documents fanned across the countertop. Last Will and Testament. The crisp paper, the embossed letterhead, the unassailable finality of it. This wasn't a love letter or a threat. It was a contingency plan for a void. Shane's hands, which had steadied during the phone call, began to tremble again. He carefully gathered the pages, his fingers avoiding the clauses that detailed the vast, terrifying transfer of assets, and slid them back into the envelope. He didn't throw it away. He carried it to his bare, minimalist home office and placed it in the center of the empty desk. A monolith.

At practice, he was a step slow. His passes were a fraction off. Coach Williams watched him with a silent, weighing gaze that Shane refused to meet.

"Hollander. A word." Williams caught him after a particularly ragged drill. "Your head's not in it."

"It's in it," Shane said, the lie automatic.

"Is it?" Williams crossed his arms. "Because what's on the ice right now isn't you. It's a competent impersonation. We need you. I need you present."

The word present felt like an accusation. He wasn't present. He was trapped in a phone call, in a legal envelope, in the memory of a voice stripped of all its fight.

He tried to lose himself in the comfort of friends. He met Rose for coffee, and she talked about a difficult scene, her hands animated. He nodded, smiled at the right moments, and inside, he was screaming. The normalcy of it, the health of it, felt like a performance he was too tired to sustain. She reached across the table, her concern a gentle pressure.

“You seem a million miles away, Shane. Is it the cabin? The press?”

“Just tired,” he murmured, the go-to excuse that was becoming his truth. “Long season.”

She didn’t believe him. He saw the doubt in her eyes, but she let it go, and he was simultaneously grateful and aching lonely. He was pulling away, building the same walls he resented Ilya for trying to scale, but his were made of polite smiles and deflection.

At night, in the echoing silence of the new house, the temptation was a physical ache. His phone was a dark rectangle on the nightstand.

You don’t get to just... give up.

He’d said it with such conviction on the phone. But the conviction was crumbling. Because he understood, in a way that chilled him, the math of it. Ilya had built his entire world on a single, obsessive point: Shane. Shane had systematically removed himself as that point. What was left to hold the structure up? The answer, in the form of a will, was nothing.

The guilt was a cold, heavy companion. He had wanted the pressure to stop, the violation to end. He had never wanted this... this extinguishing. He had drawn a line in the sand, and Ilya hadn’t crossed it; he’d laid down on his side of it and gone still. The responsibility was a weight Shane didn’t know how to carry.

One afternoon, he found himself standing in the doorway of his home office, just staring at the envelope on the desk. The silence around him was no longer just the absence of sound. It was a waiting silence. It was the silence of a man standing over a chessboard after his opponent has, without a word, tipped over his own king and walked away.

He had told Ilya to fight. To find a new fight. But as the days bled into one another, the unspoken question became the loudest thing in the beautiful, empty house: what if Ilya’s only way of fighting was this? This last, desperate gambit to ensure that, in some form, he could not be left behind?

Shane had asked for time. But time, in the silent, waiting space he'd built for himself, was just another word for the slow, dawning realization that he was now, irrevocably, tied to Ilya Rozanov's survival. Not by desire, not by bond, but by the cold, legal promise of an inheritance he never wanted, from a man who sounded like he was already half a ghost. And the most terrifying part was the tiny, shameful spark beneath the worry- the part that missed the attention, the certainty, the all-consuming focus that had once made him feel terrifyingly, addictively seen.

The fight had changed. And he was now, permanently and without his consent, in the middle of it.

And then, the one that made Shane's coffee turn to acid in his stomach: Rozanov Hospitalized After Collapse at Private Residence.

The article was sparse, citing "severe exhaustion and dehydration." It mentioned he was stable, under observation. The comments sections were a circus of speculation- overtraining, substance abuse, a secret illness.

Shane knew. He knew with a cold, sick certainty that settled in his bones. This wasn't manipulation. Manipulation was boxes on doorsteps and bribed hotel clerks. Manipulation was forceful kisses and tracked phones. This was something else. This was the sound of an engine that had run at redline for too long, finally seizing, not with a bang, but with a silent, terminal sigh.

He shouldn't go. It was the worst possible idea. Ilya was in a private hospital, but still in Canada, and showing up there was walking back into the labyrinth he'd just escaped. He told himself he was going for confrontation. To look Ilya in the eye and finally scream at him for this, for the ultimate guilt trip, for using his own disintegration as a weapon. He packed a bag, told his coaches a family emergency had come up, and drove south, his knuckles white on the wheel.

He expected the fortress. The private security, the hissed threats, the explosive rage of a cornered animal. He used a side entrance, gave a name that wasn't his, and moved through the hushed, sterile halls with a pounding heart, braced for war.

What he found was silence.

The private room was dim, the blinds half-closed. Ilya lay in the bed, dwarfed by it. He was asleep, or unconscious, an IV line taped to the back of a hand that lay palm-up on the white sheet. He was pale, the sharp angles of his face stark and shadowed, dark lashes stark against skin that had lost its vitality. The machines beeped softly, monitoring a rhythm that seemed too slow, too quiet. The terrifying, kinetic force that was Ilya Rozanov was gone. In its place was a man who had, quite simply, stopped fighting.

Shane stood in the doorway, the anger draining out of him, leaving a hollow, echoing shock. He'd come ready for a storm. He'd found the eerie calm after the storm has passed, leaving only wreckage.

He must have made a sound, a shift in the air, because Ilya's eyes opened. They were the same impossible blue, but the fire was out. They focused on Shane slowly, without surprise, without the predatory gleam or the desperate hope. Just a flat, weary recognition.

"You came," Ilya said, his voice a dry rasp, barely audible over the hum of the machines.

"You collapsed," Shane replied, his own voice strangely small. He didn't move from the doorway.

A faint, almost imperceptible shrug lifted Ilya's shoulder. "Da."

The simplicity of it was devastating. Shane stepped inside, letting the door sigh shut behind him. He didn't sit. He stood at the foot of the bed, a safe distance, yet feeling unbearably close. "The will... was that part of this? We spoke and I thought you'd be better."

Ilya's gaze drifted to the window. "It was... putting things in order. The noise." He echoed his own word from the phone. "Before the quiet."

This wasn't a gambit. It was a conclusion. Shane felt the last of his defensive anger crumble, replaced by a wave of aching, complicated sorrow. "You can't just... do this."

"Why?" Ilya asked, still looking away. "You have your life. Your new house. Your friends. Your... safety. This is what you wanted. No more Ilya to trouble you." He said it as a statement of fact, not a reproach.

"That's not- " Shane cut himself off, frustration and grief tangling in his throat. He took a step closer. "What hurt the most... after everything, after Boston, after all the messed-up shit... I thought we were getting somewhere. Before you went too far. I thought maybe... there could be something real. Not just the... the heat of it. But something else. And you ruined it."

Finally, Ilya's eyes slid back to him. There was no defense in them. Only a profound, exhausted sadness. "There was something real," he whispered. "For me. From the first time I scented you. From the first time you came over to say hello to me."

Shane's breath hitched. "Was it one-sided?"

Ilya turned his face away again, a clear, painful rejection of the question. His profile was a stark line against the pillow. "It does not matter."

"It matters to me. I liked you, Rozanov. I liked you a lot and I thought--"

"If you only knew," Ilya breathed, the words barely there. "You can't... like me, Hollander. I am not a good man. I do terrible things. I think terrible thoughts. I see you, and I want to own the air you breathe. That is not... liking. That is a sickness. I do not deserve you to waste your 'like' on me." The confession was stripped of all pride, all arrogance. It was just a bleak report from a ruined interior.

The space between them crackled with a tension that had nothing to do with threat and everything to do with a magnetic, painful pull that had survived the collapse. Shane moved then, without thinking. He crossed the last few feet to the bedside. He reached out, his hands trembling slightly, and took Ilya's face in his hands, turning it firmly, gently, back toward him.

The touch was electric. It was the first skin-to-skin contact in months. Ilya's eyes flew wide, a shock of pure, unguarded feeling flashing through the exhaustion- yearning, shame, a helpless surrender to the touch. Shane felt it too, the insane, gravitational pull, the rightness of his palms against the rough stubble and too-warm skin. He held his gaze, forcing the connection Ilya had always demanded, but now Shane was the one initiating it.

"I don't know what to do," Shane whispered, his thumbs stroking the sharp crests of Ilya's cheekbones. "I don't know where to go from here. You're here, and you're... you're vanishing. And I..." He couldn't finish. And I can't stand it.

Ilya leaned infinitesimally into the touch, his eyes closing for a second. When they opened, they were glistening. "You go," he said, his voice breaking. "You go live. That is where you go. That is the only good choice."

They stayed like that for a long moment, suspended in the quiet beep of the monitors, the world outside the room ceasing to exist. Shane didn't forgive him. The hurt was still a lodged shard of glass in his heart. The fear was still there. But the man in the bed was not the monster from his nightmares or the obsessed suitor from his waking hours at that moment. He was just a man, broken by his own nature, who had finally chosen Shane's peace over his own possession.

Ilya's gaze remained fixed on the window, on a world that seemed to have lost all its color. Shane's words hung in the antiseptic air.

"I will unblock your number," Shane said, his voice softer now, the anger spent, leaving behind a weary determination. "When you get your phone back. Maybe we can... talk. Just talk. And maybe, eventually, we can work on at least being... I don't know. On speaking terms. Not like this."

Ilya nodded, a shallow dip of his chin, still refusing to look at him. To look would be to hope, and hope was a poison he was trying to purge from his system. "Khorosho," he rasped. Okay.

He heard the rustle of Shane's jacket, the soft sound of his footsteps retreating. The door opened and sighed shut. The silence that followed was different. It wasn't the hollow silence of surrender. It was a silence charged with a faint, terrifying echo of possibility. It was worse.

Outside the hospital, the cold air hit Shane like a slap, but it felt clean. The leaden weight in his chest, which had been his constant companion for weeks, had shifted. It wasn't gone, but it had cracked open, and through the crack poured a strange, frantic energy. He hadn't forgiven Ilya. The man in the bed was a ghost of the monster he'd feared, and that was somehow more devastating. But he was here. And Shane had touched him. And for the first time, it hadn't felt like a battle.

He pulled out his phone, his thumbs flying. He texted his parents: Headed back. I'll see you at the arena before the game. He had four hours to get to the arena. He needed to move, to think, to process.

He was in the dimly lit parking structure, focused on the glow of his screen, searching for his rental car key in his pocket. The blow to the back of his neck was explosive- a short, sharp impact of shocking violence. There was no pain, just a brilliant white flash behind his eyes, and then the world tipped sideways into silent, velvet black.

Consciousness returned in nauseating waves. A throbbing, sickening ache radiated from his neck through his skull. He was lying on something lumpy and unfamiliar. He tried to move, to push himself up, and panic detonated in his chest.

He was tied. Thick, coarse plastic bit into his wrists and ankles, securing him spread-eagle to a metal-framed bed in the center of a dank, unfamiliar room. Bare, whitewashed walls, a single bare bulb overhead, the smell of mildew and dust.

"No... no, no, NO!" The yell tore from his raw throat, a raw sound of pure terror. He pulled against the ropes, the friction burning his skin, but they held fast.

A shadow detached itself from the corner. The figure stepped into the weak pool of light.

Chris Hill.

His former teammate's face was a mask of twisted, possessive glee, but his eyes were the worst part- glittering with a fervent, unhinged light Shane had never seen before.

"Welcome back, sleeping beauty," Hill sneered, his voice a low, ugly thing. "Took you long enough. Guess Rozanov didn't wear you out too bad at the hospital, huh?"

Shane's blood ran cold. "Chris... what are you doing? Untie me. This isn't funny."

"Funny?" Hill let out a sharp bark of laughter. "No, it's not funny, Shane. It's serious. I've been so patient. Watching you. Following you. All this time, you were hiding your little secret from me. From everyone." He leaned in, his breath hot and sour on Shane's face. "An Omega. My perfect, pristine captain. All along. I thought I was just going crazy when I started wanting you."

The world tilted again. Hill knew. How did he know?

"I saw the way you looked at him," Hill spat, the jealousy curdling his words. "Rozanov. I saw you reach out to him. After everything I've done for you. After Mexico." The memory of that unwanted kiss, the disgust Shane had felt, flashed between them. "And then I find out... you gave it to him. Your first time. You let that Russian animal have what was mine."

"It wasn't like that- " Shane began, but Hill's open hand cracked across his face with brutal force. Shane's head snapped to the side, stars exploding in his vision, the coppery taste of blood filling his mouth.

“Don’t lie to me!” Hill roared. He grabbed the collar of Shane’s shirt and yanked, the fabric tearing. His fingers scrabbled at the side of Shane’s neck, finding the edge of the scent patch. With a vicious rip, he tore it away, then the one on his lower back. Shane’s clean, honeysuckle Omega scent, no longer chemically muted, bloomed faintly in the stale air.

Hill inhaled deeply, a grotesque parody of pleasure. “There it is. Now we can get started for real.”

He moved to a rickety table against the wall where a small, professional-looking medical kit lay open. Shane watched in mounting, paralyzing horror as Hill prepared a syringe, drawing a clear liquid from a vial.

“No... Chris, don’t- ”

“This,” Hill said, turning back, the needle glinting, “is just a little helper. Speeds things up. In a few days, that pretty little body of yours is going to be begging for it. And I’ll be here. I’m going to give you my bite, Shane. I’m going to breed you so full, so deep, that when they finally find you, there’ll be no choice. You’ll be mine. Bonded. Pregnant. Done.”

The clinical, monstrous certainty in his voice broke through Shane’s terror. As Hill approached, needle poised, Shane fought with everything he had. He bucked, he twisted, he screamed, a raw, animal sound of denial.

With a snarl of frustration, Hill dropped the syringe on the bed. He lunged, his hands closing around Shane’s throat. He squeezed, cutting off the scream, cutting off the air. Shane’s vision tunneled, dark spots swimming before his eyes. He clawed at the hands, his bound wrists making the effort pathetic. Hill’s face, contorted with rage, was the last thing he saw before the darkness rushed up again, not with a blow, but with a slow, suffocating swallow.

In the hospital, Ilya jolted awake, his heart slamming against his ribs. A cold, sharp dread, entirely separate from the lingering fog of his medications or his own depression, coiled like a serpent in his gut. Something was wrong. Deeply, fundamentally wrong. He dismissed it as a side effect, a phantom of his broken mind, and stared at the ceiling until dawn.

The feeling did not leave. It festered.

The next day, he made a concerted effort. To please the stern Russian therapist who spoke of cognitive reframing, he ate three bites of oatmeal. To fulfill the assignment, he picked up the journal the doctor had given him. He stared at the blank page. Reflect on what is happening. What was happening was a vast, internal silence. He wrote one sentence: The world is quieter.

He almost asked for the TV to be turned on that evening. The Voyaguers were playing. Shane would be there. The want was a physical ache. He ignored it, clinging to the shred of discipline he had left. He was trying to let go. To be what Shane needed: absent.

Two days later, Svetlana visited. Her eyes were red-rimmed, her face pale with a fear that had nothing to do with him.

“Ilya,” she whispered, her voice breaking before she began.

“What is it?” he asked, the dread from days before crystallizing into instant, icy certainty.

“It’s Shane Hollander.” She gripped his hand. “He’s... he’s missing. No one has seen him since he left the hospital here. His car was found in the parking garage. There are... signs of a struggle.”

The world did not go quiet. It shattered.

A sound ripped from Ilya’s chest- not a shout, but a raw, guttural roar of pure, unadulterated panic. He threw off the thin hospital blanket, tubes tearing at his skin. The heart monitor shrieked a frantic alarm as his pulse skyrocketed. He was on his feet, his IV stand crashing to the floor, his mind blank of everything but a single, white-hot imperative: FIND HIM

“Ilya, no!” Svetlana cried, trying to hold him back.

Orderlies and nurses rushed in, responding to the alarm. They saw a wild-eyed, powerful man surging toward the door, fueled by a terror that gave him inhuman strength. They grabbed him. He fought like a feral thing, elbows flying, a snarl on his lips. It took four of them to wrestle him back, to force him onto the bed, to strap the restraints over his wrists and ankles as he thrashed and roared, his voice cracking as he screamed a name into the sterile, uncaring air.

“SHANE!”

The surrender was over. The fight was back. And it was a thousand times more terrifying than before.

When Ilya woke up, he reached for Svetlana, telling her he could find out where Shane was. The confession tore from him like a piece of his own flesh. “The tracker,” Ilya gasped, the words raw in the sterile room as Svetlana tried to calm his thrashing. He clawed at the medical restraints. “I need my phone.”

Svetlana froze, her hands on his shoulders going slack. Her face paled, horror and a dawning, sick understanding warring in her eyes. She didn’t ask questions. She just stared at him for one long, terrible second, then turned and fled the room to find a nurse, to demand his personal effects.

Alone, Ilya fought the straps, his muscles screaming, until he managed to wrench one hand free. He fumbled for the remote, stabbing at the power button. The TV flickered to life, tuned to a sports news channel. And there he was.

Shane’s face, his team headshot, smiling and clean-cut, filled the screen beside a stark graphic: MISSING. The ticker below scrolled: Montreal Captain Shane Hollander, 20, missing for 72 hours... Parents offer substantial reward... League issues statement... No leads...

The hollow dread that had been gnawing at him solidified into a block of ice in his gut. Days. He'd been in that hellhole for days.

The door burst open. Svetlana returned, her face ashen, clutching his small personal belongings bag. She threw it to him, the keys to her rental car landing on the bed. "They are coming with a sedative, Ilya. Do not be stupid—"

He was already moving. He ripped the remaining restraint free, the plastic buckle snapping. He lunged for the bag, yanking out his phone and a crumpled handful of his own clothes—jeans, a dark hoodie. "Lock the door," he ordered, his voice a guttural command she hadn't heard in weeks.

She hesitated, then did it, turning the deadbolt as he tore the hospital gown off. He dressed with frantic, clumsy speed, his fingers fumbling on the zipper. The phone in his other hand powered up, the screen blinding in the dim room. He ignored the notifications, going straight to the encrypted app.

The map resolved. A pulsing, frantic red dot in a residential area on the outskirts of a town three hours north. The biometric readouts alongside it were a nightmare: heart rate at a dangerous, sustained 150 bpm. Core body temperature: 101.3°F- three degrees into pre-heat territory. Blood pressure spiking. A warning symbol flashed next to the cardiac rhythm.

He found the number he'd memorized but never dialed -David Hollander's cell, sourced from a background check months ago. His thumbs flew.

Unknown- This is Ilya Rozanov. I have his location. Answer this phone in 3 minutes. Be alone.

He shoved the phone in his pocket and turned to the window. It was a standard hospital sash window, locked. Svetlana saw his look. "Ilya, no! You are sick! Let the police- "

He didn't hear her. He grabbed the small chair by the bed and swung it, not at the glass, but at the wooden frame holding the lock. The impact jarred up his arms, but the wood splintered. Two more blows and the lock mechanism broke free. He shoved the window up, the cold night air rushing in. It was a second-story drop, but onto a grassy, landscaped slope on the building's quiet side.

"The keys!" he barked, holding out his hand.

Tears streamed down Svetlana's face, but she threw them to him. "You will get yourself killed!"

"Then I am killed," he said, and swung his legs out the window. He dropped, hitting the ground in a rolling tuck that sent a bolt of pain through his still-weak body. He was on his feet and running, a dark streak cutting across the hospital lawn toward the visitor parking lot across the street.

He found her bright yellow Bentley unlocked it, and slid inside. The phone rang exactly three minutes after his text. He answered on the first ring.

"Rozanov?" David Hollander's voice was tight, suspicious, frayed with fear.

"Listen. He is in a house at 1887 Cypress Lane, Saint-Jérôme. His vitals are critical. He is entering pre-heart under duress. You need a doctor you trust, one who understands dynamics and discretion. Get a room at the Hôtel de l'Est, three blocks from that address. Be ready. I am bringing him to you."

"The police-"

"Will take hours he does not have. Do it. Or lose your son." Ilya ended the call, threw the phone on the passenger seat, and started the car.

The three-hour drive was a blur of speed, glaring headlights, and a monomaniacal focus that tunneled his vision to the road and the glowing map on the phone screen. He pushed the small car to its limits, his own heart hammering in time with the frantic pulse on the screen.

He parked two blocks away, in the shadows of a closed auto shop. The neighborhood was quiet, dark. The house at 1887 Cypress was a squat, neglected bungalow, its windows dark save for a faint, dirty glow from a back room.

Ilya moved through backyards like a ghost, his senses screaming. He approached the lit window from the side, peering through a grimy pane.

The scene inside froze the blood in his veins.

Shane was on a bare mattress on the floor, totally naked, his skin gleaming with sweat in the low light. He was writhing, not in passion, but in a weak, trapped struggle, his wrists bound with brutal, thick zip-ties to the bed frame. Over him, Chris Hill, his face a mask of frenzied obsession, was fumbling with his own pants, one hand pinning Shane's hip to the mattress.

A soundless roar filled Ilya's head.

He didn't go for the door. He took two steps back, lowered his shoulder, and charged the window. He crashed through in an explosion of glass, wood, and curtain rod, landing in a roll on the filthy floor.

Hill spun around, shock etching his face. "What the f--"

Ilya was already on him. He didn't throw a punch. He lunged, grabbing Hill by the throat and the back of his head, and with a raw, animalistic surge of strength, he slammed the man's face down into the concrete floor. Once. A sickening crack. Again. A wetter sound. Again. And again. He lost count, driven by a red haze of pure, annihilating fury, until the body beneath him went limp and the only sound was the wet, ragged grate of his own breathing and the wet drip of something onto the concrete.

He shoved off, leaving Hill in a ruined, twitching heap, a threadbare pulse fluttering in his neck. Ilya didn't spare him another glance.

He was at the bed in two strides. “Shane. Zayka. Look at me.”

Shane’s eyes were wide open, but they saw nothing. They were glazed, fixed on a point a thousand miles away, pupils blown with terror and the chemical storm raging in his body. He was shaking violently, a fine, constant tremor that rattled the old bed frame. He didn’t react to Ilya’s voice, to the destruction, to anything.

“Shane!” Ilya tried again, his hands hovering, afraid to touch. He saw the raw, bloody rings around his wrists from the zip-ties. He turned, scanning the squalid room. On a rickety table, amid empty cans and the medical kit, he saw a box cutter. He snatched it, sawed through the plastic ties with two sharp motions.

Shane’s arms fell limply to his sides. He didn’t move to cover himself. He just kept shaking, kept staring.

With a ragged sound of pain, Ilya stripped the filthy top sheet from the mattress, the only covering available. He wrapped it around Shane’s trembling body, tucking it tightly, trying to contain the tremors, to give some semblance of shelter. He gathered the bundled, unresponsive form into his arms, Shane’s head lolling against his shoulder.

He didn’t look back at the ruin he’d left of Chris Hill or the dark, bleeding house. He turned and ran into the welcoming, concealing night.

The world narrowed to the smell of gasoline, smoke, and fear-it was radiating off Shane, and the fragile, trembling weight in his arms. Ilya ran, Shane a bundled, shuddering parcel against his chest, his boots crunching on broken glass and dried leaves. Every shadow in the neighboring yards felt like a watching eye. He hit the unlock button on Svetlana’s keys, the sports car’s lights flashing a silent beacon in the dark.

He wrenched the passenger door open and bent, lowering Shane into the bucket seat as gently as he could manage with adrenaline screaming through his veins. The seat was all hard angles and stiff leather, designed for speed, not for broken Omegas. Shane’s head lolled against the headrest, his eyes still wide and unseeing, fixed on some horror only he could witness. The violent, fine tremors that wracked his frame made the whole car seat seem to vibrate.

“Don’t move, baby,” Ilya whispered, the endearment falling from his lips unbidden, raw and desperate. He fumbled with the seatbelt, pulling it across Shane’s chest and clicking it home, the mechanism loud in the quiet. He leaned in, pressing a hard, fleeting kiss to the side of Shane’s sweat-damp head, inhaling the scent of terror and the first, feverish hints of the forced pre-heat. “I will be right back.”

He locked the door, the thunk sounding terrifyingly final. He spared one last glance through the window. Shane hadn’t moved. He was a statue of shock, wrapped in a filthy sheet.

Ilya turned and sprinted back toward the hell-house.

Time was a blur of grim efficiency. He didn’t think. He acted. His lighter flicked to life, a small, defiant flame in the dark room. He touched it to the cheap, dusty curtains. They caught with a hungry whump, the fire climbing fast, painting the walls in dancing, demonic shadows. He threw the lighter onto the mattress where Shane had been bound, then kicked over the rickety table, sending the medical kit and empty cans scattering toward the growing blaze. He didn’t look at Hill’s still form. The fire would have its own justice.

Satisfied the inferno would consume the evidence- the zip ties, the syringe, the monster, he ran back to the car.

Inside, the atmosphere was a claustrophobic mix of cold leather and Shane’s escalating distress. Ilya started the engine, the roar unnaturally loud. He peeled away from the curb, driving fast but controlled, his eyes constantly flicking between the road and the passenger seat.

He called the Hollander’s number. David answered on the first ring. “Room 214. Back stairwell is clear. Is he-”

“Alive,” Ilya cut in, his voice tight. “Not okay. Be ready.” He ended the call.

The ten minute drive was hell. Every few minutes, Shane would make a sound- a faint, wounded whimper that was nothing like his usual voice. His trembling intensified, the seatbelt straining as his body arched subtly, then fell back. Ilya’s hand shot out, gripping

Shane's knee through the sheet. "Hold on," he growled, to the road, to Shane, to himself. "Just hold on."

He saw the hotel sign ahead—a bland, anonymous tower. He swung around to the rear service entrance, killing the lights. An older man, with a similar build to Shane was there, a silhouette in the doorway, face grim. Without a word, Ilya got out, rounded the car, and lifted Shane from the passenger seat. Shane was pliant, but a low, continuous tremor still ran through him like a faulty current.

Up in room 214, the scene was one of silent, strained horror. Yuna let out a choked cry when she saw her son, her hands flying to her mouth. David's face was stone. An older man with a doctor's bag—someone they trusted, stepped forward, his professional demeanor not hiding his shock.

"On the bed, please," the doctor said.

Ilya laid Shane down. The doctor worked quickly, checking pupils, pulse, listening to his heart. He peeled back the sheet just enough to see the bruising on Shane's wrists, the sheen of sick-sweat on his skin. He prepared a light sedative and injected it into Shane's arm. "This should calm the physiological panic, let his body rest," he murmured, more to himself than anyone.

They waited. The minutes stretched into an hour. Then two.

Shane did not wake. He did not stir. The sedative had smoothed the tremors but had done nothing to bring back the light behind his eyes. He was simply... absent. A beautiful, empty vessel.

The doctor finally straightened, his expression grave. "He wasn't raped. But for an Omega... the trauma, the violation of intent, the biochemical forcing... it can sometimes cause a psychic retreat. A shutdown. His mind has left to protect itself." He shook his head. "I'm not equipped for this. He needs a specialized hospital. A psychiatric unit familiar with dynamic-related trauma."

Yuna began to cry softly, her hand clutching Shane's limp one. David looked hollowed out.

The room air grew thick with sterile despair. The doctor's words- not raped, but... Omega shock... unresponsive... real hospital- hung like a verdict. Shane lay motionless on the bed, a beautiful statue carved from trauma, his breathing the only sign he hadn't already left them. The sedative had long since faded, leaving him stranded in some silent, inner space no one could reach.

Yuna Hollander hovered at the bedside, her fingers perpetually smoothing her son's hair, her tears a quiet, constant stream. David stood behind her, a pillar of grim silence, his eyes flicking between his wife's breaking heart and the looming, bloodied figure of Ilya Rozanov by the window.

Ilya had said nothing since carrying Shane in. His knuckles were split, his clothes smeared with soot and worse. He watched the bed, his gaze a physical weight. The doctor packed his bag with an air of professional frustration. "The body has shut down to protect the mind. There's nothing more I can do here without a full hospital suite. You need to decide."

"We're not moving him," Yuna whispered, fierce. "Not again. He's safe here."

"He's not here, Mrs. Hollander," the doctor said gently, not unkindly. "And I cannot guarantee how long his system can maintain this state."

He looked at Shane's parents. "You need to leave," he said, his voice low and utterly drained of anything but resolve.

Yuna whirled. "Absolutely not!"

"For five minutes," Ilya said, finally meeting David's eyes. He saw the father's conflict- the distrust, the fury, warring with the dawning, terrible understanding that normal methods had failed. "If he does not respond, you call whoever you want. But you will leave. Now."

David held his gaze for a long, agonizing moment. He saw the blood on Ilya's knuckles, the soot on his clothes, the absolute, terrifying focus in his blue eyes. This was the man who had brought his son back. The calculus was monstrous, but it was the only one left.

He put his arm around Yuna. "Come on," he said, his voice thick.

"David, no--"

"Five minutes," David said to Ilya, then guided his weeping wife from the room. The door clicked shut.

The silence they left behind was absolute. Ilya was alone with the consequence of everything. He walked to the bed, looking down at the ruin of his greatest, most terrible desire. Then he sat, gathered Shane's limp body against his own, and bent his head to the fever-hot skin of Shane's neck.

He had tried to own the air Shane breathed. Now, he would try to force life back into it.

The room felt larger, the quiet deeper. Ilya approached the bed, his boots soundless on the cheap carpet. He looked down at Shane- the pale skin, the dark lashes against too-prominent cheekbones, the terrible, absolute stillness. He had seen this man defy him, challenge him, look at him with fire and fear and reluctant, dazed want. He had never seen him like this. A thing broken.

He sat on the edge of the mattress, the springs groaning softly. Gently, he gathered Shane into his arms, pulling him up so his back rested against Ilya's chest. Shane was a dead weight, limp and unresponsive. Ilya arranged him, one arm supporting his torso, the other hand coming up to cradle his jaw, tipping his head to expose the clean, vulnerable line of his neck.

He bent close, his lips brushing the shell of Shane's ear. "I am so sorry, moy prekrasnyy," he whispered, the Russian endearment a raw ache in the quiet. "So sorry."

Then he lowered his mouth to the junction of Shane's neck and shoulder, to the scent gland that had called to him like a siren since he first found out the truth. He didn't hesitate. He opened his mouth, pressed his teeth against the fever-hot skin, and bit down.

It was not the claiming bite of his fantasies. It was clinical. Purposeful. A calculated override of a crashed system. He felt the skin give, the brief resistance then the pop of penetration, the immediate coppery tang of blood flooding his mouth. Shane's body gave one violent, seismic jerk in his arms, a full-body spasm of shock and instinct. Ilya held him tighter, locking him in place, not letting go, pouring his own will- live, come back, be here- through the connection.

He counted. Five seconds. Ten. The jerking subsided into tremors, then into a deep, shuddering sigh that seemed to drain the last of the tension from Shane's frame. Shane went completely, utterly boneless against him.

Ilya released the bite, pulling back. Two precise, bleeding punctures marked the perfect skin. He watched, heart hammering, as the rigid line of Shane's body softened, the awful vacant slackness of his face easing into something merely unconscious. The terrifying silence was replaced by the deep, even rhythm of natural sleep.

For a long moment, Ilya just held him, rocking slightly, his own breath ragged. He had done it. The last resort. The violation to end all violations. He felt no victory, only a vast, hollow dread and a relief so profound it felt like its own kind of pain.

Carefully, he laid Shane back on the pillows. He found a clean corner of the sheet and dabbed gently at the bite marks, then pulled the fabric up to cover Shane's neck just as a knock came at the door.

The five minutes were up.

For a long moment, Ilya just stared, his own breath ragged. He had done it. The last resort, the nuclear option he'd read about in old, texts on Omega shock therapy. A forced, temporary bond-surge to reboot a shattered system. It was a violation stacked upon violation. He felt no triumph, only a hollow, sickening dread. What have I done?

A soft knock at the door. Yuna's voice, strained and thin. "Rozanov? Is he...?"

Ilya gently laid Shane back against the pillows, arranging the sheet around him with hands that trembled. He couldn't let them see the bite. Not yet. He pulled the collar of the sheet up, obscuring Shane's neck, before crossing the room and unlocking the door.

Yuna and David rushed in, the doctor behind them. Yuna went straight to the bed, her hands fluttering over her son's face. "He's sleeping? Is he just sleeping?"

The doctor moved in, checking Shane's pulse, his pupils. "Heart rate is down. Respiration is normal. The sedative I gave him was mild, it should have worn off... this is different. This is a natural sleep state." He looked at Ilya, confusion and a dawning, professional curiosity in his eyes. "What did you do?"

The doctor looked skeptical, but Shane's vitals were stable, and his patient was no longer in a state of psychic fracture. He shrugged, packing his bag. "Monitor him. If he doesn't wake naturally in eight hours, or if there's any distress, you must take him to a hospital. The police will need to be involved regardless."

"They will be," David said, his voice firm, his eyes on Ilya. "When Shane is ready."

Once the doctor left, the room thickened with a heavy silence. Yuna sat on the edge of the bed, stroking Shane's hair. David turned to Ilya.

"Explain- how did you know where he was?"

"An old teammate was stalking him. The house was on fire when I left," Ilya said, his voice devoid of emotion. "I do not know if he got out."

Yuna made a small, pained sound. David absorbed this, his jaw tight. The morality of the situation was horrific, and they were all trapped in it.

“You should go,” David said finally. “The police, the league... your being here complicates everything.”

“I am not leaving him,” Ilya said, the words simple and absolute. He didn’t move from his post by the window.

“You don’t have a right- ” Yuna began, her voice rising.

“I know!” Ilya’s control snapped, the word cracking through the room. He took a shuddering breath, forcing himself back to stillness. “I know I have no right. But he is... he is mine to protect. I failed. I will not leave until I know he is safe. You can call security. You can call the police. They will have to drag me out.”

The standoff stretched, taut and painful. Finally, David let out a long, weary sigh. He looked at his son, sleeping peacefully for the first time in days, then back at the shattered, resolute man who had pulled him from hell. “You stay in that chair. You don’t touch him unless we say. You speak to no one.”

Ilya gave another single, sharp nod. Terms of surrender. He could live with them.

The night passed in a slow, silent vigil. Ilya sat rigid in the armchair, his eyes never leaving the bed. Yuna dozed fitfully beside her son. David paced by the door. Just before dawn, Shane stirred.

A soft groan. His eyelids fluttered. His hand twitched on the sheet.

All three of them froze.

Shane’s eyes opened. They were clear, but clouded with confusion and pain. They scanned the unfamiliar ceiling, then found his mother. “Mom...?” His voice was a dry croak.

Yuna burst into tears, clutching his hand. “Shane, baby. Oh, thank god.”

Shane’s gaze drifted past her, landing on Ilya. Recognition flickered, followed by a storm of emotions too fast to parse- fear, relief, shame, a deep, aching vulnerability. His free hand crept up, his fingers brushing unconsciously against the side of his neck, where the bite mark throbbed beneath the sheet.

Ilya held his breath.

Shane’s eyes widened slightly. He knew. He felt it. The phantom claim, the echo of Ilya’s desperation in his veins. He didn’t look away. He just stared, lost and seeking in the early morning light.

Ilya didn’t speak. He didn’t dare. He just looked back, pouring every ounce of his own wreckage, his guilt, his ferocious, unwavering devotion into that silent look. I am here. I am sorry. I will burn the world for you.

Shane’s lips parted. No sound came out. A single tear escaped, tracing a path through the grime still on his temple. Then his eyes slowly closed again, not in unconsciousness, but in exhausted overwhelm. His hand, however, remained resting against his neck, over the hidden mark.

It wasn’t forgiveness. It wasn’t acceptance.

But it was a connection. A thread, thin as a spider’s silk and stained with blood and fire, pulled taut once more between them. In the quiet hotel room, with the dawn breaking and the world of consequences waiting outside the door, it was the only thing holding Ilya together. And, perhaps, the only thing allowing Shane to finally, truly, rest.

This chapter was difficult to write.

Not because of the darker scenes, although that certainly didn't help, but because both Shane and Ilya are reaching the point where they can't keep pretending they're unaffected anymore. Shane is exhausted. Ilya is spiraling. Neither of them knows what to do with the fact that the connection between them still exists despite everything that's happened.

Unfortunately, unresolved feelings and terrible coping mechanisms are a dangerous combination.

Thank you for all the comments, theories, and emotional damage reports. I love reading them.

And yes, I know some of you want to put Ilya in a cage. Same

The silence after David and Yuna stepped out was thick, but it was a different kind of quiet. The frantic, medical emergency had passed, replaced by the grim logistics of the aftermath. Ilya remained by the bed, not willing to let Shane's hand go, while Yuna moved with a mother's haunted purpose.

She returned from the bathroom, her arms laden with soft white towels and a plastic basin filled with warm water. Her eyes were red-rimmed, but her hands were steady. "He hates being dirty," she murmured, more to herself than to Ilya, as she set the basin on the nightstand. She dipped a cloth, wrung it out, and began with heartbreaking tenderness to wipe the grime from her son's forehead, the soot from his temple.

Ilya watched for a moment, the intimacy of the act a private glimpse of a close familial relationship he felt he was trespassing upon. This was the woman Shane had spoken of with such soft fondness the fierce, unwavering center of his world. Seeing her now, in her quiet, practical devastation, he understood the depth of what he had always been threatening to disrupt.

After a minute, he stepped forward. He didn't ask. He simply picked up a fresh cloth from the stack, dipped it, and silently offered it to her. She paused, her gaze flicking from the cloth to his face, seeing the blood still under his fingernails, the ash in the lines of his knuckles. She gave a tiny, almost imperceptible nod.

He took over cleaning Shane's left arm, starting from the shoulder, moving down with a slowness that felt ritualistic. He washed away the dirt and sweat, revealing the pale skin beneath, the faint tracing of veins, the delicate bones of his wrist now circled by angry, abraded lines from the zip-ties. With each pass of the cloth, Ilya committed the details to memory, the scattering of freckles he'd once cataloged through lovesick eyes, the exact curve of Shane's elbow, the way his fingers lay slightly curled even in sleep. He knew, with a cold certainty that settled in his marrow, that this might be the last time. After the police, after the explanations, after Shane woke to the full horror of it all, he would be shut out. This moment of service, of stolen proximity, was his to hoard.

Yuna worked on the other side, her movements a mirror of his own care. The room held only the sound of water being gently wrung and their shared, shallow breathing.

David returned, closing the door softly behind him. His face was etched with new lines of strain. "The doctor will cooperate. For Shane's sake. He'll cite patient confidentiality and the psychological trauma, state that immediate hospitalization was deemed too risky without a secure, private environment." He looked at Ilya. "Your witnesses?"

"They will be credible," Ilya said, his voice low. He didn't look up from his task, his cloth now carefully wiping Shane's collarbone, avoiding the hidden bite mark. "Employees of a security firm. They will state they were hired for protective surveillance of Mr. Hollander due to prior stalker threats, tracked him to the location, and intervened. They found Mr. Hill already deceased in a fire of uncertain origin. They retrieved Mr. Hollander and brought him here, to his family, before dissolving their contract."

It was a clean, cold story. It contained truths, the stalker, the tracking, the retrieval, woven through with lies that protected the monstrous core of it. It would hold up, because the people he would pay to tell it were experts, and because the alternative, the full, unvarnished truth of his obsession, was a nuclear option that would destroy Shane more thoroughly than Hill ever could.

David absorbed this, his jaw working. “And you?”

“I was never here,” Ilya said, finally meeting his gaze. “I am in a Boston hospital, under psychiatric observation. There are records. My friend will attest to it. Your son and I have not spoken since our last... public meeting.”

The finality of it hung in the air. The plan was a life raft built from lies, but it was the only one that kept Shane from drowning in a different kind of scandal.

“When this is all over,” David said, his voice gruff, “I am going to need an explanation of all this, Mr. Rozanov.”

Ilya nodded, his eyes returning to Shane’s peaceful, sleeping face. He ran the damp cloth over the back of Shane’s hand, tracing the knuckles. “I will tell you anything I can,” he said, the words a vow and a surrender. “But Shane is the one who decides how much I can tell.”

He finished his ministrations, laying the cloth aside. Shane was clean now, the physical evidence of his ordeal washed away, leaving only the deeper wounds beneath the skin. Ilya’s hand hovered for a second, then, with a touch so light it was barely there, he brushed a strand of damp hair from Shane’s forehead.

It felt like a goodbye.

He stepped back, ceding the space at the bedside entirely to Yuna and David. The first rays of the true morning sun were cutting through the gap in the curtains, illuminating the dust motes in the air and the pale, vulnerable figure on the bed. Ilya retreated into the shadows by the window, his own form blending into the gloom, becoming the ghost he would soon have to be. He had saved the body. The rest, the mind, the heart, the future, was no longer his to claim. The fight was over, and the silence that followed was the most complete surrender he had ever known.

The next time Shane swam to the surface of consciousness, it was a slower, more deliberate ascent. The heavy blanket of sedation had lifted, leaving behind the gritty, aching reality of his body, the throbbing in his wrists, the deep, sore stiffness in his muscles, and a peculiar, localized heat on the side of his neck that pulsed in time with his heartbeat. His mind felt scoured, hollowed out, but it was his own again.

He opened his eyes. The first thing he saw was the textured, off-white ceiling of a hotel room. The second was his mother's face, etched with lines of worry and relief, hovering over him. "Shane?" she whispered, her hand cool on his forehead.

He tried to speak. His throat was desert-dry. "Mom," he managed, a cracked syllable.

A wave of emotion broke over her features, and she pressed a kiss to his temple. Behind her, he saw his father's broad shoulders, a rigid silhouette of contained anxiety. And beyond them, by the window where the gray morning light bled around the curtains, stood Ilya.

The sight of him was a jolt to Shane's system, a different kind of electricity than the terror Hill had inspired. This was a deep, resonant shock of recognition and dread. Ilya was still, dressed in dark, rumpled clothes, his face pale and shadowed, his knuckles visibly scraped. He looked like a warrior returned from a lost battle, standing guard over the spoils he no longer had a right to claim. His blue eyes, when they met Shane's, held no triumph, only a devastating, exhausted gravity.

"Hey," Shane breathed out, the word directed at the room.

"How do you feel, son?" David asked, stepping closer, his voice carefully neutral.

"Sore," Shane said, his own voice gaining a little strength. "Confused." His hand lifted, almost of its own volition, and his fingertips found the tender, raised skin on his neck. The memory wasn't visual it was sensory. The pressure, the sharp pain, the overwhelming wave of something that had pulled him back from the silent, white nothingness. He looked directly at Ilya.

"We need to talk," Shane said, his voice firmer. He looked at his parents. "Alone. With him."

Yuna's protest was immediate, a sharp inhale, but David placed a restraining hand on her arm. He was watching Shane, seeing the desperate clarity in his son's eyes. This was a mess of unimaginable proportions, and Shane was at the center of it. He had a right to navigate the minefield.

"Are you sure?" David asked.

Shane nodded, a slow, painful dip of his chin. "Yeah. Please."

With obvious, profound reluctance, Yuna leaned down, kissed Shane's forehead again, and allowed David to guide her from the room. The door clicked shut, leaving a silence that was somehow louder, charged with the unsaid.

Ilya didn't move from his post by the window. He seemed to be giving Shane every inch of space he could, as if his very presence was a contaminant.

"You bit me."

It wasn't a question.

Ilya didn't flinch. "Yes."

Shane absorbed the simple admission. The act felt both monumental and inevitable, the logical, brutal conclusion to everything they were. He felt a confusing mix of violation and a shameful, secret gratitude. It worked. He was here.

"The bite," Ilya began, his voice low and roughened by smoke and fatigue. "It is not a mating bond. It was a... a - I read about omega's being in shock before and with alpha bite they were better. A shock to your system to bring you back from catatonia. Your autonomy is intact. Your choices remain your own." He delivered the information like a doctor giving a grim prognosis, his eyes fixed on a point on the wall behind Shane. "It will fade. In a few weeks, you will feel nothing of me in it."

Shane listened, his fingers still resting on the mark. It didn't feel like 'nothing'. It felt like a brand, a receipt for a rescue he had started losing hope of. "Okay," he said quietly, because what else was there to say?

Ilya's jaw tightened. He was steeling himself. This was the preamble. "There is more," he said, and finally, his gaze swung to meet Shane's. It was like being stared at by a winter sky. "I have to tell you. All of it. And then you will tell me to leave, and I will go."

A cold dread, separate from the physical aches, began to pool in Shane's stomach. "Tell me."

Ilya took a shallow breath, as if the air itself was toxic. "The tracker. I had a tracker inserted in you, and one on your phone. It is a subdermal implant. In the back of your neck, near the hairline." He watched the color drain from Shane's face, watched his free hand fly to the nape of his neck, probing for a bump he couldn't feel. "I had it inserted while you were sedated, after Boston. It monitors location, vitals. I have watched it for months. I knew your heart rate when you ran. I knew your temperature when you slept. I knew the exact moment your stress levels spiked in that house."

Each sentence was a precise, surgical cut. Shane felt disembodied, listening to a confession about a stranger's body, a body that happened to be his. The violation was so complete, so coldly technological, it made the physical threats of Hill seem almost primitive.

"I have had you followed," Ilya continued, relentless. "By professionals. Since we got together. They reported on your movements, your company. I read reports of you laughing with Hayden. Of you spending hours at Scott Hunter's house. Of your nights with Rose." He didn't say the names with jealousy, but with a flat, factual horror at his own actions.

Shane's breath was coming faster now. The sterile hotel room felt like a panopticon. Every private moment, every attempt at normalcy, had been observed, catalogued, and delivered to this man.

"The cameras," Ilya said, and for the first time, his voice wavered, just a fraction. "In your old apartment in Montreal. In the vents. One in your parents' living room, installed during a security system upgrade I arranged. I have watched you make coffee. Read books. Sit in silence." He closed his eyes for a second, a spasm of pain crossing his features. "I have watched you sleep."

The humiliation was a hot, sick wave. Shane remembered the feeling of being watched in his home, the paranoia he'd dismissed as trauma. It had been real. Every moment of fragile peace, of private grief, had had an audience of one.

"And Chris Hill," Ilya said, the name a snarl he couldn't suppress. "When I found you... when I saw what he was doing... I did not just stop him." He opened his eyes, and they were utterly bleak. "I killed him. I beat his skull against the floor until he stopped moving. Then I set the house on fire. With him in it. I burned the evidence. I burned him."

The final confession hung in the air, the most terrible of all. It wasn't just obsession. It was murder. Arson. Ilya had crossed a line from which there was no societal return, and he had done it for him.

Shane stared at him, his mind reeling. The man who had just confessed to a horrifying litany of crimes- stalking, surveillance, violation of bodily autonomy, murder- was the same man who had just days ago been a hollow shell in a hospital bed, who just months ago had kissed his head and called him 'baby' in a trembling voice, who had, with a single, desperate act, yanked him back from the abyss.

The contradictions were too immense. They shattered something inside Shane. He didn't cry. He didn't scream. He felt a terrible, clear-eyed calm settle over the chaos.

"You're a monster," Shane whispered, the words not angry, but awed and horrified. A statement of fact.

Ilya didn't deny it. He just nodded, once. "Da."

"Why?" The question burst out of him. "Why tell me all of this? You could have lied. You could have just been the hero who found me."

"Because you deserve the truth," Ilya said, his voice finally breaking, raw at the edges. "And because I am so... so tired of hiding what I am from you. You asked me once to earn forgiveness. This is not earning. This is just... the truth of the ledger. This is what you would be forgiving."

He took a step back, toward the door, as if the force of his own confession was physically repelling him. “The police will have a story. Credible witnesses will say hired security found you. I was never here. You and I have not spoken. You are free.”

He meant it. Shane could see it in the absolute surrender in his posture. This was Ilya Rozanov, finally, truly, stopping his fight. Not by giving up on wanting Shane, but by giving up on himself.

The silence stretched, filled with the ghostly echoes of his newfound knowledge Shane looked at the monster who seemed to care about him, who had saved him by becoming irrevocably damned, and felt the world he knew fracture into impossible pieces. There was no map for this. There was only the devastating, undeniable truth lying between them, and the long, uncertain road ahead that they would now have to walk alone.

The silence after Shane’s whispered accusation- You’re a monster- wasn’t empty. It was filled with the ghost-images of everything Ilya had just described: the silent, red-lit footage, the pulsing dot on a map, the crunch of bone under his hands, the roar of flame. Ilya absorbed the label, his expression not defiant, but accepting. It was the verdict he’d been waiting for.

“Da,” he agreed, his voice hollow. “I am.”

He took a slow, deliberate step further away from the bed, increasing the distance he knew Shane needed. His gaze, however, remained locked on Shane’s face, memorizing the pale, shocked planes of it one last time.

“I am more sorry than I can say,” Ilya said, the admission dragged from a place of profound shame. “You disappeared, and I... I sat there. Angry. Not because you denied me something. But because you took yourself away. And I had let you become... necessary.”

He shook his head, a short, sharp motion, as if trying to dislodge the feeling. “It is a sickness. I know this. To watch a man build a life and want to burn it down just to be the only light left in the dark. To see you with your friends, with your family, with her... and feel it like a betrayal. That is not love. That is a poison.”

He finally broke eye contact, looking down at his own scarred, bloody hands. “But it is the only thing I have. So I will name it, for you, so you have the truth of that, too.” He lifted his eyes again, and they were blazing with a terrible, clear intensity. “I am in love with you, Shane Hollander. I have been, I think, from the moment you looked at me in that alley and did not look away. And it is the worst thing that has ever happened to either of us.”

The confession landed not as a romance, but as a catastrophe. It explained everything- the obsession, the violence, the utter ruin of boundaries. It was the diagnosis for the disease.

“My love is not gentle,” Ilya continued, his voice dropping to a raw whisper. “It is not safe. It is trackers and cameras and fire. It is a bite to drag you back from a nightmare I helped create. You deserve...” He faltered, a crack in the stone facade. “You deserve gentle. You deserve safe. You deserve to build your house by the lake and never wonder who is watching from the trees.”

He took a final, shuddering breath, his decision solidifying. “So I will do the only good thing I have ever done for you. I will leave. If that is what you wish- and it must be, it is the only sane wish- I will go. The story for the police is set. You will never see me again. You will never hear from me. I will be a ghost. A bad dream. And you... you will live. You will be clear of me.”

He was offering the ultimate surrender. Not just of his presence, but of his all-consuming need. It was the proof Shane had never dared to ask for: that Ilya could choose Shane’s happiness over his own desperate need to possess him. The cost was the obliteration of his own heart.

Ilya waited, standing perfectly still in the sterile light, for Shane to speak the words that would banish him. The silence stretched, as heavy and charged as it had been in the arena rafters, a lifetime ago. In it lay the splintered remains of two lives, and the impossible weight of a love that could only ever be expressed through confession and retreat.

The silence after Ilya’s confession was a living thing, thick with the unspeakable. He had laid his monstrous heart on the sterile hotel bedspread, and now he waited for Shane to decide its fate. The omega was pale, his fingers still absently tracing the bite on his neck, his eyes wide with a horror too complex for tears. He didn't speak. He just stared, as if Ilya were a equation he could no longer solve.

The need to flee the room, to give Shane space from his contaminating presence, became a physical pressure in Ilya's chest. He gave a stiff, shallow nod, a wordless acknowledgment of the pause, and turned toward the glass door leading to the small, concrete hotel balcony.

The cold air outside was a slap. He welcomed it. He fumbled automatically in his pocket for his cigarettes, his fingers finding the crumpled pack. He pulled one out, placed it between his lips, and then froze. His lighter was gone. Lost in the fight, in the fire. A petty, frustrating detail that somehow encapsulated the entire, spiraling disaster.

Worse than its absence was the thought of the smell. Bringing the stink of smoke back into that room, onto his clothes, near him... it was unthinkable. He removed the cigarette, crushing it in his fist, letting the shredded tobacco fall from his fingers like black snow onto the balcony floor.

That's when he finally registered the persistent, insect-like buzz coming from his other pocket.

He pulled out his phone. The screen was a disaster zone. Dozens of notifications from his encrypted messaging app, all from the security team. Missed calls. Texts marked 'URGENT'.

Status?

Team requesting instructions.

Subject's location static at unknown residential. Proceed?

Client, please advise.

The messages spanned hours. From when he was crashing through the window. From when he was driving, Shane trembling beside him. From when he was holding a flame to a curtain.

Fucking. Idiots.

A cold, clean fury, entirely different from the chaotic self-loathing he'd felt in front of Shane, iced through his veins. This was a professional fury. He had paid for a service- perfection, omniscience, protection- and they had delivered catastrophic failure. His Omega had been taken, had been in that house for days, while they sent polite texts asking for instructions.

His thumb moved with violent precision. He selected the entire team- the lead, the drivers, the cyber specialists, the physical detail that had been meant to watch from a distance.

Ilya: Group call. Five minutes. Be ready to explain your continued existence.

He leaned against the cold railing, staring at the drab hotel parking lot without seeing it. The five minutes passed. He connected the call, putting it on speaker, saying nothing at first. He could hear the faint, digital rustle of several men waiting, the subtle clearing of a throat.

"Report," Ilya said, his voice not loud, but flat and devoid of all humanity. It was the voice of a glacier calving.

"Sir," the lead operative, Kieran, began, his tone cautiously professional. "We lost visual on the subject after he entered the parking structure at the hospital. We had a man en route, but by the time he arrived, the subject's vehicle was gone, and our access to the tracker's GPS was experiencing intermittent lag, which we were diagnosing- "

"You lost him." Ilya interrupted, each word a chip of ice. "You lost him, and you were diagnosing lag. While he was being taken. While he was tied to a bed. While a man was injecting him with drugs to force a heat."

A stunned silence crackled through the line. "Sir, we had no indication of a direct threat at that location. The prior pattern indicated a fan, not a violent abduction. Our mandate was observation and discreet intervention if the subject appeared distressed, not a full tactical- "

“Your mandate,” Ilya snarled, the calm shattering, “was to ensure he came to no harm. You failed. Your failure is the only reason I had to look at a screen and see his heart rate at one hundred and fifty. Your failure is the only reason I had to put my teeth in his neck to bring him back from a shock your incompetence allowed to happen.”

He could hear their breathing, tense and careful now. They were hearing it- the barely-leashed violence, the promise of ruin in his tone. It was the same tone he’d used in a dark alley with another man who’d touched what was his, just before the first bone broke.

“This is a breach of contract,” Ilya stated, the legal term sounding like a death sentence. “A total, catastrophic breach. You are all terminated. As of this moment.”

“Mr. Rozanov,” another voice, the legal liaison for the firm, cut in. “There are protocols. An investigation into the lapse. We can provide a full debrief and reassign- ”

“You will provide nothing,” Ilya said, his voice dropping back to that terrifying, calm register. “You will do exactly two things. First, you will handle the police inquiry. You will be the ‘credible witnesses.’ You will say you were hired for protective surveillance, you tracked him, you intervened, you found the assailant deceased in an accidental fire. You will stick to this story, and you will make it hold. This is not a request. This is the price.”

He let that hang, imagining their faces, the calculation going on in their heads- the size of his wallet versus the size of the trouble he represented.

“And the second thing?” Kieran asked, his voice tight.

“The second thing,” Ilya said softly, “is you will forget my name, my face, and his. You will dissolve whatever records you have. You will take the payment for this final job and you will vanish. Because if I ever hear a whisper, a rumor, a single line of data that suggests you have spoken of him, of me, or of this... I will not sue you. I will find you. And I will show you what a real breach looks like.”

The line was dead silent. The threat wasn’t generic. It was specific, personal, and utterly believable. They had seen his file. They knew what he was capable of when focused.

“Do we have understanding?” Ilya asked.

A chorus of tight, affirmative grunts came down the line.

“Good.” He ended the call.

He stood on the balcony for another minute, the cold seeping into his bones. The rage had burned off, leaving behind the familiar, barren wasteland. He had just fired the last system of control he had over Shane’s world. All the cameras, the trackers, the men in shadows- gone. By his own hand.

He had nothing left now. No way to watch. No way to know. Only the memory of a confession, and the crushing weight of a promise to walk away.

He slid the phone back into his pocket. Below, a car pulled in, its headlights sweeping across the asphalt. A normal person, with a normal life. He turned his back on it, and on the shredded cigarette at his feet, and went inside to face the silence he had created.

The door clicked shut behind David and Yuna Hollander, leaving the hotel room submerged in a silence that felt heavier than before. Ilya stood for a moment, his back to the bed, listening to the faint murmur of their voices in the hallway as they spoke with the league representatives. He had given them the bones of the story- the hired security, the tragic fire, the retrieval. He had told them to release a statement asking for privacy, to cite trauma, to build a wall of quiet around their son. They had agreed, their faces aged a decade in a night, because the alternative was unthinkable.

Now, there was only this.

He turned. Shane was awake, propped against the pillows, watching him. The awful, glazed vacancy was gone, replaced by an exhaustion so deep it seemed etched into his bones. His fingers still rested lightly against the bandage on his neck.

Ilya crossed the room slowly, giving Shane every chance to tell him to stop, to leave. Shane said nothing. He just watched, his eyes tracking Ilya's movement with the wary focus of someone observing a predator they're not sure has been fully tranquilized.

Ilya didn't sit on the bed. He pulled the stiff hotel desk chair closer, the legs scraping softly on the carpet. He sat, the distance between them still careful, respectful. Then, slowly, he leaned forward. He didn't reach for Shane's hand, but he bowed his head, letting his forehead come to rest gently on the back of Shane's wrist where it lay on the blanket. It was a gesture of utter defeat. A supplication.

He stayed like that, breathing in the scent of hospital soap and underlying distress, for one long minute. He felt the faint, quick pulse under his skin.

When he finally sat back up, his own mask was gone. He looked stripped bare, all the sharp edges of his arrogance and control sanded down by guilt and grief. "I should go," he said, his voice rough. "I'll make sure you don't have anything to worry about. The story will hold. The people who were supposed to be watching you... they will tell it. And then they will forget you ever existed."

Shane's throat worked. He opened his mouth, but no sound came out. His eyes were a storm of conflict- fear, anger, a residual, humiliating gratitude, and beneath it all, that same confused pull that had haunted him since an elevator in Boston. He looked, Ilya thought with a pang, exactly as he had in the arena rafters: scared, and heartbreakingly young.

Seeing the struggle, Ilya continued, his voice dropping to something barely above a whisper. "The bite... it will fade. In a few weeks, you won't feel it. But for now..." He paused, choosing his words with a painful care he'd never used before. "We're linked, Shane. Biologically. It won't change anything about you. Your will is your own. But it means... if you are ever in real danger, if you are ever terrified like that again... a part of me will know. And I will come."

He wasn't offering it as a threat, or a claim. He was stating it as a bleak, physiological fact. A final, twisted piece of safety net he'd woven from his own violation. "You don't ever have to call. You don't have to think of me. But if you need me... I'll be there."

He stood then, the chair pushing back. This was the hardest thing he had ever done- harder than any check, any fight, any lonely, obsessive night. He was walking away from the only thing that had ever made his chaotic, violent life make sense. He was choosing Shane's peace over his own desperate need, and the cost was a hollowing out of his entire world.

He gave Shane one last, long look, trying to memorize the exact shade of his eyes in the gray morning light, the curve of his jaw, the way his hair fell across his forehead. He didn't say goodbye. He just nodded, a final, silent acknowledgment.

Then he turned and walked to the door. He didn't look back as he opened it and stepped into the hallway, where the muffled sounds of a normal world continued, oblivious to the quiet catastrophe left behind in room 214. The door sighed shut, sealing the silence.

Alone, Shane finally let out a shaky breath. His hand lifted again to his neck. He didn't feel owned. He felt... anchored, by something dark and deep and terrifyingly permanent. The monster was gone, leaving behind only the echo of a promise and the ghost of a touch on his wrist. The fight was over. And for the first time, the silence that followed was entirely his own.

The detective's visit the next morning was a blur of muted voices and sterile questions, conducted in the quiet sitting area of his parents' living room. Two officers in plain clothes, a man and a woman, their expressions professionally sympathetic but their eyes missing nothing. Shane sat wrapped in one of his mother's softest blankets, his father a solid, silent presence beside him on the couch.

They spoke of "credible witnesses" and "protective surveillance." They mentioned a fire, an "unfortunate demise" of the suspect, and a swift extraction. They used phrases like "trauma-informed approach" and "respect for privacy." They did not ask Shane to recount what happened in the house. They said the physical evidence and the witnesses' statements were clear. They were there, they said, primarily to assure him the case was being handled with discretion and to see if he could confirm or add to the timeline they had.

Shane answered in monosyllables. Yes, he'd been in the parking structure. No, he didn't remember the attack. Yes, he remembered waking up in the... the place. He stopped there, his throat closing. The female detective gently steered away, saying it was enough. They left their cards, urged him to contact a victim's advocate, and departed with solemn nods. The whole encounter felt like a play performed for an audience of one, where everyone knew their lines except him. He was just a prop.

Back in the car to his parents' house, the numbness that had protected him began to crack at the edges. The world outside the window was too bright, too sharp. Every pedestrian was a potential threat; every slowing car made his breath hitch. He kept his hand in his pocket, fingers clenched around his new, sterile phone.

At the house, the dam broke in the form of his old smartphone, now plugged in on the kitchen counter. It lit up like a strobe light, buzzing incessantly with a backlog of frantic notifications. Missed calls. Texts. Dozens of them. From the team group chat, from individual numbers, a torrent of Where are you? and Saw the news, call me and Holy shit, Shane.

He stared at it, paralyzed. His mother, seeing his face, silently unplugged it and took it away. "Later," she said softly.

But his new phone started next. Rose's name flashed on the screen. He answered, his "hello" a dry croak.

The sound on the other end was immediate, wrenching sobs. "Shane. Oh my god, Shane. Your dad just texted me. I've been out of my mind. The news... they said 'missing' and then they said 'found' but they wouldn't say anything else and I thought- " She broke off, crying too hard to speak.

The raw sound of her fear was a spike through his numbness. "I'm okay, Rose," he said, the automatic lie. "I'm at my parents'. I'm safe."

"I'm coming over," she said, her voice firming through the tears. "I'm getting on a plane. I don't care about the shoot."

“No,” he said, too quickly, then softened it. “Not... not yet. Please. I just... I need a minute. It’s a lot.” The thought of her seeing him like this, of having to perform any version of himself, was exhausting.

She heard the absolute truth in his fatigue. “Okay,” she whispered, her voice small. “Okay. But you call me. Any time. Promise me.”

“I promise.”

He spent the next hour doing the same with others. Jackie, her voice uncharacteristically solemn. JJ, awkward and sincere. Teammate after teammate, their concern a well-meaning wave that threatened to pull him under. He begged off visits, citing doctor’s orders for rest, the need for quiet. He could hear their confusion, their worry, but he couldn’t muster the energy to soothe them.

Finally, his phone buzzed with a call from Hayden. He answered, bracing for more emotion.

“Hollander.” Hayden’s voice was its usual flat, familiar bark, but there was an unfamiliar tension underneath. No hysterics. No tears. Just a heavy pause. “You alive?”

“Unfortunately,” Shane murmured, the old, dark joke falling from his lips automatically. He stared at the ceiling of his childhood bedroom.

Hayden let out a short, sharp breath that wasn’t quite a laugh. “Okay.” Another pause. “You don’t want us there.”

“I can’t... I just can’t right now, Hay.”

“I know.” Hayden’s acceptance was a relief. “But I’m not ‘us’. I’m me. And I’m coming over tomorrow. I’m not asking. I’m bringing shitty pizza and we’re not talking about any of it unless you want to. But I’m coming.”

Shane closed his eyes. He wanted to refuse. To build the wall higher. But the simple, stubborn declaration was a tether to a life that existed before the darkness, a life that felt a million miles away. Hayden wouldn't tiptoe. He wouldn't make him relive it. He'd just... be there.

"Okay," Shane whispered, the fight draining out of him.

"Okay," Hayden echoed. "Tomorrow. Don't do anything stupid before then."

The call ended. Shane let the phone drop to the bedspread. The silence in the room was different now. Not just the silence of shock, but the quiet before a connection. He brought his hand up, his fingertips finding the raised, tender skin beneath the bandage on his neck. The phantom echo of the bite seemed to pulse in time with his heartbeat, a dark anchor in the turbulent sea of his thoughts. It was a violation, a claim, a medical intervention, and the only reason he was here to feel the sun through his bedroom window. The confusion of it was a weight he couldn't begin to lift.

He was home. He was safe. And he had never felt more completely, and utterly, alone.

The week that followed was a study in quiet, desperate normalcy. Shane moved through his parents' house like a careful ghost, trying to inhabit the spaces of his old life. Rose flew in for two days, a whirlwind of gentle concern and determined distraction. They watched bad movies, she told him outrageous stories from her set, and she held him when he woke gasping from nightmares that featured not Hill's face, but the feel of zip-ties and the smell of smoke. She was a balm, but even in the middle of her laughter, Shane would catch himself staring into the middle distance, his mind drifting down a dark corridor to a sterile hotel room and a confession spoken in a shattered voice.

Hayden came, as promised, with truly terrible pizza. He didn't ask questions. He talked about line combinations, complained about the coach's new drills, and argued passionately about whether a certain teammate's new dog was ugly or "artistically challenged." His normalcy was a different kind of anchor- heavy, uncomplicated, and real. But when he left, the silence he left behind seemed to ring with everything unsaid, and Shane's thoughts, like water finding the lowest point, always seeped back to Ilya.

It was a constant, low-grade hum beneath everything. In the shower, he'd trace the fading mark on his neck- the skin still slightly raised, tender, a physical monument to his rescue and his violation. We're linked, Shane. The words replayed in his head, not as a threat, but as a terrifying, undeniable fact. He'd feel a phantom warmth there sometimes, a faint, cellular-level awareness that had nothing to do with his own body. It was maddening.

He told himself his curiosity was clinical. Practical. Ilya had said the bite wasn't a bond, that it would fade. Shane needed to verify that, to understand the mechanism, to reclaim some sense of agency over the strange, new quietude in his own biology. The heat that Hill's drugs had tried to force had receded, leaving a strange, hollow calm in its wake. It didn't feel natural. It felt like the stillness after a battle, and he was terrified of what might emerge from the smoke.

So, one afternoon when his mother was heading to the bookstore, he asked her, his voice deliberately casual, "Could you pick up a couple of books for me? About Omega biology. The advanced stuff, not the basic health pamphlets."

Yuna had paused, her keys in hand, her eyes searching his face with a mother's painful acuity. She saw the request for what it was: not just curiosity, but a need for weapons in a war he didn't fully understand. She nodded, squeezing his shoulder. "Of course, sweetie."

The books arrived, dense academic texts with titles like Endocrinological Pathways in Omega Presentation and The Neurochemical Basis of Dynamic Bonds. He hid them in his bedroom, and when the house was quiet, he would pore over them, his finger tracing complex diagrams of hormone cascades and receptor sites. He read about temporary bio-chemical links formed under extreme duress, sometimes used in historical medical contexts to treat severe psychic shock. He read about how they mimicked, for a short time, the channels of a true bond, allowing for a stabilizing transfer of neurological calm from an Alpha to an Omega in crisis. He read that they faded as the exogenous hormones metabolized, leaving no permanent structural change.

Ilya had told him the truth.

The relief that came with the confirmation was profound, and immediately followed by a deeper, more confusing ache. It meant the tether would dissolve. The faint, warm awareness on his neck would vanish. He would be truly, completely alone again. The part of him that had been secretly soothed by that invisible thread- the part that had, in the darkest hours, clung to the promise if you ever need me... I'll be there - felt suddenly bereft.

One night, near dawn, he found himself holding his phone, Ilya's number pulled up on the screen. His thumb hovered over the call button. He didn't want to confess anything. He didn't want to rehash the horror. He just... wanted to hear his voice. He wanted to know if Ilya was eating, if he was sleeping, if the hollow look in his eyes had changed. He wanted to tell him about the stupid pizza, about Rose's terrible impression of her director, about the fact that he now understood the difference between a kappa-opioid receptor and a delta-opioid receptor.

The impulse was so strong it was a physical pull, a low, warm shudder in his chest, frighteningly similar to the feeling described in his own past- his body and mind settled when Rozanov reached for him. He hated it. He hated how the silence now felt like a punishment of his own making.

But he thought of the cameras, the tracker, the fire. He thought of the monster who loved him. He thought of the man who had walked away to give him peace.

His thumb trembled.

He locked the phone, placed it face down on the nightstand, and rolled over, staring at the wall. The ghost of the bite pulsed on his neck, a fading star in his personal darkness. He had his answers. He had his safety. He had a life to rebuild, free of obsession.

And the hollow space inside him, where the chaos had been, now echoed with a new, more terrifying silence: the sound of his own choice, and the profound, lonely cost of the peace he had demanded.

The quiet in the new house had become a physical presence. It wasn't the peaceful quiet Shane had imagined when he'd pored over the blueprints. It was a heavy, waiting silence, and in it, every thought he'd been running from finally caught up to him.

He missed hockey. The brutal, simple clarity of the ice was a language he understood, and its absence left him adrift. But that wasn't the core of the hollow feeling.

He missed Ilya.

The admission, when it finally broke through the wall of denial he'd been maintaining, was so simple it was devastating. He missed the intensity, the unnerving focus, the way his own chaotic mind would settle into a single, resonant frequency when Ilya was near. He missed the conflict, the electricity, the terrible, beautiful sense of being seen in a way that was as frightening as it was addictive. Ilya had done the one thing he'd promised: he'd left him alone. The silence was absolute. And it was unbearable.

He couldn't carry it by himself anymore. The secret of what he was, and the darker, tangled secret of what had happened, was a weight threatening to crack his spine. He needed his people. Not to fix it- no one could- but to simply know .

He called them. Scott and Kip, steady and reliable. Hayden and Jackie, loud and fiercely loyal. JJ, kind-hearted and solid. And Rose, who flew back in the moment he asked, no questions. He didn't give details over the phone. Just, "I need to tell you all something. Can you come?"

They gathered in the great room of the new house, the space still echoing and sparse, the lake a gray mirror through the oversized windows. Shane sat on the large, low sofa, Rose immediately taking a seat beside him and threading her fingers through his, a silent anchor.

He looked at their faces- concerned, curious, patient. His team. His family.

"I'm an Omega."

The words left his mouth, plain and unadorned. For a second, there was only the sound of the wind outside.

Then, reactions rippled through the room.

Hayden's eyebrows shot up, his mouth falling open slightly. "No shit," he breathed, not in disgust, but in pure, stunned surprise. He blinked, then gave a sharp, accepting nod. "Okay. Okay, yeah. That... actually explains some things."

JJ looked shocked, his kind eyes wide, but he recovered quickly, his expression softening into one of unwavering support. "However you are, man, you're our captain. That doesn't change anything."

Kip, ever pragmatic, leaned forward, his mind already working. "The suppressants? The patches? "

"Kip," Scott Hunter said, his voice calm, cutting through the practical spiral. He hadn't looked surprised at all. His gaze on Shane was steady, understanding. "Let him talk."

Shane's eyes met Scott's, and he saw it there- the quiet suspicion, now confirmed. Jackie, perched on the arm of an armchair, nodded slowly. "I had a feeling," she said softly, her usual dramatics absent, replaced by a deep empathy. "The way you'd sometimes get... quiet in a different way. The carefulness. It makes sense."

The relief that washed over Shane was so potent it made his eyes burn. There was no horror. No rejection. Just a reshuffling of their understanding of him, an adjustment made with love.

"There's more," Shane said, his voice thickening. Rose squeezed his hand. He didn't give them the graphic details of the kidnapping- that was a darkness he couldn't relive yet. But he told them about the stalker, the threat, the reason for his sudden "injury" and withdrawal. He told them he'd been found, that it was over, but that the aftermath... was complicated.

They listened, a protective circle of silence around his halting words. When he finished, no one demanded the parts he'd left out. No one asked for the name of who'd found him. They simply absorbed the truth of his trauma.

The rest of the day was spent in a gentle, supportive orbit around him. Hayden and JJ commandeered the kitchen, arguing amiably over how to make a grilled cheese. Kip and Scott studied the cabin's unfinished deck, talking in low tones about structural supports, giving him space. Jackie and Rose flanked him on the couch, their presence a warm, wordless comfort.

They could all see it- the other thing haunting him, the shadow behind his eyes that had nothing to do with Hill and everything to do with a choice he'd made in a hotel room. They gave him the grace not to push. They surrounded him with a normalcy that felt, for the first time in weeks, not like a performance, but like a possible future.

As the afternoon light faded, painting the lake in shades of gold and violet, Shane sat amidst his friends, the secret no longer a stone in his throat. The deeper truth, the one about the missing piece, the one named Ilya, remained unspoken. But it was held now, in the quiet understanding of the people who loved him. He was not alone. And for now, that was enough to make the waiting silence in the beautiful, empty house feel a little less vast.

The morning after the gathering dawned gray and quiet. The good energy from his friends had lingered, a warm echo in the empty rooms, but as the hours ticked by, the silence seeped back in, colder and more personal. Shane was mechanically wiping down the already-clean kitchen counter when the doorbell rang.

It was Scott. Alone. He held a paper bag from a local salad place and lifted it in a silent offering. "Figured you could use something that isn't grilled cheese," he said, his voice its usual steady rumble.

Shane let him in, the scent of roast chicken cutting through the sterile new-house smell. They settled in the great room, the vast windows framing the moody, cloud-swept lake. For a while, they just sat, eating, the comfortable silence between them more soothing than any conversation could have been.

Finally, Scott brushed crumbs from his hands and leaned back, his gaze thoughtful as he watched Shane. "You held it together yesterday. For them."

Shane shrugged, looking out at the water. "They needed to know."

“They did. And you told them what they needed. Now,” Scott said, his tone shifting into something quieter, more deliberate. “What do you need?”

It was the same tone Shane remembered from his old apartment, months ago, when Scott had seen a deleted number and chosen not to push because something in Shane had looked too fragile. Shane. Not ‘kiddo,’ not teasing. Just his name, a hand gently preventing a door from slamming shut.

Shane’s throat tightened. He focused on a sailboat in the distance, a tiny speck of white against the iron-gray water. “I don’t know,” he admitted, the truth feeling both terrifying and relieving. “I feel... untethered. The game’s gone. The routine. And the quiet...” He trailed off, unable to articulate the shape of the Ilya-shaped silence that filled it.

Scott nodded, as if he’d expected this. “When Kip first presented,” he began, his voice soft, “he was a mess. Not scared, exactly. Just... lost. The world suddenly had a new set of rules for him he hadn’t agreed to. He’d lock himself in his art studio for days, not talking, just painting things. Drove me crazy with worry.”

Shane glanced at him. Scott rarely spoke this personally.

“I learned I couldn’t pull him out. I just had to make sure he knew I was outside the door. That when he was ready, I’d be there with terrible coffee and a worse joke.” Scott met his eyes. “So that’s what I’m doing. I’m outside the door, Shane. Whatever that door is for you right now. You don’t have to tell me what’s on the other side. But I’m here. For anything. A bad coffee. A distraction. Someone to sit in the quiet with you.”

The offer was so vast, so unconditional, it was almost overwhelming. “Why?” Shane heard himself ask, the word raw. “You have your own team, your family...”

A shadow passed over Scott’s face, deep and old. He looked down at his hands, calloused and capable, for a long moment. When he spoke again, his voice was thicker.

“You remind me of my brother. My little brother, Eli.”

Shane went completely still. Scott had never mentioned a brother.

“He was an Omega too,” Scott continued, the words clearly costing him. “Brilliant, funny. Quiet, like you. Felt everything too deeply. The world was... a lot for him. We lost him a long time ago. Illness.” He cleared his throat, mastering the emotion back into its usual steady container. “When I first met you, saw that same quiet intensity, that same stubborn way of trying to handle everything yourself... it hit a nerve. A good one. So, yeah. I’m here. Partly for you, because you’re my friend. And partly,” he said, looking up with a sad, honest smile, “because I didn’t get to be there enough for him. Let me be here for you.”

Tears pricked hotly behind Shane’s eyes. He looked away, blinking rapidly at the lake. The confession wasn’t a burden; it was a key, explaining the depth of Scott’s unwavering, paternal protectiveness. It wasn’t pity. It was kinship.

“I don’t know how to fix it,” Shane whispered, confessing to the window, to the memory of a bite mark, to the haunting absence of a certain chaotic presence.

“You don’t have to fix it today,” Scott said, his voice firm again, grounding. “You just have to get through today. And I’ll be here for that. And tomorrow, if you need it, I’ll be here for that too.”

The simple, monumental promise settled in the room, warmer than the sunlight that finally broke through the clouds, streaking the lake with gold. Shane didn’t have the words. He just gave a slow, shaky nod.

Scott leaned forward, clapping him once, firmly, on the knee- a touch that was solid and comforting, not an intrusion. “Good. Now, I saw the deck out there. The deck out there,” Scott finished, nodding toward the window. “The supports look solid, but the railing spacing’s off code. Could be a hazard. You want a second pair of eyes on it?”

It was such a Scott offer. Not “let me fix it for you” or “you should deal with this.” Just a simple, practical observation and the offer of company. A problem they could solve together, with their hands, in the clear, cold air. No talking required, unless Shane wanted to.

Shane looked from the sprawling, half-finished deck to Scott's calm, expectant face. The tightness in his chest, the one that had been there since he woke up in the hotel room, eased a fraction. It wasn't gone. The silence still had a name, and the ghost of a bite still pulsed on his neck. But for the first time, the silence around him wasn't empty. It was held by someone who asked for nothing in return but the chance to stand beside him.

"Yeah," Shane said, his voice rough. "Yeah, I'd like that."

Scott just nodded, as if it was settled. He finished his coffee in one last swallow and stood, gathering their plates. "Grab your coat. It's colder than it looks."

As Shane moved to get his jacket, the memory from the reference file flickered through his mind- missed the attention, missed being noticed. Missed the strange certainty of someone remembering small things about him without being asked. That was Ilya's terrifying, all-consuming brand of attention.

This was different. This was Scott noticing the deck railing. Not because he was cataloging Shane's vulnerabilities, but because he cared about his safety. It was attention without possession. Care without a price tag.

Outside, the lake air was bracing, sharp with the scent of pine and wet earth. Scott fetched a tape measure and level from his truck, and they walked the perimeter of the deck in comfortable silence, Scott pointing out where the balusters were too far apart, where a post needed shimming.

"See here?" Scott said, crouching down to point at a joint. "The beam's strong, but the fastener's already working loose. It's a small thing now. Leave it, it becomes a big thing later."

Shane crouched beside him, the cold of the wood seeping through his jeans. He understood Scott wasn't just talking about the deck. He was talking about the quiet, about the things Shane was locking away. The small, working-loose fasteners of trauma and confusion.

"I don't know how to tighten it," Shane admitted quietly, staring at the offending bolt.

They worked for an hour, Scott making adjustments, Shane following his instructions, holding boards steady, fetching tools. The physical labor was a relief- a clear, finite task with a visible result. As they secured the last section of railing, Scott leaned back, surveying their work.

"Solid," he pronounced. "Won't give way on you now."

They stood side by side, looking out at the darkening lake. The wind had picked up, chopping the water into little gray peaks.

"Thanks, Scott," Shane said. The words felt inadequate for the gift of the afternoon- the normalcy, the lack of pressure, the simple, sturdy presence.

Scott clapped a heavy, warm hand on his shoulder and left it there. "Anytime, kid. I mean it." He squeezed once, then let go, turning to pack his tools. "You're not alone in this. However it looks. However messy it gets. You've got people. You just have to let us stand on the deck with you."

Shane watched him go, tail lights disappearing down the long driveway. The house was still quiet. The silence still had its contours, its shadows. But the deck under his feet felt steady. And for the first time, standing on it didn't feel like standing on the edge of an abyss. It felt like standing on something that had just been reinforced, something that could bear the weight of whatever came next.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you too all who've stuck with this story. Seriously. Every comment, review, theory, keyboard smash, threat against Ilya, and emotional breakdown has been greatly appreciated.

I know this chapter answers a lot of questions/raise more. Shane finally has the full picture now. No missing pieces. No misunderstandings. No excuses.

The hardest part is that the truth doesn't make anything simpler.

For everyone who has been asking how Shane could ever forgive Ilya, or whether he even should: we're finally entering the part of the story where those questions matter.

And for everyone currently staring at this chapter thinking "Jesus Christ, Ilya."

...same.

See you in Chapter 21. ❤️😬

Chapter 21: Chapter 21

Chapter Summary

Quick one before a really really really good chapter lol.
Thank you to my beta reader-you're a doll.

As always, thank you for the comments, reviews, emotional support, emotional damage, and for collectively deciding that these two need approximately seventeen therapists between them. ❤️

Chapter Notes

The scar on Shane's neck had faded to a faint pale line.

Most days he forgot it was there, almost most days. The police investigation had ended exactly the way everyone promised it would. Two detectives had sat across from him in his parents' living room for less than ten minutes. They'd asked gentle questions. They'd confirmed timelines. They'd assured him that Hill was dead, that the case was closed, and that victim services remained available should he need them.

Then they had left, just like that. No lengthy testimony, no court appearances.

No reporters waiting outside. No public disclosure that Shane Hollander was an Omega. That he had been kidnapped by an old teammate.

The story released to the media had been simple enough. A stalker. An abduction. A private security team locating him before local authorities arrived. The suspect dead in a house fire before police could take him into custody.

The league had responded exactly as expected.

Statements. Offers of support, condolences. Every team in the NHL seemed to release some variation of wishing him a speedy recovery.

The attention had lasted for weeks.

Then the season continued, because it always did. The world never stopped turning for long. Shane had taken a month away from hockey.

The coaches hated it. Management hated it. The fans definitely hated it.

He didn't care.

For the first time in his life, hockey hadn't been the most important thing happening to him. His therapist had called it recovery. Shane privately called it trying not to lose his fucking mind.

He spent time at the cabin when it was done.

Time with his parents. Time with his friends. Time pretending everything was normal.

Some days it almost worked. Other days he woke up convinced he could still smell smoke.

Montreal had been a disaster without him. The first week he watched from home. The second week he stopped watching entirely. The third week the head coach called. The fourth week the assistant coach called. By the sixth week, management had started calling personally.

The message remained the same: When are you coming back? When are you ready? How much longer? Shane had ignored most of them.

Eventually he would return. Because despite everything, hockey was still his passion. The ice still made sense. The puck still obeyed physics. The boards still hurt when you hit them.

Simple, predictable.

Unlike the rest of his life.

Rose had become something else entirely during those months.

A bodyguard. A public relations manager. A defense attorney. Occasionally a criminal defendant waiting to happen.

The photographer incident had become infamous among everyone who knew them.

They'd been leaving a restaurant in Vancouver after lunch. A quiet, private place. At least it had been until a photographer exploded out of a parked car and sprinted toward them. The flash went off directly in Shane's face. After everything that happened, the sudden movement triggered pure instinct.

He stumbled backwards. His heart immediately trying to climb into his throat.

Rose had absolutely lost her mind. Shane still remembered it perfectly. "YOU SON OF A BITCH! WHO THE FUCK DO YOU THINK YOU ARE?!"

The photographer had actually taken a step backwards. Unfortunately for him, Rose kept advancing. "YOU ASSHOLE." By that point Shane was pretty sure she intended actual bodily harm.

Two production assistants and a very confused waiter had physically grabbed her before she could make good on the threat.

The photographer fled. Rose spent the next twenty minutes inventing creative new swear words. Shane laughed so hard he nearly cried. It had been the first genuine laugh since the kidnapping.

The memory still made him smile. His phone buzzed. A text from Rose.

Rose Landry- Director is being dramatic again. Send help.

Shane snorted.

Then typed.

Shane- Thoughts and prayers.

Rose Landry- You're dead to me.

His smile lingered for several seconds after the conversation ended. Then slowly faded. Because the quiet always came back eventually.

His eyes drifted toward the television mounted across the room.

SportsCenter.

A NHL highlight package. Boston versus New York.

Shane should have changed the channel.

Instead he watched. Ilya appeared on screen.

The reaction was immediate. Four months later and it still happened. That awful tightening in his chest. The commentators were talking about Boston's recent slump- moreso Ilya Rozanov's slump. About scoring. Their standing in the season, about playoff projections.

But Shane barely heard any of it. He was watching Ilya. Watching the way he moved. The way he skated. The way he carried himself.

Nobody else would have noticed, but Shane did.

He wasn't playing well, not badly when compared to other players, but Rozanov wasn't just another player.

Rozanov was still one of the best players in the world.

But Shane knew what Ilya looked like when he was fully engaged, and this wasn't it.

The fire was missing. The sharpness. The reckless confidence.

The joy.

The screen flashed to another highlight.

Another shift. Another goal that should have happened but didn't.

Shane looked away. His stomach twisted.

For four months, Ilya had kept his promise- no texts, calls, emails.

No surprise appearances.

Nothing. Absolute silence.

Exactly what Shane asked for. Exactly what he deserved. Exactly what he wanted.

So why did it feel so terrible?

His gaze dropped to the phone still resting in his hand. One call.

That was all it would take. Just one call.

How are you?

Are you eating?

Are you sleeping?

Are you okay?

Simple, normal questions.

Questions people asked when they were acquaintances.

Then the memories returned.

The tracker. The cameras. The reports.

The fire. The confession.

The monster.

Shane closed his eyes. The urge disappeared beneath a familiar wave of guilt and confusion.

No. He couldn't. Not yet, maybe not ever. But when he thought of not ever speaking with Rozanov again, his heart broke a little.

Across the television, the game ended.

Boston lost.

Ilya disappeared from the screen.

The silence returned.

A week later, Shane found himself spending more and more time at the Hunters' house.

At first it had been practical. He had been in Boston and Montreal had a few extra days off.

Kip would send him articles about Omega biology, general self help he'd stumbled across while researching his own pregnancy. Occasionally Hayden would appear uninvited and eat all the food in their refrigerator.

The arrangement somehow evolved into a standing invitation. The Hunters had always been welcoming. Now they practically treated him like family, which Shane thrived on.

The house felt... peaceful.

Not quiet - never quiet.

There was always something happening. Scott cooking. Kip painting. The television running somewhere. The dog demanding attention.

Life, actual life.

Not reporters. Not kidnappings. Not hockey.

Just life. It was strangely comforting.

Particularly because Shane had become completely fascinated by Kip. Which was admittedly a weird thing to admit.

But he couldn't help it. The pregnancy fascinated him.

They had just announced it to their group of friends. Everything about it fascinated him.

One afternoon he found himself sitting cross-legged on the couch while Kip worked on sketches for an upcoming project.

The Omega was three months pregnant now.

Far enough along that the changes were starting to be obvious.

Shane watched him absently rub a hand across his stomach while reading something on his tablet.

"You do that a lot."

Kip looked up. "What?"

"The stomach thing."

Kip laughed. "I think I feel flutters, could be gas or something Scott says, but I choose to say flutters."

Shane immediately sat up straighter.

"Seriously?"

"Very seriously." Kip grinned.

Shane stared.

Scott walked into the room carrying coffee. One look at Shane's expression and he started laughing.

"No."

Shane immediately pointed.

"He's being fluttering."

"Yes." Scott snorted.

"That's generally how pregnancy works."

Shane ignored him. His attention remained fixed on Kip.

"Can I-"

He stopped.

Suddenly unsure.

Kip immediately understood. "Oh." A smile spread across his face.

"Yeah. Come here." Shane moved closer, slowly.

As though approaching a wild animal.

Kip was openly laughing now. "You're such a nerd."

"I know." The answer came automatically.

Carefully, Shane placed a hand against the side of Kip's stomach.

Nothing happened.

Then suddenly something shifted beneath his palm.

A distinct movement.

Strong enough to feel.

Shane physically jerked.

"Oh my God."

Scott immediately lost whatever composure he still possessed.

Kip doubled over laughing.

Shane looked genuinely shocked.

"There's actually a baby in there."

The statement only made them laugh harder.

"Shane."

"I know how pregnancy works."

"Clearly."

"I just never...I didn't think you could feel them yet."

He trailed off.

Because the truth was he'd never known any pregnant Omegas personally. "We're men. Our pregnancies usually 'pop out' earlier."

To see the tiny adjustments. The extra pillows. The way Scott automatically moved things out of Kip's path without thinking about it. The way Kip unconsciously leaned into him whenever they stood together. The way Scott's hand always found the small of Kip's back.

Tiny, constant things. The sort of things Shane only noticed because nobody seemed aware they were doing them. That was what fascinated him most.

Not just the pregnancy, but the relationship itself.

The ease of it. The safety.

A few days later he was sitting at their kitchen island while Scott cooked dinner.

Kip was sorting through paint samples nearby.

Neither seemed aware they were having three separate conversations simultaneously.

"...the blue one."

"The blue one is hideous."

"It isn't hideous."

"It looks like a dentist office."

Scott looked over his shoulder.

"It does look like a dentist office."

"You're both wrong."

"We're not."

"You are."

The argument continued for another ten minutes.

Nobody got upset, nobody raised their voice.

Nobody tried to win.

Eventually Kip rolled his eyes.

"Fine. I'll choose something else."

Scott immediately kissed the top of his head.

"Thank you."

Kip swatted him.

Scott looked entirely too pleased about it. Shane watched the interaction quietly. Something uncomfortable settled in his chest.

Not jealousy, exactly. More like grief, because he'd never seen this before. Not growing up. His parents tried their very best, but they were both beta's. It was so different.

Here were an Alpha and an Omega who genuinely liked each other, who respected each other.

Who argued about paint colors and grocery lists and what movie to watch. Who didn't seem trapped by expectations. Scott never tried to control Kip. Kip never seemed afraid of Scott.

The relationship wasn't perfect. But it was healthy. And the realization felt surprisingly painful.

Because every time he watched them together, another thought inevitably followed.

A dangerous one. A stupid one. One he tried very hard not to think. What would Ilya have been like if things had worked out?

The thought appeared more often than Shane wanted. Particularly after being around two healthy, loving alpha and omega relationships.

It didn't excuse anything. Nothing ever would. The tracker had still existed. The cameras still had been there. The lies had been told.

But sometimes Shane would watch Scott quietly helping Kip stand up from the couch.

Or see Kip steal food directly off Scott's plate. Or listen to them bicker about baby names.

And he'd wonder. Not what Ilya had done.

He already knew that.

He wondered who Ilya might have become if someone had taught him love wasn't supposed to feel like possession.

The thought lingered long after he left the Hunters' house.

And later that night, alone in the cabin with rain tapping softly against the windows, Shane found himself staring at his phone again.

Not calling.

Not texting.

Just staring.

Because four months later, he still didn't know which part hurt more.

Everything Ilya had done.

Or the fact that Shane missed him anyway.

Montreal had lost four straight games.

The coaches had stopped pretending they weren't desperate. The media had spent the better part of a month speculating about his return date. Fans had apparently turned his absence into some kind of national emergency.

The pressure should have annoyed him. Instead it mostly made him tired.

He stood in the locker room staring at his stall while his teammates moved around him. The familiar sounds should have felt comforting. Equipment bags hitting the floor. Sticks rattling against lockers. The smell of tape and sweat and sharpened steel.

Home. For most of his life, hockey arenas had felt more like home than actual houses. Today felt different. His equipment sat exactly where he'd left it. His nameplate still hung above the stall. Everything looked normal.

Everything except him. The scar at the back of his neck was hidden beneath his hair now.

The tracker had been removed almost two months ago by a private surgeon. No questions asked.

The procedure itself had been simple. The recovery hadn't been. Every time he touched the small scar he remembered exactly why it had been there.

Exactly who had put it there. "Stop staring at your locker." Hayden dropped onto the bench beside him.

"I wasn't."

"You were."

"I was thinking."

"That's worse."

Shane rolled his eyes. Hayden looked annoyingly pleased with himself.

Across the room JJ appeared carrying two sports drinks.

Without a word he handed one to Shane.

The behavior had become increasingly common.

The kidnapping had apparently activated something in both of them, some deeply buried protective instinct.

For two months neither had allowed Shane to exist unsupervised for very long. It was absurd.

And strangely comforting.

"Do you both have a schedule or something?" Shane asked.

JJ blinked. "What?"

"For watching me."

Hayden immediately pointed. "I have Tuesdays and Thursdays."

JJ nodded. "I've got weekends."

"You're both idiots."

"Correct."

"Very true." Neither looked remotely embarrassed.

Shane found himself smiling despite everything.

The coaches gathered everyone together.

Final instructions.

Last-minute adjustments. Motivational speeches, Shane barely heard any of it.

His pulse was beginning to pick up.

Not panic. Not fear. Something else- anticipation.

He hadn't stepped onto NHL ice in months.

Now here he was, with twenty thousand people watching. The tunnel felt longer than he remembered.

The arena louder. The music bass vibrating throughout his body. The were lights brighter.

As they lined up for introductions, Shane became acutely aware of the neck guard beneath his jersey.

The material rubbed lightly against the healing scar at the back of his neck.

A small irritation, a tiny reminder. The tracker was gone.

But not completely. The scar remained. A permanent reminder hidden beneath his hair.

His hand twitched toward it automatically.

Then stopped.

The arena lights dimmed.

The introductions began.

One player. Then another. Then another. The crowd roared appropriately.

The volume rising and falling. Familiar, predictable.

Then his name was announced last.

For a moment Shane expected the usual reaction.

Applause. Cheering. Nothing unusual.

Instead the entire arena exploded. The sound hit him like a physical force. People were standing. Rows and rows of them. Then entire sections. Then seemingly everyone.

The roar became deafening. Not hockey deafening. Different, warmer. More emotional.

The kind of sound people made when they were genuinely happy someone was alive.

Shane froze. For one stupid second he forgot to skate forward.

The ovation continued. His chest tightened unexpectedly.

The crowd knew. Not everything, of course.

Not the details. Not the Omega secret. Not about Ilya. Not any of it.

But they knew enough. They knew he'd disappeared.

They knew something terrible had happened.

And somehow twenty thousand strangers had decided they were glad he was back.

The realization hit harder than he expected.

Shane lifted a hand.

A small wave.

The crowd somehow got louder.

"Oh, wow."

His voice cracked slightly.

Hayden immediately appeared beside him. "You crying?"

"No."

"You are."

"I'm not."

JJ skated over too. "He definitely is."

"Traitors."

Both looked entirely unapologetic. The ovation finally began to fade.

Slowly.

Reluctantly.

As the game preparations continued.

But the feeling lingered.

A warmth in his chest. A reminder that people cared. Not because he scored goals, Not because he won games.

Because he was Shane. Because he came back. The game itself started normally enough. Montreal looked terrible. They'd made most of their plays off him since his first year and now they would need to find that rhythm again.

Which wasn't surprising.

By the second period Shane had already assisted on one goal and nearly scored another.

The crowd energy had shifted. Hope replacing desperation.

For the first time since returning, hockey felt simple again.

Then during third period, he sat out and his eyes drifted toward the scoreboard.

A standings graphic flashed briefly.

Eastern Conference. Team rankings. Upcoming schedules.

His stomach immediately dropped.

Boston.

The realization hit him before he could stop it. Soon. Very soon. He hadn't looked at the schedule.

Not once, deliberately. Avoidance had seemed easier.

But eventually the season would force the issue.

Sooner or later he would walk into an arena and see Ilya again.

The thought settled heavily in his chest.

Four months.

No calls or texts.

No surprise appearances.

Nothing.

Absolute silence. Exactly what Shane had demanded. Exactly what Ilya had promised.

And now, for the first time, Shane wasn't sure how he felt about it.

"Hey." JJ bumped his shoulder.

"You okay?"

Shane blinked.

The scoreboard had already changed.

The moment passed.

"Yeah." It wasn't entirely a lie.

Hayden appeared on his other side. Neither teammate moved away. Neither questioned him further. They simply remained there, close enough to reach if he needed to. Close enough that if something happened, they would be there immediately.

Protecting him without making a big deal out of it. For the first time since the kidnapping, Shane realized something surprising.

He felt safe.

Not because the danger was gone. Not because the nightmares had stopped. Not because he'd fully healed.

But because he wasn't carrying everything alone anymore.

As play resumed, Hayden shoved him lightly.

"Try not to make us lose five straight."

Shane snorted.

"No promises."

The puck dropped.

The crowd roared.

And for the first time in months, Shane Hollander skated forward instead of looking back.

The win ended a lot of things.

The losing streak.

The endless questions about when Shane was coming back. The tension that had settled over the locker room for weeks. The mood afterward felt lighter than anything Shane had experienced in months.

For the first time since returning, everyone seemed relaxed. Laughing, teasing each other. Actually enjoying themselves. Which was how he found himself cornered by half the team before he'd even finished showering. He'd never been more thankful then now for having Hayden and JJ on his side to give him a warning to cover up.

"We're going out."

Shane immediately shook his head. "No."

"That wasn't a question."

"It should be."

"It wasn't."

Hayden appeared from seemingly nowhere.

"We already decided."

"You decided."

"We decided for you."

"That's worse."

JJ looked entirely too pleased with himself. "Correct."

Shane groaned. The argument continued all the way through getting dressed.

Eventually Jackie arrived, waiting for them while they all finished up getting dressed.

The moment Shane heard she was coming, his resistance weakened considerably.

By the time six more teammates had agreed to join them, the battle was lost.

"Fine." The locker room immediately erupted in cheers.

"Saint Hollander is actually going out with us?"

The silence that followed was immediate.

Shane closed his eyes. "Jesus Christ."

Hayden nearly threw his helmet at Micheals for saying that. "That was unbelievable."

"I hate all of you."

"You're buying appetizers."

"Absolutely not."

They chose a restaurant everyone liked. Nothing fancy. Somewhere they could rent a private room and avoid most of the attention that came with professional hockey players existing in public.

The moment Shane walked inside he realized his teammates had already planned everything.

His chest warmed immediately.

Because his seat was already chosen.

JJ on one side.

Jackie on the other.

Not obvious enough to draw attention. Just close enough, protective. The realization made something ache pleasantly inside his chest. Nobody mentioned it, nobody needed to.

Shane sat down and immediately found himself staring at a phone shoved directly in front of his face.

"Look." Jackie was practically vibrating.

"What am I looking at?"

"Emma."

Shane obediently examined the picture. His favorite tiny human stared back at him. His entire face softened.

"Oh my God."

"I know."

"She's adorable."

"I know."

Shane swiped to the next picture. Then another, and another. By the fifth picture he was smiling so hard his cheeks hurt. The baby was bundled in different outfits. Sleeping. Yawning.

Making strange expressions. Being held by various family members. The photos continued for several minutes. Shane didn't complain once. By the time Jackie finally reclaimed her phone, he immediately demanded more.

Across the table Hayden looked horrified.

"How are you encouraging this?"

"She's adorable."

"She looks exactly the same in every picture."

Jackie gasped.

JJ immediately covered his mouth.

"Careful."

"Thank you," Jackie said.

Hayden looked betrayed.

The conversation dissolved into chaos after that. Menus appeared, food was ordered. Half the table immediately began arguing about appetizers.

Shane focused on reading the menu carefully. It was an old habit. One he'd developed when he decided to seriously go for hockey. Long before suppressants. Long before Ilya.

Making sure there would be something he could actually eat. Counting macros and portion control, clean ingredients. Making sure he wouldn't accidentally spend an evening hungry because everyone else chose differently. The behavior was so automatic he barely noticed himself doing it anymore.

Eventually he settled on something simple.

Easy.

The drinks arrived shortly afterward. Beer for most of the table.

Ginger ale for Shane.

Nobody commented at first. Then Hayden raised an eyebrow.

"That's depressing."

"It's delicious."

"It's soda."

"It is an elite soda."

"Children drink it and we're at a bar."

JJ immediately raised his glass. "To children's soda."

Several players joined in. The toast was ridiculous, Shane laughed anyway.

His ginger ale clinked against their beer bottles.

For a little while he forgot, forgot about the scar. Forgot about therapy appointments and nightmares and police reports. Forgot about everything except the people sitting around him.

His friends, his teammates. His family, in all the ways that mattered.

The realization settled warmly inside his chest.

Then the conversation shifted. Somebody started telling an embarrassing story about a road trip. Someone else brought up an old prank. Laughter erupted around the table.

Shane smiled, listened.

Participated when necessary. But eventually his attention drifted. His phone sat beside his plate. Face up. Screen dark. Every few minutes his eyes found it automatically.

An old habit. One he hadn't quite broken. He wasn't expecting anything, at least that was what he told himself.

Still. His gaze kept returning. The screen remained blank. No texts, no missed calls. No notifications.

Nothing. The emptiness felt strangely loud. Because once upon a time his phone had never stayed quiet for very long. Not when Ilya was involved.

There had always been something. A stupid meme. A picture of curious looking Russian food.

An article neither of them would actually read.

A complaint about a referee, or a teammate. A complaint about a coach.

Mostly complaints, honestly.

The quick phone calls were what Shane missed most.

Five minutes between practices, three minutes walking to a bus, Seven minutes sitting in airports before boarding a flight.

Nothing important, nothing life-changing.

Just...

Hi.

What are you doing?

You're boring.

You're calling me next time.

And somehow an hour would disappear. The realization hit unexpectedly, he missed that.

Not the obsession, or the tracker. Definitely not the surveillance.

Not any of the terrible things that followed.

But he missed Ilya, the actual person. The one he had been getting to know. The laughing, the teasing. The terrible jokes. The way Ilya always sounded pleased simply because Shane answered the phone. The way the larger man would hold him as he tried to catch his breath.

A painful knot settled in his chest. Across the table, laughter erupted again.

Someone had spilled a drink. JJ was being blamed.

Life continued- normal, happy.

Safe.

Shane forced himself back into the conversation. Forced himself to laugh when appropriate. Forced himself to focus on the people actually sitting beside him.

Because Ilya wasn't here. And that wasn't an accident. It was a choice.

A promise, one Ilya had kept for four straight months.

The screen of his phone remained dark.

Shane looked away first. For some reason, that hurt more than he expected.

Game day arrived far too quickly.

For fourteen weeks Shane had known this day was coming. For fourteen weeks he'd successfully avoided thinking about it.

Unfortunately, reality had a way of catching up.

He woke before dawn, before the alarm.

No text message waiting for him. No nightmare. His eyes simply opened and refused to close again.

The hotel room remained dark and silent around him. The digital clock on the bedside table glowed faintly in the darkness.

5:11 AM.

Shane stared at the ceiling for several minutes. Then gave up.

He got up and changed into gym clothes and went for a run before the sun came up.

The run helped, at least a little.

The cold morning air bit at his lungs as he moved through nearly empty streets. His feet pounded against the pavement in a steady rhythm, his breath fogging in front of him. Usually running cleared his head.

Today it didn't.

Every thought somehow circled back to the same place.

Tonight. Tonight he would see Ilya.

Not on television, or in interviews.

Not in highlight reels. In person.

The realization sat heavily in his stomach. By the time he returned to the hotel, sweat soaked through his shirt and his legs felt pleasantly tired.

The team breakfast was waiting downstairs.

Shane made a respectable attempt.

A piece of toast.

Half a banana.

A few bites of eggs.

The food may as well have been cardboard.

Every swallow felt forced.

Eventually Hayden appeared carrying a plate piled high with enough food to feed a small village.

He looked down at Shane's untouched breakfast.

Then looked back up.

"That's pathetic."

"I'm eating."

"You're looking at food."

"I'm trying."

"It isn't."

Hayden immediately stole the rest of Shane's toast.

Shane was too tired to argue.

Which apparently concerned Hayden more than the lack of eating.

The older Alpha narrowed his eyes.

"You okay?"

"Fine."

"Uh huh."

Shane looked away.

Hayden sighed. "Jesus Christ."

"What?"

"You look like you're about to throw up."

"I'm not."

"You absolutely are."

The worst part was that he wasn't entirely wrong. Shane's stomach felt twisted into knots.

Not in fear, not exactly.

Something more complicated. Something worse, because fear would have been easier to understand.

Back in his hotel room he found himself doing something he'd promised not to do.

Searching.

Just a little, just once.

The first interview appeared immediately.

Boston's morning skate.

Ilya standing in front of reporters.

Shane clicked it before he could stop himself.

The video lasted less than three minutes.

That was all it took. His stomach sank, the changes were subtle for anyone who didn't really know the man. Most people wouldn't notice, but Shane did.

Of course he did.

The Ilya on screen looked thinner, paler. The sharp angles of his face more pronounced than before. There were shadows beneath his eyes.

The reporters asked questions.

Ilya answered them. Politely, professionally.

And that alone felt wrong.

Because Ilya hated being polite with reporters.

He was usually sarcastic.

Annoying. Occasionally a complete menace but to gain a laugh.

Half the league's journalists seemed to genuinely enjoy interviewing him because they never knew what would come out of his mouth.

This version didn't joke at all.

Question, answer. No teasing, smirking, rolling his eyes or winking.

Nothing.

Just empty efficiency. Shane clicked another interview.

Then another.

The result remained the same.

The comments underneath were worse, some fans had noticed.

Rozanov seems off this season.

Anyone else think he's lost weight?

Dude looks exhausted.

What happened to his personality?

He's still putting up points but something is wrong.

The old Rozanov would've made fun of that reporter.

Hope he's okay.

Shane closed the video. Then immediately opened another.

Then another. He knew he should be getting his head into tonight's game, but he couldn't stop.

Ninety-five days.

That was how long it had been. Ninety-five days without a text, without a phone call.

Without hearing his voice.

Without seeing him.

Without anything.

Ilya had kept his promise.

Perfectly.

Painfully.

Exactly.

At the time Shane had wanted that. Everything had become too much, he needed distance, the room to think.

So Ilya had given it to him.

Completely. Without complaint or negotiation. Without trying to convince him otherwise. The memory made something ache inside his chest.

Because for years Shane had begged Ilya to respect boundaries.

To listen, to stop pushing. And now that he finally had... Shane hated it.

The realization was deeply unfair. His phone sat on the edge of the desk. Silent, the same way it had been for months. How many times had he picked it up?

How many times had he almost called? Almost texted? Almost done something?

He'd lost count somewhere around week six.

His thumb hovered briefly over the screen.

Then stopped.

No.

Not yet. Maybe not ever. The thought hurt.

Outside his hotel window the city had begun waking up. Cars moving through the streets, people heading to work. A perfectly ordinary day.

For everyone except Shane. Because in less than twelve hours he would walk into an arena. Step onto the ice.

And see Ilya Rozanov for the first time in ninety-five days.

Ninety-five days. Long enough to heal, to recover. Long enough to move on.

Except Shane wasn't entirely sure he'd done any of those things. The thought lingered as he finally stood and headed toward the door.

Game day had arrived.

And whether he was ready or not, so had the rest of his life.

At some point over the past few weeks, Shane became convinced he had Stockholm syndrome.

There was no other explanation to know how much he missed the Alpha.

At least, that was what he told himself as he sat on the edge of the hotel bed scrolling through increasingly questionable articles on his phone.

The search history was embarrassing.

Can victims miss kidnappers?

Can trauma cause attachment?

Stockholm syndrome symptoms.

Can you miss someone who hurt you?

The internet was deeply unhelpful.

One article insisted victims developed positive feelings toward their captors as a survival mechanism. Another argued the entire concept was largely misunderstood and often exaggerated by the media. A third claimed it wasn't even a legitimate diagnosis.

Shane spent twenty minutes reading conflicting opinions before dropping his head back against the wall.

"This is useless." He already knew it was useless. Because none of the articles actually fit.

Chris wasn't the person he missed. Chris made his skin crawl. The room still appeared in his nightmares. The smell of stale air still occasionally made him anxious. That wasn't affection. That was trauma.

The problem was Ilya. And Ilya wasn't the one who kidnapped him. The thought immediately made him groan. Because that wasn't exactly helping his case either. The tracker, the cameras, the surveillance, the lies and manipulation- that was what Ilya had done.

Normal people weren't supposed to miss someone after learning all of that. His therapist would probably have interesting opinions. Shane wasn't interested in hearing them. Instead he found himself staring at another article. Trauma bonding. He clicked it, read half and then closed it.

Opened another. Closed that one too.

None of them felt right.

Because the more he read, the more one uncomfortable truth kept resurfacing. He didn't miss Ilya because of the tracker. He missed him despite the tracker.

Despite everything.

That was the problem. Not the obsession, but the person underneath it.

The idiot who sent him terrible memes at three in the morning. The asshole who called him from airports because he was bored. The jerk who somehow managed to spend thirty minutes complaining about referees without repeating himself, saying that was practicing his English.

The idiot who had made him laugh so hard during one road trip that he'd nearly choked on a carrot. The realization sat heavily in his chest.

God. He missed talking to him. The simple, stupid conversations.

The daily check-ins. The familiarity.

Ninety-five days.

The number felt absurd.

Long enough that Shane should have adjusted, enough that missing him should have faded. Instead it seemed to have gotten worse.

With an annoyed sigh he tossed the phone onto the bed.

"Not Stockholm syndrome."

The words sounded ridiculous spoken aloud.

He wasn't sure whether that made him feel better or worse.

Eventually he forced himself to get ready. The game wasn't going to wait. The first problem appeared almost immediately.

His hair. Shane stared at his reflection in the hotel bathroom mirror. Then frowned, he wet it again. Then frowned harder.

Something about it looked wrong.

He couldn't identify what.

Only that it was wrong.

Five minutes later he was still trying. Ten minutes later he hated everything. By fifteen minutes he was actively considering shaving his head.

His phone buzzed.

JJ: We're about to leave.

Shane froze.

Shane: I need five more minutes?

JJ: Why? You're never late.

A second text followed.

JJ: Are you messing with your hair? Hayden bet me twenty dollars.

Shane: I'm blocking both of you.

JJ: Too late. We're downstairs.

True to their word, neither allowed him to travel alone.

When Shane reached the lobby, Hayden was already waiting beside the entrance.

Coffee in one hand.

Utterly smug expression on his face.

"Hair still fighting back?"

Shane considered violence.

Instead he grabbed his bag.

The ride to the arena felt strangely familiar.

The closer they got, the tighter his stomach became. By the time they arrived, the familiar crowd had already gathered outside.

Reporters. Photographers. Social media teams. Fans.

The usual circus. Camera flashes immediately erupted the moment the players started arriving.

Normally Shane would stop.

Smile.

Answer a few questions. Today he kept walking. Nobody tried to stop him.

A few reporters called his name, but he ignored them.

The arena swallowed him up a few moments later. Inside the locker room he immediately retreated into routine.

Routine was good.

Routine made sense.

Equipment, tape, pads.

Lacing up his skates.

In the same order he had been doing since he was 6 years old.

Structure.

His headphones went in before anyone could interrupt him.

A recorded architecture lecture filled his ears. Something about adaptive reuse of historical buildings. Normally he would have been completely absorbed. Today he retained none of it.

The professor might as well have been speaking another language. Still, the familiar voice helped, grounded him.

The ritual of getting dressed helped even more.

Piece by piece. Everything exactly where it belonged.

Eventually warmups arrived. Shane followed the team onto the ice.

The familiar roar of the crowd washed over him.

His pulse immediately accelerated.

Not because of the game. Because he was in Boston.

Because somewhere out here...His eyes moved automatically.

Casually, hopefully.

He scanned the opposite end of the rink.

Black jerseys.

Black helmets.

Players stretching.

Skating.

Passing pucks.

No Ilya.

Shane frowned. He looked again, still nothing. The absence felt oddly disappointing.

Which was ridiculous.

The entire point of the morning had been anxiety about seeing him.

Now he was disappointed not to.

His brain had officially stopped making sense.

Warmups ended.

Players disappeared back into their respective locker rooms.

The final minutes before puck drop passed in a blur. They were all gathered around the bench and Coach was explaining line adjustments. Special teams, matchups.

Something about Boston's defensive pairings.

Shane was listening for the most part.

Then suddenly he wasn't. A strange sensation crawled down his spine. The feeling of being watched.

The feeling of someone entering a room.

The feeling of awareness.

His attention shifted before he could stop it.

The tunnel entrance.

The opposing bench.

And there.

Ilya.

For one suspended moment everything seemed to stop. The crowd disappeared. The coaches disappeared.

All the noise disappeared. It had been ninety-five days.

Ninety-five days since Shane had last seen him.

The difference was immediately obvious.

The interviews hadn't lied.

Ilya looked unlike himself.

As if four months had aged him years.

At the exact same moment, Ilya looked up. Their eyes met. Neither moved. Neither smiled.

Just looked.

Then someone said something to Ilya. The moment shattered.

Both turned away. The game began. The opening faceoff felt strange.

Because Ilya stood directly across from him. For years that had felt normal. Now it felt impossible. The referee dropped the puck. Shane won it cleanly.

Muscle memory, instinct. The game exploded into motion. For the first several shifts Shane kept waiting. Waiting for the intensity. The aggression. The familiar pressure.

Whenever they played, Ilya usually made his presence known- its what made Shane better himself, having someone matching his skill level. But now he kept waiting.

For a hit. A chirp. A shove into the boards.

Something, anything.

It never came. The realization unsettled him more than he expected.

They crossed paths repeatedly.

Faceoffs.

Defensive coverage.

Line changes.

Ilya remained professional. Focused. Distant.

Once, midway through the first period, Shane carried the puck through center ice expecting the usual challenge.

Instead Ilya peeled away and picked up gave his left wing a chance to get the puck.

The space felt wrong.

The absence felt wrong. Four minutes into the game, Shane scored.

The crowd erupted.

Instinct took over. He celebrated with his teammates. The arena shook beneath the roar.

And before he could stop himself, his eyes found Boston's bench. Found Ilya. For years Shane had always known exactly what expression would be waiting.

Annoyance.

Mock outrage.

Some dramatic eye roll.

A sarcastic gesture.

Something. Anything.

Instead there was nothing. Ilya simply sat there. Expression unreadable. Eyes fixed on the ice. As if the goal hadn't mattered at all. As if Shane hadn't mattered at all. The realization hit far harder than being checked into the boards ever could.

And for the first time all game, Shane wished Ilya would just get angry. The rest of the game only got worse. Not because Boston was winning. Not because Montreal was struggling. Because Shane couldn't stop noticing everything Ilya wasn't doing.

For years, playing against Ilya had been predictable in all the most frustrating ways. If Shane touched the puck, Ilya would somehow appear. If Shane scored, Ilya would have something smart to say about it. If Shane got hit too hard, there would be a retaliatory collision somewhere within the next two shifts. If Shane got pinned against the boards, there was a good chance it was Ilya doing it.

The attention had always been relentless. Exhausting. Annoying.

Comforting, but tonight, it was gone.

Eight minutes into the game Shane scored again.

The away section of the crowd erupted. His teammates nearly tackled him against the glass.

Instinctively, automatically, his eyes found Boston's bench.

Found Ilya.

Nothing.

No eye roll.

No dramatic sigh.

No sarcastic clap.

No exaggerated expression about how lucky Shane had gotten.

Just a blank expression.

The same expression he wore for every other player in the league.

Shane hated it.

The realization unsettled him enough that he missed half of what Hayden was yelling during the celebration.

The game continued.

Shift after shift.

The pattern repeated.

Whenever they shared the ice, Shane found himself waiting.

Waiting for a chirp.

Waiting for a shove.

Waiting for some indication that things between them had ever been different.

Nothing came.

Late in the second period another Boston player drove him hard into the boards.

The hit wasn't dirty.

Just heavy.

The impact rattled through his shoulder and sent a flash of pain up his neck.

The fresh scar where the tracker had been removed burned beneath the collar of his equipment.

Instantly Hayden was there.

JJ appeared immediately afterward.

Several players crowded together.

The usual post-whistle shoving began.

The sort of thing that happened a dozen times every game.

Shane barely noticed.

Because twenty feet away, Ilya had frozen.

For one brief second Shane saw it.

Saw the instinct.

Saw the concern.

Saw Ilya take a half step forward.

Then stop.

The expression vanished.

The moment disappeared.

Ilya turned away.

Skating back toward his position.

Not intervening.

Not checking on him.

Not doing anything.

The realization sat heavily in Shane's stomach for the rest of the game.

This wasn't indifference.

That somehow would have been easier.

This was restraint.

This was Ilya deliberately choosing not to act.

Choosing not to cross boundaries.

Choosing not to give Shane a reason to be angry.

Everything Shane had spent years asking for.

Everything he should have wanted.

Everything he suddenly hated.

By the third period, Montreal was up by two.

The crowd had fully come alive.

Every shift felt faster.

Every hit harder.

The game finally ended with a deafening blast of the horn.

Montreal won.

The arena erupted.

Players poured over the boards.

The crowd stood.

Shane was immediately swallowed by teammates.

Helmets.

Gloves.

Arms around his shoulders.

Celebration.

The sort of victory that felt bigger than the standings.

His first game back.

A win.

A statement.

Eventually the chaos settled.

Players separated.

Equipment was adjusted.

And the handshake line began to form.

Shane's stomach immediately twisted.

He hadn't thought about this part.

Or maybe he'd deliberately avoided thinking about it.

The line moved slowly.

One player at a time.

Good game.

Good game.

Hell of a game.

See you next time.

The usual script repeated over and over.

Shane barely registered any of it.

His attention remained fixed farther down the line.

Waiting.

Watching.

The closer Ilya got, the harder it became to focus.

Three players away.

Two.

One.

Then suddenly Ilya was standing in front of him. Up close the difference was impossible to ignore. The interviews hadn't captured it properly. He looked exhausted.

Not physically. Something deeper. The shadows beneath his eyes seemed permanent now.

His face was thinner. His shoulders slightly more slumped than Shane remembered.

For a moment neither of them moved. The noise of the arena seemed strangely distant.

Then Ilya extended his hand. "Good game."

Professional. Polite. Distant.

The exact sort of thing he would say to any opponent in the league. Not to Shane.

Never Shane.

Shane stared at him for half a second too long.

Then reached out automatically.

The moment their hands touched, something inside his chest tightened painfully.

God.

He'd forgotten.

Forgotten how familiar Ilya felt.

How easy it had always been.

"You too."

The words sounded wrong.

Too formal.

Too small.

Ilya nodded once.

Already beginning to move away. Already preparing to continue down the line. Panic flared unexpectedly.

Sharp and immediate.

Shane didn't think. He simply acted.

"Rozanov." The name escaped before he could stop it. For the first time all night, Ilya hesitated.

Only slightly, but enough. Those blue eyes lifted back to his.

The line continued moving around them. Players brushing past on both sides. Nobody was paying attention. Shane's pulse hammered in his ears.

"Can we talk?"

For a second he wasn't sure Ilya had heard him. Then he saw something flicker across the Alpha's face. Hope, fear.

Disbelief.

Gone so quickly Shane almost thought he'd imagined it.

Ilya remained completely still.

Shane swallowed. "Room three twenty-nine." His voice dropped lower. "Later?"

Neither of them moved. The arena seemed impossibly loud.

The moment stretched. Then Ilya gave the smallest nod.

Barely noticeable, but unmistakable.

"Okay."

Just one word. Quiet. Careful.

As though speaking too loudly might break something. The player behind Ilya bumped his shoulder impatiently.

The line continued moving. The moment ended. Ilya released his hand and stepped away.

Shane watched him go.

Watched him disappear farther down the line. Watched him become another player again.

His pulse refused to slow.

Because for the first time in ninety-five days, there would be no silence tonight.

And that realization terrified him almost as much as it relieved him.

Ninety-five days.

Ilya knew the exact number because he counted them. At first it had been hours. He'd found himself checking the time obsessively, calculating how long it had been since he'd left the hotel room, since Shane had last looked at him, since he'd heard his voice. Then the hours became days. The days became weeks. Now they had somehow become months. Ninety-five days without a text message. Ninety-five days without a phone call. Ninety-five days of honoring the one request Shane had made of him. It was the longest promise Ilya had ever kept and by far the hardest. There were days when he genuinely thought it would have been easier to quit hockey entirely than continue living like this.

The medication helped.

Not enough. Just enough to function in day to day life.

Enough to get out of bed in the morning without staring at the ceiling for two hours first. Enough to sit through team meetings and practices without his thoughts constantly spiraling back toward Vancouver. Enough to sleep for more than a handful of hours most nights. His doctor seemed pleased with the progress. His therapist seemed cautiously optimistic. Svetlana outright threatened him when he missed appointments. Everyone around him seemed relieved that he was functioning again.

The problem was that functioning and living were not the same thing.

Every part of his routine reminded him of Shane. The realization had become almost laughable. A stupid meme appears online and his first instinct is to send it. Something ridiculous happens during practice and his hand immediately reaches for his phone. He sees a referee make an especially terrible call and already knows exactly what joke Shane would make about it. Every airport reminded him of long phone calls. Every hotel reminded him of road trips. Every architecture article he stumbled across made him wonder whether Shane would find it interesting. It happened dozens of times every day. Hundreds, probably. By now the habit was so deeply ingrained that it occurred before conscious thought. Reach for phone. Remember. Stop.

The worst part was that the realization never became easier.

The silence inside his apartment had become something alive. At first he'd tried distracting himself. Television. Music. Podcasts. Anything to fill the space. Nothing worked. Eventually he gave up. Now the apartment remained mostly quiet. Some nights he sat on the couch for hours without turning anything on, staring out the windows at the city below. The place felt far too large for one person. He found himself avoiding entire rooms because they reminded him of conversations that had happened there. Even the kitchen annoyed him. Shane had once spent twenty minutes arguing that ketchup belonged on scrambled eggs. The memory still surfaced every single time Ilya opened the refrigerator.

Boston noticed.

Of course they noticed.

The coaching staff noticed first. Then the players. Eventually the reporters began asking questions, though never directly. Nobody wanted to risk offending one of the league's biggest stars. Instead they danced around the subject. Are you feeling okay? Have you been sleeping? Is something bothering you this season? He answered every question the same way. Fine. Tired. Long season. Nothing interesting. The lies came automatically now.

The fans noticed too.

That was almost worse.

He stopped reading comments months ago but occasionally something slipped through anyway. Someone would show him a post. A teammate would mention it. A headline would appear while scrolling. What happened to Rozanov? He never smiles anymore. Is he injured? Dude looks miserable. Somebody help this man. The funny thing was that most of them were wrong. Miserable implied drama. Misery implied some grand emotional collapse. The truth was far simpler than that. He was lonely. Endlessly, hopelessly lonely. There was no tragedy to analyze and no mystery to solve. He missed Shane. That was it.

Then game day arrived.

The entire league seemed excited about Shane's return. Every sports network ran some variation of the same story. Shane Hollander returns after missing a month. Montreal gets their star back. Huge matchup tonight. Ilya stopped paying attention after a while because every mention of Shane produced the same uncomfortable reaction in his chest. By warmups he felt physically ill. Not nervous. He didn't get nervous before games anymore. It was something worse. Anticipation. Awareness. The knowledge that after ninety-five days he would finally see him again.

The first glimpse nearly undid him.

Shane was laughing at something Hayden said. The sound didn't reach him across the ice, but the expression did. His cheeks looked healthier. The dark circles beneath his eyes had mostly disappeared. He looked stronger. More rested. More like himself. For one horrifying second relief hit Ilya so hard he forgot how to breathe. Alive. Healthy. Safe. The knowledge should have comforted him. Instead it only made him ache.

When Shane finally looked up and their eyes met, the entire arena seemed to disappear.

Ninety-five days vanished instantly.

For one terrible moment every instinct he possessed screamed at him to cross the ice. To talk to him. To ask how he was sleeping. Whether he was eating properly. Whether the nightmares had stopped. Whether therapy was helping. Whether he was happy. Whether he hated him. Whether he missed him.

Instead Ilya turned away.

Because that was the promise.

That was the deal.

Shane had asked for space and Ilya had given it to him. Every miserable, suffocating, lonely day had been built around that promise. Breaking it now would make all of it meaningless.

The game itself became an exercise in restraint. Every shift required conscious effort. Every instinct had to be suppressed. When another Boston player drove Shane into the boards during the second period, Ilya actually started moving before realizing what he was doing. The reaction had been immediate. Pure instinct. Shane gets hurt. Go. Protect. Check on him. The same impulse that had existed for years. He stopped himself only because he caught Hayden and JJ already moving in. The realization left him feeling vaguely sick for the rest of the period.

By the time the final horn sounded, he was exhausted.

Not physically.

Emotionally.

Because it turned out ignoring Shane required far more energy than obsessing over him ever had.

The handshake line should have been simple. Shake hands. Say good game. Keep moving. Professional. Polite. Distant. He repeated the script in his head while the line advanced, convincing himself that if he treated Shane exactly like everyone else, he could survive it.

Then he reached him.

Up close, the differences were impossible to ignore. Shane looked better. Not completely healed, because some things didn't heal that quickly, but better. Alive. Healthy. Real. Standing directly in front of him after ninety-five days of silence.

Ilya extended his hand.

"Good game."

The words sounded hollow even to his own ears.

Then Shane said his name.

Everything stopped.

Not the arena.

Not the crowd.

Not the players continuing down the line around them.

Just him.

For one impossible second, hope returned.

And after ninety-five days of teaching himself how to live without it, hope was far more frightening than despair had ever been.

By the time Ilya made it back to his house, he was beginning to regret agreeing.

Not because he didn't want to see Shane.

That had never been the problem.

The problem was that he wanted it too much.

The drive home passed in a blur. He barely remembered leaving the arena. One moment he had been standing in the handshake line trying not to stare at Shane, trying not to memorize every detail all over again, and the next he was standing alone in the middle of his living room. His suit jacket had been discarded somewhere near the front door. His tie was hanging loose around his neck. The television remained dark. The apartment was silent except for the distant hum of city traffic filtering through the windows.

For a long moment he simply stood there.

Then he started pacing.

The habit had become increasingly common over the last few months. His therapist had several professional explanations for it. Excess nervous energy. Anxiety regulation. Obsessive tendencies seeking an outlet. Svetlana had a much simpler description. She called it "wearing a hole through the floor like an idiot."

Tonight it felt impossible to stop.

He moved from the living room to the kitchen and back again. Past the dining table. Around the couch. Back toward the windows. His thoughts refused to settle on any one thing for more than a few seconds before racing off in another direction. What did Shane want to talk about? Had he changed his mind after the handshake line? Was he going to ask for answers? Was he going to ask for closure? Was he going to tell Ilya that this was the last conversation they would ever have? Every possibility seemed equally likely and somehow each one felt worse than the last.

His eyes drifted toward the clock.

11:08 PM.

Too early.

The meeting wasn't until later.

At least that was what he told himself.

He checked his phone.

Nothing.

Of course there was nothing.

Shane had already given him the room number. There was no reason for further communication. No reason for a text. No reason for a call.

Five minutes later he checked again anyway.

The silence inside the apartment seemed louder than usual. For months he had forced himself to adapt to it. No random phone calls. No text messages waiting when he woke up. No photographs of architecture projects. No complaints about teammates. No arguments over absolutely nothing. The silence had become familiar. It had become routine. Tonight it felt unbearable.

Eventually he wandered into the kitchen and opened the refrigerator despite having no intention of eating. The cold air spilled out around him. He stared blankly at the contents for nearly thirty seconds before realizing he hadn't actually looked at anything. The door closed again.

His appetite had never fully returned.

Neither had his sleep.

Neither had a lot of things.

The clock continued ticking.

11:21 PM.

His therapist had warned him about nights like this. Anticipation was dangerous. Anticipation allowed his thoughts to spiral. It encouraged catastrophizing and obsession and all the unhealthy behaviors they had spent months trying to manage. Under normal circumstances he could recognize when it was happening.

Tonight he didn't particularly care.

Because Shane had asked him to come.

The thought alone sent another wave of nervous energy through him.

Ninety-five days.

Ninety-five days without hearing his voice.

Ninety-five days without seeing him in person.

Ninety-five days of forcing himself not to call.

Not to text.

Not to check in.

Not to drive past places Shane might be.

Not to ask mutual friends how he was doing.

Every single day had been a conscious decision.

Every single day had hurt.

And now Shane wanted to see him.

A bitter laugh escaped him.

The sound echoed strangely through the empty apartment.

This was ridiculous.

He was a grown man.

A professional athlete.

One of the most feared players in the league.

And he was pacing around his house like a teenager before a first date.

Eventually he crossed the room and opened the cabinet where he kept his medications.

The extra dose had been prescribed months earlier.

Emergency situations.

Moments where everything became overwhelming.

Moments where he could feel himself losing control of his thoughts.

Seeing Shane for the first time in three months and then being invited to his hotel room at midnight seemed close enough to an emergency for his liking.

At least that was the justification he settled on.

The pills disappeared with a mouthful of water.

For a while he remained standing there, gripping the edge of the counter and staring at nothing.

Slowly his pulse began to settle. Not completely. Nothing was fixing this.

But enough to think, to breathe, to function.

The clock read 11:37 PM.

The hotel was less than ten minutes away.

He'd spent nearly an hour pacing around his apartment accomplishing absolutely nothing.

Enough.

Before he could change his mind again, he called for a car.

The ride felt simultaneously endless and far too short. The city drifted past outside the windows, illuminated by streetlights and neon signs. People moved along sidewalks. Restaurants closed for the evening. Life continued exactly as it always had. Ilya sat in the back seat watching it all and felt strangely disconnected from it. His stomach twisted harder with every passing minute.

By the time the hotel came into view, his hands had started shaking.

Not badly.

Just enough that he noticed.

The driver pulled to the curb.

For several seconds Ilya simply stared through the windshield at the entrance.

Then he forced himself to move.

Inside, the lobby was quiet. A few guests lingered near the seating area. The receptionist glanced up and immediately recognized him before politely pretending she hadn't. He appreciated that. The last thing he needed tonight was conversation.

The elevator was worse.

Far worse.

Every floor seemed to take forever. The enclosed space left him alone with his thoughts again. By the time the doors finally opened, his pulse had climbed right back to where it had started.

The hallway stretched ahead of him, lined with identical doors and soft lighting. The carpet muted his footsteps as he walked. Room 329 sat near the end.

Each step felt heavier than the last.

Because every step brought him closer to Shane.

Closer to answers.

Closer to whatever happened next.

Closer to the possibility that none of this would end the way he wanted.

When he finally reached the door, he stopped.

For several long seconds he simply stared at the brass numbers.

Ninety-five days.

Everything had led here.

Slowly he lifted his hand.

Knocked once.

Then again.

The sound echoed softly through the hallway.

Silence followed.

A heartbeat.

Two.

Three.

Then the lock clicked.

The door opened almost immediately.

As though Shane had been standing there waiting.

For a moment neither of them spoke.

Neither moved.

The warm light from inside the room spilled into the hallway, casting soft shadows across Shane's face. He stood barefoot in sweatpants and an oversized Canadiens hoodie, his hair still damp from a shower. There were faint shadows beneath his eyes. His expression was a complicated mixture of nerves, relief, uncertainty, and something else Ilya couldn't quite identify.

He looked real.

Not a photograph.

Not a television screen.

Not a memory.

Real.

Alive.

Standing less than three feet away.

And suddenly all the words Ilya had rehearsed over the last three months disappeared completely.

Because for the first time in ninety-five days, there was nothing separating them anymore.

No hospital room.

No reporters.

No hockey rink.

No crowd.

Just the two of them.

Standing in a hotel doorway.

Looking at each other.

Neither entirely sure where to begin.

Chapter End Notes

Well.

They're finally talking.

First of all, thank you all so much for the incredible response to little idea I had in my head. I genuinely read every comment, every theory, every keyboard smash, every threat directed at Ilya, and every plea for therapy.

A special shoutout to everyone who collectively decided that the solution to this story is professional counseling. Honestly? You're probably right.

Healing isn't the same thing as forgiveness. Shane missing Ilya doesn't magically erase what happened. Missing someone, loving someone, trusting someone, forgiving someone, and choosing someone are all different things.

Unfortunately for Shane, he is slowly discovering that those distinctions are incredibly annoying.

For everyone wondering whether Ilya has been suffering during the time skip:

Yes.

Very much yes.

The man has had approximately ninety-five consecutive bad days.

For everyone wondering if Shane is suffering:

Also yes.

He's just better at pretending otherwise.

And for everyone screaming at them to kiss already:

Respectfully, have you met these idiots?

Thank you again for reading, commenting, and sticking with this story. Every comment genuinely makes my day and helps motivate me to keep writing.

Currently getting ready to write the heck out of chapter 22 but I need a big glass of wine and my gay bestie for the good parts 😊

Chapter 22: Chapter 22

Chapter Summary

To everyone commenting:

"They need to talk."

"They need therapy."

"They need boundaries."

"They need healthier communication."

Good news.

This chapter contains all four.

Bad news-

They're still Shane and Ilya. ❤️🔪

Chapter Notes

The door clicked shut, a sound as final as a verdict. The room was standard for a team hotel: two queen beds with stiff floral spreads, a dark wood desk littered with Shane's playbook and a half-empty water bottle, the faint, clean scent of industrial carpet cleaner undercut by the familiar, aching trace of Shane- sun-warmed cotton and honeysuckle, but dampened by his suppressants.

Ilya had mapped the escape routes the moment he crossed the threshold. He stood now with his spine pressed against the wall adjacent to the bathroom door, as far from the bed where Shane perched as the geometry of the room would allow. Twelve feet of beige carpet stretched between them, a minefield.

He looked wrecked. The exhaustion wasn't just in the shadows bruising the skin beneath his eyes; it was in the slump of his broad shoulders under his simple black sweater, in the way his large hands hung limp at his sides, fingers slightly curled as if around a phantom stick. His blond hair, usually styled with careless precision, was pushed back from his forehead in messy waves, like he'd been running his hands through it for hours. Which he had. He'd paced his own room until the pattern was worn into the carpet, until the four walls felt like they were breathing in sync with his panic, until he'd dry-swallowed the bitter, emergency benzo his therapist had prescribed for 'acute emotional episodes'. It had sanded the sharp edges off the panic, leaving behind this hollow, resonant numbness. He felt like a glass vase, thin and fragile, vibrating with a silent, sustaining note.

Shane, in contrast, was sitting perfectly still on the edge of the nearest bed, his hands folded in his lap. He wore soft grey sweatpants and a faded Montreal hoodie, the uniform of private sanctuary. His dark eyes tracked Ilya's position, the calculation clear in his gaze. He looked healthier than he had four months ago- the sharp, haunted planes of his face had softened slightly, the perpetual tension in his jaw had eased a fraction. But the calm was a practiced one, the stillness of a deep lake over cold, dark depths.

"You can sit, you know," Shane said finally, his voice quiet in the insulated room. He nodded to the desk chair, then to the other bed. "Anywhere."

Ilya's head moved in a tight, single shake. "No."

"Why?"

The word hung there. Ilya's throat worked. He looked at the chair, then at the empty space on the bed beside Shane, a distance of maybe two feet. It might as well have been two miles. "The promise," he said, the words scraping out. "I said I would keep my distance. This is... the distance this room allows." He gestured vaguely with one hand, a stiff, abortive motion. "If I sit, the distance becomes... negotiable. It becomes choice. My control is... it is not good, Shane. You know this. The control is a thin wire. If I choose to sit three feet from you instead of twelve, the next choice is to move to two feet. Then one. Then..." He trailed off, his gaze dropping to the carpet. "The promise was distance. This is the distance."

Shane absorbed that, his fingers lacing tighter together. He didn't look hurt, just... weary. Weary of the algebra of trauma, the constant calculus of safety and threat. "So you're just going to stand against the wall like you're waiting for a firing squad?"

A ghost of something- humor, despair- flickered over Ilya's face. "Da. If that is what it looks like."

Silence expanded again, filled with the hum of the mini-fridge and the distant, muffled sound of a elevator chime in the hall. Shane took a slow, deliberate breath, the one his therapist had taught him. Four counts in, seven counts hold, eight counts out.

“You look like shit,” Shane said, not unkindly.

Ilya let out a short, sharp breath that wasn’t a laugh. “This is accurate.”

“Are you sleeping?”

“Intermittently.”

“Eating?”

“Food is... functional.” He hadn’t tasted a meal in months. He consumed calories like fuel, nothing more.

“Therapy?”

“Twice a week. Dr. Kostova. She is... very direct. It is unpleasant sometimes but-” He said it with a sort of grim respect, shrugging his shoulders.

“Medication?”

Ilya’s eyes flicked up, meeting Shane’s for the first time since entering the room. The contact was a physical jolt, a live wire connecting the twelve-foot gap. “Yes. Pills.” He said with a grimace. “For anxiety. For the... obsessive thoughts.” He paused, the confession clawing its way up. “I took an extra one tonight. Before I came. So I would not... spiral apart.”

Shane's lips pressed into a thin line. He'd wondered about the unnatural calm, the flatness of Ilya's tone. It wasn't peace. It was chemical restraint. "Okay," he whispered. Another silence, Shane could see the tight way Ilya was holding himself.

"Why did you invite me here, Shane?" Ilya asked, his voice low. He kept his gaze fixed on a point just over Shane's shoulder, on the generic landscape painting of a birch forest. It was easier than looking at him. "You have your space. You are healing. I see this. You are with your team, you smile sometimes in the interviews. You are... living. Why bring the complication back into your life?"

Shane didn't answer immediately. He unfolded his hands and placed them palm-down on the bedspread on either side of him, grounding himself in the texture of the fabric. "I missed you," he said, the simplicity of it devastating.

Ilya flinched as if struck. His hands clenched into fists at his sides, the knuckles bleaching white.

"Not... not just the way it was. Not the... the obsession, or the intensity, or the way what you told me...after. You'd look at me like I was the only thing in the universe." Shane's words were careful, each one selected and placed like a piece of delicate machinery. "I missed the stupid texts about your terrible coffee. The jokes you'd make that only I understood. The way you'd dissect a game play by play for an hour on the phone. I miss you as my friend." His voice cracked on the last word, a tiny fracture in his controlled facade. "And I saw you tonight, on the ice, and then after... and you look empty, Ilya. You look like you're just... waiting to stop. And I realized... my healing shouldn't have to look like your destruction. That's not... that's not what I wanted."

Ilya's breath hitched. He leaned his head back against the wall, staring at the ceiling. The acoustic tiles were stained with an old water mark, shaped vaguely like a continent. "What do you want?" he asked, the question directed at the ceiling.

"I want to understand," Shane said, his own voice gaining strength. "I want one conversation where nothing is hidden. No trackers, no lies, or half-truths. I need to know what was real. I need to know if the man who lo- cared about, the one who made me laugh, who learned about my routines, who held me when the world was too loud, I need to know if he was real, or if he was just... set dressing for the craziness.”

That finally broke Ilya’s paralysis. His head snapped down, eyes blazing with a sudden, wounded fury. “You think it was fake?” The numbness was burning away, the medication overwhelmed by a surge of raw emotion. “You think, what- that I studied you to mimic my feelings? That I calculated everything to get you to laugh or something?” He pushed off the wall, taking one involuntary step forward before freezing, his entire body trembling with the effort to root himself to the spot. “The obsession is because it was real! I’ve been obsessed with you from the first second I saw you, Hollander. It was quiet, and it was stupid, and it was watching you adjust your tie before a press conference and feeling my heart stop. It was the friendship! Then... then the fear came. The fear of you being hurt, of you being taken, of you waking up and realizing you could do better than a damaged, possessive good for nothing Russian with a father’s ghost in his mouth. The obsession... it was the security system my broken brain built around my feelings. To protect it. To keep it safe. It was a cage I built around something beautiful, and then I... I locked you inside with it. I know this. Dr. Kostova has made me say it until I want to vomit. It was all real, Hollander. The good and the bad. The cage was my sickness. If I could rip out my own heart and give it to you to make up for my mistakes, I would do it instantly. So tell me what to do?”

He was breathing heavily now, his chest rising and falling in ragged bursts. A sheen of sweat glistened at his temples. The confession had cost him, tearing out of him in a raw, bloody heap.

Shane stared at him, his own heart hammering against his ribs. He saw it now, the man beneath the hollowed-out shell. The pain, the furious, desperate truth of him. He saw the man he’d missed, screaming from behind the bars of his own making.

“Tell me about Chris,” Shane said, his voice barely audible.

Ilya went very, very still. All the color drained from his face. “Shane...”

“No. You want to be honest? That’s the heart of it. You killed him. You burned him alive. You told me that. Now tell me why. Not the reason you gave me then. Not the ‘he took you’ reason. Tell me the reason in your head, in that moment, when you struck the match.”

The air left the room. Ilya's knees felt weak. He wanted to slide down the wall, to disappear into the carpet fibers. He forced himself to stand.

"He touched you." The words came out barely above a whisper. Ilya stared somewhere past Shane's shoulder, his eyes fixed on something only he could see. "He put hands on you. He drugged you. He frightened you, I saw your face. You were terrified." Each sentence sounded rougher than the last. "He made you small." His jaw tightened, for several seconds he said nothing. When he spoke again, his voice had gone strangely flat. "And in my head... it stopped being only him."

A humorless laugh escaped him. "That is problem, Hollander. It was never only him." His gaze dropped briefly to the floor. "It was every threat. Every alpha who looked at you and thought he had right. Every reporter who asked questions because he wanted piece of you. Every person who looked at you and saw something to take." He swallowed. "Every memory of my father."

The words came quieter. "Every time I watched him put hands on my mother. Every time I watched her become smaller." His shoulders rose and fell in a slow breath. "It all became same thing." The silence stretched. "And Hill..." His mouth twisted. "Hill became face of it."

For the first time he looked directly at Shane. There was no pride in his expression. No satisfaction, only horror.

"I did not think this is justice." The confession came immediately. "I did not think I am saving world. I did not do it because I am good man." His fingers curled into fists. "I thought this ends here."

A pause. "I thought if he disappeared, if he was gone forever, then this one thing could never happen again." His voice dropped lower. "No second victim. No next omega." The words sounded practiced. Thought about too many times. "It was not punishment."

He laughed again. Short, ugly. "It was prevention." The hotel room felt suddenly very quiet. "I wanted final answer." His eyes glistened. "I wanted lock on door. I wanted certainty."

His gaze drifted away. "When I watched fire take him..." The sentence broke. For a moment Shane wasn't sure he would continue. "When I watched him die, my head became quiet."

Ilya closed his eyes. The shame on his face was immediate. "That is the truth." His voice was barely audible now. "For first time in years, everything became quiet."

He opened his eyes again. "I felt relief." The admission seemed to physically hurt. "I felt peace."

Another pause. Then: "And that is why I am afraid of myself." His stare never left Shane's.

"I am not hero." The next words sounded almost exhausted. "I am man who enjoyed watching another man die." He swallowed hard. "I did it for you. That is true."

He reached up and closed his fist over his cross pendant. "But I also did it for myself."

The silence that followed felt endless. "I wanted him gone." His voice cracked. "And when he was... I was happy." For the first time since entering the room, Ilya looked genuinely vulnerable.

Not dangerous, not obsessive.

Not possessive. Just broken. "That is part I cannot forgive."

A beat.

A single, hot tear traced a path down Shane's cheek. He didn't wipe it away.

Ilya saw it, and it shattered him. "I am sorry," he breathed, the words breaking into fragments. "I am so sorry that my love is a monstrous thing. I am sorry I cannot... un-build the cage. I am sorry the friend you miss is the architect of your prison. I am just... sorry."

He expected Shane to recoil. To tell him to leave. To finally, rightfully, seal him out forever.

Shane slowly stood up from the bed.

Ilya stiffened, his muscles coiling to flee, to press himself through the wall.

But Shane didn't approach him. He walked to the desk, picked up the water bottle, and took a slow drink. He was giving them both space, time. He turned, leaning back against the desk, facing Ilya from across the room. The twelve feet remained.

"I'm not asking you to be a hero," Shane said, his voice thick but clear. "I'm asking you to be a patient. I'm asking you to keep seeing Dr. Kostova. To take your medication. To fight the obsession for you, not for me. Because you want a mind that isn't a prison for either of us."

Ilya stared, uncomprehending. "You are not... afraid?"

“I’m terrified,” Shane admitted softly. “But I’m not afraid of you. I know I should be, but only I’m afraid of what you’re capable of. And I see you fighting it. Standing against that wall right now is you fighting it. That’s... that’s something.”

He took another breath. “I don’t know if we can be what we were. That’s probably gone. It was built on secrets and dependency. But I missed my friend. And I think... maybe we can try to build an acquaintance. A very careful, distant, texting-about-coffee acquaintance. With a lot of walls. And rules. And both of us in therapy.”

A fragile, impossible hope, thin as a glass thread, began to tremble in the hollow of Ilya’s chest. It was agony. It was everything.

“What are the rules?” Ilya asked, his voice raw.

“Rule one,” Shane said, holding up a finger. “You keep going to therapy. For a long time. Rule two: no more secrets. If you feel yourself... spiraling, about me, about anything, you tell your therapist. You don’t let it fester. Rule three: this goes at my pace. Glacier pace. And if I say stop, we stop. No negotiation.”

Ilya nodded, a sharp, jerky motion. “Da. Yes. I can... I can follow rules.”

“I know you can,” Shane said, and there was the faintest, most fragile hint of the old warmth in his eyes. “I’m proud of you for getting help.”

A shudder ran through Ilya. “It was like death.”

“I know.” They looked at each other then, across the minefield of carpet, across the wreckage of love and obsession and fire. The distance was still there, vast and necessary. But for the first time, it didn’t feel like an ending. It felt like a grueling, painful starting line.

“The coffee at the new place near my apartment is still terrible,” Ilya offered, a tentative, shaky offering. A piece of their old friendship held out across the no-man’s land.

A small, real smile touched Shane's lips. "Text me about it tomorrow afternoon. I have a therapy session in the morning."

"I will," Ilya whispered, the promise like a vow.

He didn't move from the wall. Shane didn't move from the desk. They remained in their designated spaces, the boundaries clear and hard. But the room no longer vibrated with the static of impending collapse. It hummed with the exhausting, precarious effort of two shattered men, learning how to build something new from the rubble, one careful, distant text message at a time.

The silence in the room after Ilya left was different. It wasn't the oppressive, charged silence of before. It was a spent silence, like the air after a storm has passed through, clean and bruised but breathable. Shane stood by the desk for a long time, his palms flat on the cool wood, feeling the residual tremor in his own hands.

He had looked like a ghost pressed against that wall. A beautiful, shattered ghost. The confession about Chris... Shane had needed to hear it, but the raw, ugly truth of it sat in his gut like a stone. I felt peace. That was the part that would haunt him. Not the violence itself—he'd made a certain, grim peace with that necessity, but the satisfaction Ilya had taken from it. The monster and the man were not separate; they were the same entity, one fueled by a love so twisted it found solace in annihilation. But was what they had love? Or was it lust, biology? Curiosity? Shane didn't want to analyze that too much.

Shane believed him. That was the terrible, anchoring truth. He believed the friendship had been real. The obsession was the disease that had infected it. Ilya was sick. He was admitting it, treating it, fighting it. Standing against that wall had been an act of agonizing willpower. Shane had seen the tremor in his muscles, the desperate clench of his jaw.

He finally moved, methodically preparing for bed. Brush teeth. Floss. Wash face. The routine was a balm. He slid under the stiff hotel sheets and stared at the dark ceiling. His therapist would have questions about this. Was it healthy? Was it safe? He could hear her calm, probing voice. What is your goal here, Shane? What are you trying to accomplish?

An acquaintance. A careful, texting-about-coffee acquaintance. It sounded so pathetic when spoken aloud in his head. But it also felt like the only possible first step on a very long, very fragile bridge. He fell asleep with the image of Rozanov's wide, horrified eyes burned into his mind, and the sound of his own rules, Glacier pace, echoing like a mantra.

The first text came three days later, in the afternoon. Shane had just finished a light workout and was sitting in his living room, going through his weekly calendar. He picked up his phone repeatedly until he gave up and sent a quick 'hi'.

Shane- The coffee at the new place in town is still terrible. It tastes like they filter it through an old hockey sock.

He stared at the message. It was mundane. It was safe. It was a direct response to Ilya's last offering in the hotel room. He hit send before he could overthink it.

The response was not immediate. A full twenty-three minutes passed. Shane had almost given up, had gone to make himself tea, when his phone buzzed again on the counter.

IGR- This is a specific and vivid description. I am impressed. My own coffee today was brewed from what I believe are the ground-up remains of a Soviet-era propaganda pamphlet. Very bitter. Many lies.

A startled laugh burst out of Shane. It was short, but it was real. He could hear Ilya's dry, deadpan delivery in his head. That was the friend. That was the man who could make him laugh with a perfectly absurd turn of phrase.

Shane- Sounds treasonous. Be careful.

IGR- The state security does not monitor my coffee choices. Yet. I will be vigilant.

And that was it. Shane didn't reply further. Ilya didn't send anything else. The conversation had a clear beginning and end. It was a block of text, exchanged, and then released. It felt... manageable.

It became a pattern. Every few days, Shane would initiate. He followed his own rule, glacier pace. The topics were deliberately superficial, orbiting the safe, shared gravity of their lives.

Shane- Hayden tried to cook for the team. Fire department came. It was not a drill.

IGR- This does not surprise me. His hands are terrible holding sticks, now knives. Was the meal salvageable? Worst player in the league.

Shane- He was full of hope and ambitions. We ordered from a pizzeria.

IGR- A wise choice. Tell him for me, his next contract should include a personal chef. It is a safety issue.

Shane- They're repaving the road outside my building. The noise starts at 7 AM. My schedule is is trashed.

IGR- This is an outrage. Have you considered filing a formal complaint with the city? I can draft a strongly worded letter in Russian. It will confuse them and may delay the work.

Shane- Tempting. But I think my therapist would call that an 'avoidance behavior.' I'm trying earplugs.

IGR- Earplugs are a surrender. The letter is a strategic offensive. But I defer to your therapist. How are the earplugs?

The texts were never long. Never probing. Ilya never asked how he was feeling, never referenced the past, never mentioned therapy or medication unless Shane brought it up first. He was scrupulously, almost painfully, adherent to the boundaries. He always waited for Shane. The silence between exchanges sometimes stretched to four or five days. Shane found himself noticing the gaps, wondering if Ilya was staring at his phone, willing it to light up. The thought sent a complicated pang through him- part guilt, part a strange, aching validation.

He mentioned it to his therapist Myra, during one of their weekly video sessions. Her face, framed by her tidy, grey-blond bob, was thoughtfully neutral.

“And how does it feel, when you send a text?” she asked.

Shane considered, picking at a thread on his sweatpants. “It feels... like I’m throwing a rope across a gap. A very thin rope. And I’m not sure if the other side is still there.”

“But you keep throwing it.”

“Yeah.”

“Why?”

“Because...” He struggled for the words. “Because when he texts back, it’s... normal. It’s funny. It’s about casual things. Like we’re getting to know each other all over again. It feels like I’m getting a piece of something back. A piece I actually liked.”

Myra nodded. “And the distance? The fact that he never initiates?”

“It’s what I asked for. It’s good. It makes me feel... safe. In control.” He paused. “But it also feels a little like I’m holding a remote control to a person. And that feels wrong, too.”

“That’s an insightful observation,” Myra said, making a note. “The goal of boundaries isn’t to control another person. It’s to define your own space. His choice to respect them is his responsibility. Your choice to relax them, if you ever do, will be yours.”

The season wound down. Montreal made the playoffs but were knocked out in the second round in a hard-fought, seven-game series. The final buzzer felt less like an ending and more like a exhaustion. Shane’s body was tired, but his mind, for the first time in years, wasn’t screaming. The suppressants were steady. His public persona remained intact- he reliable, beta center for the Montreal Voyageurs. The facade was becoming more comfortable, less like a cage and more like a well-fitted suit of armor. He could live inside it.

The texts with Ilya continued through the playoff stress, a low-frequency hum in the background of the chaos.

Shane- Long flight to Tampa. JJ brought his ukulele. Some of us might kill him.

IGR- I have alerted The Hague. Stay strong. Noise-cancelling headphones are a legitimate survival tool.

After their elimination, the silence felt heavier. The structure of the season was gone, replaced by the vast, unstructured expanse of summer. Shane planned to stay in Montreal. He had a routine: therapy, training, classes, volunteering with a youth hockey camp for neurodivergent kids, quiet dinners with his parents where they talked about everything except the thing that had almost broken him. It was a good plan. A healing plan.

He didn’t expect the text that came on a humid Tuesday in early June.

Shane- Summer plans finally sorted. I’m partnering with a hockey youth camp, trying to remember how to relax. You?

The response took longer than usual. Almost an hour. When it came, Shane was in the middle of chopping vegetables for a stir-fry, his phone propped on the kitchen counter.

IGR- My plans have solidified. I am going back to Russia for the summer. I leave in two weeks.

The knife slipped. It nicked the side of his thumb, a bright, stinging line of pain. He cursed, dropping the knife into the sink with a clatter. He grabbed a paper towel, wrapping it tightly around the cut, his eyes locked on the screen. A cold, dense feeling spread from his chest outwards.

Russia.

The word was a tripwire in his mind, detonating a cascade of images: news articles about restrictive new laws, protests met with harsh crackdowns, omegas being stripped of professional licenses, forced into state-registered bonds. A cold, bureaucratic kind of violence. Ilya was an alpha, a famous one. He would be fine. More than fine. He'd be celebrated.

But the thought of him there, in that atmosphere, breathing that air... it made Shane's skin prickle with a deep, instinctive dread. It felt like watching someone walk back into a burning building they'd just escaped.

His hands were trembling. He wiped one on his jeans and picked up the phone. The response he typed was impulsive, unfiltered.

Shane- Russia? Why?

It broke their unspoken rule. It was a direct, emotional probe. He sent it before he could stop himself.

This time, the reply was faster. As if Ilya had been waiting for the question.

IGR- I have endorsement contract commitments there that require my physical presence for photo shoots and appearances. The penalties for non-compliance are... significant.

IGR- Also, Svetlana. She is... not well. Her father is sick and she is not taking it well. She will not admit it, but she needs help. I am the only one she will allow to help her. And... it is my home. For better or worse. There are things I need to see. To understand.

Shane read the messages, each one landing like a weight. The endorsement deals- practical, financial. Unarguable. Svetlana. That hit differently. Shane remembered seeing her on Ilya's arm a few times when they were photographed for events, her unwavering loyalty, the way she'd been the only one to ever truly challenge Ilya. If she needed him... that was a call Ilya would never ignore.

The cut on his thumb throbbed. He typed, deleted, typed again. He couldn't voice the chaotic fear. He had to stick to the facts. The political reality.

Shane- The political climate there right now... it's not good for people like me. The new registry laws. It's dangerous.

IGR- I know. I follow the news very closely. This is part of what I need to see. And to ensure my own legal protections, as an alpha with international status, are in absolute order. I will be safe, I am not... unaware. I am going with eyes open.

But it wasn't enough. The fear was a physical thing now, a knot in his throat. He was pacing his kitchen, the bloody paper towel still clutched in one hand.

Shane- It feels like a step backwards. After everything.

IGR- It is not a step. It is a... reconnaissance. A necessary one. The battlefield is not only here, in your living room or my therapist's office. It is also there, in the laws and the streets. I need to see it to know how to fight it. For myself. My face is being used as if I'm promoting this. This does not change our agreement. The texts. The distance. I will have a VPN. The time difference is a challenge, but not an impossibility. I will still wait.

Our agreement. The phrase was so formal, so contractual. Yet it was also an anchor. He was promising continuity. The glacier pace would continue, just over a much greater, more terrifying distance.

Shane stopped pacing. He leaned against the cool refrigerator door, closing his eyes. He was overreacting. Ilya was a grown man, a wealthy, famous alpha returning to his homeland to fulfill contracts and care for his sick friend. It was rational. It was his right.

So why did it feel like a betrayal?

Because, a small, honest voice inside him whispered, you have started to rely on the idea of him being here. While not in the same country, in the same time zone. A manageable crisis. You've started to rebuild the idea of 'us' as two people on the same soil, and now he's ripping that soil away.

He wasn't. He was just going to Russia. For the summer.

Shane took a deep, shuddering breath. Four in. Seven hold. Eight out. He walked to the sink, ran his thumb under cold water, watching the pink swirl down the drain. He bandaged it carefully. Then he picked up his phone.

He couldn't forbid it. He wouldn't. That was the old dynamic. That was control. He had to accept Ilya's autonomy, even when it scared him. Especially when it scared him.

Shane- Okay. Svetlana comes first. Look after her. And be careful. Not just with the politics. With yourself.

The response was almost instantaneous.

IGR- I will. I have my medication. I have scheduled calls with Dr. Kostova. I have rules. Thank you, Hollander.

The conversation ended there. Shane finished making his stir-fry, ate it tasting nothing, and cleaned the kitchen with mechanical precision. The fear didn't leave. It settled into a low-grade hum of anxiety in his bones. Russia was no longer an abstract concept in the news; it was a place where Ilya would be, walking streets Shane could not picture, under a sky he would not see.

That night, for the first time in months, he dreamed of concrete rooms and the smell of gasoline. But in the dream, when he turned, it wasn't Chris he saw in the shadows. It was a faceless, uniformed official, holding a registry with Shane's name on it. And Ilya was standing between them, his back to Shane, his posture not of a protector, but of a negotiator. When Shane woke, his heart was pounding, and the first grey light of dawn was seeping around his blinds.

The texts in the following two weeks were strained. The easy rhythm was gone. Shane's messages were shorter, more factual.

Shane- Camp starts next week. Twenty kids. Should be chaotic.

IGR- You will be excellent with them. Chaos requires structure. You are the master of structure.

The day before Ilya's flight, Shane broke. He was sitting in his quiet, sunlit living room, and the silence felt accusing.

Shane- What's your flight number?

A long pause.

IGR- Aeroflot 315. Departing at 21:15. Why?

Shane- So I know when you're in the air.

Another pause, longer this time.

IGR- I will text you when I land in Moscow. If you want me to.

Shane- Okay.

And that was it. The next evening, at 9:15 PM Eastern time, Shane didn't turn on the TV. He didn't try to read. He sat on his couch, his knees drawn up, and imagined a heavy bird of metal and light lifting off from a New York runway, turning its nose east, carrying its complicated cargo into the night. The distance, which had felt so carefully measured in feet and text messages, suddenly expanded to its true, terrifying scale: continents, oceans, ideologies.

The glacier was moving. But now, it was cleaving in two, with a vast, dark sea rushing in between.

The Aeroflot cabin was a study in controlled atmosphere, but the silence in Ilya's head was louder. It was the chemical calm, the benzo haze, turning the world into a series of muffled, procedural steps: fasten seatbelt, tray table up, prepare for landing. He stared out the window as the lights of Moscow resolved from a scattered galaxy into grim, familiar grids. Motherland. The word tasted of diesel exhaust and old snow.

He did not go to see his family. The thought of his father's apartment- the lingering ghost of cheap vodka and impotent rage in the walls- was a physical revulsion. He had a driver take him directly to the sleek, sterile luxury apartment his agent maintained for him in the Patriarch Ponds district. It was all cold marble and floor-to-ceiling windows, a display case for a trophy. He stood at the window that first night, looking out at the city that had built him and broken him in equal measure, and felt nothing. The medication saw to that. It was a relief.

The obligations began immediately. They were a gauntlet of performance.

There was the shoot for the premium vodka brand, where he was instructed to look “powerfully contemplative” while holding a crystal glass against a backdrop of fake birch trees. He did it. His smile for the sports drink commercial was practiced, reaching only his teeth, never his eyes. He did the talk show, deflecting questions about his “quiet season” and “rumored personal struggles” with the glib, charming evasion he’d perfected over the years. He was Ilya Rozanov - the Star, the export. The product.

And then came the other obligations. The ones not listed on any contract.

It was a dinner, ostensibly to discuss his “philanthropic potential” as a national sports icon. The restaurant was private, opulent, all dark wood and heavy velvet. The man across from him, Vitaly, had the polished, quiet menace of a senior bureaucrat. He spoke of national pride, of legacy, of the importance of strong alpha role models.

“A man of your standing, Ilya,” Vitaly said, sipping his Armenian brandy, “should be thinking of the future. Stability. A family line.”

Ilya kept his expression neutral, his fingers loose around his own untouched glass. “My future is on the ice. For now.”

Vitaly waved a dismissive hand. “The ice is temporary. Blood is permanent. The state has excellent programs. The registry is now fully digitized. So many worthy omegas from good families, reaching marrying age.” He leaned forward slightly, his voice dropping into a confiding tone. “The age has been standardized to twenty-one. A perfect time. Healthy, fertile, properly educated in their duties. We could arrange introductions. You could have your pick. A beautiful companion. Children who would carry your name and your talent.”

The air in the room thickened. Ilya could smell the alcohol, the man's expensive cologne, and beneath it, the sterile, metallic scent of state controlled suppressants. He saw, for a dizzying second, not an anonymous omega, but Shane. Shane at twenty-one, terrified and brilliant, injecting illegal suppressants in a bathroom stall before a major game. Shane, whose entire life was a masterpiece of clandestine control, of hiding what this man was offering up like a cut of prime meat.

A cold, slick nausea rose in his throat. It was the obsession, but inverted- not a desire to possess, but a violent, clawing need to protect what was his from this. To build a wall around Shane so high that this man's gaze could never touch him. But of course he couldn't do that now. They had 'boundaries'.

He manufactured a smile. It felt like cracking ice on his face. "That is a generous offer. And under other circumstances, I would be deeply grateful." He paused, letting the silence build. He channeled every ounce of his media training, his innate charisma, layering it over the lie. "But, unfortunately, my attention is... elsewhere. There is an omega. In Boston. The negotiations are... delicate. International complications. But we have an understanding. A marriage will likely follow shortly."

The lie was so specific, so blandly plausible, it hung in the air with the weight of truth. He saw the calculation in Vitaly's eyes- the slight disappointment, but also a recognition of a different kind of prize: an international union, a bridging of worlds, still a victory for the narrative.

"Boston," Vitaly repeated, nodding slowly. "An American omega. That has its own... strategic benefits. My congratulations, then. We will speak of this again after the wedding."

"Of course," Ilya said, his smile still fixed. He took a sip of the vodka then, letting the fire of it burn away the taste of the lie.

He left the dinner feeling more hollowed out than after any game. He sat in the back of the Mercedes, watching the neon of Tverskaya Street blur past, and for the first time since landing, he craved the sharp, clarifying agony of feeling something. The medication made everything feel padded, distant. The lie had been too easy. It was the kind of lie his father would have told, smooth and self-serving.

He didn't go back to the sterile apartment. He told the driver to take him to the oncology hospital in the southwest district.

The smell of the hospital was universal: antiseptic, despair, and stubborn hope. Svetlana was in the family lounge on the fourth floor, a small room with plastic chairs and a perpetually bubbling aquarium. She looked smaller, her fierce energy banked to a low, burning coal. She saw him and didn't smile, just nodded.

"He's sleeping. The treatment is... hard," she said, her voice rough. "But he is tough. So they are matched."

Ilya sat beside her, not touching. "What can I do?"

"You are here. That is doing something."

They sat in silence for a while, watching the garishly colored fish drift through their synthetic world.

"How is your therapist?" she asked, not looking at him.

"Direct. She asks questions I do not want to answer. So she is probably good."

A faint snort. "And the medication?"

"It makes the world... quiet. It is useful."

She turned her head then, her dark eyes scanning his face with the precision of an MRI. “And Shane?”

The name was a needle slipped between his ribs. He kept his gaze on the fish. “There is no Shane. There is an agreement. There are rules. There are text messages about nothing really. We are trying to be friends.”

“That is not an answer.”

“It is the only answer I have.”

Svetlana studied him for a long moment. “You look like a man who has placed his own heart in a locked box and is now sitting on the lid.”

“It is safer there,” he said, his voice flat.

“For who?”

He didn’t answer. He couldn’t. The truth was a tangled knot: safer for Shane, yes. But also, selfishly, safer for him. The box kept the obsession contained. It also kept the love, the terrible, genuine love, from tearing him open in this hospital lounge.

He came back the next day. And the next. He brought Svetlana proper food when she refused to leave her father’s side. He sat with Viktor while he slept, the old man’s breathing a ragged, rhythmic struggle. He remembered Viktor from his childhood- a bear of a man who was the best goaltender of the soviet era, whose presence had always been a solid, quiet contrast to the volatile chaos of Ilya’s own father. Seeing him reduced, frail, was a different kind of reality.

One afternoon, while Viktor slept, Svetlana cornered him by the coffee vending machine.

“The texts,” she said, her arms crossed. “Are they helping? Or are they just another way to torture yourself?”

Ilya leaned against the wall, the hum of the machine vibrating through his spine. “They are a thread,” he said quietly. “A very thin thread. If I pull on it, I fear it will snap. If I let it go, I fear I will float away. So I just... look at it.”

“And he knows you are here?” She gestured vaguely, encompassing the hospital, the city, the country.

“He knows. He was... upset.”

“Good,” Svetlana said fiercely. “He should be. It is upsetting.” She sighed, the anger bleeding out into exhaustion. “You told him about the offer? The ‘pick of the registry’?”

Ilya shook his head. “No. I told the man a lie. I said I had an omega in Boston. That we would marry.”

Svetlana’s eyebrows shot up. Then, a slow, grim smile touched her lips. “A good lie. A protective lie.”

“I’m getting better at it,” he muttered, looking at his shoes.

“It was,” she said, not unkindly. “But you told it to keep a Hollander safe. That makes it a new kind of lie. Maybe a better one.”

He didn’t know what to say to that. The morality of his actions was a maze he no longer trusted himself to navigate.

Days bled into weeks. The endorsement commitments were completed. The campaigns of him with the vodka appeared on massive billboards. He avoided all further government overtures. His world shrank to the hospital, the gym where he maintained his training in grim, solitary sessions, and the silent apartment.

He waited for Shane's texts. They came less frequently now, the time zone and the unspoken weight of his location creating a new distance. They were still surface-level, achingly mundane.

Shane- One of the kids at camp today called a slapshot a 'swissy-boom.' I think I like that better.

IGR- The terminology committee at the NHL will be horrified. I support this rebellion.

He would stare at the message, at the faint echo of Shane's smile in the words, and feel the lock on the box in his chest strain. He never initiated. The discipline was a brutal, daily exercise. It was the only form of penance he had left.

One evening, leaving the hospital, the summer twilight still clinging to the sky, his phone buzzed. Not a text. An email alert from a secure, encrypted service. The investigator he had retained- the only one from the old apparatus he kept on a retainer, with strictly defined, legal parameters- had completed his background check. The subject: all known associates of the late Chris. A final, obsessive sweep for any lingering threats.

Ilya stood on the sidewalk, the traffic noise fading to a hum. He opened the report, scanning it. Mostly dead ends, former associates in prison or abroad. Then, a single note, buried:
Financial records indicate a series of large, untraceable payments made to Chris in the six months preceding the kidnapping. Source appears to be a shell corporation with nominal ties to several Russian oligarchs. No direct link to subject Rozanov established. Motive unclear.

He was stopped from replying when a picture came through from Shane. He was surrounded by a group of 15 children all in hockey gear. His heart melted a little. Hollander would make such an amazing parent.

He tried to think of what to reply that didn't push the established lines. He settled on a smiley face, commenting that some of the little girls looked like better players than Pike.

The world did not tilt. The medication held. But the quiet in his mind became a different kind of quiet- the quiet of deep, dark water where something immense had just glided past, unseen.

He closed the email. He deleted it. He looked up at the Moscow sky, no longer familiar, just a canopy of gathering dark.

He had come to see, to understand, to fulfill obligations. He was seeing things now he did not want to understand. The battlefield, he realized, was not just in laws or in therapist's offices. It was here, in the ghost of a dead man's finances, in the polite offers in private restaurants, in the space between a text message sent and a reply received. It was everywhere.

He put the phone away. He walked to his car, alone. The box in his chest was no longer locked. It was simply too heavy to open.

Shane was in his Montreal kitchen, sunlight dappling the clean countertops. He was measuring coffee beans, the ritual calm and precise. But the scent was wrong. Instead of dark roast, the air was thick with the green, crisp bite of alpha- Ilya's scent, but not from a memory. It was present, immediate, as if he were standing right behind him.

Shane turned, and the kitchen melted away like paint in rain. The tiles under his feet became the coarse, industrial carpet of the hotel room. But it was different. Warmer. The light was golden and low, like perpetual sunset, casting long shadows that seemed to breathe. Ilya wasn't by the door. He was in the center of the room, standing perfectly still, watching him.

He was shirtless, wearing only a pair of soft, grey sweatpants that hung extremely low on his hips. The defined muscles of his chest and abdomen were not the sculpted perfection of an athlete in a photoshoot, but the powerful, living architecture of the man Shane had known- a map of birthmarks, of tension, of contained strength. His eyes held none of the hollowed-out exhaustion from their real meeting. They were dark, focused, blazing with an intelligence that saw through skin and bone straight to the omega core of him.

No words were spoken. The twelve feet between them didn't vanish; it became a tangible space charged with potential, like the air before a lightning strike. Shane felt his own body responding before his mind could protest. A deep, internal flutter, a cascade of warmth that started in his belly and spilled downward, a slick, undeniable gathering of heat between his legs. His suppressants weren't just failing; in the dream, they had never existed. His biology awoke, not with a shock, but with a profound, sighing relief, as if coming home after a long, arduous journey.

Ilya took one step forward. Then another. Each footfall was silent, but Shane felt it in his bones. He was powerless to move, rooted not by fear, but by a yearning so acute it was a physical ache. When Ilya finally stood before him, the heat radiating from his alpha body was like standing near a furnace.

A large, calloused hand rose, not to his face, but to the column of his throat. Ilya's thumb rested against his pulse point, feeling the frantic rhythm there. His gaze was possessive, awed.

"There you are," Ilya murmured, his voice a low rumble that vibrated through Shane's skin. "I have missed this. The truth of you. It has been like living in a world without scent, without color."

His other hand came up to the hem of Shane's t-shirt. With a deliberate, slow pull, he drew it up and over his head, discarding it without a glance. The cool air on his skin was a shock, followed immediately by the searing heat of Ilya's palms smoothing over his shoulders, down his arms. His touch was worship and conquest intertwined.

Ilya's mouth found the junction of his neck and shoulder, and he didn't just kiss it. He inhaled, a deep, shuddering breath that made his whole body tense. "Sweet," he growled against the damp skin. "So sweet and all mine."

The claim, spoken into his flesh, unraveled the last of Shane's resistance. A soft, broken sound escaped him, and he leaned into the mouth working its way down his chest. Ilya took a nipple into his mouth, sucking and laving it with his tongue until it was a hard, aching peak, then biting down with just enough pressure to make Shane cry out, his hands flying into Ilya's hair, not to push away, but to hold on.

Ilya guided him backward until his knees hit the edge of the bed. He laid Shane down with a reverence that contradicted the hunger in his eyes, arranging him on the striped bedspread as if he were something precious. Then, he knelt on the floor between Shane's legs, his hands pushing his thighs apart with an unyielding gentleness.

The first touch of Ilya's tongue, there, at the slick, heated heart of him, was an electric shock. Shane arched off the bed, a gasp torn from his lungs. It wasn't just the sensation- incredible and dizzying- it was the intimacy of it. The absolute, carnal submission of this powerful, dangerous alpha on his knees, tasting him, learning him. Ilya feasted on him with a single-minded intensity, his tongue delving deep into his cunt, then circling the tight furl of his ass, making Shane writhe and clutch at the bedding. The dual attention was maddening, a preview of what was to come.

"Ilya... God..."

"You taste like heaven," Ilya rasped, lifting his head, his chin glistening. His eyes were wild. "Like home. I need to be inside. Now."

He rose, shedding his sweatpants. His cock, fully erect, was a formidable sight- thick, veined, the head flushed a deep red and already leaking. He stroked himself slowly, his gaze locked on Shane's spread body. "Look at you. Open for me. Wet for me. Your body knows its alpha."

He didn't ask. He guided himself to Shane's entrance, the blunt head pressing against the incredible, yielding heat. He pushed in, not in one swift motion, but with a slow, relentless penetration that stole the breath from Shane's lungs. He felt every inch, the stretch, the burn, the profound rightness of it. Ilya sank to the hilt, burying himself fully, and they both groaned, a harmony of raw need.

For a moment, he just stayed there, embedded, his body trembling with the effort of holding still. He lowered himself, covering Shane completely, and kissed him, deep and filthy, letting him taste himself on Ilya's tongue.

“You feel that?” Ilya whispered against his lips, giving a shallow, grinding thrust. “That is where I belong. Deep in your cunt. Filling the space made for me.”

He began to move, setting a deep, rhythmic pace that was pure claiming. Each thrust was a deliberate conquest, hitting a spot inside that made Shane see stars. But Ilya wasn't satisfied. His hand slid down, over Shane's trembling belly, through the wetness, until his thumb found his other entrance.

“This too,” Ilya breathed, his voice thick with lust. “Every part. I want you so full of me you can't tell where you end and I begin.”

He pressed his thumb in, just past the tight ring of muscle, alongside the relentless glide of his cock in Shane's cunt. The double sensation was overwhelming, a flood of pleasure so intense it bordered on pain. Shane sobbed, his body bowing, completely impaled, completely owned.

Ilya's pace became more urgent, his thrusts harder, his thumb working in time. He was everywhere, overwhelming all of Shane's senses- the smell of their coupling, the sound of skin slapping and ragged breaths, the sight of Ilya's face, clenched in ecstatic agony above him, the taste of sweat and salt, and the all-consuming feeling of being taken.

“I'm going to breed you, Shane,” Ilya chanted, his rhythm becoming erratic, primal. “Right here. Right now. I'm going to pump my seed so deep into your womb it takes root. I want to see your belly swell with my baby. I want everyone who looks at you to know you are mine. That I filled you, claimed you, bred you.”

The words, dark and possessive, lit a fire in Shane's blood, it was a biological truth roaring to the surface. The idea of it, of being so thoroughly claimed, of having Ilya's child growing inside him- unlocked a deep, submissive well of desire. It was the ultimate surrender, the ultimate connection.

“Yes,” Shane gasped, his own voice unrecognizable. “Do it. Breed me. I want it, I want your baby-”

His permission shattered Ilya's control. With a guttural roar, Ilya drove into him one final, devastating time, his thumb pressing deep, and Shane felt him swell, then pulse, a hot, torrential flood releasing deep into his cunt. The sensation of being filled, claimed, seeded, triggered his own climax. It ripped through him, a cataclysm of pleasure that clenched around Ilya's cock and thumb, milking him, as his own release striped his stomach. The orgasm seemed endless, a fusion of physical ecstasy and profound, psychic completion.

The violence of the climax- the dual, full-body convulsion in the dream perfectly synced with the wrenching, real orgasm in his sleeping body, was a seismic shock too great.

Shane woke with a strangled cry, his back arching off the mattress in the dark of his bedroom.

The phantom sensations were horrifically vivid: the stretch, the heat, the flooding release. The real ones were a mortifying confirmation: the slick wetness soaking his thighs, the sticky mess on his abdomen, the rich, sweet, unmasked scent of omega in pure heat and satisfaction hanging thick in the air.

He had come. Spectacularly. In his sleep. At the exact moment of the dream's violent, breeding fantasy.

"Oh, god. No."

He scrambled from the bed, his heart a frantic bird trapped in his ribs. The scent was everywhere, cloying, damning. He didn't turn on the light. He couldn't face the evidence. He stumbled to the bathroom, legs like water, and fumbled for the shower. He didn't wait. He stepped under a blast of icy water, pajamas and all, gasping as it shocked his feverish skin.

He scrubbed until his skin was raw, trying to erase the ghost of Ilya's hands, his mouth, his claim. He stood under the freezing spray until he shivered uncontrollably, the dream's heat finally scoured away.

Afterward, in the dark, he changed the sheets with robotic efficiency, bundling the soiled evidence away. Only then, standing in the center of his pristine, scentless room, wrapped in a towel, did the full weight of it crash down.

It wasn't just a sex dream. It was a full-blown, detailed fantasy of complete surrender and primal breeding. His body, his omega nature, hadn't just mutinied. It had drafted a blueprint for its own colonization and begged for it.

He sat on the edge of the clean bed, head in his hands, the echo of Ilya's voice a brand on his soul: I want to see your belly swell with my baby.

And the most terrifying part? In the depths of the dream, he had wanted it, too.

The silence of his phone felt accusatory. It sat on his kitchen counter, a black rectangle of unfulfilled obligation, while Shane meticulously scrambled egg whites. He'd missed the morning check-in. For over two months, like clockwork, he had initiated their glacial-paced text exchange every few days. It was a rule, a structure, and Shane lived by structure.

Today, the thought of typing out some inane comment about the weather or his training regimen made his skin crawl. It felt like a lie. How could he send 'The humidity is brutal today. How's friendly Russian?' when his body still hummed with the phantom echo of being filled, claimed, bred? It would be a desecration of their careful, sterile agreement. It would be an admission that Ilya, even an ocean away, still lived in his synapses, in his biology, in his dreams.

He ate without tasting, cleaned the plate with robotic efficiency, and stared at the phone. Ilya wouldn't text. He was scrupulous about that rule. The silence would stretch, and Ilya would interpret it correctly- as a withdrawal, a step back on the glacier. That's what Shane wanted, wasn't it? More distance.

A cold, hollow anxiety pooled in his stomach. He wasn't built for this kind of ambiguity. He needed to talk to someone who wouldn't therapize him, but who also knew the whole, ugly story. He picked up the phone and scrolled past Ilya's name, his thumb hovering over his mother's contact before moving on. She'd be loving but terrified. He needed bluntness. Plus he'd been avoiding the long overdue conversation of what was going on between him and Ilya.

He called Rose.

She answered on the third ring, her voice bright and slightly breathless. "Shane! Hey, I'm just between takes, you have perfect timing. What's up honey?"

Just hearing her voice, so normal, so anchored in his real life, made his throat tighten. "Can you talk? I mean, really talk?"

The background noise on her end faded, replaced by the sound of a door closing. "Okay, I'm in my trailer. You sound weird. What's wrong? Is it..." She lowered her voice.

"It's me," Shane said, sinking onto his couch. He pulled a cushion into his lap, gripping it tightly. "I had a dream. A really... graphic dream. About him."

He told her. Not in the visceral, anatomical detail he'd experienced, but in blunt, clinical terms that still made his face heat. "It was about sex. Possessive sex. And it... woke me up. Physically. I haven't been able to think straight since."

Rose was silent for a long moment. He could practically hear her thinking, parsing the information through her fiercely protective lens. "Okay," she said finally, her voice carefully neutral. "First, it's just a dream. Your brain processing shit. You've been under insane stress for over a year, you're on a chemical cocktail to suppress your entire secondary gender, and your ex-boyfriend-thing, who is also your obsessive, possessive, maybe-still-in-love-with-you alpha rival- just went back to a country that's basically an omega dystopia. It's not surprising your subconscious is throwing a rave."

"A rave where I get knotted and bred," Shane said flatly.

“A metaphorical rave,” Rose insisted, though her tone was gentler. “Shane, your body has needs you’ve been medically silencing for years. The mind finds a way to express that. It doesn’t mean you want him back, necessarily. It might just mean you’re... lonely. Or horny. Or both. Like you’ve only had sex with one person. You’re too hot to keep all that to yourself.”

“It didn’t feel metaphorical. It felt like a memory.” He pressed the heel of his hand against his forehead. “And now I can’t bring myself to text him. It feels like he’d know. Like he’d smell it on the words.”

“Good,” Rose said, her protectiveness surfacing. “Maybe you shouldn’t text him. Maybe this is your brain’s way of telling you to cut the thread. He’s in Russia, Shane. He’s doing god-knows-what, meeting with government creeps who probably offer him omegas like canapés. Why are you keeping this line open?”

“Because he’s trying,” Shane whispered, the truth of it aching. “He’s sick, and he’s trying. He gives me the space I asked for. He follows the rules.”

“He also burned a man alive and enjoyed it,” Rose shot back, not unkindly, but with the brutal honesty only a best friend could wield. “Trying is the bare minimum. It doesn’t entitle him to a piece of you. Not even a ‘casual text buddy’ piece.”

He had no argument. She was right. Everything she said was logically, defensibly right.

“So what do I do?” The question was barely audible.

Rose sighed. “I have to get back to set in five. Let’s have dinner. My place. That new Lebanese place near me. We’ll talk properly. No phones, no distractions. Just us.”

“Okay.”

“And Shane? Breathe. It was a dream. You’re safe. He’s thousands of miles away. You’re in control.”

He hung up, clinging to her words. You’re in control. He repeated it like a mantra as he changed into his workout gear and drove to the team’s private training facility.

The controlled environment of the gym usually centered him. The predictable whir of treadmills, the clank of weights, the smell of rubber and sweat. Today, the sounds were too sharp, the lights too bright. He flinched when Hayden dropped a 45-pound plate onto the floor with a resonant clang.

“Whoa, Holzy, you okay?” Hayden asked, wiping his brow with his forearm. He was doing deadlifts, his face flushed with effort.

“Fine,” Shane said, too quickly. He moved to a cable machine, focusing on the precise, repetitive motion of a lat pulldown. Control the movement. Control the breath.

JJ wandered over from the leg press, his usual easy-going expression tempered with concern. “You’re looking a little... twitchy, cap. Everything cool with the fam?”

“Family’s fine,” Shane said, avoiding eye contact, counting his reps in his head. Eleven... Twelve...

Hayden and JJ shared a glance over his head, a whole silent conversation passing between them. They’d been his shields, his unknowing guardians during the worst of it. They didn’t know the details- they thought it was a standard, messy breakup with a rival player- but they knew it had broken something in him. They’d learned to read his moods.

“Okay,” Hayden said, his voice deliberately casual. “Well, if you wanna hit the heavy bag later, I’m down. Good for working out the weirdness.”

“Or we could just order a truly irresponsible amount of pizza and watch bad action movies,” JJ offered. “No talking required.”

The offers, so simple and full of uncomplicated, brotherly care, almost undid him. This was his life. His team. His friends. A world away from golden-lit hotel rooms and Russian whispers.

They nodded, leaving him to his workout, but he felt their watchful attention for the rest of the session. He was jumpy, and they’d noticed. The facade was cracking.

The restaurant was cozy, all warm wood and the scent of garlic and roasting meat. Rose had secured a booth in the back, partially shielded by a decorative screen. She’d already ordered a plate of hummus and fresh, warm pita.

“Okay,” she said, after they’d ordered. “Start from the beginning. Don’t clinicalize it. Just tell me.”

So he did. Haltingly, his face burning, he gave her more of the dream’s texture. The way the distance dissolved. The feeling of his suppressants simply not existing. The shocking, vivid clarity of Ilya’s possession, the words he’d used, the dual penetration, the overwhelming focus on breeding.

Rose listened, her expression serious, her food forgotten. When he finished, she took a long drink of water.

“Wow,” she said softly. “That’s... intense.”

“It felt more real than any other dream I’ve ever had.”

“I believe you.” She tore a piece of pita, swirling it in the hummus without eating it. “So, your subconscious isn’t just suggesting a quick hookup. It’s suggesting full-bonding, baby-making, forever-claiming with the one person who is categorically the worst choice for that.”

“Thanks, that’s helpful,” Shane said drily.

“I’m just naming the monster.” She finally ate the pita, thinking. “Here’s my take, for what it’s worth. You’ve been in survival mode for so long. First, hiding your gender. Then, managing Ilya’s obsession. Then, recovering from the kidnapping. Your entire sexual, romantic, biological identity has been tied to trauma, secrecy, and crisis. You haven’t had a single normal, healthy, fun sexual experience as your full self. Ever.”

The truth of it landed, heavy and sad.

“Your body is rebelling,” Rose continued. “It’s screaming for an outlet. But your mind, understandably, associates ‘outlet’ with ‘Ilya,’ because he’s the only one who’s ever seen that part of you, even if he twisted it. So your brain serves up Ilya as the vehicle for the release you need.”

“So what’s the solution? More therapy?”

“Therapy for the trauma, absolutely. But for the... physiological frustration?” Rose leaned forward. “Maybe you need to reprogram the association. Find a new outlet. A safe one.”

Shane blinked. “What, like... date?”

“God, no. Dating is a minefield.” Rose shook her head. “But you’re a young, incredibly fit guy. You have needs. What if you found a... friend. A discreet, understanding friend.

Someone you trust, where there's zero romantic expectation. A friends-with-benefits situation. No strings, no obsession, just... mutual release. You get to experience physical intimacy on your terms, in a controlled setting, without all the apocalyptic baggage."

The idea was so foreign, so utterly outside the binary he'd lived in- complete celibacy vs. all-consuming entanglement with Ilya- that he couldn't process it. "Who? How? I can't just... I'm not like that."

"You could be," Rose said gently. "If it was safe. It's about taking that power back. Your body, your choice, your rules. No one monitoring you, no one claiming you, no one breeding you. Just pleasure. To remind you that it can exist separately from him."

Before he could formulate a response, a flash went off near the entrance. Then another. A paparazzo, lens pointed directly at their booth. Rose groaned. "Ugh, perfect. Tomorrow's headline: 'Shane Hollander and Rose Labelle Spark Dating Rumors Again Over Cozy Dinner.' Sorry."

Shane shrugged, used to it. But as the waiter delivered their mains, the idea Rose had planted took root. A friends-with-benefits situation. A safe, controlled experiment in reclaiming his own sexuality. It sounded terrifying. It sounded impossible.

But as he picked at his lamb kofta, the ghost of the dream still clinging to him, the alternative- continuing to be haunted by a phantom Ilya in his sleep while maintaining a sterile text-based purgatory with the real one- sounded like a slower, more exquisite kind of torture.

He looked at Rose, who was glaring in the direction of the departed photographer. "How," he asked quietly, "does one even find a 'discreet, understanding friend' for that?"

Rose turned back to him, a slow, sympathetic smile on her face. "We start," she said, "by figuring out what you actually want. What feels safe. We make a list. Like you do with everything else."

A list. Rules. Structure. Shane felt the first faint stirring of something that wasn't dread or desire, but possibility. It was a terrifying possibility, but it was his.

The "Get Shane Laid" list as Rose called it, was a disaster.

It lived on his Notes app, a sterile bullet-point manifesto of What Feels Safe. Rose had helped him draft it over coffee the morning after their dinner, her phone buzzing constantly with messages from her publicist about the "dating rumors" photos.

"Okay, rule one," she'd said, tapping her screen. "No alphas."

Shane had nodded immediately. The idea of an alpha's natural dominance, the biological push-and-pull, the potential for a claim... it was the core of the Ilya-shaped trauma. "Agreed. Betas only."

"Rule two: Must have zero connection to professional hockey. No players, no coaches, no staff, no reporters."

Another check, not as easy. Hockey was the arena of their rivalry, their friendship, their love. It was contaminated ground.

"Rule three: Discretion is non-negotiable. They sign an NDA if it gets to that point. Your privacy is everything."

"Rule four: No romantic expectations. This is physical. Transactional, almost."

“Rule five,” Shane had added, his voice quiet. “They have to be... calm. Steady. Not intense.”

Rose had looked at him then, her expression softening. “You’re describing the opposite of him.”

“That’s the point.”

For a week, Rose operated as a reluctant, fiercely protective matchmaker. She had connections- friends of friends, a guy from her yoga class, a respectful beta cinematographer she’d worked with. She’d send Shane photos and bios, pared down to the relevant list criteria.

And every single one gave him the ick.

Mark, the yoga guy, was calm and steady. He was also passionately into crystal healing and talked about “energy alignment” in a way that made Shane’s skin crawl. His lack of intensity felt not like safety, but like a profound absence of passion. Shane found himself missing the electric, all-consuming focus Ilya could bring to a simple conversation about airport food.

Ben, the cinematographer, was discreet, professional, and happily polyamorous. He explained his boundaries with elegant clarity. It was all perfectly reasonable, and Shane felt nothing but a cold, polite detachment. The man’s emotional landscape was so maturely mapped, so unmessy. Shane realized, with a sinking heart, that he associated care with a certain kind of beautiful, destructive messiness. With someone memorizing his coffee order not because it was polite, but because knowing his preferences felt like a vital piece of intelligence.

The final straw was Derek, a beta graphic designer who was funny, kind, and loved hockey as a fan. He was the closest fit. They met for a strictly platonic coffee. Derek was great. He was fine. He made Shane laugh once with a story about a disastrous client.

And when Derek casually touched his arm to emphasize a point, Shane had to suppress a full-body flinch. Not out of fear, but out of a profound, wrong sense of disloyalty. His skin, traitorously, remembered a different, calloused touch. The quiet, steady beta touch felt like a cheap imitation.

He texted Rose that night.

Shane- It's not going to work.

Rose Landry- Which one?

Shane- Any of them. All of them. It's me. I'm broken.

Rose Landry- You're not broken. You're hung up. There's a difference.

Shane- It feels the same.

He lay in bed, the structured list feeling like a taunt. He mentally ran through the criteria. Calm. Steady. Beta. Non-hockey. Discreet. He imagined a person who embodied them perfectly.

Then he imagined that person trying to make him laugh after a brutal loss. He imagined them understanding the specific, grinding pressure of a playoff streak. He imagined them knowing, without being told, that he needed the blankets arranged a certain way, that overhead lighting after 7 PM gave him a headache.

Every point on the list, every trait he'd identified as "safe," was just a negative-space silhouette of Ilya Rozanov. The intensity, the hockey obsession, the alpha possessiveness- he had tried to carve those out. But what was left wasn't a person he could want. It was a cardboard cutout. The very architecture of his attraction, it seemed, had been built around a single, flawed, dangerous blueprint.

The realization was a quiet devastation. He wasn't looking for a safe alternative. He was looking for Ilya, with the dangerous parts removed. And that man didn't exist.

Three days later, watching a group of kids at his summer camp utterly fail to execute a simple passing drill in a delightful, chaotic mess, he did something impulsive. He took a picture. Jackie, who was hanging around as the camp mom, had captured him in the middle of it, his stick held out as a gentle guide for a tiny, determined seven-year-old who was swinging at the puck like it had insulted her family. Shane's face was relaxed, a real smile touching his eyes, the summer sun bright on his hair.

He looked at the photo. It was a slice of his real life, his healing life. Without overthinking, he opened his text thread with Ilya. The last message was from over a week ago, his own unanswered text about the humidity. He attached the photo and typed.

Shane- My legacy. Teaching the next generation to whiff on wide-open nets.

The reply came later that evening, as he was sorting gear.

IGR- This is a good picture. You look happy. The child looks... fiercely committed to missing. The form is terrible. I love it.

It was a standard, friendly reply. Perfectly within the bounds of their "acquaintance" agreement. It was exactly what he should have wanted.

It felt like ash in his mouth. He wanted more. He wanted Ilya to say, 'You are beautiful in the sun.' He wanted him to ask, 'Do you think about teaching our own child that one day?' He wanted the possessive, obsessive, all-consuming attention that had once suffocated him. The neutrality was a new kind of torture. He refused to overthink it- it was the definition of crazy but right then, he didn't care.

So he began to share more. Carefully curated pieces of his life, trying to feed a hunger he couldn't name. A picture of the whole camp group, arms slung around each other, faces sweaty and grinning. A shot of him and Hayden and JJ collapsed on the bench after playing with the kids, red-faced and laughing.

IGR- Team Pike-Hollander-JJ remains undefeated against minors. A proud day.

The replies were always there. Always friendly. Always neutral. A chasm of polite distance yawned beneath every exchanged photo and quip. Shane found himself scrutinizing each message, looking for a crack, a hint of the old, hungry Ilya. There was none. The medication, the therapy, the rules- they were working. Ilya was being good. And it was driving Shane quietly mad.

The ragebait was not a conscious decision. It was a desperate, spiraling impulse.

It started with Scott. He was at a team barbecue at Kip and Scott's house, with some of the Voyaguers invited along with some of the New Jersey rookies. The first truly relaxed gathering since the season ended. Kip, heavily pregnant now, glowed with a serene, healthy happiness that made something in Shane's chest ache. Scott was attentive, grounding, his alpha presence so gentle and supportive it was like a masterclass in everything Ilya was not. Jackie took a picture of them by the grill, Shane smiling as Scott demonstrated a flipping technique. The alpha's arm was loosely around Shane's shoulders, a gesture of pure, platonic camaraderie.

Shane sent it.

Shane- Learning the secrets of the perfect burger. Scott is a grill-master.

He waited, his heart a hard, anxious knot in his chest. This would do it. The sight of another alpha, a good one, touching him. The domestic setting. The smile.

The reply came an hour later.

IGR- I hope you and the team are having a good evening.

It was so bland, so utterly devoid of the jealous, possessive fire Shane had been braced for, that he actually laughed, a sharp, hollow sound. He'd thrown a lit match into what he thought was a powder keg, and it had landed in a bucket of water.

He escalated. He sent a photo of him and a young, handsome beta intern from his father's department at work, who'd joined them for lunch. He sent a goofy, arms-around-each-other shot with three of his single beta teammates after a pickup game. Each time, he crafted a caption that hinted at casual, easy companionship.

Each time, Ilya's response was a variation on a theme: polite, slightly humorous, completely detached. A sports commentary on the pickup game. A question about the architecture firm's projects. It was like texting a particularly friendly, knowledgeable chatbot.

The final attempt was the most blatant. It was a selfie, taken in his own kitchen, sent late at night. He was wearing a soft, old t-shirt, his hair damp from a shower, a faint, tired smile on his face. The setting was intimate. The message was just the photo. No caption.

He stared at the sent image, his pulse thrumming. This was the dream-Shane, the one accessible and unguarded. If anything could pierce the chemical calm and the therapist-mandated rules...

His phone buzzed.

IGR- You look tired. The camp is draining but good, I hope. Sleep well, Hollander.

Sleep well.

Two words of such profound, infuriating neutrality that something in Shane finally snapped. Not into anger, but into a cold, clear despair. He had been trying to provoke a monster back to the surface, and the monster was gone. In its place was a polite, medicated stranger who wished him pleasant dreams.

He put his phone down on the counter. The silence of his apartment pressed in, heavier than ever. The ragebait had failed because there was no rage left to bait. Ilya had successfully walled himself off, becoming the careful, distant acquaintance Shane had demanded.

He had gotten exactly what he asked for. And it felt like losing him all over again.

He didn't text again after that. The glacier pace ground to a complete halt. He had given up.

The first photo was a knife, expertly slipped between his ribs.

Ilya was in the sterile Moscow apartment, staring at the screen of his phone, the chemical calm from his evening dose of lorazepam creating a muffled, padded distance from the world. Then Shane's message came through. The picture of him and Scott Hunter by a grill, Scott's arm a casual, possessive bar across Shane's shoulders. They were both laughing. Scott looked like a fucking poster boy for wholesome alpha partnership- steady, kind, safe. The kind of alpha who grilled burgers and supported his pregnant omega husband and didn't hire private investigators to track the object of his affection.

The rage was instantaneous, a white-hot geyser that erupted through the pharmaceutical fog. His vision tunneled, the edges going dark and sparking with static. His hand clenched around the phone, the case groaning in protest. He saw himself hurling it against the marble wall, watching the screen explode into a spiderweb of cracks, destroying the image, destroying the proof that Shane could smile like that- sun-drenched and easy, under someone else's touch.

Scott Fucking Hunter. The man had everything Ilya had been taught was weak: patience, gentle dominance, open affection. And he had access to Shane, was treated like family. Ilya's breath came in short, sharp gusts. The obsession, that great wounded beast he kept chained and sedated in the dark of his psyche, roared to life. It wanted coordinates. It wanted a threat assessment. It wanted to know Scott Hunter's schedule, his weaknesses, the precise pressure needed to make him remove his arm and never, ever put it back.

Then, the next photo. Shane with JJ, with other teammates, faces flushed with laughter after a game. JJ, the loyal, simple-hearted beta who had been there, in Shane's hotel room, who had seen Shane broken and had helped pick up the pieces Ilya had shattered. The jealousy here was different, colder. It wasn't about rivalry; it was about replacement. JJ offered the uncomplicated friendship Ilya had poisoned. He was the friend Ilya could no longer be.

Ilya stood up, pacing the length of the cold, empty living room. The urge to smash something, to act, was a physical tremor in his hands. He could text back something cutting. He could ignore it. He could, God help him, ask a question. You and Hunter seem close.

But Dr. Kostova's voice was in his head, a drill sergeant in the silence. "The obsession is a security system you built. It is malfunctioning. Your task is not to obey its alarms, but to stand still and let them ring until they stop."

This was a test. Not from Shane- Shane was just living his life, rebuilding it, exactly as he should, but from the universe. Or from his own therapy. A test of his new, fragile control.

He stopped pacing, forcing his hand to relax. The phone remained intact.

Of course Shane wouldn't be alone. The idea was absurd. He was beautiful, brilliant, and kind. He was healing. The world was full of Scotts and JJs and countless other men, betas, alphas, good men who would see that and want to be near it. Who would deserve to be near it. Ilya's claim was forfeit. He had burned it in a gasoline-fed fire. All he had left was the privilege of these text messages, this distant, sterile window into Shane's happiness.

If he wanted to keep that window open, even a crack, he would have to learn to watch. To see Shane smiling in other people's arms, laughing at other people's jokes, building a life with other people's support. He would have to accept it. Even if the acceptance felt like swallowing ground glass. Even if it killed him slowly, cell by cell.

He typed his reply, his fingers stiff. It was bland. Neutral. The kind of thing a casual acquaintance would say. He sent it and put the phone face down on the table, as if it were radioactive.

The subsequent photos were a special kind of torture. Each one was a lesson in a life he was not part of. The group shots, the easy camaraderie, the beta intern from David Hollander's firm - a clean, safe, appropriate connection. Ilya dissected each image with a forensic, agonizing eye, noting the ease in Shane's posture, the lack of tension around his eyes. He was thriving. Away from him.

And then, the final one. The selfie. Shane, soft and tired and freshly showered in his own kitchen. It was an intimacy so casual it stole the air from Ilya's lungs. This wasn't for public consumption. This was a glimpse of a private Shane, a Shane at rest. And he had sent it to Ilya.

The beast in his chest howled, begging him to respond in kind. To say something that would claw back a piece of that intimacy. You look beautiful. I miss you.

He picked up the phone. His thumb hovered. He thought of the government man, Vitaly, offering him his "pick" of faceless, registered omegas. He thought of Svetlana's father, wasting away in a hospital bed, his daughter's loyalty the only thing easing his pain. He thought of Shane, standing in a hotel room, telling him his healing shouldn't have to look like Ilya's destruction.

He typed the only thing he could allow himself. The only thing that was both true and safe. You look tired. The camp is draining but good, I hope. Sleep well, Hollander.

It was a surrender. A white flag waved from the deepest trenches of his own sickness.

The texts from Shane stopped after that. The silence was worse. Ilya knew why. His neutral, friendly replies had achieved their intended effect. They had built the very distance Shane had asked for. He had passed the test by failing it in the only way that mattered.

The decision to return to the US for early training camp was an escape. Moscow's atmosphere, the oppressive political climate, the ghost of his father in every shadow, the memory of Vitaly's offer- was a poison he could no longer breathe. He needed the structure of hockey. The mindless, physical punishment of the ice.

He packed his bag in the silent apartment. As he folded his training gear, a stupid, stubborn hope took root, a weed in the cracks of his resolve. He was flying into New York, but his team's first preseason game was in Toronto. A back-to-back, in fact. He would be in the city for forty-eight hours.

He finished packing and zipped the bag closed. The hope was a live wire in his chest, painful and bright. He knew, with a certainty that felt like fate, that the text would not come. Shane was done testing him. Shane was moving on.

He was leaving Russia. He was returning to the same continent, the same league, the same orbit as Shane Hollander. But the distance between them, he understood now, had nothing to do with geography. It was measured in the space between a genuine smile in a photo and the bland, acceptable reply it received. It was a chasm he had helped dig, and he would have to learn to live on his side of it.

At the airport, waiting for his flight to be called, he received a single message. Not from Shane.

Sveta- Do not do anything stupid in America. Remember the rules. Remember the box you are sitting on. Do not lift the lid.

IGR- I remember.

Sveta- Good. Then go play hockey. It is the only thing you have ever done simply because you love it. Try to remember that feeling. I love you, Ilyaуска.

He boarded the plane, the ghost of a hope for a Montreal invitation still flickering faintly in the dark hold of his heart, already braced for it to be extinguished.

Chapter End Notes

I'd like to formally apologize to everyone who celebrated the healthy communication and emotional growth in the first half of this chapter.

You should have known better. 🤦

Next chapter will be up Tuesday-maybe lol. I might be convinced to post earlier.

Please remember that canon Shane is a freaky deaky boy and we'll get to see that because yum. Thoughts and prayers for our boys. They're going to need them. ❤️

Chapter 23: Chapter 23

Chapter Summary

First of all, thank you for all the comments on the last chapter and for the new reviewers catching up. Special thanks to my beta reader-you're a gem and to my bestie Alex-you're a freaky deaky but that's why I adore you. ❤️

I was planning to take a little longer with this one, but then you all started making me blush, theorizing, and all that, and generally enabling me.

So naturally I locked myself in a room with snacks, caffeine, and emotional support bestie and somehow finished this chapter early.

As always, I take no responsibility for the actions of Shane Hollander, Ilya Rozanov, or Shane Hollander's increasingly questionable decision-making skills.

Enjoy. 😊

The silence in his apartment had become a physical presence. It had weight, texture- a thick, humming stillness that seemed to press against Shane's eardrums. For days, the only sounds had been the methodical scrape of his knife on the cutting board, the hum of the dishwasher, the soft tap of his fingers on his therapy journal. The text thread with Ilya was a frozen wasteland, a monument to his own failed provocations and Ilya's impeccable, devastating control.

He couldn't stand it.

Sitting rigidly at his kitchen island, he stared at his phone. The logical part of his brain, the part that built schedules and followed rules, recited the facts: You asked for distance. He is giving it. This is the correct outcome. The rest of him, the part that still dreamed in gasoline-scented shadows and golden hotel light was screaming.

His thumb moved before he could debate it further.

Shane- Good morning.

Two words. Innocuous. A restart. A thread thrown back across the chasm. He hit send and immediately stood up, the stool scraping harshly against the floor.

Pacing began. A tight, six-step circuit from the island to the living room window and back. He counted his breaths. Four in. Seven hold. Eight out. It didn't calm the frantic buzz under his skin. He checked the phone. Nothing. Of course. It was early. Ilya was in Russia. The time difference was... he couldn't even calculate it. His mind was static.

He paced for seventeen minutes. The silence of the phone was an amplifier for every terrible thought. He's ignoring you. He's done. You finally pushed him away for good. He's with Svetlana, or he's in a meeting with some government creep, or he's just deleted your contact altogether. Probably found some easy omega in Russia who wouldn't cause so many problems.

On the twenty-third minute, his phone buzzed on the countertop. He lunged for it, his heart a trapped bird slamming against his ribs.

IGR- Good morning. I am not in Russia. I left earlier than planned. I just landed in Boston.

The world tilted. Boston. He was back. On the same continent, in the same time zone. The distance, which had felt galactic, collapsed to a few hundred miles of manageable airspace. A wild, illogical hope, sharp as a shard of glass, pierced the anxiety.

Shane bit his lower lip hard enough to sting, the pain a grounding spike. He started pacing again, faster now, the six-step circuit feeling like a cage. His mind raced through calculations. Training camp didn't start for over a week. Ilya was in Boston.

The impulse was a riptide, pulling him under before he could fight it. His fingers flew over the screen.

Shane- Come to Montreal. If you want. Before camp. You could... hang out. For a few days.

He sent it and nearly threw the phone onto the sofa, as if it were about to detonate. Hang out. What a stupid, juvenile phrase. What did that even mean? Were they sixteen? This was the man who had built a prison of surveillance around him and then burned down a whole freaking house to get him back. They didn't "hang out."

The wait this time was agony, a slow-motion freefall. He stood frozen in the middle of his living room, staring at the blank TV screen, seeing nothing. Every possible rejection played out in his head. I am busy. I have things to do. It is not a good idea. We should maintain distance.

The buzz, when it came, was a shock to his system.

IGR- Okay. There is a flight in one hour. It should land at Trudeau in just over three hours.

Okay.

Simple. Direct. No questions, no negotiations, no cautious probing. Just... okay.

The reality of it hit Shane like a gust of wind. He was coming. Ilya was coming to Montreal. In three hours. To hang out.

His phone slipped from his suddenly nerveless fingers, clattering onto the hardwood floor. He didn't pick it up. He turned and half-ran, half-stumbled down the hall to his bedroom, throwing open the doors to his walk-in closet.

He stared at the contents, and a wave of sheer panic washed over him. Everything was wrong. It was all uniforms: rows of impeccably tailored suits for press conferences, stacks of team-branded polos and hoodies, neat piles of dark-wash jeans and simple, solid-colored t-shirts. It was the wardrobe of Shane Hollander, Beta Hockey Star. It was structured, safe, and utterly, completely bland.

What did one wear to “hang out” with the architect of your trauma and the subject of your most erotic dreams? Nothing he owned seemed remotely adequate. The grey t-shirt was too casual. The dark green henley felt like it was trying at all. The jeans were just jeans.

“No, no, no,” he muttered, running his hands through his hair.

He needed help. He needed a translator for a situation he had no map for. He snatched his phone from the floor, his fingers trembling as he pulled up FaceTime and hit Rose’s contact.

She answered after two rings, her face filling the screen. She was in a makeup chair, a silk robe around her shoulders, a stylist hovering behind her with a curling iron. “Shane? What’s wrong?”

“I need help,” he blurted out, his voice tight with stress.

“What kind of help? Are you okay?” Her protective instincts immediately sharpened her tone.

“I need you to help me pick an outfit.”

Rose blinked. The stylist paused, glancing at the screen with curiosity. “An... outfit. For what?”

Shane began pacing again, the camera jostling. “For a date. I think. I don’t know. It’s not a date-date. It’s a hang-out. But it needs to be... right. Nothing in my closet is right. It’s all wrong.”

“A date.” Rose’s voice was flat. “With who?”

“I can’t- I’ll tell you later. Please, Rose. It’s not even a date. Its a hang out.”

The words tumbled out. He saw the instant it registered in her eyes. The concern hardened into something else- understanding, frustration, worry. She knew. Of course she knew. There was only one “he” that could reduce Shane Hollander to a pacing, closet-meltdown mess.

She was silent for a long moment, her gaze searching his through the screen. He could see the war in her expression: the desire to tell him to cancel, to run, to stick to the list. And the deeper loyalty, the one that made her his best friend.

Finally, she sighed, a short, exasperated sound. “Okay. Okay, you disaster. Point the camera at the closet. And for God’s sake, stop pacing. You’re making me seasick.”

Relief, weak and shaky, flooded him. He wasn’t alone in this. He aimed the camera at the rows of clothing. “See? It’s all terrible.”

“It’s all you,” Rose corrected, her professional eye already assessing. “Which is the problem, isn’t it? You don’t know who to be for this.” She leaned closer to her screen. “Alright. Forget ‘date.’ Think ‘confident, casual, I-have-my-life-together. I’m the hottest player in this damn league.’ Which you are. Show me that. Confident armor. Do you still have those black leather pants from that charity gala two months ago? The ones you said you’d never wear again?”

Shane blinked, then rummaged deep into the back of the closet. He found the garment bag, unzipped it, and held up the pants. They were slim-cut, buttery soft black leather. “These? Rose, I can’t wear these to just... hang out. They’re for a red carpet.”

“Exactly. They say you’re not trying to be casual. You’re making a statement. You’re not the same person as before. Now, a shirt. You need something underneath that isn’t aggressive. Something that softens the leather.” Her eyes scanned the shelves. “That semi-sheer white t-shirt. The viscose one. It’s elegant, it’s a little vulnerable, and it’s the exact opposite of a hockey jersey.”

Shane fumbled for it, holding it up. It was luxuriously soft, simple but elegant.

“Yes. That. It’s approachable but put-together. It says you didn’t try too hard, but you also didn’t just roll out of bed. Which, for you, is trying very hard. Now, shoes. Not athletic shoes. The black leather boots with that tiny heel—the Louboutins. Let me see you try it on.”

As Rose dictated and Shane pulled items out, creating a small pile on his bed, the frantic panic began to recede, channeled into the manageable task of following instructions. This was a problem with a solution. Pick A, then B, then C. Yet, with each selected item, the reality solidified. He was building an outfit for Ilya. He was preparing for his arrival. The countdown, once a source of nausea, was now a heartbeat in the room.

“You’ll look like you have a spine and a pulse, which is an improvement over your usual ‘reliable neutral’ palette. Now, the blazer. You need to pull it together, make it look intentional, not like a costume.” She tapped her chin. “The black Saint Laurent blazer. The one with the sharp shoulders and the satin lapel. It’s severe. It’s expensive. It says ‘I am in control of this situation,’ even if you’re currently having a meltdown on FaceTime.”

He pulled out the blazer, the weight and cut of it immediately feeling different in his hands. It wasn’t a sports coat; it was a piece of architecture. As he laid the pieces on the bed—the inky leather, the cloud-like shirt, the sharply tailored blazer—the frantic panic began to recede, replaced by a strange, focused calm. This wasn’t just picking clothes. This was constructing a persona. A version of Shane Hollander who was confident, sophisticated, untouchable. A version who could handle Ilya Rozanov showing up in his city with three hours’ notice.

Rose’s gaze was serious now, all business. “Shane... this outfit isn’t for ‘hanging out.’ This is for a negotiation. A reunion. A declaration. Are you sure this is what you want?”

He looked at the ensemble on the bed. It was a far cry from a grey sweater and jeans. It was a uniform for a battle he didn’t fully understand. “I don’t know what I want to do,” he admitted quietly. “I just know I can’t wear a team polo.”

Rose sighed, her expression softening with reluctant understanding. “Then wear the armor. Just remember, it’s still you underneath. And for god’s sake, text me when you get there and an hour after. I need a check in text every hour or I’m going there with a taser.”

She hung up, leaving him in the sudden silence of his bedroom. The countdown was no longer an abstract source of nausea. It was a clock ticking in his head, in the sleek lines of the leather pants, in the severe cut of the blazer. He had two and a half hours to become the man who could wear this outfit and face the ghost from his dreams, who was currently somewhere over the Atlantic, drawing closer with every passing minute.

Shane stared at the assembled outfit on his bed, the stark black and white a silent proclamation. The clock on his nightstand read just over two hours until landing. A new, more practical anxiety surfaced. Logistics. He picked up his phone, the glass cool against his still-tingling fingers.

Shane- What's your flight number? I'll pick you up.

He sent it, then immediately cringed. It was too direct, too presumptuous. It assumed a level of welcome Ilya might not feel. But the alternative, letting him get a cab, arrive in the city alone felt cold. Wrong.

The reply came faster than he expected.

IGR- United 1422. But do not trouble yourself. I will take a car. I need to check into my hotel first, get settled. Perhaps we could meet in the hotel restaurant after? It is neutral ground.

Hotel? Neutral ground?

The words were a cold splash of water. Shane frowned, his thumb hovering over the screen. He'd been so focused on the seismic fact of Ilya's arrival, he hadn't considered the mechanics. Of course Ilya would get a hotel. That was the sensible, independent, boundary-respecting thing to do. The thing a casual acquaintance would do. Just like Shane had wanted.

But they weren't casual acquaintances. They were... whatever this shattered thing was. And Shane had a perfectly good, empty guest room. A guest room that was, in fact, on the opposite side of the apartment from his own bedroom, with a full bathroom in between. It was the epitome of ‘plenty of room.’ It was safe, private, and would save Ilya the cost and the sterile loneliness of a hotel.

His mind, always seeking the most efficient, structured solution, presented it clearly. It made logical sense. It was a kind offer. It was also, he realized with a sinking heart, a massive overstep. An invasion of the very ‘neutral ground’ Ilya was meticulously constructing.

He paced to the window, looking out at the quiet Montreal street. He wanted to text back: You can stay here. I have the space. The offer burned on his tongue. It was the truth. It was also a grenade rolled into the careful, demilitarized zone they were trying to establish.

He thought of Ilya in a generic hotel room, alone with his medication and his thoughts, staring at the same acoustic-tile ceiling Shane had stared at in Room 329. The image was desolate. He thought of Ilya here, in his space, surrounded by Shane’s things—his books, his carefully organized kitchen, the quiet hum of his life. That image was terrifying for a different reason. It was intimate. It was a vulnerability he wasn’t sure he was ready to offer, and a trust he wasn’t sure Ilya would know how to receive without twisting it.

But the hotel restaurant? It felt like a business meeting. A debriefing.

His brain’s need for clarity warred with the ocean of emotional ambiguity. What was the protocol for this? What were the rules? His rule had been ‘glacier pace.’ Ilya’s rule was ‘distance.’ Meeting in a public hotel restaurant was glacier pace. It was distance. It was correct.

It felt like a defeat.

He typed, deleted, and typed again, his frustration mounting.

Shane- You don’t need a hotel. I have a guest room. It’s separate. You’d have your own space.

He sent it before he could stop himself. A direct challenge to the ‘neutral ground.’ An offer of something that was neither the intimacy of his bed nor the sterility of a hotel. A middle ground he was desperately trying to engineer.

The wait for a reply was agonizing. He watched the three dots appear, then disappear, then appear again. Ilya was wrestling with it too.

IGR- That is a generous offer. More than generous. But the hotel is already booked. Non-refundable. And... it is better this way. The restaurant is good. I will text you the address when I am checked in.

It is better this way.

The finality of it was a door gently but firmly closed in his face. Ilya was choosing the buffer, the structure of a public, impersonal space. He was adhering to the letter of their unspoken law, even when Shane was suddenly, desperately, trying to amend it.

A sharp pang of rejection, clean and cold, shot through him. It was followed immediately by a wave of shame. He was the one who had demanded distance. He was the one who had needed walls. Now, when Ilya was meticulously building those very walls brick by painful brick, Shane was trying to kick a door in them. It wasn't fair.

He took a deep, settling breath. Four in. Seven hold. Eight out. The structure of the breath helped cage the unruly feeling. Ilya was right. It was better this way. Safer. More controlled. It was what he had asked for.

Shane- Okay. Text me the address.

Shane- And Ilya... I'm picking you up from the airport. I don't live far.

This time, he left no room for negotiation. It was a small reclaiming of agency, a tiny push against the wall. He wasn't asking. He was telling. He needed that one gesture, that one point of contact from the impersonal sky to the personal ground.

The reply was swift.

IGR- Okay. Thank you, Shane. I will see you at arrivals.

Shane put the phone down, his heart still beating a complicated rhythm against his ribs. He looked back at the outfit on the bed, the armor of leather and tailored wool. He would wear it. He would drive to the airport. He would meet Ilya in the fluorescent buzz of the arrivals hall, and then he would follow him to a neutral hotel restaurant.

He had gotten a concession for the car ride. A tiny fragment of the closeness he'd impulsively craved. The rest, the guest room, the shared space, the domestic quiet remained on the other side of a line Ilya was determined not to cross. For now, Shane would have to be satisfied with watching him from his side of it, dressed for a battle neither of them knew how to fight.

The clothes lay assembled on the bed, but Shane felt more like a raw nerves. The shower was his first attempt at a ritual, a reset. He stood under the spray, the water as hot as he could stand it, trying to steam away the lingering phantom sensations from the dream and the cold knot of anxiety in his gut. He scrubbed methodically, but his mind wouldn't quiet. It replayed the texts: Neutral ground. Hotel restaurant. It calculated the minutes until arrival. It fixated on the feel of the leather pants he would soon have to pull on.

Drying off, he faced the medicine bag on his bathroom counter. It was a small, zippered case that kept his life in control. Inside, arranged with military precision, were his weekly suppressant pills, his scent-neutralizing patches, his emergency anti-anxiety medication. His hand hovered. His routine was two patches: one in the morning, one in the evening, to ensure total, unwavering containment. To be Shane Hollander, Beta.

His fingers bypassed the pill organizer and went to the box of patches. He took out one. Just one. He applied it to the inside of his collar, right over his scent gland, over the fading mark of Ilya's bite, pressing it firmly until the adhesive caught. It was a compromise. A tiny, deliberate crack in the fortress. He wouldn't be broadcasting his omega scent, but the single patch was less than his full dose. A subconscious, perhaps reckless, allowance for the possibility of... something. A sliver of authenticity in the constructed performance. The thought made his stomach flip.

Dressing was a slow, deliberate ceremony. The semi-sheer white t-shirt felt like wearing a cloud, its softness a stark contrast to the cool, commanding slide of the black leather pants as he pulled them on. They fitted like a second skin, supple and silent. He shrugged into the Saint Laurent blazer, and the transformation was immediate. The sharp lines of the shoulders squared his own, the severe cut pulling his posture straight. In the mirror, he didn't see the anxious man who'd been pacing his kitchen. He saw someone polished, formidable, and untouchable. The outfit was a statement, just as Rose had said. The problem was, he wasn't entirely sure what he was trying to say.

With an hour still to kill, the silence of the apartment became oppressive. The structured part of his brain, the part that thrived on pre-game routines, insisted on preparation. He got out his styling paste and worked it through his damp hair, using the techniques he'd learned from countless photo-shoot stylists, creating deliberate texture, a look of casual perfection that took focused effort. He checked his reflection. The hair, the clothes, the clean, scent-patched skin. It was a costume for a role he'd never rehearsed: Shane Hollander, Confident NHL MVP ready to get the Attention of the Alpha.

He was ready far too early. The urge to just go, to be in motion, was overwhelming. He grabbed his keys and his phone, his fingers brushing against the cool leather of the blazer's lapel as he locked his apartment door.

The drive to Trudeau was a blur of familiar streets under a pale summer sky. He parked in the short-term lot, the silence of the car closing in on him the moment the engine cut off. Now he was here. Now he had to wait.

Sitting was impossible. He got out, leaning against the driver's side door, then immediately pushing off. His hands felt alien, too large, with nothing to hold. He shoved them into the pockets of the leather pants, then pulled them out, crossing his arms over his chest. The pose felt defensive. He uncrossed them. He was twitchy, every nerve ending firing without purpose. The public space of the arrivals area felt like a stage, and he had no idea how to stand on it.

A stupid, desperate thought occurred to him. He pulled out his phone and googled: how to look cool waiting at airport arrivals.

The results were laughable. Stock photos of people holding signs with hearts, overly posed candids, listicles about “airport reunion style.” He snapped his phone off, a flush of heat rising up his neck. What was he doing? This was Ilya. The man who had seen him vomiting from anxiety, who had held him while he shook apart, who had looked into the heart of his obsession and confessed to murder. Posturing for him based on a lifestyle blog was beyond absurd.

But he needed an anchor. A voice from the real world, the simple world. He called JJ.

JJ answered on the second ring, the sound of video game gunfire in the background. “Cap? You good? You never call.”

“I need... a second opinion,” Shane said, pacing a tight circle beside his car.

“On a play? It’s the off-season, man, my brain is in potato mode.”

“Not a play. On... a vibe.”

The gunfire stopped. “A vibe. Okay. I’m listening.”

Shane took a breath, forcing his words to be calm. “If you were picking someone up at the airport. Someone you used to... know. And you wanted to look like you had your life together. Not desperate. What would you do? How would you stand?”

There was a long silence on the other end. Shane could practically hear JJ’s kind, uncomplicated brain processing this. “Okay,” JJ said slowly. “First, you’re overthinking it. But since you’re clearly already overthinking it... glasses.”

“Glasses?”

“Yeah. Sunglasses. They make you look mysterious. Not just staring at the doors like a creeper.”

Shane did own a pair. Several he received from a deal but he rarely used them. He thought he looked ridiculous.

“Second,” JJ continued, warming to his theme. “Don’t pace. It screams ‘anxious chihuahua.’ Lean. Lean on something. The hood of your car is good. But like, casually. One foot up, arms relaxed. You’re not waiting; you’re just... being there, and it’s a coincidence they’re arriving.”

“I’m picking them up.”

“Details, cap. Vibe is about illusion. Third, and this is key: have your phone out, but be looking at it like you’re mildly annoyed by a work email. Not like you’re refreshing their flight status every ten seconds. You’re a busy guy. They’re fitting into your world.”

Shane closed his eyes. JJ’s advice was both profoundly stupid and strangely practical. It was a script. A set of physical instructions to follow when his own internal script had failed. “So, glasses, lean, look annoyed at my phone.”

“Bingo. You wanna look like you have a million better places to be, but you’re choosing to be here out of the goodness of your heart. It’s all about selling the ‘none desperate’ look.”

“The ‘non-desperate’ look,” Shane corrected automatically.

“That’s the one. Who are you picking up, anyway? A scout? Agent?” JJ’s tone was curious but carefully light.

Shane hesitated. “Just... an old friend.”

Another pause. JJ was many things, but he wasn't dumb. The outfit query, the airport vibe check, the 'old friend', it added up to only one person. But JJ, in his profound loyalty, didn't push. "Well, tell your 'old friend' I said hey. And remember, lean, don't loom. You got this, cap."

"Thanks, JJ."

He hung up, feeling marginally less untethered. He put on the sunglasses, went to lean against the hood of his car. He leaned against it, trying to mold his body into a shape of casual indifference. He pulled out his phone and stared at it, trying to conjure a convincingly irritated expression.

He felt like an impostor. The severe, beautiful clothes felt like a disguise everyone could see through. The people flowing around him- families embracing, drivers holding signs, couples reuniting with kisses, highlighted the profound strangeness of his own mission. This wasn't a reunion. It was more like a diplomatic summit following a war.

Time stretched, elastic and cruel. He checked the flight status board. Landed. His pulse jumped. Then the wait for bags. Then customs. Each step was a new layer of suspense. He shifted his weight, the leather of his pants sighing softly. He tried the 'one foot up' pose against the car, but it felt staged. He went back to just standing, arms crossed, trying to project a calm he didn't feel.

His phone, the prop in his hand, buzzed. Not a notification. A text.

IGR- Landed. Just getting my bag. I will be out soon.

The words were simple. Factual. But they sent a jolt through his system, a live wire of anticipation that electrified the space between his heart and his stomach. The performance was over. The waiting was almost done.

He pushed off the car, standing fully straight. He didn't try to look busy or annoyed anymore. His gaze fixed on the doors where the passengers would emerge, his body thrumming with a tense, silent readiness. The polished armor of his outfit felt like exactly what it was: both a shield and a declaration. He was here. On his turf. In his city.

And Ilya Rozanov was about to walk through those doors.

The first breath of Montreal air was a shock- so different from Russia, not cold, but clean, scrubbed of Moscow's diesel and political tension. Ilya adjusted the duffel strap on his shoulder, the weight familiar. The sunglasses were a necessity, cutting the fluorescent glare of arrivals into manageable, dark-toned slices. The sleeveless black hoodie and joggers were his go to airport clothes. If he'd known of the invitation to see Shane, he'd worn something better. The backwards baseball cap pulled low was the final piece, shadowing his face. He looked like any athlete traveling incognito. He felt like a man walking into a sniper's alley.

He moved through the crowd, his gaze- hidden behind the dark lenses, sweeping the waiting area with an efficiency born of long habit. Scan, assess, dismiss. Pillar. Family. Driver with a sign. Then-

His breath hitched, a tiny, almost imperceptible catch in his throat.

Shane. He was leaning against a black car, and he looked... fucking devastating.

The image from the texts hadn't done it justice. The black blazer cut a line that made his shoulders look impossibly broad yet sharp. Beneath it, the thin white shirt was a scandalous hint of skin. And the pants... the black leather molded to his legs with a silent, confident claim. This wasn't the Shane in team polos or soft sweaters. This was a revelation. A statement carved from shadow and light.

The reaction was instantaneous, a low, hot punch of desire that gathered in his gut and surged south, thick and demanding. Fuck.

He didn't break stride. The years of media training, of hiding every true feeling behind a smirk, clicked into place. But internally, it was a red-alert scramble. He subtly shifted the duffel bag in front of him, the bulky canvas a perfect, casual shield. He thanked every god he didn't believe in for the sunglasses. Behind their privacy, he could let his gaze devour. He tracked the elegant line of Shane's throat, the way the blazer hugged his narrow waist, the confident set of his stance. He looked powerful. In control. Beautiful. It was a different kind of ache, this sharp, wanting admiration. It was cleaner than obsession, more desperate than nostalgia. It just was.

He stopped a few feet away. "Your car is easier to find than a Montreal power play in the third period," he said, his voice carefully calibrated to sound light, slightly teasing. The familiar hockey jab was safe ground.

Shane's eyes- those steady, intelligent eyes, found his, seeing only their own reflection in the dark lenses. A faint, nervous smile touched his lips. "You made it. Baggage okay?"

"It is all here." Ilya hefted the duffel, using the motion to further adjust its protective placement. "You did not have to come."

"I wanted to." The reply was simple, and it landed somewhere deep in Ilya's chest, a warm, dangerous stone.

The walk to the car was a study in forced normalcy. Ilya was hyper-aware of the space between them, of charged air. He could smell it now, cutting through the airport odors: Shane's clean, soap scent, the faint, expensive note of wool from the blazer, and underneath... just the barest, barest trace of something sweeter, almost masked. The scent patch. He caught the faintest scent of Honeysuckle. Ilya's alpha senses, long-dulled by medication and despair, sharpened to a needle point. The discovery was a seismic shift. It wasn't an invitation. It was a crack in the façade. A tiny, monumental show of trust, or perhaps, a test.

He said nothing.

The car was a sensible, Ilya tossed his bag into the back and took the passenger side. The interior was immaculate, smelling of lemon cleaner and the faint, ingrained scent of Shane's beta-disguise. Now, in the enclosed space, the other, subtler note was more discernible. It took every ounce of his willpower not to turn his head and inhale deeply, to try and catch more of it.

The engine purred to life. The silence that followed was thick, palpable.

“How was your flight?” Shane asked, eyes on the road as he navigated out of the garage.

“Long. Unremarkable. I watched a terrible movie about a talking dog.” Ilya kept his tone even, his body angled slightly toward the window, as if fascinated by the concrete pillars flashing by. It gave him a pretext to keep his profile turned, his lap hidden.

“Sounds... profound.”

“It was not. The dog’s motivations were unclear.” He risked a glance. Shane’s hands were tight on the wheel, knuckles pale. The elegant costume couldn’t hide the tension in his frame. “The traffic is light.”

“Da, it said it was convenient when I booked it.”

Another silence, stretching too long. The air in the car was becoming unbearable. It was filled with everything they weren’t saying. Ilya could feel the heat of Shane’s body from across the console. He could see the way the leather pants tightened across his thigh when he worked the clutch. The blazer had slipped back slightly, and the sheer fabric of the shirt over the curve of his shoulder was an exquisite torture.

He needed to say something. Anything. “The outfit is new.”

Shane stiffened almost imperceptibly. “It’s just clothes.”

“You look very nice,” Ilya corrected softly, before he could stop himself. He immediately wanted to claw the words back. Too much. Too close.

Shane’s jaw tightened. He didn’t deny it. “You look... comfortable.”

Ilya looked down at his own hoodie and joggers, then back out the window. “I travel for utility.” And to hide the evidence of how you affect me, he didn’t add.

They lapsed back into quiet. The cityscape began to flow past- familiar buildings, banners for teams that weren’t theirs. The normalcy of the scenery was a bizarre contrast to the screaming tension inside the car. Ilya kept his breathing measured, his mind repeating the mantras Dr. Kostova had drilled into him. You are in control. He is safe. The urges are just feelings, you can rise above it. It will pass. But the feeling was a hard, aching throb behind his zipper, and the object of its focus was a foot away, smelling like the most delicious secret and looking like a dream he had forfeited the right to have.

He was grateful for the sunglasses. Grateful for the bag in his lap. Grateful, even, for the stilted, terrible small talk. It was the scaffolding holding him up. Without it, he would either reach out or shatter. He wasn’t sure which would be worse.

The hotel restaurant was all low lighting and dark wood, a deliberate attempt at intimacy that felt, to Ilya, like being displayed in a diorama. He’d handed his bag off to a bellhop with a murmured instruction and a generous tip, a transaction that bought him a few more minutes of barrier between his duffel and Shane’s perceptive gaze. He’d requested a private booth in the back, a tactical move. It provided a semblance of seclusion, while the public nature of the venue enforced a ceasefire. He couldn’t shatter here. The rules of civilization applied.

Sliding into the plush leather booth, he finally removed the sunglasses and cap, placing them on the seat beside him. The world became sharper, brighter, more dangerous. Shane sat across from him, the severe lines of his blazer a stark contrast to the soft, shadowy upholstery. He was studying the menu, giving Ilya time to study him without being a creep.

A waiter appeared. Ilya ordered a glass of ice water. When it arrived, he didn’t drink immediately. From the zippered pocket of his joggers, he retrieved a small, discreet pill case.

He shook out a single, pale blue tablet, the fast-acting mood stabilizer that he needed to be ‘normal’ for Shane. He dry-swallowed it with a practiced ease, meeting Shane’s eyes across the table as he did it. No apology. No explanation. A simple statement of fact: This is what it takes for me to sit here without crumbling.

Shane’s gaze flickered, but he said nothing. He returned to the menu, his fingers tracing the embossed text. After a few minutes of silence that stretched like hot tar, he closed it. “I’ll have the garden salad. Dressing on the side.”

Ilya almost smiled, a bitter, understanding twist of his lips. Of course. He remembered the need to control his food. That was something he had worked on to relax before but now old habits seemed to have returned. A meal that was mere sustenance, no pleasure, no indulgence. The opposite of everything Ilya felt churning inside him.

“The ribeye,” Ilya told the waiter. “Medium rare. Extra peppercorn sauce.” A primal, bloody choice. A claim of a different kind. He needed the protein, the iron, the tangible weight of it in his stomach to ground him.

The waiter left. The silence returned, but now it had a new texture. The performative tasks of arrival and ordering were gone. They were just two men in a booth, with nothing to look at but each other and the canyon between them.

Ilya let his eyes settle on Shane, really look, without the barrier of lenses. The sharp cut of the blazer, the tantalizing hint of skin through the shirt, the defiant set of his jaw. He was so beautiful it was a physical ache, a hollowing-out behind Ilya’s ribs. He focused on the water glass, the condensation beading on its side.

Then, Shane shifted. He uncrossed his arms, leaning forward slightly on the table. His voice, when it came, was lower, softer than their earlier stilted car talk.

“You know,” Shane began, his eyes not on Ilya’s face, but on his own hands where they rested on the dark wood. “I never thanked you. For the advice about the grill. Scott said the hotter coals were a game-changer.”

The words were innocuous. The tone was not. It was measured, deliberate. A subtle, almost imperceptible lace of something warmer underneath. Ilya's senses, already heightened, went on full alert. He kept his expression neutral, taking a slow sip of water. "He is so old he should have known. He would have figured it out."

"Maybe." Shane's gaze lifted, finally meeting his. There was a glint there, a testing sharpness. "But it was thoughtful. You've always been... observant. About details."

A direct reference to the past, wrapped in a seeming compliment. Ilya felt the first crackle of warning along his nerves. This wasn't just conversation. This was a probe. "Observation is a skill," he replied, his voice carefully flat. "Like any other. It can be used well, or poorly."

"Mm." Shane leaned back, the movement causing the blazer to gape slightly, revealing more of the sheer fabric underneath. His eyes traveled over Ilya, a slow, appraising sweep that felt nothing like the frightened or furious looks he was used to. This was calculated. "You really like the sleeveless look." He said with a smile.

The question was about his attire, but the subtext was a laser focus on Ilya's body. Ilya felt the heat of it like a touch. He forced himself to remain still, to not flex the arm Shane was so blatantly looking at. "I work hard for my body. Why not show it off." He said with a shrug.

"It's good," Shane murmured, a ghost of a smile playing on his lips- not the nervous one from the airport, but something more knowing. "It's a statement. Shows off the arms. All those hours of shooting pucks have... noticeable results."

There it was. Undeniable, deliberate flirtation. A soft, verbal caress aimed directly at the most volatile part of Ilya's psyche. The medication was a dull blanket over his emotions, but this was a needle, finding the gap in the weave. His heart began a slow, heavy pound against his sternum.

He could play along. He could fall into the old, easy rhythm of their banter, let it spiral into something charged and dark and mutual. He could say something like, 'You are one to talk, in leather that looks painted on.' The words burned on his tongue.

But that path led back to the obsession. To possession. To the look in Shane's eyes when he'd discovered the trackers. Their food arrived and he frowned when he saw Shane move the salad dressing away and pick out half the chicken

So, he deflected. He looked down, cutting into the steak that had just arrived, the pepper sauce rich and pungent. "The results are for shooting pucks," he said, his tone dismissing the compliment. "Nothing more." He took a bite, the act of chewing giving him a moment to school his features, to push down the surge of raw want Shane's words had unleashed.

He saw Shane's confident posture falter, just for a second. A faint flicker of uncertainty in those steady eyes. The test had been administered, and Ilya had refused to react. He had chosen the salad over the steak, the water over the wine, the distance over the dangerous, inviting heat.

He kept his eyes on his plate, on the bloody, tangible reality of his meal. Every cell in his body was screaming to look up, to engage, to take what was being offered. But the man who would have taken was the man who had built a cage. The man he was now, medicated and trembling with the effort, could only do one thing: hold the line.

Even if it meant letting Shane think he felt nothing. Especially if it meant that.

The rest of the meal passed in a fragile, cautious conversation. They spoke of neutral things—the upcoming training camp structure, mutual acquaintances in the league, the peculiarities of Montreal in the summer. The conversation flowed, if haltingly, like water finding new paths around old, immovable rocks. Ilya ate his steak with deliberate focus, using the ritual of cutting and chewing to ground himself. Shane picked at his salad, every so often looking up through his lashes in a way that sent a fresh, quiet shock through Ilya's system.

It was the scent that was undoing him. With every minute that passed in the warm, enclosed booth, the single, insufficient scent patch on Shane's scent gland lost its battle. The clean soap and wool aroma was now underpinned by something warmer, sweeter, uniquely Shane. It was the ghost of the omega beneath the beta facade, a whisper of truth Ilya had only ever caught in fleeting, unguarded moments before. Now, it was a soft, persistent fog in the air between them, and every breath Ilya took was a conscious effort not to drown in it.

Combined with the way Shane was acting- leaning in just slightly to listen, laughing softly at a dry observation, letting his fingers brush against his own neck in a way that was either nervous or unconsciously provocative, it was a sustained assault on Ilya's chemically-fortified defenses. The mood stabilizer kept the panic at bay, but it did nothing to dampen the raw, aching want. It just made him excruciatingly aware of it, a prisoner watching the world through a soundproof glass wall.

His nerves felt scraped raw, every sense dialed to a punishing sensitivity. He was running on fumes of willpower.

"We should go," Ilya said finally, his voice tighter than he intended. He signaled for the check, needing the interaction to end, needing space where Shane's scent wasn't the only thing he could think about.

Shane didn't argue. He just nodded, that new, unreadable calm still draped over him like the expensive blazer. When the bill was settled and they stood, Ilya moved toward the lobby, assuming Shane would head for the doors, for his car, for the safety of his own home.

"Rozanov."

He turned. Shane was standing a few feet away, hands in the pockets of those impossible leather pants, looking up at him. The hotel's ambient lighting caught in his eyes.

"Yeah?"

"Are you going to invite me up?"

The question landed like a physical blow, low in Ilya's gut. A red flag the size of a billowing storm warning erupted in his mind. Danger! Boundary. Retreat. Every lesson from Dr. Kostova screamed at him to say no, to make an excuse, to reinforce the wall.

But Shane was looking at him, not with the old fear or anger, but with a quiet, daring curiosity. And he'd asked so softly. The little omega, a treacherous, possessive part of Ilya's brain supplied, even as he mentally flinched from the term. He couldn't deny him. Not when he asked like that. Not when every cell in Ilya's body was howling to say yes.

He gave a single, stiff nod. "If you want."

The ride in the elevator was silent, charged. Ilya stared at the ascending numbers, feeling Shane's presence beside him like a localized gravity field. His room was on the twelfth floor, a standard suite. He unlocked the door and let Shane enter first.

Shane didn't hover awkwardly. He walked into the sitting area, glanced around at the generic furniture, then, with a deliberate casualness that made Ilya's breath catch, went and sat on the edge of the king-sized bed. He smoothed a hand over the duvet, then patted the space beside him. An invitation.

Ilya froze in the doorway. Sitting on the bed with him was a line he could not cross. It was a gateway. He remained standing, leaning against the small entryway table, putting the width of the room between them.

He saw the flicker of disappointment on Shane's face, the subtle downturn of his lips he failed to hide. A pout. It was adorable, and it wrecked Ilya completely.

After a moment of heavy silence, Shane looked up. "Can I ask you something?"

Ilya nodded, his throat too tight for words.

Shane's tongue darted out, wetting his lips. Ilya tracked the movement, hypnotized. "You had cameras in my apartment," Shane said, his voice still soft, but with a new, razor-sharp edge beneath it. "In the bedroom."

A cold dread, separate from the heat of desire, drenched Ilya. This was it. The reckoning for one of his deepest shames.

“Does that mean,” Shane continued, holding his gaze, “you recorded us having sex? The first time?”

The air vanished from the room. Ilya’s body went rigid, his mind flashing to the encrypted file, buried under layers of security on a drive he hadn’t dared to look at in months. He’d deleted almost everything else- the footage of Shane cooking, sleeping, reading, living his life. But that one... that one and a few others he had kept. It wasn’t surveillance. It was a sacrament. A record of the single most perfect, untainted moment of his life, before the sickness had fully twisted his love into something monstrous. He’d told Dr. Kostova about deleting the files. He had lied.

He couldn’t speak. He just gave another slow, agonized nod, his eyes begging for a forgiveness he knew he didn’t deserve.

Shane absorbed this, his expression unreadable. Then, he said the words that shattered Ilya’s last remaining fragment of control.

“I want to see it.”

No. The denial was instinctive, visceral. To show him would be to expose the very core of his sickness, to let Shane see himself through the lens of Ilya’s obsessed, worshipping gaze. It would be the ultimate violation.

“I’ll... send it to you,” Ilya choked out, the compromise pathetic. A delay. A coward’s retreat.

Shane didn’t reply. Instead, he stood up from the bed. Slowly, never breaking eye contact, he reached up and shrugged off the beautiful, black blazer. It slid from his shoulders and pooled on the floor with a soft whump. He stood there in just the semi-sheer white shirt and the black leather pants, vulnerability and power fused into one devastating silhouette.

Ilya's control snapped. He didn't move forward. He took a stumbling step back, his back hitting the wall beside the door. The distance was his only defense.

"Shane," he rasped, the word a plea and a warning.

But Shane was done with warnings. He had come here, dressed like a temptation, asked the most dangerous question, and now he stood in the center of the room, waiting. The line had not just been crossed; it had been erased. Ilya was out of moves, out of medication, out of lies. He was just a man against a wall, staring at the only thing he had ever truly wanted, knowing he was seconds away from falling on his knees.

The plea in Ilya's voice was real, a raw scrape of sound in the quiet room. He was pressed against the wall, not by force, but by the sheer weight of his own need, using the unyielding surface to hold himself upright, to hold himself back. Shane stood before him, blazer discarded, a vision of deliberate provocation and heartbreaking vulnerability. The space between them wasn't space at all; it was a live wire, crackling with everything unsaid and everything remembered.

Shane didn't answer the plea. He closed the distance.

It wasn't an aggressive move. It was a slow, deliberate invasion, each step measured. He stopped when the toes of his boots almost touched Ilya's, his head tilting back to maintain eye contact. Ilya could see the pulse fluttering wildly in the hollow of Shane's throat, could smell the sweet, unmasked omega scent now blooming freely, a direct challenge to every shred of his control.

Then Shane leaned in and kissed him.

It wasn't like the dream. It wasn't a devouring possession. It was soft, a question. A tentative brush of lips against Ilya's own, which were parted in a silent gasp. The contact was a jolt of pure, undiluted lightning. Every nerve ending Ilya possessed, every synapse he'd tried to medicate into submission, fired at once.

The dam didn't just break. It vaporized.

A low, guttural sound ripped from Ilya's chest, part agony, part surrender. His hands, which had been clenched at his sides, flew up. One arm banded around Shane's waist, yanking him flush against his body, erasing the last millimeter between them. The other hand came up to cradle the back of Shane's head, fingers tangling in the perfectly styled hair, destroying its careful order. He used the leverage to spin them, reversing their positions in one fluid, powerful motion. Shane's back met the wall with a soft thud, and Ilya crowded into him, his body a cage of heat and muscle.

He tore his mouth away just enough to speak, his forehead pressed to Shane's, their breath mingling in ragged, hot gusts. His voice was a dark, shattered thing. "Tell me to stop right now. Say it. I will step back. You leave. This is your last...last chance."

He meant it. Every fractured word. He was holding onto the cliff's edge by his fingernails, and the order to stop would be the only thing that could make him let go.

Shane's answer was to surge up, sealing his mouth over Ilya's again. This kiss was not a question. It was an answer. A demand.

And Ilya was lost.

The kiss deepened, turning hungry and desperate. Ilya's tongue swept into Shane's mouth, claiming, tasting. He tasted like the crisp white wine from the restaurant, like mint, and underneath it, that unique, sweet-Shane flavor that was home and heaven and ruin. Shane moaned into the kiss, the sound vibrating through Ilya's entire being. His hands came up, not to push, but to pull. They fisted in the fabric of Ilya's sleeveless hoodie, gripping the hard muscle of his back, trying to drag him closer even when there was no closer to get.

Ilya's hand slid from Shane's hair, down the column of his throat. He didn't squeeze. He held. His thumb pressed against the frantic pulse, feeling the life beat there, a captive rhythm under his palm. It was a claiming of a different kind, a primitive, alpha gesture of possession and protection that made Shane whimper and arch into him. The sheer shirt was a maddening barrier. Ilya could feel the heat of Shane's skin through it, could see the shadow of his nipples, hard and pebbled against the fabric. He dragged his mouth from Shane's lips, down his jaw, nuzzling into the scent-rich gland at the junction of his neck and shoulder. He inhaled, a deep, shuddering drag that made his knees weak. “Bozhe moy,” he groaned against the damp skin. “You smell... you are killing me.”

Shane’s head fell back against the wall, baring his throat further. His hands abandoned Ilya’s back, scrambling for the waistband of his joggers. He pushed at the fabric, his fingers clumsy with urgency, seeking skin. “Ilya... please...”

The plea, raw and wanting, was a spike of heat straight to Ilya’s groin. He was painfully hard, the confines of his pants agonizing. He let Shane’s seeking hand push under the elastic, let those cool, clever fingers brush against the burning skin of his lower abdomen. A violent tremor racked him. He wanted to let Shane touch him everywhere. He wanted to strip them both bare and lose himself in the heat and sweat and scent of him.

But the hand around Shane’s throat tightened, just a fraction. A warning. A control.

“No,” Ilya growled, the word muffled against his neck. He captured Shane’s wandering wrist, pulling it gently but firmly away from his body, pinning it against the wall beside Shane’s head. He interlaced their fingers, holding him there. “Not like this.”

“Why?” Shane gasped, trying to reclaim his mouth for another kiss. “I want you. You want me. I can feel it.”

“That is why,” Ilya snarled, frustration and desire twisting together. He kissed him again, hard and bruising, a punishment and a promise. He ground his hips forward, letting Shane feel the full, rigid length of his erection through their clothes. Shane cried out, a broken, beautiful sound, and rocked back against him, seeking friction. The leather of his pants whispered against the rough fabric of Ilya’s joggers.

Ilya’s free hand roamed, mapping the territory he’d once monitored from a cold, digital distance. He slid it under the hem of the sheer shirt, his calloused palm skating over the smooth, hot plane of Shane’s stomach, feeling the muscles jump and quiver at his touch. He traced the defined lines of his abdomen, up to his chest, his thumb circling a nipple through the fragile fabric. Shane gasped, his back arching off the wall, pushing into the touch.

“You are so beautiful,” Ilya breathed, his lips trailing wet, open-mouthed kisses along Shane’s collarbone. “This... this body. This mind. This heart. I wanted to own it. To lock it away where only I could see.” He bit down, not hard enough to mark, but enough to make Shane jolt. “I am trying... trying... not to be that man tonight.”

“I’m not a thing to own,” Shane panted, his hips still moving in a desperate, shallow rhythm against Ilya’s thigh. “But I’m here. I’m choosing to be here. Right now. With you.”

The words were a different kind of devastation. They offered a gift Ilya didn’t know how to accept without corrupting it. He kissed him again, swallowing his words, trying to drink his certainty. His hand left Shane’s stomach, sliding around to clutch the firm curve of his ass through the buttery leather, pulling him even tighter into the cradle of his hips. The friction was exquisite, torturous. He could feel the corresponding hardness in Shane’s pants, could imagine the wetness soaking through his underwear beneath the leather. The image alone nearly undid him.

He wanted to drop to his knees. He wanted to peel those pants down and taste him, to reduce Shane to a sobbing, pleading wreck under his tongue. He wanted to flip him around, push that shirt up his back, and fuck him right there against the wall, hard and fast, claiming him in the most basic, animal way.

The fantasies were a riptide, pulling him under.

With a Herculean effort that felt like tearing his own soul in two, Ilya wrenched his mouth away. He rested his forehead against the wall beside Shane’s head, his entire body trembling with the strain of holding still. His breath sawed in and out of his lungs. The hand around Shane’s throat gentled, becoming a caress, his thumb stroking the pounding pulse.

“Shane,” he whispered, the name a prayer and an epitaph. “Milyy. We have to stop.”

“No,” Shane protested immediately, trying to chase his lips. “Don’t. Not yet.”

Ilya caught his chin, forcing him to hold still, to meet his eyes. What Shane saw there must have given him pause- not just desire, but a profound, tortured war. “Listen to me,” Ilya said, each word costing him. “If we go further tonight... I will not be the man you asked for in that hotel room. I will be the man who had cameras in your walls. The man who needs to possess every sigh, every gasp, to know it is for him and him alone. The monster is right here.” He pressed Shane’s hand against his own chest, over his hammering heart. “It is breathing the same air as the man who lo-cares for you. And I am trying... so hard... to not let the man win.”

The confession hung between them, stark and ugly and true. The heated arousal in Shane’s eyes flickered, mingling with understanding, with a trace of the old fear, and with something else, heartbreaking tenderness.

“You stopped,” Shane said quietly, his body relaxing incrementally against the wall. “You’re stopping now.”

“Da,” Ilya breathed, the relief and the agony of it equally potent. He slowly, carefully, unwound himself. He released Shane’s wrist. He took his hand from his throat. He stepped back, putting a foot of cold, empty space between them. The loss of contact was a physical pain.

Shane stood against the wall, disheveled and flushed, his lips kiss-swollen, his shirt half-untucked, his hair a wreck. He looked thoroughly ravished, and the sight was a fresh knife twist in Ilya’s gut. He watched as Shane’s expression shifted from dazed desire to something more complicated- frustration, yes, but also a dawning, weary comprehension.

“The better man,” Shane murmured, echoing Ilya’s words from what felt like a lifetime ago in the restaurant.

Ilya nodded, unable to speak. He was the better man standing in the wreckage of his own resistance, feeling every primal instinct scream in betrayal. He had never done anything harder in his life.

Shane pushed himself away from the wall. He didn’t approach. He bent, slowly, and picked up his discarded blazer from the floor. He didn’t put it on. He just held it, a bundle of black wool in his arms, a shield retrieved.

“Send me the video,” he said, his voice surprisingly steady. It wasn’t a flirtation or a challenge this time. It was a request.

“I will,” Ilya promised, his own voice gravel.

Shane looked at him for a long moment, his gaze sweeping over Ilya’s tense form, his own conflicted desire still evident in the flush on his skin, the rapid rise and fall of his chest. Then he turned and walked to the door. He paused, his hand on the handle, but didn’t look back.

The door clicked shut behind him.

Ilya stood frozen in the center of the silent room, the ghost of Shane’s scent and heat still clinging to him, the taste of him still on his tongue. His body throbbed with unmet need. His mind was a battlefield, strewn with the casualties of his old self and the fragile, wounded standard of the man he was trying to become.

He had let him go. He had chosen the harder, right thing over the desperate, easy thing.

It felt like a victory that had shattered every bone in his body. He slid down the wall to the floor, buried his face in his hands, and trembled.

Chapter End Notes

Well.

That certainly happened.

A few of you have already started picking up on some details I've been quietly scattering through the last few chapters, and I am delighted (and slightly terrified) by how observant some of you are. There are a couple of breadcrumbs in this chapter that may become very important sooner rather than later.

I won't say which ones.

Just know that some of the theories in the comments have gotten alarmingly close to my outline. 🙄🙄

Thank you all for reading, commenting, theorizing, screaming, and emotionally supporting these two disasters. Half the fun of posting is watching everyone put on detective hats and start connecting dots.

See you next chapter.

Chapter 24: Chapter 24

Chapter Summary

Hello pocket friends ❤️

First of all: what the hell are you all doing to me in the comments?!

Some of your comments made me cry. Some made me blush. Some made me laugh out loud at work. Some had me kicking my feet like a teenager and staring at my phone with the dumbest smile imaginable.

I love it. Entirely too much.

This chapter came together way faster than expected because I got sucked into reading comments and suddenly my brain went: "well, now you HAVE to write the next one." I got my date in, paid attention to the hubby so now we're back!

A huge thank you to my beta reader, who continues to save me from myself on a regular basis.

And thank you to my gay best friend, who is the fourth love of my life, my emotional support gremlin, and the person most responsible for enabling this nonsense in the first place.

Anyway.

The boys are attempting communication.

The boys are attempting emotional growth.

The boys are attempting healthy relationship behaviors.

Please keep your hands and feet inside the vehicle at all times.

Ilya stood in the silent hotel room, the trace of Shane's scent still clinging to him like a fog over the whole room. He took a deep, shuddering breath, his body still trembling with the effort of holding back.

He picked up his phone, his fingers shaking as he dialed the concierge desk. The call connected on the second ring.

"Good evening, Mr. Rozanov. How can I assist you?"

"I need to leave the hotel without being seen," Ilya said, his voice steady despite the chaos inside him. "Can you direct me to private exit?"

There was a pause, a rustle of papers. "Of course, sir. Take the service staircase on the twelfth floor. It will lead you to the staff parking lot. There is a gate that opens directly to the street. I will ensure it is unlocked for you."

"Thank you," Ilya said, hanging up. He looked at the door, at the empty space where Shane had been. He was still here, in the air, in the taste of their kisses, in the heat of their bodies pressed together. Ilya could not let him leave without acknowledging it, without touching it one last time.

He crossed the room, his steps silent on the plush carpet. He opened the door, and Shane was just walking slowly down the hallway, his arms crossed, his expression guarded. Ilya's heart stuttered, a painful, beautiful shock.

"Can I walk you out?" Ilya asked, his voice soft, careful. He held out his hand, giving Shane the choice to take it.

Shane looked at the hand, then up at Ilya's face. There was a long, tense moment, then Shane uncrossed his arms and placed his hand in Ilya's. It was a surrender, a trust. Ilya felt it like a jolt, a current that traveled up his arm, into his chest, then his heart.

He led Shane down the hall, their footsteps silent in the empty corridor. They reached the service stairs, the door heavy and unmarked. Ilya pushed it open, revealing a narrow, utilitarian staircase leading down. Once they reached the ground level, he turned to Shane, their hands still linked.

"I'm going to court you," Ilya said, his voice barely above a whisper. "Properly. I won't fuck this up."

Shane's eyes widened, a soft, surprised gasp escaping him. Ilya smiled, a slow, soft curve of his lips. He reached up, his fingers tracing the delicate pattern of freckles across Shane's cheekbones. Shane leaned into the touch, his eyes fluttering closed, a soft sigh escaping him.

Ilya leaned in, pressing a soft, chaste kiss to Shane's lips. It was a promise, a seal on the words. He pulled away after a few moments, despite Shane's attempt to deepen the kiss. He stepped back, his hand still holding Shane's, his thumb brushing the pulse point at Shane's wrist.

"Go home, Krasavchik," he murmured, his voice gentle. "I'll call you later. Maybe we can do something tomorrow."

Shane nodded, his eyes still closed, his lips parted. Ilya watched as he turned and walked out the exit door, his hand trailing along the railing. Before turning left towards the parking lot, he looked back, a soft smile on his face. Then he was gone, swallowed by the late afternoon light.

Ilya stood there, in the dim light, the door to the service stairs still open, the cool air of the stairwell a stark contrast to the heat of the room they'd just left. He took a deep, shuddering breath, his body still trembling with the effort of holding back. But there was a new sensation now, a quiet, steady pulse of hope. He had touched the edge of the cliff, and he had not fallen. He had stepped back. He had chosen the right thing.

And tomorrow... tomorrow, he would start again. He would court Shane Hollander properly. He would not fuck this up.

The silence in the hotel room was absolute. It was a different silence than before Shane had arrived. That had been the silence of anticipation, a hollow, ringing quiet. This was the silence of the aftermath, thick and heavy, saturated with the omega's scent, of everything that had almost happened.

Ilya stood just inside the door, his back against it, as if barricading himself in. The click of the lock was the period at the end of a sentence he'd barely been able to speak. His body, which had been vibrating with a near-violent restraint, began to tremble in earnest. It was a full-system collapse. The adrenaline, the desire, the sheer, agonizing will it had taken to step back- it all drained out of him at once, leaving behind a hollow, shaky shell.

He slid down the length of the door until he was sitting on the floor, his knees drawn up. He dropped his head into his hands. The chemical blanket of the mood stabilizer was wearing off, and what rushed in to fill the void wasn't the obsession's familiar, possessive roar. It was something quieter, more devastating: a clear, unobstructed view of what he had just done, and what he had just denied himself.

He could still feel the imprint of Shane's body against his own, the surprising strength in his lean frame, the heat of him through the sheer shirt, the way his hips had rocked, seeking friction. He could taste him. Crisp mint and the underlying, unique sweetness that was Shane's own. The scent of him, that heartbreakingly vulnerable omega scent he'd so carefully hidden for years, was woven into the fibers of Ilya's hoodie, a fragrant brand on his skin.

He had been so hard it was painful. He was still hard, a dull, aching reminder. Every primal, alpha instinct had been screaming at him to take, to claim, to bury himself in that heat and scent and never come out. The monster had been wide awake, salivating, its claws sunk deep.

And he had told it no.

Not for himself. Not because he didn't want it with a desperation that felt like dying. But for Shane. Because Shane had asked for a better man in a hotel room months ago. Because the man who would have fucked him against that wall was the same man who had installed cameras, who had watched those videos not just with lust, but with a covetous, sickening satisfaction that he owned a piece of Shane no one else could see.

A shudder racked him, deep and cold. He thought of Shane's question. "Does that mean you recorded us?" The shame of it was a live coal in his gut. He had. He had kept it. In his most honest, most broken moments, he would take it out and watch it, not just for arousal, but for proof. Proof that it had been real. That Shane had looked at him like that, had touched him like that, had moaned his name. It was a relic of his sickness, and he had just promised to send it to its subject. To hand over a piece of his own pathology for Shane to examine. It felt like cutting out a part of his own soul and offering it on a plate.

His phone, discarded on the carpet beside him, began to vibrate. The screen lit up, casting a pale blue glow on the dark floor. The caller ID made his blood run cold.

Отец.

Father.

The man's face, bloated and perpetually sneering, flashed in his mind. The voice, slurred with vodka and contempt. "Love is control, Ilya Gregorovich. You show you care by making sure they cannot leave. You make them need you. It is the only way they stay."

For years, that poison had been the blueprint. It had twisted his genuine love for Shane into something monstrous, something that built cages and called them safety.

The phone buzzed again, an angry insect. A part of him, the old, wounded part that still craved that man's approval even as he despised him, wanted to answer. To hear the gruff voice, to fall back into the familiar, toxic pattern. It would be easier than this. Easier than sitting on the floor, trembling with the effort of being good.

His thumb hovered over the screen.

Then he saw Shane's face, not from tonight, but from that first horrible confrontation after the trackers were discovered. The betrayal, the hurt, the sheer fear. The look of someone realizing the person they loved was a stranger wearing a familiar face.

Ilya swiped his thumb across the screen, rejecting the call. He didn't just silence it. He blocked the number. A final, decisive click. The poison line was cut.

The silence felt cleaner after that. Heavier, but cleaner.

He needed an anchor. Not the anchor of the past, but the one guiding him toward a possible future. His fingers, still unsteady, scrolled past the blocked contact and found the one labeled Dr. Kostova. He had a standing instruction to call, day or night, if he was in crisis. Was this a crisis? He felt more stable than he had in years, and yet he was sitting on a hotel room floor, shaking apart.

He pressed call. It rang three times before she answered, her voice calm and alert, no trace of sleep. "Ilya. It's late, are you alright?"

The words tumbled out in a ragged, Russian torrent. He told her about the text, the airport, the devastating outfit, the restaurant, the scent patch, the deliberate flirtation that had felt like being flayed alive. He told her about the room, the kiss, the feel of Shane's body, the war inside him. He told her about the hand on Shane's throat, the way he'd pinned his wrist, the terrifying, beautiful moment when every cell in his body was screaming to take more. And he told her about stepping back. About the words he'd forced out.

He told her about the promise of a proper courtship." He confessed about the video, the deep shame of it, and his promise to send it.

There was a long silence on the other end of the line. He could hear the scratch of a pen on paper.

"Ilya," she said finally, her voice holding a warmth he'd rarely heard. "This is not a setback. This is perhaps your most significant breakthrough."

He let out a breath he didn't know he'd been holding. "It does not feel like one. It feels like I have been run over by a truck."

"The feeling valid, Ilya. Let yourself experience this and learn from it. This wont always be so difficult." she said, her tone turning warm again, which was somehow comforting. "The obsession, the pathological possessiveness, it seeks release. It seeks the dopamine flood of conquest and control. You denied it that flood. You experienced the intense craving, you had the object of the craving willingly in your hands, and you made a conscious choice based on a higher principle: his autonomy. Your love for him, not your need to own him, dictated your action. Do you understand the difference?"

He closed his eyes, leaning his head back against the door. “The love... hurts more. It is harder.”

“Yes. Obsession is a simple, hungry beast. Love is a complex garden. It requires patience, nurturing, respect for each other. You took the first, real step into this so called garden tonight. You did not trample the flowers because you wanted to hold them. You did not let your baser, Alpha instinct win.”

The metaphor was absurd, and perfectly accurate. He had wanted to trample, to devour. He had chosen to admire from a step away.

“My father called,” he said, the words quiet. “I blocked him.”

Another pause, another soft scratch of pen on paper. “Good. You are choosing your lineage. You are not your father’s son in this moment. You are becoming your own man.”

They spoke for twenty more minutes. She guided him through the physical aftermath, the shaking was normal, a neurological release of pent-up tension. She told him to drink water, to take a over the counter, non-habit-forming sleep aid if he needed it, to not punish himself with the memory of Shane’s body, but to acknowledge the feeling and let it pass. She approved of his plan to send the video. “It is a transfer of power. You are giving him back a piece of himself you stole. It will be painful for you. That is the point. The pain is the medicine.”

When he hung up, the room was still dark, but the oppressive weight had lifted slightly. It had been named, examined, and placed within the narrative of recovery, not ruin.

He pushed himself up off the floor. His body ached. He went to the minibar, ignored the alcohol, and took out a bottle of water. He drank it all, then opened his laptop. His fingers were steady now.

Finding the encrypted file took a moment. It was buried, but he knew the path by heart. He clicked on it. A video player opened. He didn't press play. He didn't need to. The thumbnail was seared into his memory: Shane, smiling up at him from a tangle of his own sheets, sunlight from his Montreal apartment window catching in his dark hair. A look of open, trusting affection that had long since been burned away by fear and betrayal.

His throat closed. This was the last vestige of his surveillance. His most cherished trophy. And it did not belong to him.

He attached the file to an email. His cursor hovered over the address field. He typed: S.Hollander@

The auto-fill completed it. He wrote no subject. In the body, he typed only two words.

As promised.

He hit send.

The action felt like a physical amputation. A vital, rotten part of him was severed and sent away. The relief was immediate, and immense. He was clean of it. Finally.

He shut the laptop. The room was quiet. The ghost of Shane's scent was fading, replaced by the sterile smell of air conditioning and the clean general hotel smell. He walked to the window, looking out at the glittering, indifferent lights of Montreal. Somewhere out there, in a clean, well-ordered apartment, Shane was alone with his own thoughts, with the memory of a kiss that had stopped, with a promise hanging in the air.

I'm going to court you.

The words felt terrifying and true. He had no map for this. No father's example to follow, no obsessive playbook to enact. He would have to invent it, moment by moment, with Dr. Kostova's voice in one ear and the memory of Shane's soft, trusting sigh in the service stairwell in the other. The books on Omega relations helped some, but before when he was in situations outlined in books, his instincts and learned behaviours took charge.

He would call tomorrow. He would ask about his day. He would listen. He would not assume. He would not track. He would just... be there. As a man, not just an alpha. As a hopeful suitor, not a desperate owner.

It was the hardest thing he would ever do. And for the first time, as he stood in the silent hotel room, the hollow ache in his chest began to feel less like emptiness, and more like space. Space for something new to grow.

The digital clock on Shane's nightstand glowed 6:08 AM. His body, trained by years of regimented routine, was already stirring before the alarm. The phantom sensations from the night before- the press of Ilya's body, the scrape of his teeth, the iron grip of his hand around his wrist, had woven themselves into his dreams, leaving him tangled in his sheets, heart pounding with a confused ache.

He swung his legs out of bed, the cool floorboards a shock to his system. Structure. Routine. He moved to the window, drawing the blinds to let in the pale, early morning light. Montreal was quiet, the city holding its breath before the day began. His own mind was anything but quiet.

The knock at his door at precisely 6:30 was so unexpected he froze, halfway through pulling on a running shirt. No one visited at this hour. Maybe Rose, was the only one who might, and she would text first. A cold, irrational dread, a leftover ghost from a different life, slithered down his spine. He approached the door cautiously, peering through the peephole.

No one stood there. Just the empty hallway. He unlocked the door and opened it a crack.

On the mat sat a simple, elegant cardboard box. Next to it was a slender glass vase holding a bouquet of flowers. Not a grand, romantic explosion of roses, but something thoughtful and understated: deep blue lisianthus, white astilbe, and sprigs of green eucalyptus, tied with a brown paper wrap. It was beautiful in a way that felt observed—cool colors, not overwhelmingly perfumed, no loud too-bright colors. It was a bouquet chosen by someone who paid attention.

He brought them inside, setting the box and vase on his kitchen island. His fingers trembled slightly as he opened the box. Inside, nestled in insulated packaging, were two still-warm breakfast sandwiches from the artisanal bakery three blocks away- the one he'd mentioned in a text weeks ago as having the only acceptable sourdough in the city. There were also two perfect lattes in sealed cups and a small paper bag of their maple-pecan croissants, his favorite guilty pleasure.

There was no card.

He didn't need one. The specificity was the message. This wasn't a generic gesture. This was Ilya saying, I remember. I listen.

The dread evaporated, replaced by a warmth that was equally unsettling. It spread through his chest, sweet and dangerous. He traced the petal of a lisianthus, its texture like cool silk. This was courting. This was the "properly" Ilya had whispered in the dim stairwell. It was so normal, so charming, it completely disarmed him. The Ilya he knew- the one of grand, oppressive gestures, would have had the entire bakery delivered, or would have shown up at his door himself, demanding entry. This was quiet. Considerate. It respected his space and his schedule.

He took a picture of the flowers next to the open box of food, the morning light from his window making it look like a still-life. He sent it.

Shane- 6:30 is aggressively punctual. Did you bribe the bakery to open early?

The reply came before he could take a sip of the latte.

IGR- No bribery required. They open at 5:30 for construction workers. I am merely an enthusiastic early customer.

The flowers are not too much? How do you like them?

Shane smiled, a real one that softened his face. He cradled the phone.

Shane- They're not too much. They're perfect. Thank you.

The latte is still hot. How?

IGR- Insulated packaging and a driver who understands the value of a timely delivery. I calculated the travel time.

Of course he did. Shane could picture him, awake in the sterile hotel room, doing the math, orchestrating this small, perfect moment. The obsessive precision was still there, but its aim had shifted. Instead of monitoring his pain, it was anticipating his comfort.

Shane- You didn't have to do this.

IGR- I wanted to. Did you sleep?

The question was careful, laden with unspoken meaning. Did you sleep, or did you lie awake thinking of me? Of us? Of how I stopped?

Shane- Some. You?

IGR- Also some. The bed is large. And quiet.

An image flashed in Shane's mind: Ilya, alone in a king-sized bed in a generic hotel room, staring at the ceiling, wrestling with the same ghosts. The distance between their separate silences felt intimate somehow.

They texted back and forth for twenty minutes as Shane ate the sandwich which was, predictably, perfect and sipped the latte. The conversation was easy, light. They talked about the sourdough's tang, the upcoming training camp schedule, a ridiculous headline about a teammate. It was like the texting from before the obsession, from before the collapse. It was the friendship, tentative and precious, poking through the ashes.

Shane- I have a quick team admin meeting at 9. Logistics for the charity skate next week.

IGR- You should go. Do not be late on my account.

Shane- What are your plans today?

IGR- I will train at hotel gym. Then I will think of what to do next.

Shane bit his lip, his thumb hovering over the screen. The impulse was to say, Come over after. Just... be here. But the memory of the hotel room, of Ilya's trembling restraint, of his own desperate pull towards him, gave him pause. The guest room offer had been rejected. Ilya was building a courtship on neutral ground, brick by careful brick. To insist on his own territory felt like pushing.

Shane- A movie?

IGR- ?

Shane- For what to do next. We could see a movie. Tonight.

There was a pause. Shane could almost hear him thinking, analyzing the variables.

IGR- A public movie theater. With popcorn.

Shane- That's generally how it works.

IGR- I would like that. But I will pick you up. And I will bring you home.

Shane's breath caught. It was so... normal. So dating-101. It was also a subtle reassertion of the structure Ilya needed: defined steps, clear boundaries, a sense of control over the environment. A public place. A defined beginning and end.

Shane- Okay. Pick me up at 7.

The meeting was interminable. Shane sat in the Voyageurs' conference room, nodding as the community relations coordinator detailed the schedule for the charity skate, but his mind was elsewhere. It was replaying the feel of Ilya's hand in his in the service stairwell, the soft promise in his voice. It was analyzing the bouquet, the timing of the delivery, the specific choice of pastry. It was a problem to be solved, but for the first time, the problem was delightful.

After the meeting, as he was heading out, his phone buzzed.

IGR- Training done. The hotel gym is adequate. I have been thinking about the movie. Action or comedy?

Shane- Whichever you want.

IGR- I'm willing to sit through whatever boring movie you might like. Therefore, I am willing to endure poor pacing of a PG comedy movie for you.

Shane- That's very noble. But let's see what's playing. I'm not making you sit through a rom-com.

They settled on a big-budget action film- a safe, neutral choice with plenty of explosions and minimal emotional complexity. The ordinariness of the exchange, the negotiation of a simple evening plan, sent another warm, foreign thrill through Shane. This was what people did. This was dating.

Ilya arrived at 6:58 PM, driving a sleek, black rented sports car that was both utterly predictable and subtly thrilling. He was dressed down- dark jeans, a simple tight grey henley that stretched across his shoulders, a leather jacket. He looked both casual and intensely, magnetically present. He didn't come to the door as Shane requested, since neighbors were sitting on their balconies. He texted from the car.

IGR- I am here.

When Shane emerged, Ilya got out, coming around to open the passenger door for him. The gesture was old-fashioned, courtly. Their eyes met as Shane sat down, and the air between them crackled with the memory of the previous night. But Ilya just gave a small, contained smile and nodded. "You look very pretty today."

"Thanks," Shane said with a blush, sliding into the low seat. "So do you."

The drive to the cinema was quiet, filled with a comfortable tension. Ilya drove with focused precision, one hand on the wheel, the other resting on the gear shift. Shane watched the city lights slide by, hyper-aware of the few inches of space between Ilya's hand and his own thigh.

At the multiplex, Ilya insisted on buying the tickets, then the popcorn, one large ginger ale, to share and bottled water. He remembered Shane didn't like soda unless he ordered ginger ale 'as a treat'. They chose seats near the back, in a sparsely populated showing. As the trailers began, Shane felt a flicker of disappointment. The distance between their seats felt vast, a canyon in the dark even with only the armrest between them.

He glanced at Ilya, his profile illuminated by the flashing light of the screen. He looked relaxed, but his posture was upright, his attention seemingly fixed on the previews. Shane let out a small, unconscious sigh, his shoulders sinking a fraction.

He didn't see the way Ilya's lips twitched, the way he had to suppress an indulgent smile at the clear, quiet pout. Ilya had seen it, and the urge to reach over, to bridge the gap, was a physical pull in his chest. But he kept his hands to himself, curled around the popcorn tub.

The movie was exactly what they'd needed: loud, dumb, and visually spectacular. It demanded no emotional investment, only passive consumption. About halfway through, during a lull between car chases, Shane reached for the popcorn. His fingers brushed against Ilya's in the tub.

Both of them stilled.

On screen, something exploded. Neither of them looked.

Slowly, Ilya turned his hand, just enough to let Shane's fingers rest against his palm. It wasn't a hold, just a point of contact, warm and buttery from the popcorn. They left their hands like that for the rest of the film, a silent connection in the dark. It was more intimate than any kiss they'd shared so far.

When the credits rolled, they walked out, the shared popcorn tub empty, their hands swinging briefly close but not touching. The night air was cool.

"The special effects were so - I don't know what's that word. It looked fake." Ilya remarked as they reached the car.

"You're just mad you didn't think of using a grappling hook to swing between skyscrapers first," Shane replied, a real laugh bubbling up.

Ilya looked at him, the parking lot lights catching in his eyes. "Perhaps."

The drive back was different. The silence was softer, charged with the shared memory of linked hands in the dark. When Ilya pulled up to Shane's building, he put the car in park but left the engine running. The unspoken question hung in the air.

"Do you want to come up?" Shane asked, the words leaving his mouth before he could overthink them. "For tea? Or... something?"

Ilya's hands tightened on the steering wheel. He looked straight ahead, his jaw working. The struggle was visible, a storm playing out behind his eyes. The hotel room, the stairwell- the promise he'd made to himself and to Shane.

"A movie date ends with the drive home," he said finally, his voice low. "That is the... better choice for you."

"We can make new choices," Shane whispered.

Ilya turned his head then, and the look he gave Shane was so full of raw, aching want it stole the air from the car. "Do not tempt me, krasavchik," he murmured. "The man is winning, but the alpha has very persuasive arguments tonight."

Instead of answering, Shane leaned across the center console. He moved slowly, giving Ilya every chance to pull away. He didn't. When their lips met, it wasn't the desperate, wall-pinning clash of the night before. It was soft, searching, a continuation of the conversation their hands had started. Ilya's mouth was warm, and he tasted of salt and the faint, buttery hint of the popcorn. He made a low sound in his throat, a vibration Shane felt in his own chest, and his hand came up to cradle Shane's jaw, his thumb stroking his cheekbone.

It deepened, naturally, inevitably. The release of the pheromones scented air in the car, growing thick with the smell of leather and pine, of Ilya's clean alpha scent, and of Shane's own, lightly masked sweetness. Shane's hand found its way to Ilya's neck, fingers sliding into the soft curls at his nape. Ilya's other arm wrapped around him, pulling him as close as the console would allow, the gear shift digging into Shane's side, a minor, irrelevant pain.

This was different. This wasn't a test or a battle for control. This was a mutual discovery, a rediscovery. Shane sighed into the kiss, letting his head fall back slightly, giving Ilya better access. Ilya took the invitation, his mouth moving to Shane's jaw, then down the sensitive column of his throat, nipping lightly at the spot where his scent was strongest, just above the collar of his shirt. Shane gasped, his fingers tightening in Ilya's hair.

"Ilya," he breathed, the word half a plea, half a statement of fact.

Ilya pulled back, just an inch, his breath coming in short, hot gusts against Shane's damp skin. His eyes were dark, pupils blown wide in the dim light from the dashboard. "We should stop," he said, the words seeming to cost him. "The rules..."

"Fuck the rules," Shane whispered, chasing his lips again.

Ilya met him for one more searing, too-brief kiss before he firmly, gently, set Shane back into his own seat. He was trembling, a fine tremor running through the hand that now gripped the steering wheel again. "No," he said, more to himself than to Shane. "Not like this. Not in a fucking car." He took a deep, shuddering breath, visibly regaining his composure. "I am walking you to your door."

Shane, his own heart hammering, his body humming with unmet need, could only nod. The rejection was gentle, but it was a rejection nonetheless. It was also, he understood with a dawning, frustrating clarity, an act of profound respect.

Ilya turned off the car and came around to open Shane's door, holding his hand out to help Shane stand- another old-fashioned gesture that now felt achingly tender. They walked to the building's entrance in a silence that was no longer comfortable, but thick with suspended energy.

At the door, Shane fumbled for his keys. Ilya stood close, but not touching him.

"Thank you," Shane said, looking up at him. "For the flowers. The breakfast. The movie. The... everything."

A ghost of a smile touched Ilya's lips. "The 'everything' is hardest part."

"I know."

Ilya reached out then, not to pull him close, but to tuck a stray strand of hair behind Shane's ear. His touch was feather-light. "Goodnight, Hollander."

"Goodnight, Rozanov."

Shane unlocked the door and slipped inside. He didn't look back as he headed for the elevator, but he felt Ilya's gaze on him until the door swung shut.

Upstairs, in the quiet of his apartment, Shane leaned against his own front door. The flowers from the morning greeted him from the kitchen island, a silent testament to a day of careful, deliberate courtship. His lips were still tingling. His body was still awake with the echo of Ilya's touch.

He was being courted. Properly. By a man who was fighting a war inside himself to do it right. It was terrifying. It was the most hopeful thing that had happened to him in a very long time.

Across town, Ilya sat in the parked rental car outside Shane's building for a long time, watching the light go on in his apartment window. He replayed the kiss in the car, the feel of Shane yielding against him, the scent of him, the sweet, trusting sigh. He clutched the steering wheel until his knuckles were white, wrestling the "monster" back into its cage, brick by brick.

The man had won the day. The courtship continued. And for the first time, Ilya allowed himself to believe that the victory, however painful in the moment, might lead somewhere neither of them had ever dared to go: a future.

The rented sports car felt like a cage on the drive back to Boston. The scent of Shane- that fragile, heartbreaking blend of clean soap and unmasked sweetness still lingered in the upholstery, a delicious reminder of what had been offered to him. Ilya drove with the windows down, letting the cool, late-summer air scour the interior, but it was no use. Some scents adhered to memory, not just fabric.

His mind, usually a whirlwind of analysis and strategy, was preternaturally quiet. The silence wasn't the medicated blankness from Moscow. It was the spent, granular calm after a storm has passed, where every detail is sharp and raw. He could still feel the exact pressure of Shane's fingers linked with his in the popcorn tub, a point of contact that had sent more voltage through him than any body check. He could see the way Shane's lips had parted on a sigh in the dark of the car, an invitation Ilya had carved out a piece of his own soul to refuse.

The man is winning.

Dr. Kostova's words from their late-night call echoed. "You are not your father's son in this moment." Each careful gesture- the flowers chosen for their elegance, not their ostentation; the movie date in a public space; the agonizing, respectful retreat at the door, was a brick in a new foundation. A foundation built on choice, not coercion. On patience, not possession.

It was the hardest thing he had ever attempted.

Boston greeted him with its familiar, brash skyline. His condo, when he entered, was a monument to sterile transience. Floor-to-ceiling windows, minimalist furniture, nothing on the walls. It was a place to sleep and store gear, not a home. He dropped his duffel by the door and went straight to the sleek, untouched desk in the corner. His laptop sat there, a black monolith.

The email.

He hadn't lied to Shane. He had, months ago, as part of his initial, frantic attempts to "heal," unlinked their email accounts. He had severed the digital umbilical cord that had allowed him to monitor Shane's flight bookings, his online purchases, his correspondence. It had been a necessary amputation.

He ignored the emails from his agent and team. Before the severing, he had seen things. Notifications. Tentative, exploratory emails from team executives and agents that had nothing to do with trade talks. They were about opportunities. Phrases like "future considerations" and "long-term vision for a player of your caliber" and "building a legacy." They were the kind of emails sent to a franchise cornerstone whose contract was entering its final year. Shane's rookie deal, like his own, was ticking down.

Ilya powered on the laptop. He didn't reopen the old, invasive pathways. He didn't need to. The knowledge was etched into him. At least six other teams had been sniffing around, his agent had confirmed, their interest growing as Ilya's on-ice performance remained stellar even while his personal life imploded. The offers weren't formal yet, but the groundwork was being laid. A king's ransom for the Russian scoring phenom.

And Shane... Shane would be receiving the same. The quiet, brilliant, unproblematic center who had led his team in points and grace under unspeakable pressure. Montreal would move heaven and earth to keep him. But other teams, hungry for his combination of skill and unflappable leadership, would be circling too. They just didn't know the secret that made his composure so hard-won.

A cold, complex knot tightened in Ilya's stomach. It wasn't jealousy. It was something more terrifying: parallel uncertainty. Their professional futures, which had always been intertwined through rivalry, were now on similar, precarious trajectories. They could end up on opposite sides of the continent. With the weight of new, gargantuan contracts and the ghosts of the past pressing down on the fragile new thing they were trying to grow.

His phone buzzed- a calendar alert. Preseason Physicals - 8:00 AM. The real world, with its impersonal demands, reasserted itself. He was back in the machine. The next few weeks would be a barrage of medical tests, media days, and early skates designed to separate the vacation-soft from the game-ready. Every move he made would be scrutinized. Was Rozanov focused? Was he worth the massive investment? Was he a liability with all the fighting on the ice and unpredictability?

He showered, the water needling his skin. He thought of Shane's routine, the meticulous order of his life. The thought was a comfort. Shane was probably already asleep, his apartment quiet, the flowers on one of those fancy tables, perhaps beginning to wilt. A simple, ordinary end to an extraordinary few days.

Later, wrapped in a towel, his hair dripping, he picked up his phone. He didn't overthink it. He called.

Shane answered on the third ring, his voice soft with sleep. "Rozanov?" A hint of worry bled through. "Everything okay?"

Just hearing his name in that sleep-roughened tone unraveled something tight in Ilya's chest. "Da. Everything is okay. I just got settled back in Boston. I did not wake you?"

"It's okay. I was just reading." A rustle of sheets. "How was the flight?"

"Long. Quiet." I missed you the moment I left your doorstep. He didn't say it. The courtship required a lighter touch.

A soft, breathy laugh came through the line. It was the best sound Ilya had heard in months. "That's your fault. You bought the large."

"A strategic error."

They talked then, not about contracts or obsessions or the terrifying open field of their future. They talked about nothing. The weird abstract art in Ilya's lobby he'd never understood. The book Shane was reading about naval history. The way Hayden had texted Shane a blurry picture of a squirrel wearing a tiny hat. It was easy. It was the friendship, rediscovered, its edges softened by everything that had happened since.

Ilya lay back on his cold, too-large bed, the phone pressed to his ear, and let Shane's voice paint pictures in the dark. This was the part he had missed most catastrophically: the daily texture of him. The shared, stupid universe of two people who simply know each other.

"My physical is tomorrow," Ilya said after a comfortable silence. "The circus begins."

"Mine's Thursday," Shane replied. Then, his voice careful, he added, "It's a big year."

The understatement hung between them, Ilya could hear the nerves over the phone. It's the last year of our rookie contracts. Our value is at its peak. Our lives are about to be auctioned to the highest bidder.

"Da," Ilya said simply. He didn't ask the questions burning in his mind. Have they called? What are you thinking? Do you want to stay with Montreal? To ask would be to step into the old patterns, to assume his need to know superseded Shane's right to privacy. Instead, he said, "You will be magnificent. As always."

Shane was quiet for a moment. "You too. Just... try to look like you've slept, okay? For the photos."

A real smile touched Ilya's lips. "I will wear extra sunglasses."

They lapsed into silence again, but it was the good kind, the kind that felt like sharing oxygen over a long distance.

"I should let you sleep," Ilya murmured, though every cell in his body resisted ending the connection.

"Yeah. Big day for the circus." Shane's tone was warm. "Goodnight, Ilya."

“Goodnight, krasavchik.”

He held the phone to his ear for a second after the call ended, listening to the empty silence, already missing the sound of Shane’s breath. Then he placed it on the nightstand and stared at the ceiling.

The future was a maze of contracts, cameras, and unknown cities. The past was a minefield of his own creation. But the present, this fragile, deliberate present where he could call Shane Hollander and talk about squirrels in hats, felt like a miracle he had no right to, but would fight with every reformed bone in his body to keep.

The man was winning. And for the first time, Ilya began to suspect the prize might be worth more than any trophy, any contract, any obsessive dream of total possession. It might simply be this: the right to hear his voice in the dark, and to know he had earned the privilege to listen.

The number 194 became a silent, persistent guest in Shane’s mind. It followed him from the clinic to the gym, from the ice to his quiet apartment. It wasn’t about aesthetics or performance; it was about deviation. For years, his body had been a precise instrument, its weight a constant variable in the equation of his control. 190 pounds was the output of a life meticulously calibrated specific caloric intake, measured exertion, managed stress. It was the weight of Shane Hollander, Beta Hockey Star, a figure of immutable stability.

194 was the weight of something else. Something unplanned.

He stood in his kitchen three days after the physical, staring at the weekly menu emailed by the private chef Ilya had quietly hired for him. It was another one of those “courting” gestures- thoughtful, observant, removing the daily mental load of meal prep so Shane could focus on training and recovery. The menu was elegant, balanced, and full of the wholesome, nutrient-dense foods an athlete needed: grilled salmon with quinoa and roasted asparagus, bison chili with sweet potato, berry chia seed pudding for breakfast.

It was perfect. And it felt like an indictment.

Because he had eaten the chef's food. He had enjoyed the perfectly seared scallops, the rich avocado chocolate mousse. He hadn't tracked a single macro. He'd simply consumed, trusting the expertise behind it, and his body had responded by shifting its set point.

His phone buzzed on the counter. A text from Ilya.

IGR- Chef Laurent sends his compliments. He says you have the palate of a man who appreciates quality. I think he is flirting. I should fire him. Get you old grandmother to cook for you.

A week ago, the text would have made him smile. Now, it felt like a spotlight on his lapse. Chef Laurent's quality had added four pounds of unplanned mass.

Shane's fingers moved over the screen, pulling up the reply email to the chef. His therapist's voice, Dr. Mayra's calm, rational tone, echoed in one ear. "You're defining your capacity. Protecting your energy. That's autonomy."

But another voice, older and more familiar, hissed louder. Autonomy is control. Control is numbers. Predictability. Safety. Gaining this weight is making you softer. If someone notices your hips getting rounder, they can put the pieces together.

He began to type, his movements sharp and precise.

Mr. Laurent,

Thank you for the proposed menu. Please make the following adjustments for the coming week:

- Remove the quinoa from the salmon dish. Substitute with double the asparagus.
- Omit the sweet potato from the chili. Extra lean ground bison only, with increased leafy greens.

- The berry chia pudding is to be replaced with plain Greek yogurt (non-fat) and a separate portion of whole berries
- Please ensure all sauces are served on the side, if included at all. Vinegar or lemon-based dressings only.
- Remove the avocado mousse dessert option entirely.>

The goal is maximum lean protein and fibrous vegetables, minimal simple carbohydrates and fats

Sincerely,

Shane Hollander

He hit send before he could second-guess it. A cold, clean sense of order washed over him. He needed to get down to 190lbs again, before the season.

His phone buzzed again. Ilya.

IGR- You are quiet today. Did the skate go poorly?

Shane stared at the message. Ilya was noticing his patterns, his moods. Another observation. This one felt less like being seen and more like being monitored. The old paranoia, a ghost he thought he'd buried, tapped on the glass of his mind.

Shane- Skate was fine. Just tweaking the meal plan with the chef. Getting ready for camp.

He needed to justify it. To preempt the question.

IGR- Laurent's plans are designed for peak athletic performance. He knows his business.

Shane- I know. Just personal preference. Need to lean out a bit.

The lie tasted bitter. It wasn't about leaning out. It was about erasing the evidence of his own contentment. The four pounds were a monument to a summer where he'd laughed at texts, savored pastries, and kissed someone in a dark car without calculating the consequences. They had to go.

IGR- As long as you are getting enough fuel. The preseason is a grind.

The concern in the text was palpable, and it irked Shane. It felt paternal. Like Ilya was overseeing his care, even from a distance. The chef, the check-ins, they were threads of a safety net Ilya was weaving around him again. But this time, Shane was the one feeling trapped by it.

Shane- I've been fueling this body for a long time. I think I know what it needs.

The moment he sent it, he winced. It was defensive, sharp. He was picking a fight over a menu. Over his own irrational reaction to a number on a scale.

Ilya's reply took a minute.

IGR- You are right. Forgive me. It is your body. Your choice.

The words were correct. Respectful. Exactly what he'd asked for. So why did they make him feel so alone?

His next session with Dr. Mayra felt charged. He sat in the familiar armchair, the weight of the unsaid pressing on him.

“Something’s wrong. You’re all tense.” Dr. Mayra observed, not unkindly. “Last time, you spoke about feeling frustrated but ultimately safe within the new boundaries. Today, you seem... agitated.”

Shane picked at the seam of his jeans. “I gained weight.”

Dr. Mayra waited.

“Four pounds. At my physical.”

“And how do you feel about that?”

“It’s... wrong,” Shane said, the word bursting out of him. “It’s a deviation. My weight is 190. It has been for years. Through everything. It’s a constant.”

“A controlled variable,” she offered.

“Yes. And now it’s not. And I... I changed the meal plan the chef sends. I cut out all the carbs, the healthy fats, the desserts. I need to get back to 190.”

“Why?”

The question was so simple it felt like a trap. “Because that’s my weight. That’s the correct number.”

“According to whom? Your performance metrics from last season? Your doctors? Or an internal standard you set during a period of extreme stress and suppression?”

Shane fell silent. She had neatly dismantled his logic.

“You told me you’ve been feeling calmer. That your sleep has improved. That the texts with Ilya, while complicated, have brought a sense of... connection. Is it possible your body is responding to a decrease in chronic stress? That four pounds might represent a healthier baseline, not a failure of control?”

“It feels like a failure,” he whispered, the admission shameful. “It feels like I’ve been... indulgent. Distracted.”

“By Ilya’s attention? By his gifts?”

“By all of it,” Shane confessed. “The flowers, the food, the... the way he talks to me now. It’s like I’ve taken my eye off the ball. Literally and figuratively. My body is the first thing to show it.”

Dr. Mayra leaned forward. “Shane, for years, your body has been a fortress. You medicated it to hide its nature. You trained it to project an image of impenetrable, beta strength. You controlled its every input and output to maintain a specific, unchanging form. That fortress kept you safe. It also kept you isolated inside it.”

She let that sit for a moment. “What if these four pounds aren’t the walls crumbling? What if they’re you, very carefully, opening a window? Letting in a little air. A little light. Maybe even letting someone else see in. you have a more active social life. You’ve been taking control of your free time and doing things you love.”

The analogy was too apt. It made his eyes sting. He thought of Ilya seeing him- really seeing him- not as a perfect, controlled idol, but as a human who ate croissants and gained a few pounds and sometimes sent sharp texts when he felt cornered.

“He hired a chef,” Shane said, deflection in his tone. “It feels like another form of control. Just a nicer cage.”

“Did you ask him to hire the chef?”

“No.”

“Can you tell him to cancel the service?”

“No. I like it actually. It makes me feel like he... I don't know, like I'm being looked after.”

“Then it is a gift with an off-ramp. Your autonomy remains intact. The choice to alter the menu was you exercising that autonomy.” She paused. “Though, perhaps ask yourself: are you changing the menu for performance, or are you punishing your body for changing? For daring to reflect a life that is becoming slightly less rigid, slightly more... lived-in?”

The session ended with more questions than answers, but with the thorny issue named: his weight wasn't just a number. It was a barometer for his fear of the very changes he was supposedly trying to embrace.

That evening, a new menu arrived from Chef Laurent. It adhered strictly to Shane's mandates: no carbs, no sweets, lean protein and greens presented with elegant, Spartan simplicity. It was exactly what he'd asked for.

Attached was a note.

Mr. Hollander,

Your adjustments have been made. Please note that the removal of complex carbohydrates may impact energy levels during high-intensity training blocks. I will monitor and can adjust protein sources accordingly. My goal is to support your objectives.

Respectfully,

Laurent

It was professional, accommodating, and contained a subtle, expert warning. Shane felt no triumph, only a hollow victory. He had successfully reasserted control over a spreadsheet of food. He had not addressed the storm inside him.

He looked at the vase on his bookshelf. The lisianthus were fully dry now, their blue petals papery and delicate, preserved in their moment of beauty. A gift he had accepted. A gesture from a man trying to court him properly.

He thought of Ilya's text: "It is your body. Your choice."

The right words. The respectful words. Why did they leave him feeling so adrift?

Because, he realized with a sinking clarity, part of him was terrified that if he truly relaxed his control- if he allowed the weight to stay at 194, if he enjoyed the chef's meals without scrutiny, if he leaned fully into the terrifying, gentle promise of this new version of Ilya, he would lose himself entirely. The fortress walls might not just develop windows; they might dissolve altogether, leaving him exposed in a way he hadn't been since he was a teenager injecting illegal suppressants in a bathroom stall.

The scale was a manageable problem. A number to be corrected. The much harder problem was figuring out who Shane Hollander was allowed to be on the other side of all this, not just a 'beta', not just a survivor, not just an object of obsession or a subject of a courtship, but a man, in a body that was changing, facing a future that was terrifyingly, exhilaratingly unwritten.

The encrypted file arrived just after midnight, the night before the first preseason scrimmage. Shane had been in bed, eyes closed but mind racing through power-play setups and the nagging, hollow feeling left by his own restrictive meal plan. His phone, set to Do Not Disturb, buzzed once with a specific, overriding alert he'd assigned only to Ilya's or his parents forms of communications.

His heart, already unsettled, gave a hard, single thump against his ribs. He sat up, the cool sheets pooling around his waist. The room was dark, lit only by the faint ambient glow from the city outside his window. He reached for the tablet on his nightstand, its larger screen feeling suddenly necessary, a more appropriate stage for whatever was coming.

The email was stark. No subject line. The body contained only two words: As promised. And below it, the attachment. A video file, cryptically named with a string of numbers and letters.

Ilya's voice from the hotel room, strained and ashamed, echoed in the silence. I'll send it to you.

Shane's fingers were cold. He tapped the file. A media player opened, filling the screen with blackness for a moment before resolving into an image.

It was his old apartment. The one he'd lived in before the kidnapping, before the surveillance was discovered. The camera angle was high, in the corner of his bedroom, near the ceiling. A hidden lens capturing the entire room. The quality was shockingly clear. He saw his own bed, the navy duvet cover he'd since replaced, the stack of books on his nightstand. The late afternoon sun slanted through the blinds, painting stripes of gold across the floor.

And then, he saw himself.

He watched his past self walk into the frame, wearing a soft, faded Voyageurs t-shirt and sweatpants. He was smiling, a little shy, a lot nervous. He was talking to someone off-camera, his gestures careful. Then Ilya entered the shot.

Shane's breath caught.

Ilya looked younger. Not in years, but in spirit. The harsh lines of perpetual tension that had later carved themselves into his face were softer. His eyes, which Shane had become accustomed to seeing as either blazing with intensity or hollowed with exhaustion, were alight with a different fire. It was a mix of awe, hunger, and a tenderness so raw it was painful to witness.

He watched as Ilya reached for him, his movements not with the desperate, claiming aggression of their later encounters, or the carefully measured restraint of the present, but with a reverence that seemed to surprise even Ilya. His large hands framed Shane's face, his thumbs stroking his cheekbones with a touch so gentle it made present-day Shane's skin prickle.

The audio was clear. He heard his own laugh, a sound he barely recognized-light, unguarded, free of the underlying hum of anxiety that had become its permanent bass note. He heard Ilya's voice, lower, a rough caress. "You are so beautiful, Shane. It steals my breath."

The Shane on screen flushed, ducking his head, and Ilya tipped his chin back up, forcing eye contact. "No. Look at me. Let me see it."

The progression was slow, achingly so. A dance of shedding layers, not just of clothing, but of defenses. Ilya was meticulous. He kissed every new inch of skin revealed, the hollow of his throat, the slope of a shoulder, the plane of his stomach. He kept pausing, his eyes searching Shane's face.

"This okay?" Ilya asked, his voice gravelly, as his hand slid under the waistband of Shane's sweats.

"Yes."

"Tell me to stop."

"Don't stop."

Present-Shane watched, transfixed. He was a ghost in his own bedroom, observing the moment of happiness. He saw the trust in his own eyes, a trust that had been so complete it was its own form of blindness. He saw the way his body arched into Ilya's touch, a language of pure, uncomplicated wanting.

But it was Ilya who held his focus. The alpha's attention was absolute. It wasn't just sexual, it was devotional. His eyes never left Shane's face for long, constantly checking, reading, ensuring every gasp was pleasure, every shiver was welcome. When he finally, slowly, entered him, he did it with a controlled, shaking slowness that spoke of a fear of hurting him that outweighed his own desperate need. He buried his face in Shane's neck, his shoulders trembling with the effort of his restraint.

“You feel... Bozhe moy... you feel like heaven.”

Shane watched, his own body responding traitorously to the memory, heat pooling low in his belly. He was fascinated. This was the obsession in its pure, nascent form, before it curdled into something malignant. It was still possessive, but the possession was of the moment, of the feeling, not of the person as an object. Ilya was worshipping, not cataloging.

Then, he saw it.

As the intensity built, as Ilya's thrusts became less measured, more driven by primal need, there was a moment. Ilya pulled back slightly, his body shielding the movement from the camera, but not completely. Shane's own legs were wrapped around Ilya's waist, his head thrown back in ecstasy, oblivious.

Ilya's hand moved between their bodies. A quick, deliberate motion. A flicker of something translucent and discarded, barely caught by the wide-angle lens, falling to the sheets beside them.

The condom.

Shane's finger stabbed the screen, freezing the frame. He leaned in, his heart now a frantic drum against his ribs. He rewound. Five seconds. Played it in slow motion.

There. Unmistakable.

Before re-entering him, Ilya had removed it.

A cold fury, sharp and clean, sliced through the haze of arousal and nostalgic ache. It was a violation. A profound, dangerous betrayal of trust. It was the ultimate act of the obsession, the need to claim, to connect, to breed, overriding safety, consent, rationality. He'd been vulnerable, lost in sensation, and Ilya had made a decision that risked everything- his career, his secret, his very body.

The anger was a white-hot spike. He wanted to throw the tablet. He wanted to call Ilya and scream, to unleash every foul, hurtful word he could summon. How dare he? After everything, this was the proof- the sickness was there from the very beginning, woven into the most intimate moment they'd shared.

He sat there, shaking, the frozen image of their joined bodies a grotesque mockery on the screen. He forced himself to breathe. Four in. Seven hold. Eight out. The numbers were a lifeline.

His thumb moved, un-freezing the frame. The video continued.

He made himself watch. Through the haze of his fury, he saw Ilya's face. The ecstasy was there, yes, a raw, animal triumph. But so was something else. A vulnerability so deep it was terrifying. Tears glistened in Ilya's eyes as he moved, as he came, his release a shuddering, almost sob-like collapse onto Shane's body. He didn't pull away. He held Shane so tightly it looked like he was trying to merge them into one entity.

"Moy... moy...", Ilya chanted, the word lost in the skin of Shane's shoulder. It sounded less like a boast and more like a desperate, hopeful prayer.

The fury in Shane's chest splintered, confused.

The video continued past the climax. Ilya, still buried inside him, nuzzled his neck, placing soft, open-mouthed kisses along his scent gland. He whispered in Russian, too low for the microphone to catch clearly, the words a continuous, soothing stream. His hands, which had been gripping hard enough to bruise, now smoothed over Shane's back, his sides, a tender apology written in touch.

Present-Shane watched as his own body on screen gradually went limp, his breathing deepening into the rhythms of sleep. Satisfied, utterly spent. Ilya finally, carefully, withdrew. He didn't get up immediately. He just lay there for a long moment, propped on one elbow, watching Shane sleep. The look on his face... it was devastation. It was love so profound it bordered on grief. He reached out and brushed a strand of sweat-damp hair from Shane's forehead, his fingers trembling.

Then, he slowly got out of bed. He walked, naked and unselfconscious, to the bathroom. He returned with a warm, damp cloth. And with a tenderness that made the breath catch in present-Shane's throat, he began to clean him. He was meticulous, gentle, wiping away the evidence of their joining from his stomach, his thighs. He turned him slightly to ensure he was clean everywhere, his touch clinical and loving in the same motion. He fetched a glass of water from the kitchen, lifted Shane's head, and encouraged him to drink a few sleepy sips.

Then, he got back into bed. He pulled the covers over them both. He gathered Shane into his arms, tucking his head under his chin. And he stayed awake.

For over an hour, the video showed Ilya, eyes open in the dark, staring at the ceiling or down at the man in his arms. Every few minutes, he would press a kiss to Shane's hair, his temple, his shoulder. A random, quiet punctuation in the silent vigil. He was guarding. He was savoring. He was, quite clearly, memorizing.

Shane watched, his earlier anger now a tangled, heavy knot in his gut, wrapped in vines of a longing so acute it was a physical pain. He had no memory of this. None. He'd fallen asleep feeling sated and loved, and had woken up alone. He'd assumed Ilya had left. He'd never known about the careful cleanup, the water, the hours of silent, wakeful holding.

This was the man who had removed the condom? The same man. The monster and the caretaker were not separate people. They were the same shattered entity, capable of a reckless, terrifying violation and a breathtaking, selfless tenderness in the same hour.

The video ended. The screen went black, reflecting Shane's own stunned, pale face back at him.

He was shaken to his core. More turned on than he could ever remember being, his body humming with a confused, desperate arousal that felt connected to the devotion on the screen, not just the sex. And he was still, fundamentally, upset. The risk Ilya had taken was unconscionable. It was the starkest proof of the obsessive pathology Dr. Mayra had tried to describe.

But the anger wouldn't hold its shape. It kept melting against the image of Ilya's tear-streaked face at the moment of climax, and the later image of him wiping Shane's skin with such reverent care.

He had a hundred questions. They swarmed in his head, a chaotic buzz.

Why did you do it?

Were you trying to get me pregnant?

Did you even think about what that would have done to me?

Why did you stay awake?

What were you thinking?

Why did you look so sad?

Do you still look at me like that when I'm not looking?

He picked up his phone. The text thread with Ilya was the last thing open. His thumbs hovered over the keyboard. What could he possibly say?

I watched it. Too neutral.

How could you? An accusation that would trigger defensiveness or shame, and shut down any real conversation.

His mind, ever-seeking structure, tried to categorize his reactions. He made his mental list of what he would need to bring up when they were next face to face.

The need for clarification won. He couldn't sit with this maelstrom alone. He needed data. He needed Ilya's voice, his explanation, however flawed or painful.

He didn't text. He called.

The phone rang once, twice. Ilya answered on the third ring. His voice was wide awake, clear, and layered with a tension that told Shane he'd been waiting for this call.

"Shane."

"I watched it," Shane said, his own voice sounding thin and far away.

A beat of silence. He could hear Ilya's steady breath on the other end. "I know."

"You took the condom off."

No pretense. No easing into it. The statement hung in the digital space between them, an indictment. Ilya didn't deny it. He didn't offer excuses. His voice, when it came, was low, stripped bare. "Da. I did."

"Why?" The word was a crack in Shane's composure.

A long exhale. "In that moment... I wanted nothing between us. Not latex, not fear, not your suppressants, not my own sanity. I wanted it to be just you and me. Skin to skin. As close as two people can be. It was... a madness. A selfish, terrible madness. I knew it even as I did it. And I did it anyway."

The honesty was disarming. It wasn't a justification. It was a confession.

"You could have... you risked everything," Shane whispered, the enormity of it crashing over him again.

"I know. There is no defense. It is the single most unforgivable thing I have ever done to you. Even more than the cameras. Because that..." Ilya's voice broke. "That was me putting my sickness inside you in the most literal way possible. It is the reason I never asked for more, after. The reason I was so afraid of my own obsession. I saw what it made me capable of in a moment of... of what I thought was love.”

Shane closed his eyes. The knot in his gut tightened. “You stayed. After. You cleaned me up. You held me for hours.”

A soft, shocked silence. “You remember that?”

“No. I saw it. On the video. I don’t remember any of it.”

Ilya made a small, wounded sound. “I wanted you to be comfortable. To feel... cared for. Not used. The two things... the act and the aftermath... they do not balance. I know this. One does not erase the other.”

The paradox. The unbearable, human paradox of Ilya Rozanov.

“You looked at me,” Shane said, his throat tight. “While I was sleeping. You looked... devastated.”

“I was,” Ilya admitted, the words raw. “Because I knew, even then, in some deep part of me I was ignoring, that I would ruin it. That my love was not a clean thing. That having you, truly having you, would break me in ways that would end up breaking you. I was holding paradise, and I knew I was its destroyer. I was trying to memorize what it felt like before I did.”

The tears came then, hot and silent, tracking down Shane’s face. He didn’t sob. He just let them fall.

“Why send it to me?” he asked, wiping his cheek with the back of his hand. “Why show me that? The good and the... the violation?”

“Because you asked,” Ilya said simply. “And because you deserve the whole truth. Not the curated truth. Not the truth that makes me look less monstrous. You have seen the monster in the daylight, in the trackers and the fire. You needed to see it in the dark, in the most intimate space we shared. And you needed to see... that it was not all there was. That even the monster is capable of holding a glass of water to your lips. It does not make it okay. It just makes it true.”

Shane sat in the dark, the tablet's black screen beside him, the ghost of his own pleased cries and Ilya's reverent whispers still echoing in the room. The hundred questions had distilled into one overwhelming, terrifying realization.

He was not just attracted to the better man Ilya was trying to become. The reformed, courting, respectful alpha.

A part of him- a deep, shameful, omega part that had thrilled to the breeding fantasy in his dream- was still, irrevocably, drawn to the devastating, all-consuming, monstrously devoted man in the video. The man who would break every rule to feel closer to him, and then spend the night in penance, holding him as if he were the only holy thing left in a ruined world.

“I don't know what to do with this,” Shane confessed, the admission a surrender.

“You do not have to do anything,” Ilya said, his voice gentle now, the confessional intensity receding. “It is information. A piece of the past. It does not obligate you to a future.”

But it did. It had changed the terrain. Shane now knew the full, flawed, terrifying topography of Ilya's love. The canyons of obsession and the peaks of tenderness were part of the same landscape.

“We have a scrimmage tomorrow,” Shane said, grasping for the familiar, for the structure of the game.

“I know. You should sleep.”

“I won’t be able to.”

“Then rest your eyes. Think of power-play formations. Think of anything but this.”

A weak, watery laugh escaped Shane. “That’s your advice?”

“It is the only safe advice I have left to give you,” Ilya replied, and Shane could hear the faint, sad smile in his voice.

They hung up a moment later. Shane placed the tablet facedown on the nightstand. He lay back, staring at the ceiling, just as Ilya had done in the video.

His body still hummed. His mind still churned. But the chaotic storm had settled into a heavy, profound knowing. The path forward was no clearer. If anything, it was more fraught. But he was no longer looking at a shadowy figure from his past. He was looking at a man, brilliantly, fatally flawed, whose love for him was the most beautiful and dangerous thing he had ever known.

And for the first time, Shane thought he might finally understand its true shape. It wasn't a cage or a sanctuary. It was both. And the choice of whether to step inside, knowing the full blueprint, was now, terrifyingly, his alone.

The morning light cutting through Shane’s blinds felt accusatory. It was too clean, too normal, illuminating the dust motes dancing over his tablet where the video had played. His body felt heavy, wrung out from a sleepless night spent caught between the visceral memory of arousal and the cold, hard fact of betrayal. The two sensations refused to reconcile, leaving him in a state of suspended, queasy shock.

He’d replayed it in his mind a hundred times. The slow, worshipful touch. The devastating tenderness of the aftermath. And the single, deliberate motion that undermined it all. A violation so intimate it felt like a theft. He hadn’t just risked Shane’s career; he’d gambled with his very biology, his autonomy, his future, for a moment of skin-on-skin connection.

The structured part of his brain, the part that had built a life on suppressants and control, screamed in protest. It drafted mental lists, categorized the offense under “Unforgivable,” and demanded action. But another part, a deeper, more primal part that had thrilled to the words “I want to see your belly swell with my child.” in his dream, watched the video of Ilya’s tear-streaked, devoted face and understood the impulse on a cellular level. The conflict was paralyzing.

He couldn’t sit with it. He needed the variable defined. He needed the equation solved. He needed to hear Ilya say it out loud.

His hand was steady as he picked up his phone, but his pulse hammered in his throat. He called.

Ilya answered on the first ring, his voice a low, wary rumble. “Shane.” No question. Just an acknowledgment of the storm he knew was coming.

“You said it was a madness,” Shane began, his own voice surprisingly flat, clinical. He was distancing himself through analysis. “You said it was selfish. But you haven’t said why. Not really. Not the core of it.”

A beat of silence. He could hear the faint sound of traffic, a city waking up on Ilya’s end. Boston. “I wanted to feel you,” Ilya said, the words simple and devastating. “All of you. Nothing in between.”

“That’s not an answer,” Shane pressed, the clinical tone cracking. “That’s a feeling. I need the thought process. I need to understand the risk calculus in your head. You didn’t know if I was on any other birth control. You didn’t ask. You just... decided. For both of us. Why?”

He heard Ilya take a sharp breath, as if steeling himself. “The chances... they were not zero. But they were small. Very small. You were not in heat. The timing was not optimal. It was a risk, yes. A stupid, risk. But it was a calculated one.”

“Calculated?” The word was a bullet. “You calculated the odds of getting me pregnant without my knowledge or consent?”

“No.” Ilya’s voice hardened, not with defensiveness, but with a grim, unflinching honesty. “I calculated the odds of conception. The consent... in that moment, Shane, I was not thinking of consent. I was thinking only of connection. Of claiming. Of being as close to you as a person can be to another. It was the most selfish moment of my life. I am not trying to justify it. I am explaining the sickness.”

Shane closed his eyes. The sickness. The obsession. Laid bare. “And if the odds had been higher? If I’d been in heat? What then?”

The silence that followed was so profound Shane could hear the blood rushing in his own ears.

“Then I would have done it anyway.”

The admission landed like a physical blow. It was the truth he’d been circling but hadn’t wanted to hear. There was no mitigating circumstance, no moment of passion so overwhelming it clouded judgment. The judgment was the passion. The obsession’s logic was its own.

“My ultimate dream,” Ilya continued, his voice dropping to a raw, haunted whisper, “the fantasy I would torture myself with... it was not just being inside you without a barrier. It was the thought of you, after. Carrying our child. My mark on you, in you, permanent. A part of me you could never erase. A life we made together, binding you to me in a way no contract, no promise ever could.”

He said it without shame, without apology for the desire itself. He apologized for the action, for the risk, for the violation of trust, but not for the dark, yearning core of the fantasy. It was the most honest thing he’d ever said to him.

Shane’s mind went blank. The lists, the categories, the analysis- they short-circuited. He was left floating in a void of pure, undiluted reaction. Horror. Arousal. Fear. A strange, terrifying sense of... recognition. The dream hadn’t been just his subconscious. It had been an echo of Ilya’s deepest, most closely held want, resonating in the bond their trauma had forged.

He couldn't speak. The silence stretched, thin and brittle.

"You asked for the truth," Ilya said finally, the words heavy with exhaustion. "The whole truth. That is it. That is the rotten heart of it. I wanted to own you in the most fundamental way a person can own another. And I knew it was wrong. And I wanted it anyway."

Shane found his voice, but it was small, a child's voice in the dark. "What do you want now?"

Another pause. This one felt different- less like the prelude to a confession, more like a man searching for a new language. "I want you to be safe," Ilya said, each word measured. "I want you to be happy. I want to be someone who deserves to be near you while you are those things. The dream... the fantasy... it is a ghost. I am not feeding it anymore. But I cannot kill what is already dead. I can only tell you where it is buried."

It was a profound distinction. He wasn't disavowing the nature of his desire; he was confessing its place in the cemetery of his old self. The man trying to court him with flowers and movie dates was the same man who harbored that ghost. The monster and the penitent shared a body.

Shane's head throbbed. He needed the conversation to stop. He needed to not be having it. He grasped for the mundane, for the structure of daily life.

"You have practice," he said abruptly, his tone shifting to something almost normal. "You're running late."

A startled noise from Ilya, almost a laugh. "How did you-"

"I can hear your coach yelling in the background. Or someone. Your team's morning skate is at 8:30. It's 8:17."

A beat of silence, then a genuine, weary chuckle. “Your brain. It is a remarkable thing. Even now.”

“Go,” Shane said, the command automatic. “Don’t be late because of this.”

“Shane-”

“Go, Ilya. We’ll... we’ll talk later.”

He hung up before Ilya could respond. He dropped the phone onto the bed as if it were hot, then immediately snatched it back up. His fingers flew over the screen, opening his notes app. He needed to parse this. He needed to break it down into components his reeling mind could process.

He stared at the list. It was neat. Organized. It made the chaotic torrent of feelings look manageable. But the words on the screen—“breeding fantasy,” “arousal,” “non-consensual risk” glared back at him, clinical and damning.

He thought of the video again. Not of the condom moment, but of what came after. The tender cleanup. The watchful, tearful vigil. The man who held a glass of water to his lips was the same man who had risked his future for a feeling.

Dr. Mayra’s question echoed: “Do I have the capacity to choose something else?”

Looking at the list, at the cold facts of Ilya’s confession, the answer seemed like it should be a resounding yes. He should walk away. This was pathology. This was danger.

But then he thought of the movie date. The careful distance in the car. The respect at his door. The daily texts that asked for nothing, that simply said I am here, and I am thinking of you. The man who was trying, every day, to build a new self over the rotten heart of the old one.

He thought of his own body's traitorous response, both in the dream and while watching the video. The part of him that heard "I wanted you carrying our child" and didn't recoil in pure horror, but felt a deep, secret thrill.

He was not just afraid of Ilya's obsession.

He was afraid of his own complicity in it.

His phone buzzed. A text.

IGR- I am at the rink. I am sorry. For everything. Not for the truth, but for the pain it causes you. It is a heavy burden. You should not have to carry it.

Shane read the message three times. It wasn't an excuse. It wasn't a plea. It was an acknowledgment of the weight he had just dropped onto Shane's shoulders. It was, in its own twisted way, a form of respect.

He didn't reply. He couldn't. The lists and categories were failing. The equation was unsolvable with the data he had. The only clear next step was the one he'd typed: Discuss with Dr. Mayra.

He got out of bed. The morning routine: shower, skincare, dress, protein shake, felt like moving through wet cement. His body, the body Ilya had dreamed of filling with his child, felt alien to him. He caught his reflection in the mirror after his shower, his hand unconsciously drifting to his lower abdomen. Flat. Unmarked.

For now.

The thought wasn't entirely his own. It was seeded by Ilya's confession, by his own dream, by a biology he'd spent a lifetime suppressing. He dropped his hand, a flush of shame heating his skin.

He had a day of meetings, training. He would go through the motions. He would be Shane Hollander, reliable beta center, teammate, friend. He would smile at the right times, nod in the right places.

And all the while, in the silent, secret center of him, the ghost of Ilya's ultimate dream would whisper, and his own treacherous heart would listen.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much for reading ❤️

I've been absolutely living for the comments lately. The theories, the screaming, the emotional damage reports, the mentions of edging (!! the concern for Shane, the concern for Ilya, and the occasional comment that makes me stare into the distance for ten minutes because YOU NOTICED SOMETHING.

And speaking of noticing things...

A few readers have already started catching details that may become important later, which has been incredibly fun to watch.

So tell me:

What's your favorite part of Ilya's courtship attempt so far?

Are you Team Flowers, Team Breakfast Delivery, Team Movie Date, or Team Service Stairwell?

What do you think Shane's biggest obstacle is right now?

And most importantly... which one of these idiots is going to crack first? Will I have Shane try to crack Ilya's head like a watermelon with his thighs?? (Thanks gay besties for THAT visual)

I read every single comment, even if I can't always respond immediately.

Chapter 25: Chapter 25

Hi friends

First things first: thank you. Thank you for the comments, the theories, the emotional support, the yelling, the concern for Shane's wellbeing, the concern for Ilya's sanity (which is fair), and for continuing to take this journey with me.

Some of your comments genuinely made me cry. Some made me laugh so hard I had to walk away from my computer. Some had me blushing and kicking my feet like an absolute fool. I read every single one of them, and they have been such a huge motivation while writing this story.

A massive thank you to my beta reader, who somehow continues to wrangle this increasingly complicated emotional disaster into something coherent. Any remaining mistakes are mine, not theirs.

And of course, thank you to my gay bestie- the fourth love of my life- who has listened to me ramble about these two hockey idiots for an unreasonable number of hours and still answers my messages, and gives me stick figure drawings of the spicy scenes when I'm stuck.

I think you've earned this chapter.

Be nice to me.

The soothing silence of Dr. Mayra's office had become a sanctuary. Here, in the plush armchair, Shane could lay out the tangled threads of his life and trust her to help him find a pattern, or at least not to judge the knot.

Today, the knot was particularly hard session.

"So," Dr. Mayra began, her pen poised over her notebook. "You received the video. You watched it. You confronted him. You've had time to sit with his explanation. Where does that leave you?"

Shane looked at his hands, clasped tightly in his lap. “In two pieces,” he said, the honesty surprising him with its bluntness. “One piece is furious. It’s logical. It has lists. It says, ‘He violated your bodily autonomy in the most fundamental way. He risked your entire life for a feeling. This is the obsession, undressed. Run.’” He took a breath. “The other piece... saw the way he looked at me. The way he held me after. And it doesn’t want to run. It wants to understand the man who contains both those things.”

Dr. Mayra nodded, her expression neutral. “And which piece is speaking right now?”

“They’re arguing,” Shane admitted. “The logical piece is louder. It’s... safer. But the other piece isn’t quiet. It keeps replaying the the look in his eyes over and over again.”

“Let’s talk about the lists,” she suggested. “The logical piece. What does it want?”

“Boundaries. Explicit, non-negotiable boundaries. No more unilateral decisions. Ever. About anything. If we ever... if there’s ever a physical relationship again, everything is discussed. Everything is consented to. Step by step.”

“That sounds like an excellent starting point for any healthy relationship, but especially vital here,” she affirmed. “And the other piece? The one that saw him cry?”

“It wants... to believe the tears were real. That the care was real. That the man who wiped me clean is as real as the man who took the condom off. It wants to believe they can be separated. That the second man can win.”

“Do you believe they can be separated?”

Shane was quiet for a long moment. “I don’t know. But I believe he’s trying to separate them. The gifts, the texts, the distance he keeps... it’s all him trying to build a new pattern. One where care doesn’t have to mean control.”

Dr. Mayra made a note. “That’s a significant observation. You’re attributing positive intent to his current actions, while holding him fully accountable for his past ones. That’s a mature, and very difficult, space to occupy.”

“It’s exhausting,” Shane confessed.

“I imagine it is.” She set her pen down. “Shane, I want to pivot slightly. We’ve spent a lot of time discussing Ilya, his pathology, his progress. I want to talk about you. About your patterns.”

He looked up, wary. “My patterns?”

“You are, by nature and necessity, a people-pleaser. You manage perceptions. You maintain control through impeccable performance- in hockey, in your public persona, in your suppressed biology. You say ‘yes’ to avoid conflict, to maintain harmony, to be the perfect son, the perfect teammate, the ideal beta, the perfect role model to minorities and Canadians in general.” She leaned forward slightly. “Where in your life are you practicing ‘no’?”

He thought of the league promoters. “I slowed down the promos the league wanted me to do for the weekly home games. Tuesdays and Thursdays, before two.”

“Good. That’s a start. But I’m talking about the deeper ‘no.’ The ‘no’ that isn’t about scheduling, but about desire. The ‘no’ that says, ‘I don’t want this, even if it disappoints you.’ The ‘no’ that expresses a preference, a flaw, a need.”

Shane shifted in his chair. The question felt invasive. “I don’t know.”

“I think you do,” she said gently. “With Ilya, even now, you are so focused on understanding his motivations, his progress, his capacity for change. Where is your own? What do you want, Shane? Not what you think you should want, or what would be safest, or what would please him or your parents, or fans or the league. What does the part of you that isn’t perfect want?”

The question hung in the air, vast and terrifying. He'd spent so long defining himself by what he wasn't - an omega, a problem, a burden and what he had to be- the team star, a beta, being in control at all times, that the concept of a pure, unmediated want felt alien.

"I don't have to be perfect?" The words came out softly, more a child's question than a man's.

Dr. Mayra's smile was kind. "No. You really don't. In fact, trying to be perfect is what keeps you locked in this cycle. It's what made you the perfect target for an obsessive love- you presented a flawless, controlled surface, and Ilya, in his brokenness, became obsessed with uncovering the 'real' you underneath. What if you just... were the real you? Messy, sometimes unsure, saying 'no,' saying 'I want,' making mistakes?"

"It sounds dangerous," he whispered.

"It is. Being known is always dangerous. But it's also the only path to being loved for who you actually are." She paused. "As for Ilya... my advice remains the same as before. Extreme caution. But caution doesn't have to mean paralysis. If you are honest with yourself about what you are and are not willing to accept, and if you communicate those boundaries clearly, and if he continues to respect them... then it is okay to see where it goes. At a pace you set. Your healing is not contingent on his. Your journey is separate. They can run parallel, or they can diverge. That is your choice."

The session left him feeling scoured out, raw but clearer. The mandate was terrifying: be imperfect. Express wants. Say no.

He tried it in small ways first. When his mother called, bubbling over with news of a "lovely, stable beta from a good family" who just happened to be in town and would love to meet for coffee, Shane didn't give his usual non-committal hum. He took a breath and said, "No, Mom. I'm not interested in being set up right now."

The silence on the other end was profound. Then, a hesitant, "Oh. Okay, sweetheart. That's... that's fine." She sounded bewildered, a little hurt, but not angry. The world didn't end.

When the team's community relations coordinator emailed asking if he could add a last-minute hospital visit to his already-packed Thursday, he wrote back: "I'm sorry, my class is on that day. I can offer a time next week, or perhaps another player is available." The coordinator wrote back a perfectly pleasant, "No problem, we'll ask Hayden!"

Each small "no" felt like a muscle he'd never used before, aching but strengthening.

University was his new refuge. In the lecture halls of McGill, poring over architectural schematics and historical texts, he wasn't Shane Hollander, NHL center or traumatized omega. He was Shane Hollander, student. The problems here were clean. They had solutions. The Gothic arch either supported the weight or it didn't. The foundations of Bauhaus were a matter of historical record, not emotional interpretation.

He loved it. He loved the smell of old books and dry-erase markers. He loved the focused silence of the library, the rustle of pages, the click of his own pen. He was older than most of the other undergraduates, and his fame occasionally drew whispers or hesitant glances, but the academic environment was a great leveler. Here, his value was in his analysis of Vitruvius, not his slap shot accuracy.

He was working on a paper about the influence of defensive military architecture on early Canadian fortifications when his phone buzzed with a text. A familiar, now-welcome flutter in his chest.

IGR- Boston's public library has a first edition of Palladio's Quattro Libri. I stood near it and thought of you. It is behind glass. I did not attempt to steal it, though the thought occurred.

Shane- Theft is generally frowned upon, even for rare books. Also, you'd never fit it in your gear bag.

IGR- This is the practical thinking I rely on you for. How is the fortress of Louisbourg?

Shane- Poorly designed against sustained cannon fire. My professor is less critical.

IGR- Your professor did not have to withstand a slapshot from Ovechkin. His standards are low.

Shane smiled, a real one, alone in the library carrel. This was the new normal. Light. Easy. A connection that spanned cities and histories, both personal and architectural. It was what he'd said he wanted. What he'd asked for.

So why did he sometimes stare at the phone after these exchanges, a hollow feeling growing beneath his ribs?

The NHL season began like a great machine rumbling to life. The rhythm was comforting: travel, game, recovery, practice, repeat. Montreal started strong. Shane's line was clicking, his own play sharp, his body responding to the grueling pace. The 194 pounds settled into a new, solid equilibrium; he was stronger, not softer, and the scale's judgment mattered less as his performance spoke for itself.

Ilya, in Boston, was also tearing up the league. Their texts became a running commentary on their parallel statistical standings.

Shane- Two goals against Tampa. You're showing off.

IGR- One was an empty netter. Do not be too impressed. I saw your assist on the power play. The pass was... acceptable.

Shane- It was a saucer pass through three defenders.

IGR- As I said. Acceptable.

The gifts continued arriving when Shane was on the road.

The first came to his hotel in Chicago. A concierge brought up a small, elegant box. Inside, nestled in tissue paper, was a pair of custom-made skate guards. Not the standard team-issue rubber ones, but guards crafted from rich, dark leather, his number 24 embossed on the side in subtle, silver foil. There was no note. None was needed. They were beautiful, practical, and spoke of a deep understanding of his daily reality. He ran his fingers over the leather, a complicated warmth spreading in his chest.

In Dallas, it was a first-edition copy of John Ruskin's The Stones of Venice, a text he'd referenced when they were first getting to know each other so long ago. The book was old, the spine delicate, and tucked inside the front cover was a plain card with a single, precise line of handwriting: "For your fortress of books. - IGR."

In Vegas, a set of incredibly high-end, noise-canceling headphones arrived. The attached card read: "I know you need to shut the world out sometimes. Hope these help." He'd never mentioned the sensory overwhelm he sometimes had, but of course, Ilya had noticed.

Each gift was thoughtful, personal, and utterly non-possessive. They weren't jewels or grand gestures. They were solutions to small problems, acknowledgments of his interests, tokens of care that asked for nothing in return. They were, in a word, perfect.

And that was the problem.

The frustration built slowly, a pressure cooker with the valve sealed shut. Their calls and texts remained in the same lane: flirty, fun, lighthearted. Ilya shared anecdotes about his teammates, complained about the food in various cities, sent him ridiculous memes that made him snort. He asked about Shane's classes, listened intently to his descriptions of vaulting techniques, and offered surprisingly insightful comments. It was everything Shane had once mourned the loss of- the friendship, the easy camaraderie, the intellectual connection.

But it never deepened. It never strayed into the dark, tangled woods of what had happened in that hotel room, of the video, of the confession. It was as if they had mutually agreed to have the other man push the relationship forward but neither of them were.

After a hard-fought win in Toronto, Shane lay in his hotel bed, bone-tired but buzzing with adrenaline. His phone lit up.

IGR- The deflection off Petrov's skate was lucky. But the patience on the second goal... that was you. You see the ice like no one else.

Shane- Thanks. I'm watching the highlights from your game now.

But Shane frowned. He did not want to talk about hockey. He wanted Ilya to tell him that he was missed, that he couldn't wait until they were in the same city so they could see each other.

IGR- Did you ice the shoulder?

Shane- Yes, mom.

He replied sarcastically, trying to get a rise out of the Russian.

IGR- Good. Rest.

Shane stared at the exchange. It was supportive, affectionate even. But it was safe. It was the conversation of close friends, of devoted teammates. Not of two people who had seen the absolute worst of each other and were trying to find a way back to something else.

The hollow feeling yawned wide. He thought of the leather skate guards, now protecting his blades in the equipment room. He thought of the gifts, carefully packed in his luggage. He thought of Ilya's voice, raw and shattered, saying, "My ultimate dream... it was the thought of you, after. Carrying our child."

Where was that man? Where was the man who felt things so violently, so deeply? Had the therapy and the medication smoothed him out into this... this perfect, thoughtful, distant pen pal?

He wanted the intensity. Not the destructive, possessive kind, but the realness of it. He wanted to talk about the video, not as a crisis, but as a part of their history. He wanted to ask if Ilya still had those dreams, and if he did, what he felt about them now. He wanted to scream that the gifts were lovely, but they weren't enough. He wanted to be seen again, in all his messy, complicated, imperfect reality, not just as the curated recipient of perfect presents.

His fingers flew over the screen before his logical brain could catch up.

Shane- The gifts are amazing. Thank you.

IGR- You are welcome. The headphones are working?

Shane- They're great. It's just... is this it?

The send button felt like jumping off a cliff. The three dots appeared immediately, then disappeared. Then appeared again. A long, long minute passed.

IGR- Is what it?

Shane- This. The texts. The jokes. The perfect, thoughtful gifts. The careful distance. Are we just going to be... this? Forever?

He could feel the tension through the phone, a continent away.

IGR- What would you have us be?

Shane- I don't know. Real. You sent me a video of you taking a condom off me without my knowledge. We can't just talk about power plays and architecture forever.

The silence this time was absolute. No dots. Nothing. Shane's heart hammered against his sternum. He'd done it. He'd said no to the pleasant status quo. He'd pointed what he wanted/

When the reply came, it was short.

IGR- No. We cannot stay how we are now.

But what is alternative, Shane? I am trying to be man you can have conversation about everything with. That man will not survive a conversation about the video. Not yet. The other man... the one who wants that conversation, who wants more... he cannot be trusted with you. I am building a bridge between them. I am trying my best.

Shane read the message three times. The frustration didn't evaporate, but it morphed. It wasn't that Ilya was avoiding depth. He was consciously, painstakingly, constructing a pathway to it that wouldn't collapse under their weight. The flirty, lighthearted connection wasn't the end goal; it was the foundation for something that could hold more.

He was practicing too. Saying 'no' to his own darkest impulses, building a new way of being with Shane, one careful plank at a time.

The realization was a balm and a burden. It meant the waiting wasn't passive. It was active, grueling work in progress. And Shane had just stomped on the new paths they were trying to build, demanding to know why it wasn't finished.

He typed, his fingers less frantic now.

Shane- I'm sorry. I'm frustrated. I see that you're putting in the effort like I asked. I just... miss the other side of our relationship sometimes.

IGR- Be patient with me, krasavchik. Please.

The old endearment, spoken not with possession but with a soft plea, undid him.

Shane- I'll try.

Another gift arrived two days later, in Winnipeg. It was a small, flat package. Inside was a single sheet of high-quality vellum. On it, drawn in precise, detailed ink, was a blueprint. The cottage- labeled in a neat, architectural hand. A thick cardstock was in front: I added something you might want to add. I hope you like it. I had this started before-my gift to you.

He noticed another building added behind the treeline. A gym-but a gym with a practice hockey rink. Plans already laid out perfectly. It was a gift that spoke both their languages. Hockey and design. Analysis and affection. He could just imagine it, the same style as the cottage, large floor to ceiling windows, sophisticated. It said, I see all of you. The student and the star. And I have built you this as my offering.

Shane pinned the blueprint to the wall of his hotel room. He studied the lines, his heart melting at such a thoughtful gesture.

He lay back on the bed, the hollow feeling momentarily filled. It wasn't the intense, all-consuming connection he sometimes ached for. It wasn't a resolution. But it was progress. It was two damaged people, on opposite banks of a river of pain, slowly, carefully, building a bridge toward each other. One imperfect, beautiful step at a time.

Two weeks later, Shane was a storm on legs. His mood was as unpredictable as the Montreal weather in late October, swinging from frosty to thunderous in the span of a few hours. He was due to start his cycle any day now, and the hormonal rollercoaster was making his usually even keel see-saw wildly.

He was sitting in his apartment, the lights low, the sound of the city muted through the closed windows. His phone buzzed on the coffee table. A text from Ilya.

IGR- The play against Toronto was impressive. The way you forced the turnover and capitalized on the breakaway... such a good trick. Plus you looked edible in the new uniform.

Shane stared at the message, his fingers hovering over the screen. He should reply. He wanted to reply. But the words that bubbled up inside him were not the sweet, flirty responses Ilya was used to. They were sharp, accusatory, fueled by the hormonal storm raging inside him.

Shane- Did you watch the game or just my ass in those pants?

He hit send before he could overthink it. He knew it was unreasonable. He knew Ilya had done nothing to deserve this. But he couldn't stop the words. They were a release, a valve for the pressure building inside him.

Ilya's response was immediate.

IGR- I watched the entire game. Your ass was not the only thing I noticed. If you are going to insult me, come up with something better.

Shane huffed, a sound somewhere between a laugh and a growl. He typed out another snarky reply, but paused. He was being a brat. He was taking out his frustration on Ilya, who had done nothing to warrant it. He deleted the message and typed a new one.

Shane- Sorry. I'm being an ass. It's... it's my time of the month.

He sent it, bracing himself for Ilya's reaction. The three dots appeared, disappeared, appeared again. Then:

IGR- I see. You are excused. And I know when you usually have your cycle. I have read your medical records, remember?

Shane's blood ran cold. He'd forgotten, in the heat of his hormonal rage, that Ilya had seen everything. Every test result, every doctor's note. Including the ones about his omega status, his cycle, his suppressant use.

Shane- You fucking asshole! I tell you something important and that's all you have to say? Forget it then. You're probably distracted with some whore and want to get me off the phone.

Ilya's reply was immediate.

IGR- I will remind you if it means you treat me with less hostility. I am not your enemy, Shane. I understand you are not feeling like yourself right now, I will respect me and you need to calm down.

Shane's fingers hovered over the screen. He wanted to snap back, to defend his autonomy, his privacy. But Ilya was right. He was being hostile for no reason. He took a deep breath, letting it out slowly.

Shane- I'm sorry. Again. I'm just... on edge.

IGR- I know. I wish I could be there to... help.

Shane's heart skipped a beat. Ilya had never offered to help with this before. He'd always respected Shane's privacy, his boundaries. But now, he was offering... what? Comfort? Support?

Shane- You can't. But... thank you.

IGR- If you need to vent, or if you want to talk, I am here. Even if you are unreasonable.

Shane smiled, a small, genuine smile that felt good after the storm of snarky texts.

Shane- I'll keep that in mind. Thank you.

They left it at that. Shane set his phone down, leaning back against the couch cushions. He felt better. Calmer. The storm inside him had settled, at least for now.

But the next day, the cycle started. And with it, the hormones, the emotions, the irrational thoughts. He snapped at Ilya over the smallest things. He picked fights over nothing. He was a whirlwind of moods, and Ilya was the convenient target.

On the third day, Ilya had had enough. He called Shane over FaceTime, his expression stern, his eyes glinting with an emotion Shane couldn't quite read.

"Hollander," he said, his voice low, commanding. "Stop this."

Shane blinked, taken aback. "What?"

"This... this brat you are being. I understand your hormones are causing you distress. But I will not be your punching bag. If you need to vent, I will listen. But I will not tolerate this behavior. Not from you. Not from anyone."

Shane stared at him, his mouth open in shock. He'd never seen Ilya like this. He was... dominant. Authoritative. And it wasn't the obsessive, possessive dominance Shane had seen before. It was something else. Something healthy.

He felt a flush come over his face. He was being unreasonable. He was taking out his frustration on the one person who had always been there for him. The one person who understood him.

"I... I'm sorry," Shane stammered, his voice small. "I didn't mean to... I'm sorry."

Ilya's expression softened. "I know. But I will not enable this behavior. You are better than this, Shane. You deserve better than this."

Shane felt a lump form in his throat. He was better than this. He deserved better than this. And Ilya... Ilya was trying to give him that. To give them that.

"I'll... I'll try to be better," Shane said, his voice steady now. "I promise."

Ilya nodded, a small, satisfied smile tugging at the corners of his mouth. "Good. Now, tell me about your class today. The one on Gothic architecture, yes?"

Shane smiled back, the tension in his chest easing. They talked about classes, about hockey, about nothing and everything. It was a normal conversation. A good conversation. And it was a start to calm him down.

Ilya paced the length of his therapist's office, his hands clenched behind his back. The room was a sanctuary, a space where he could speak freely without fear of judgment or repercussion. Dr. Kostova sat in her usual chair, her expression calm, her pen poised over her notepad.

"Tell me about your week, Ilya," she began, her voice steady and non-judgmental.

Ilya took a deep breath, his gaze fixed on the abstract painting on the wall. "I played better," he said, his voice measured. "I scored three goals in the last game. The team is winning."

Dr. Kostova made a note. "And how does that make you feel?"

Ilya paused, considering the question. "Relieved," he admitted. "I've been... distracted. Since Montreal. Since Shane."

She nodded, her pen moving across the page. "And how is Shane?"

The question was a minefield. Ilya navigated it carefully. "He's... well. He's playing well. He's enjoying his classes. He's... testing me."

Dr. Kostova raised an eyebrow. "Testing you?"

Ilya nodded, a small, bitter smile tugging at the corners of his mouth. "He's... acting like a brat. Snapping at me over nothing. Being unreasonable. It's... it's a good sign, I think. According to some omega books I've been reading, it's a way for them to test their alpha. To see if they can push boundaries and still be safe."

Dr. Kostova set her pen down, her expression thoughtful. "And how do you feel about this testing?"

Ilya unclenched his hands, running a hand through his hair. "Frustrated," he admitted. "I want to... to react. To push back. But I know I can't. Not yet. Not until he trusts me again. Not until he's sure I won't... revert."

"And how do you manage this frustration?"

Ilya looked at her, his eyes steady. "I go to the gym. I run. I play hockey. I... I talk to Svetlana. She keeps me grounded."

Dr. Kostova made another note. "And your father?"

Ilya's expression darkened. "I ignore him. He calls, he texts, he leaves messages. I delete them without listening. I... I can't. Not right now. Not with Shane so close."

She nodded, her expression understanding. "And this decision to ignore him? Is it because of Shane or because you are done with that part of your life? Are you mourning the loss of the relationship or does it create a relieved feeling? "

Ilya was quiet for a moment, then he said, "Relieved. It's... it's a relief to not have to... to not have to be what he wants me to be. To not have to live up to his expectations."

Dr. Kostova smiled, a small, genuine smile. "That's progress, Ilya. That's you taking control of your own narrative. That's you choosing your own path."

Ilya felt a warmth spread through him at her words. It was a validation, a confirmation that he was on the right track. He thought of Shane, of his snappy texts, his unreasonable demands. He thought of the way he'd snapped back, not with anger, but with calm, measured responses. It was a new kind of control, a new kind of strength.

"I... I think I'm getting better," he said, his voice soft. "I think I'm learning to... to be the man Shane needs me to be. Not the man my father wants me to be. Not the man my obsession wants me to be."

Dr. Kostova leaned forward, her eyes intent. "And what does Shane need, Ilya? What does he want?"

Ilya thought of the video, of Shane's body arching into his touch, of his soft sighs, his trusting sleep. He thought of the way he'd cleaned him up, of the hours he'd spent watching him sleep, memorizing every line of his face. He thought of the way Shane had looked at him in Room 329, his eyes wide, his cheeks flushed, his heart pounding in his chest. He thought of the way he'd walked away, of the promise he'd made to himself to be better.

"He needs... he needs to be safe," Ilya said, his voice steady. "He needs to be respected. He needs to be... seen. Not just as an omega, not just as a hockey star, but as... as Shane. The man he is, not the man he's supposed to be. He needs to be loved, not just possessed. He needs to be... free."

Dr. Kostova nodded, a small, satisfied smile on her face. "And what about you, Ilya? What do you need?"

Ilya looked at her, his expression serious. "I need to be the man who can give him that freedom. I need to be... better. I need to be... enough."

The session ended with Ilya feeling a sense of accomplishment, of progress. He left the office, the crisp autumn air filling his lungs, and walked to his car. He drove home, the city lights blurring past him, and sat in his apartment, the silence pressing in on him.

He thought of Shane, of his texts, of his snappy demands. He thought of the way he'd snapped back, not with anger, but with calm, measured responses. It was a new kind of control, a new kind of strength. It was the strength of a man who was learning to let go, to trust, to love without possession.

He picked up his phone, his fingers hovering over the screen. He thought of the last text Shane had sent, the one that had made him smile despite the frustration.

Shane- I'm not a cat. I looked it up when you kept calling me that.

He typed out a response, a small, teasing smile tugging at his lips.

IGR- I think you like it. When you are mad, you get angry face like a kitten. It is beautiful.

He waited, his heart pounding in his chest. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then appeared again.

Shane- I've been upset only when you don't notice me.

Ilya laughed, a real, genuine laugh that echoed in the empty apartment. He typed out a response, his fingers moving quickly over the screen.

IGR- I've noticed. I've always noticed. But I'm learning to be patient. To wait for you to be ready. To be the man you need me to be.

He hit send and waited, his heart pounding in his chest. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then appeared again.

Shane- You're learning fast.

Ilya smiled, a soft, satisfied smile that felt like a victory. He typed out a response, his fingers moving slowly over the screen.

IGR- I have the best teacher.

He leaned back against the couch, his eyes closed, a sense of peace washing over him. He was learning. He was growing. He was becoming the man Shane needed him to be.

And that was worth more than any goal, any victory, any championship. It was worth everything.

Ilya paced the length of his Boston apartment, his phone clutched in his hand. The screen displayed a picture of Shane, taken during one of their FaceTime calls. Shane's hair was messy, his cheeks flushed, and he was laughing at something Ilya had said. It was a picture Ilya had saved without Shane's knowledge, a secret memento of a moment when Shane had been happy, unguarded.

He set the phone down on the kitchen counter, his reflection staring back at him from the dark window. He looked tired. The circles under his eyes were darker than usual, a testament to the sleepless nights spent wrestling with his thoughts and his father's persistent calls.

The phone rang, the shrill sound piercing the silence. Ilya's father. Again. He ignored it, letting it ring out. He didn't have the energy to deal with his father's demands, his expectations, his disapproval. Not tonight. Not when Shane was so close.

He picked up the phone, his thumb hovering over Shane's number. He wanted to call, to hear his voice, to reassure himself that Shane was okay. But he didn't. He respected Shane's space, his boundaries. He would wait until Shane reached out to him. That was the new normal. The new right normal.

Instead, he pulled up their text conversation from earlier in the day. Shane had been snappy, unreasonable. Ilya had bitten back, not with anger, but with a calm, measured response. It was a dance they had been doing for weeks now. Shane would snap, Ilya would respond with calm, and eventually, Shane would apologize, or at least stop snapping. It was a pattern Ilya had come to recognize, to expect.

But it was exhausting. It was a constant test of his patience, of his control. And it was a reminder of the power imbalance in their relationship. Shane was testing him, pushing him, and Ilya was... letting him. Because that was what healthy boundaries looked like, wasn't it? Letting the other person push, to see if you would still be there when they pulled back.

But what if Shane never pulled back? What if this was the new normal? The thought was a cold, bitter pill to swallow.

His phone buzzed with an incoming text. It was Svetlana.

Sveta- You're overthinking again. I feel it. Stop it.

He smiled, a small, grateful smile. Svetlana knew him too well. She could read his moods like a book.

IGR- I'm trying. It's just hard. With Shane. He's testing me.

Sveta- That's good. It means he feels safe. It means he trusts you enough to test your boundaries.

IGR- I know. But it's... it's hard. To not react. To not... to not be what he's testing for.

Sveta- You're doing it. You're not the man your father wants you to be. Not the man your obsession wants you to be.

IGR- I just want... I want him to be happy. I want him to be here with me. Not just on the phone. Not just in texts.

Sveta- Then invite him over. To your house. Show him that you can be a good host, a good alpha. That you can respect his boundaries and still give him what he needs.

IGR- I was thinking about it. But... he's been so bratty. I'm not sure he'd accept.

Sveta- Then ask. Be honest. Tell him you want to see him. That you miss him. That you want to take care of him. In a healthy way. Not the old way.

IGR- I'll think about it. Thank you, Svetlana.

Sveta- Anytime, Ilyusha. You're doing great. Keep going.

He set the phone down, a sense of determination settling over him. Svetlana was right. He needed to ask. He needed to show Shane that he could be the alpha he needed, even when he was being unreasonable. Even when he was pushing boundaries.

He picked up his phone again, his fingers hovering over Shane's number. He took a deep breath, then typed out a message.

IGR- I want to see you. In person. At my house. This weekend. If you want to, of course.

He hit send, the message disappearing into the digital void. He waited, his heart pounding in his chest. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then appeared again.

Shane- Really?

Ilya smiled, a soft, satisfied smile that felt like a victory.

IGR- Don't be so boring. I wouldn't have asked if I didn't want you here. I've also noticed that you're still Shane. My Shane. And I want to see you.

He leaned back against the couch, his eyes closed, a sense of peace washing over him. He was learning. He was growing. He was becoming the man Shane needed him to be.

And that was worth more than any goal, any victory, any championship. It was worth everything.

The next day, Ilya woke up to a text from Shane. It was a picture. A close-up of a pair of sweatpants, faded and worn, the fabric soft from use. Ilya recognized them instantly. They were the ones he'd sent him recently. They were too long and wide, which for some reason made him extremely happy when he saw that they were Shane's preferred lounge pants now when he had no where to go. The ones he'd worn during their FaceTime calls, the ones that made Ilya's heart ache with a bittersweet longing.

Shane- I'm wearing your pants today. For luck.

Ilya smiled, a real, genuine smile that felt like a reward. Shane was thinking of him. He was wearing Ilya's clothes. He was thinking of their shared history, of their connection, and he was using it for luck.

IGR- I hope they bring you all the luck in the world. And more.

He laid back against the couch, his eyes closed, a sense of contentment washing over him. This was progress. This was Shane reaching out, even if it was just a picture of a pair of sweatpants.

The day of the first Boston game dawned grey and drizzly. Ilya woke up early, his body already buzzing with anticipation. Today, he would see Shane. In person. At his house. If Shane wanted to, of course.

He spent the morning preparing. He cleaned the house, not that it was messy after having the cleaning service there for extra time to make sure everything clean, but because he wanted it to be perfect. He picked up fresh flowers, because Shane loved them when he had some delivered, and the scent reminded him of Shane's apartment, of Shane himself. He checked the fridge, he had called the chef yesterday to make sure he could handle feeding the omega something that he'd like and would be a bit foolproof.

By the time the team left for the arena, Ilya was a ball of nervous energy. He sat in his seat in the locker room, his hands clenched in his lap, his mind racing. What if Shane changed his mind? What if he didn't come over? What if he did, but he was still unreasonable, still bratty?

He pulled out his phone, his fingers hovering over Shane's number. He wanted to call, to reassure himself that Shane was still coming. But he didn't. He respected Shane's space, his boundaries. He would wait until Shane reached out to him. That was the new normal. The new right normal.

The game was a blur. Ilya played well, but his heart wasn't in it. His mind was elsewhere, on the man across the rink from him racing against Marly for the puck. He was on edge every time someone came near him-they all seemed so much bigger than Shane and he'd hate to have to murder one of his teammates for injuring Hollander. Boston won 5-4 but he didn't feel guilty since Shane had blushed when they went down the line at the end of the game.

After the game, Ilya sat in the locker room, his head in his hands. He was exhausted, emotionally drained. He had played a full game, had gotten a hat trick, and had still felt like he was only half-present.

His phone buzzed. A text from Shane.

Ilya's heart stopped, then restarted, a hard, painful thump against his ribs. Shane would be on his way after the team debrief. To his house. Shane was coming. Ilya stood up, his hands shaking as he gathered his things. He didn't bother with a shower, didn't bother with changing. He just left, his heart pounding in his chest, his mind racing.

He drove home, his foot heavy on the gas, his hands tight on the wheel. He pulled into the driveway, his tires squealing. He ran to the door, his heart in his throat, his body buzzing with anticipation. As he ran to the bathroom to get ready.

He had just slipped some pants on when the doorbell rang. He checked himself out, pulling his pants a little lower, smoothing back his damp hair. He made sure his scent patch was on before slipping on his black slides and went to answer the door.

"Come in," Ilya said, his voice soft. He smiled to himself as he saw Shane looking around, taking in the details of the home. He asked sometime about the builder, making him grin. "Mr. Real Estate..."

Shane blushed hard, making his freckles of course stand out more as if only to please Ilya. He motioned if he needed to take off his shoes but Ilya let him know he was ok. Ilya led him to the kitchen island, to where he had left a gift. It was a box, wrapped in simple, elegant paper. Shane looked at it, then at Ilya, his eyes wide.

"What is it?" he asked, his voice barely above a whisper.

Ilya smiled, a small, soft smile. "A gift. For you."

Shane took the box, his fingers tracing the edges of the paper. He looked up at Ilya, his eyes searching. "Why? I don't need more gifts though?"

Ilya's heart ached at the question. Why? Because Shane was here. Because Shane was wearing Ilya's clothes. Because Shane was testing him, and Ilya wanted to show him that he could be trusted. That he could be the alpha Shane needed him to be.

"Because I want to give you things," Ilya said, his voice steady. "I like the feeling of providing for you... that shows you that I see you. All of you. Not just the omega. Not just the hockey star. But Shane."

Shane looked at him, his eyes wide, his mouth open in a small 'O'. Then, slowly, he began to unwrap the gift. The paper fell away, revealing a small, elegant box. Shane opened it, his fingers careful, his breath catching as he saw what was inside.

It was a necklace. A simple chain, with a pendant shaped like a phoenix, its wings spread wide, its eyes made of two small, perfect rubies. It was a symbol of rebirth, of rising from the ashes. Of a new beginning.

Shane looked at it, then at Ilya, his eyes filled with tears. "Ilya... it's... it's beautiful."

Ilya smiled, a soft, satisfied smile. "It's you. Strong. Resilient. Beautiful. A phoenix rising from the ashes. That's you, Shane. That's who you are."

Shane looked at the necklace, then at Ilya, his eyes filled with tears. "Thank you," he whispered. "I... I don't know what to say."

Ilya reached out, his hand covering Shane's where it rested on the box. "You don't have to say anything. Just... wear it. For me."

Shane nodded, a small, hesitant movement. Then, he picked up the necklace, his fingers fumbling as he tried to put it on. Ilya's fingers fumbled slightly as he fastened the clasp of the necklace, his knuckles brushing against Shane's neck. He noticed it then, the subtle shift in Shane's scent. It was still Shane, sweet and soft- but there was an underlying note, a hint of something sharper, more pronounced. He recognized it as the scent of an omega near his heat, but it was muted, as if Shane had used only a single patch or had left an old one on for too long.

The necklace hung around Shane's neck, the phoenix resting just above his heart. It looked perfect. It looked right.

Ilya leaned back, his eyes never leaving Shane's face. "You look beautiful," he said, his voice soft.

Shane blushed, a soft, pink stain spreading across his cheeks. "Thank you," he whispered.

They stood there, inches apart, their bodies close, their breaths mingling. Then, slowly, Ilya stepped back, putting some distance between them. "We should... we should talk," he said, his voice soft.

Shane nodded, a small, sad movement. "Yes. We should."

They sat down at the kitchen island, their bodies turned toward each other, their eyes steady. They were ready. Ready to talk. Ready to listen. Ready to be honest. Ready to be the men they needed each other to be.

His body responded, a primal, instinctual reaction. His grip on Shane's neck tightened, his fingers tangling in the soft hair at the nape. Shane leaned into the touch, his eyes fluttering closed, a soft, needy noise escaping him.

Ilya stood there, frozen, his body humming with a sudden, sharp desire. He wanted to claim, to mark, to take. But he didn't. He forced himself to release Shane, his hands dropping to his sides, his breath ragged.

Shane, however, had other plans. He leaned up, his lips brushing against Ilya's cheek, close to his mouth, but not quite on it. Then, he moved. He slid over, his body pressing against Ilya's, his lips finding Ilya's in a soft, tentative kiss. It was a kiss filled with questions, with uncertainties, with a tentative, cautious hope.

Ilya stood still for a few seconds, shock rooting him to the spot. Shane rarely initiated intimacy. Even before their separation, he had been hesitant, his touches careful, measured. But now, here, in Ilya's kitchen, he was kissing Ilya. Fully. On the lips.

Then, Shane wrapped his arms around Ilya's neck, his body pressing closer, his lips parting, inviting. Ilya, unable to resist any longer, wrapped his arms around Shane, picking him up with ease. Shane's legs wrapped around Ilya's waist, his body molding to Ilya's as if they were made to fit together.

Ilya lifts him to the kitchen counter, setting him down gently. Shane's hands went to Ilya's hair, his fingers tangling in the short strands, pulling him closer. Ilya's hands went to Shane's hips, his thumbs tracing the line of his hipbones, his fingers digging into the soft flesh.

They made out, their bodies pressed together, their breaths mingling, their hearts pounding in sync. It was a kiss filled with questions, with uncertainties, with a tentative, cautious hope. It was a kiss that saying, I want you. I want us. I want to try.

And Ilya, for the first time in a long time, felt a spark of hope. A hope that maybe, just maybe, they could make this work. That maybe, they could try again without fucking things up.

Shane's lips were soft, tentative at first, then more insistent, more demanding. Ilya responded, his body pressing against Shane's, his hands tangling in Shane's hair, pulling him closer. Shane's legs wrapped around Ilya's waist, his body molding to Ilya's as if they were made to fit together.

Their kisses were filled with questions, with uncertainties, with a tentative, cautious hope. It was a dance of tongues and teeth, of soft noises and sharp breaths. It was a conversation in its own right, a dialogue of desire and hesitation, of trust and fear.

Ilya's hands roamed Shane's body, his thumbs tracing the line of his hipbones, his fingers digging into the soft flesh. Shane's hands went to Ilya's hair, his fingers tangling in the short strands, pulling him closer. Their bodies moved together, a rhythm as old as time, as instinctual as breathing.

Ilya's hand wrapped around Shane's jaw, his fingers tangling in the soft hair at the nape, his thumb tracing the line of Shane's cheekbone. It was a possessive, dominant gesture, one that would have made Shane bristle in the past. But now, he leaned into it, his eyes fluttering closed, a soft, needy noise escaping him.

"Shane," Ilya murmured, his voice hoarse with desire. "You're playing with fire."

Shane opened his eyes, his gaze steady. "I know," he whispered.

Ilya's grip tightened, his thumb brushing against Shane's lower lip. "You don't know what you're asking for," he said, his voice a low warning.

Shane leaned into the touch, his body pressing against Ilya's. "I do know, I haven't been able to stop thinking about this," he challenged, his voice soft but steady. He reached down and lowered the waistband of Ilya's lounge pants, reaching in and stroking him.

Ilya's eyes flashed, a primal, possessive hunger igniting in their depths. He leaned in, his lips capturing Shane's in a kiss that was anything but soft. It was a claiming, a marking, a promise of things to come. His tongue swept into Shane's mouth, his teeth nipping at Shane's lower lip, his hands tangling in Shane's hair, pulling him closer.

Shane moaned, the sound muffled against Ilya's mouth. His other hand went to Ilya's hair, his fingers tangling in the curls, pulling him closer. Their bodies pressed together, a rhythm as instinctual as breathing.

Ilya paced the length of his bedroom, his hands clenched behind his back, his eyes fixed on the floor. Shane sat on the edge of the bed, his body turned toward Ilya, his eyes steady. The tension in the room was palpable, a tangible thing that seemed to hum in the silence.

Ilya opened his eyes, his gaze locking with Shane's. There was a long, silent standoff. Then, slowly, Ilya nodded. "Okay," he whispered. "Talk."

Shane smiled, a small, satisfied smile that felt like a victory. "Sit down," he said, his voice gentle but firm. "Please."

Ilya hesitated, then sat down on the edge of the bed, his body tense, his hands clenched in his lap. Shane sat next to him, leaving a careful distance between them. He turned his body toward Ilya, his eyes steady.

"I... I want you to take control," Shane said, his voice soft but firm. "Not just in the bedroom. I want you to take control of... of us. Of this. Of what happens next."

Ilya looked at him, his expression guarded. "What do you mean?"

Shane took a deep breath, his eyes never leaving Ilya's. "I mean... I mean, I want you to make the decisions. I want you to... to guide me. To guide us."

Ilya's eyes widened, shock and something like hope flashing in their depths. "You... you want me to... to control you?"

Shane nodded, a small, hesitant movement. "I've been thinking about this. I've talked to my therapist, I did my research. I want you to take the lead. I want you to... to show me what you want. What you need. I trust you, Ilya. I trust you to... to guide me. To guide us."

Ilya was quiet for a moment, his eyes searching Shane's face. Then, slowly, he reached out, his hand cupping Shane's cheek, his thumb tracing the line of his jaw. "You... you don't know what you're asking for," he whispered, his voice hoarse with desire.

Shane leaned into the touch, his eyes fluttering closed. "Show me," he whispered back. "Show me what I'm asking for."

Ilya's grip tightened, his thumb brushing against Shane's lower lip. "Are you sure?" he asked, his voice a low warning. "Once we start... once I start... I don't know if I can stop."

Shane opened his eyes, his gaze steady. "I'm sure," he said, his voice soft but firm. "I want this, Ilya. I want you. I want us. I want to try."

Ilya's eyes flashed, a primal, possessive hunger igniting in their depths. He leaned in, his lips capturing Shane's in a kiss that was anything but soft. It was a claiming, a marking, a promise of things to come.

Shane moaned, the sound muffled against Ilya's mouth. His hands went to Ilya's hair, his fingers tangling in the short strands, pulling him closer. Their bodies pressed together, a rhythm as old as time, as instinctual as breathing.

Ilya's hands roamed Shane's body, his thumbs tracing the line of his hipbones, his fingers digging into the soft flesh. Shane's hands went to Ilya's hair, his fingers tangling in the short strands, pulling him closer. Their bodies moved together, a dance as old as time, as instinctual as breathing.

Their kisses were wet, messy, hungry. Ilya's were precise, controlled, desperate. They were a study in contrast, a dance of give and take, of push and pull. They were a conversation in their own right, a dialogue of desire and hesitation, of trust and fear.

Their bodies pressed together, their breaths mingling, their hearts pounding in sync. It was a kiss filled with questions, with uncertainties, with a tentative, cautious hope. It was a kiss that said, I want you. I want us. I want to try.

And Ilya, for the first time in a long time, felt a spark of hope. A hope that maybe, just maybe, they could make this work. That maybe, they could build a new bridge, one kiss at a time.

The dark sheer drapes over the windows created a warm dimly lit atmosphere in the bedroom, the air was thick with tension and the scent of arousal. Ilya, was sprawled over Shane, his muscles taut as he watched Shane, who was withering under him as they kissed and touched. Ilya's heart pounded in his chest, a primal drumbeat that echoed the desire coursing through his veins.

Shane grew more and more frustrated, his eyes locked onto Ilya's. His pupils were dilated, a clear sign of his heightened state. He reached out, his fingers tracing the contours of Ilya's abs, feeling the power that lay beneath the surface. Ilya tensed, his body yearning for Shane's touch, yet he held back, his mind screaming at him to maintain control.

"Hollander," Ilya's voice was a low growl, a warning that he was teetering on the edge. Shane ignored it, his hands moving to Ilya's pants, pushing them down over his ass and using his foot to get them lower. Ilya's breath hitched as Shane's fingers brushed against his hardness, but he grabbed Shane's wrists, stopping him.

"Not like this, Shane," Ilya said, his voice firm. Shane looked up, his eyes filled with a mix of confusion and frustration. Ilya could see the need in him, the desperate desire for release. He understood it, felt it too, but he wanted more. He wanted to give Shane control, to teach him that he didn't always have to submit.

Ilya flipped them over, manhandling Shane to sit on his lap. Shane gasped, surprise and excitement warring in his eyes. Ilya positioned Shane's legs, opening him up, and guided just above his cock. Shane's eyes widened, understanding Ilya's intention. This position gave him the option to stop, to control the depth and pace.

Ilya leaned up, his breath hot on Shane's ear. "This way, you're in control, lyubimy," he whispered. Shane shivered, a moan escaping his lips as Ilya's hardness pressed against him. Ilya began to guide Shane slowly, to get comfortable with the pace.

Shane started to move, tentatively at first, then with more confidence. He moaned, his body arching down into Ilya's. Ilya could feel the heat, the pressure, and it was driving him wild. But he held back, focusing on Shane, on his pleasure.

After a while, Shane's movements became more frantic. "Ilya, please," he pleaded, his voice filled with need. Ilya understood. The position was good, but it wasn't enough. He flipped them over again, positioning himself between Shane's legs.

"I've got you, Solnyshko," Ilya murmured, his voice soothing. He started to move, his hips snapping forward, his cock sliding in and out of Shane's tight heat. Shane cried out, his fingers gripping the sheets, his body trembling with need.

Ilya leaned down, his face burying in the pillow beside Shane's head. He could feel the urge to bite, to mark Shane as his, but he held back. Instead, he focused on the pleasure, on the feel of Shane's body surrounding him, on the moans that escaped Shane's lips.

Shane's body tensed, his back arching as he came, his release coating Ilya's stomach. Ilya continued to move, his body chasing his own release. With a final thrust, he came, his body shuddering as he filled Shane with his seed.

Ilya collapsed beside Shane, his breath ragged. He pulled Shane close, their bodies still joined. Shane turned his head, his eyes meeting Ilya's. In them, Ilya saw satisfaction, contentment, and something more. Something that made his heart swell with a warmth that had nothing to do with the heat of their bodies.

In that moment, Ilya knew. They could never go back to how it was before. This was a connection, a bond that went beyond the physical. And he would cherish it, protect it, and nurture it, no matter what.

That thought was more terrifying than anything he'd ever experienced before.

The room was filled with their combined scents, no patches blocking the heady pheromones. Ilya pulled himself up to rest against the headboard watching the door to his bathroom-willing Shane to step out. He'd wanted to go with him, to carry him to the tub and start the water for him, to give him the proper aftercare but Shane had begged for a few 'human minutes' and walked to the bathroom by himself on shaky legs. When he came back out, he had cleaned himself up a bit and was blushing like crazy. He walked over slowly, shyly and climbed back into the bed, dragging the sheet over himself.

Ilya rolled onto his side, his eyes locked onto Shane's. He could see the desire in the omega's eyes, the hunger, the need. But he also saw the confusion, the uncertainty. Ilya smiled, a slow, predatory smile that made Shane's heart race.

"Come here," Ilya said, his voice a low growl. Shane shivered, his body responding to the alpha's command. He scooted closer, his body pressing against Ilya's. Ilya reached out, his hands gripping Shane's hips, pulling him even closer.

Shane turned his head, his eyes meeting Ilya's. He could see the satisfaction in them, the contentment. He smiled, a soft, lazy smile that made Ilya's heart swell.

"Thank you," he said, his voice soft. Ilya raised an eyebrow, questioning. Shane blushed, his eyes darting away. "For teaching me," he said, his voice barely above a whisper. "For showing me... for making me feel..."

Ilya understood. He cupped Shane's cheek, his thumb brushing away a tear that had escaped Shane's eye. "You're welcome," he said, his voice firm. "I'll do anything for you, as long as you want me to."

Shane's eyes filled with tears, but he smiled, a watery, beautiful smile that made Ilya's heart swell. He leaned down, pressing a soft kiss to Shane's lips. It was a promise, a vow, a declaration of intent. He was here, and he was staying, and he was going to love Shane, protect him, and cherish him, no matter what.

As the sun dipped below the horizon, casting the room in shadows, Ilya and Shane lay entwined, their bodies pressed together, their hearts beating in sync. They were quiet, lost in their own thoughts, but the silence was comfortable, filled with a sense of peace and contentment that was almost tangible. Shane had tried to get up, but Ilya swallowed his pride and begged him to stay. The game was the next day, skipping one training wasn't hurting anyone.

"I told Hayden I'd-" Ilya's hand snapped up to Shane's neck, not squeezing at all, but holding.

"Do not mention another Alpha while your in my bed, still covered in my scent." Ilya growled, bringing his face closer to Shane's. He watched as Shane's eyes glazed over and a drugged, almost silly small smile over came his face.

Shane nodded and Ilya let go, beginning to pull back. "I apologize, but just do not say another alpha's name after what we did. My brain isn't -" He paused as if trying to find the words. "quiet right now. I need to settle down a bit more first."

Shane had agreed, reaching over to his pants and pulling out his phone. On a whim, he hit the speaker button as he was calling Hayden, making up an excuse for him to not check into the hotel.

They were not just alpha and omega, not just lovers. They were partners, equals, a team. And they knew, with a certainty that was bone-deep, that they were in this together, for better or for worse, for as long as they both shall live.

Chapter End Notes

WELL

THAT happened. 🙄🔥💙

After everything I've had them put each other (and all of us) through, Shane and Ilya finally managed to spend more than five minutes in the same room without someone crying, running away, committing a felony, requiring medical attention, or setting off several thousand alarm bells. 😊✨

Growth. 🌱

I wanted this chapter to focus on something that's been quietly happening in the background for a long time: both of them are changing. Not because they're trying to become what the other person wants, but because they're finally starting to figure out who they are outside of fear, obligation, trauma, and expectation. ❤️

💙 Shane is learning how to want things. YAY Shane!

♥️ Ilya is learning how to love without possession. GOOD JOB Ilya

Neither of those journeys are finished.

Not even close. 😊

I'd love to hear your thoughts because there are several moments I'm especially curious about:

🕯️ Ilya's therapy progress.

🎁 The gifts.

👄 The reunion.

😈 Whether Shane is becoming a menace on purpose.

🐻 Whether Ilya deserves a gold star for not immediately losing his mind.

Or did you never lose faith and just sit there watching me torture them for twenty-five chapters? 😊

As always, thank you for reading, commenting, bookmarking, leaving kudos, writing essays in the comments, making me cry, making me laugh, and generally enabling my obsession with these disaster men. 😊💕

I read every comment, even when I'm terrible at replying to all of them. They genuinely make my day. 💕

See you in Chapter 26. 🙄💙👉🌟

CHAPTER 26-My version of the tuna melt scene. Grab tissues lol. Will be posted Saturday or Sunday-I'm a third of the way done with it.

Chapter 26: Chapter 26

Chapter Summary

Once again, thank you everyone for reading my little thought bubbles. The gasp that left me this morning when I saw I hit 1000 kudos- my heart was so happy.

A lot of readers picked up on just how terrified Shane actually is of the word mate, and a few of you were also very worried about what happens when someone like Ilya gets his hopes up.

Well. Today we find out. Thanks a mil to my beta reader and gay bestie-y'all are divine.

As always, thank you for reading, commenting, screaming, theorizing, and letting me emotionally torture you week after week. ❤️

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Ilya did not sleep. Or rather, he forced himself to stay awake for the most part. He napped in short, fractured bursts, never sinking deeply enough to lose awareness of his surroundings. Every time his eyes drifted shut, panic dragged them open again. The room was dim, the curtains blocking most of the early morning light. Somewhere beyond them, Boston was waking up. Cars moved through wet streets. A siren wailed in the distance before fading away. Beside him, Shane slept on, still here. The thought repeated in his head over and over. Still here. The clock crept past four, then five. Then six. Shane never disappeared. Never woke up and changed his mind. Never looked at Ilya and remembered all the reasons he should have run. He simply slept. Ilya turned slightly onto his side, propping himself up on one elbow. God. He was beautiful. Not the polished version from interviews. Not Captain, Canada's Golden Boy Shane Hollander standing in front of microphones with perfect posture and practiced answers. This was different. His hair was a complete disaster. The dark strands stuck up in every direction, flattened strangely on one side where he'd spent hours buried in the pillow. A faint crease marked one cheek. An actual pillow imprint. Ilya stared at it with the sort of fascination normally reserved for religious miracles. His freckles seemed darker in the soft morning light. His mouth was slightly open. One hand was curled beneath his cheek. He looked younger somehow, like when they first met and the beautiful shy boy came up to him to introduce himself.

He was softer. Real. Better than perfect. Ilya's chest hurt, he had spent years obsessed with Shane Hollander. The impossible thing he could never have. Should never have again once he fucked up so royally but here they were, and he was determined not to make any mistakes. Yet somehow he'd never imagined this. That it would feel so good, that the dark thoughts that sometimes came into his head would be totally silenced by just having the omega in his bed for such an extended period of time.

He discovered more in the middle of the night than any camera or bodyguard had ever told him. Like how Hollander, who occasionally snored for about three seconds before stopping. Ilya discovered this at six twenty-three in the morning and nearly lost his mind.

Ten minutes later, he found a small cluster of freckles on towards the right of the small of his spine.

His gaze drifted lower. A bruise darkened Shane's shoulder, another along his ribs.

Hockey. It was normal, expected. Then his eyes caught the faint marks along Shane's hip. His stomach twisted. Those weren't from hockey. They were from him. Not severe, not enough to actually hurt Shane. But they were there, evidence of his hands.

Months ago, he would have looked at those marks and felt something possessive.

Something ugly. Now all he felt was guilt, he should have been more careful.

The thought settled heavily in his chest. Without thinking, he reached toward the bruise.

His hand stopped halfway, No.

Shane was sleeping. He didn't get to touch simply because he wanted to. Slowly, he lowered his hand back onto the mattress.

This was progress. Dr. Kostova would probably be proud. Ilya thought it was torture.

Shane shifted slowly.

Ilya immediately dropped his head onto the pillow and closed his eyes. Years of professional hockey had given him excellent reflexes and years of hiding emotions had made him an accomplished liar.

The mattress moved. A sleepy sound escaped Shane, then silence.

A few seconds later, he felt Shane turn over and facing towards him, then a tentative hand on his face. Shane was looking at him, touching him like he mattered. The feeling nearly stopped his heart.

His eyes were still heavy with sleep. He looked warm, comfortable.

Safe.

Ilya wanted to frame the image.

"Good morning," Shane mumbled.

"Good morning." He whispered, finally opening his eyes.

For a moment neither moved. They simply looked at each other, the silence wasn't awkward, or tense.

It was peaceful. So peaceful.

Something neither of them had much experience with.

Shane shifted closer first.

Just a few inches.

Then a few more.

Until his head settled against Ilya's shoulder, Ilya immediately wrapped an arm around him.

Not because he was afraid Shane would leave, but because he wanted to.

Because Shane wanted him to. The distinction mattered. They settled together beneath the blankets. No rush, no expectations.

Just warmth, just breathing. Together.

Ilya felt Shane relax against him little by little. Every muscle loosening. Every guard lowering.

It occurred to him suddenly that they had never really done this before.

There had always been a hotel checkout. They were always on limited time when together.

But now? Nothing but a game tonight where they'd have some more time after until Shane's flight in the late morning.

The world could wait.

Shane yawned. The sound was ridiculously cute.

Ilya smiled despite himself.

"What?"

"You make the most adorable small noises."

Shane lifted his head.

"What does that even mean?"

"You make little noises."

"I do not."

"You do."

"I don't."

"You sound like angry kitten. Look like one too. Is my favorite."

Shane groaned and buried his face against Ilya's chest.

"Oh my God."

"Is true."

"I hate you."

"No." Ilya pressed a kiss into his messy hair. "You do not."

For the first time in a very long time, Shane didn't argue.

And for the first time in even longer, Ilya allowed himself to believe he might be right.

They stayed in bed for a while more. Shane shifted, turning onto his side to face Ilya. His eyes, still soft with sleep, held a familiar, warm glint. He reached out, his fingers brushing over the birthmarks across Ilya's chest. "Hey," he murmured, his voice husky.

"Hey," Ilya replied with a smile, his thumb stroking Shane's cheekbone. He noticed Shane's eyes darting from his face, to the walls, down to his body over and over again for a few minutes. He held his face still, moving him so that Shane had no other choice then to tell him what was going on in his head. "Use your words. Tell me what you need."

A slow, blush touched Shane's cheeks again. "Please fuck me again." Shane whispered, his eyes already glazed over.

The request, so blunt and quiet, sent a jolt of heat straight through Ilya's core. His body responded instantly, a low growl building in his chest. He moved, rolling Shane onto his back and covering him, bracing his weight on his forearms to cage him in. He dipped his head to capture that smiling mouth in a deep, promising kiss.

As he settled his hips between Shane's thighs, Shane's body tensed. It was subtle- a quick intake of breath, a faint tightening around his eyes. But Ilya felt it. He froze, pulling back just enough to search Shane's face.

"What?" Shane asked, the word breathless.

"You winced."

"I didn't. I'm fine." Shane replied, trying to pull Ilya to him again.

"You did." Ilya's voice was firm, leaving no room for argument. He shifted his weight off, his gaze scanning down Shane's body. The adrenaline and passion of the night had faded, leaving behind the honest aftermath: the deep muscle aches from the game, the tender bloom of bruises from their earlier, less careful couplings. He saw it now in the slight stiffness of Shane's movements, in the way he'd favored his right side when he had turned.

Shane looked away, a faint blush coloring his cheeks. "It's fine. I want you to."

"I know you do," Ilya said, his tone softening. He leaned down and kissed him, slow and sweet, pouring all the 'no' into a 'yes' of a different kind. "But not like that. Not if it hurts you."

He kissed his way down Shane's body- over the sternum, sucking on a nipple briefly, the quivering abdomen, the hip bones. When he took Shane into his mouth, it was with a focused, worshipful tenderness that was its own kind of claiming. This wasn't about conquest or punishment. It was about giving pleasure so exquisite it made thought impossible. He used his tongue, his lips, the gentle pressure of his throat, building the sensation slowly, inexorably, until Shane's hands fisted in the sheets and his back arched off the mattress with a broken, grateful cry.

After, Ilya didn't let him drift too far into his head, he eased him back down from the high with soft words and kisses. When he felt Shane come back to normal, he kissed the inside of his thigh, then stood. "Stay."

He went to the bathroom, starting the water in the deep tub. He poured in a generous capful of the expensive, muscle-soaking oil he'd bought after noticing it on Shane's usual shopping lists and waited for the steam to begin to fog the mirrors.

When he returned, Shane was lying boneless, a sated, dazed expression on his face. Ilya gathered him up- eliciting a soft, protesting groan at being lifted and carried him into the cloud of warm, scented vapor. He lowered them both into the hot water, settling with Shane's back against his chest. A sigh of pure relief shuddered through Shane as the heat penetrated his sore muscles.

For a while, they just sat in the quiet, Ilya's arms loose around him, his chin resting on Shane's damp hair. His hands moved under the water, gently kneading the tight cords of Shane's shoulders.

"It's late. I should call Hayden. And my tutor... I usually go over some questions I have throughout the week." Shane said after a while, his voice soft and relaxed.

"The classes," Ilya said finally, his voice a rumble against Shane's back. "Architecture and business?" He felt Shane nod slowly.

"How are they?"

Shane relaxed further into the touch, lulled by the heat and the massage. "Good, hard though. I wasn't the best student before sports took over and not much has changed. I'm only good at the design classes. The business finance module is kicking my ass. All the depreciation schedules and liability curves. It's like a different language."

"But you like it."

"I do. It's... practical. It makes sense in a way that just playing doesn't always. It's for after."

He paused. "In case I get found out. It would help me manage the properties I had already. For having something that's mine, that I built."

Ilya's hands stilled for a moment on his shoulders. Something that's mine. The words resonated with a dark, secret echo in his own mind. He pushed it away, focusing on the pride in Shane's voice. "You will be good at it. You have a mind for planning. For seeing how parts make a whole." He resumed the massage, working down the line of Shane's spine. "The architecture, this is for the dreaming part, yes? For the 'what if'?"

A small, happy sound escaped Shane. "Yeah. It's the fun part. The creative part. Learning how to draw the spaces you imagine... it's relaxing. My professor says I have a good eye for flow. For how people move through a space." He stopped when Ilya chuckled.

"What? Is that too boring." Shane said with an indulgent smile, turning his head to look at Ilya over his shoulder.

“It is, but also perfect for you, no?” Ilya agreed softly, thinking of Shane on the ice, his unparalleled spatial awareness, his anticipation. It was the same mind, applied to a different canvas. “You see the paths before they exist. Makes you good hockey player.”

They lapsed back into a comfortable silence, the water cooling around them. Ilya reached over to add more hot water, keeping the temperature perfect. He washed Shane’s hair with a careful, thorough gentleness, rinsing the suds away with a cupped hand.

In this quiet, steamy sanctuary, the bruises and the aches were just facts of their bodies, not wounds of their spirit. Here, Ilya wasn’t the monster from the broken door or the strategist in the dark hotel. He was just the man holding his omega in a bath, listening to him talk about his future, and feeling a fierce, protective pride that threatened to split his own chest wide open. He knew the other versions of himself were still there, waiting in the wings. But for this stolen time, he let them wait. This version, the caretaker, the listener, was the one Shane needed right now. And for Ilya, that was becoming the only version that mattered.

The water had cooled to a skin-temperature comfort, and Shane had melted into a pliant, boneless state against Ilya’s chest. With a soft grunt of effort, Ilya stood, lifting Shane effortlessly from the tub. Water sheeted off them both.

Shane, blinking slowly, reached automatically for the plush towel warming on the rack. Ilya caught his wrist, guiding the hand back down. “No,” he murmured, his voice a low vibration in the steamy room. “I have you.”

He set Shane gently on the thick bath mat and grabbed the towel himself. What followed was not a quick dry-off, but a ritual. Ilya started with Shane’s hair, blotting the dark strands with careful absorption until they were just damp. Then he moved to his shoulders, his back, his arms, using broad, firm strokes that were both practical and deeply soothing. He knelt to dry Shane’s legs, each stroke of the fabric over his calves and thighs methodical and thorough. Finally, he nudged Shane’s feet apart to dry between his toes, an act of such mundane intimacy that Shane’s breath hitched.

Ilya guided him to the bedroom, sat him on the edge of the bed, and retrieved the hairbrush from the ensuite. He stood behind Shane, working through the tangles with a patience Shane had never seen in him, his touch impossibly gentle. Each pull of the brush was smooth, untangling knots without a single tug of pain.

Next came the lotion the he knew Shane liked best- the expensive one that smelled of almond and vanilla. Ilya poured a pool of it into his palms, warming it before he began. His hands were calloused, powerful, yet they moved over Shane’s skin with a reverence that felt like a sacrament. He massaged it into the back of Shane’s neck, across his shoulders, down the length of his spine, over the faint bruises on his hips. He turned Shane to face him and did his chest, his arms, his stomach, even taking each of Shane’s hands to rub the lotion into his fingers and palms. The room filled with the soft, sweet scent and the quiet sound of skin sliding against skin.

Throughout it all, Shane simply watched. His eyes, wide and soft, followed Ilya’s every movement with a kind of awed disbelief. He offered no resistance, his body moving wherever Ilya’s guiding hands directed him- a tilt of the chin, a lift of an arm. He felt like something precious, something being carefully restored.

Finally, Ilya went into his closet. He pulled out a pair of soft, grey sweatpants and a well-worn navy hoodie. He dressed Shane himself, guiding his legs into the pants, pulling the sweatshirt over his head, carefully threading his arms through the sleeves. The clothes swallowed him. The sweatpants pooled around his ankles, and the hoodie's shoulders dropped far down his arms, the cuffs covering his hands. He looked small, enveloped, swathed in Ilya's scent and Ilya's space. Ilya's gaze darkened with a possessiveness that was entirely separate from lust; it was a deep, primal satisfaction at the visual proof of Shane wrapped in his world. He said nothing, but the faint, approving curve of his mouth said everything.

Shane looked down at himself, at the oversized sleeves, and then back up at Ilya. The awe in his eyes had softened into something else, a profound, vulnerable gratitude that shimmered on the verge of tears. He had fought to keep such tight control in all things in his life, had managed his own life, carried his own weight for so long. He had never, not once in his adult life, been handled with such comprehensive, self-assured care. He hadn't known he could be, or that he would want to be.

He didn't have the words. Instead, he shuffled forward on the bed, the excess fabric whispering, and simply leaned his forehead against Ilya's neck. It was surrender, and it was thanks. Ilya's arms came around him, holding him in the fortress of his own clothes, and for a long moment, they just stood there, in the quiet morning light, with Shane feeling, for the first time, utterly and completely taken care of.

The quiet embrace lingered, Shane sinking into the warmth and the scent of Ilya's clothes. But after a moment, Ilya gently disentangled himself, holding Shane by the shoulders at arm's length. "I'm hungry," he declared, leaning in to press a quick, firm peck against Shane's lips.

"For what?" Shane replied, a slow smile spreading as he tried to chase the kiss.

Ilya dodged him with a soft laugh, giving his behind a light, familiar squeeze. "Food, you pervert." He steered them both out of the bedroom and into the kitchen's clean, morning light.

He guided Shane to a stool at the kitchen island. "Sit. Do not touch anything."

As Shane settled, watching with that same soft, captivated expression, Ilya's mind clicked into a different kind of focus. To the series of detailed, slightly exasperated texts from Laurent. He opened the refrigerator, his eyes finding the specific item immediately: a cans of ginger ale, so cold it was beaded with moisture. Very cold. Small cans only and they had to be imported from Canada. He'd had to go to three specialty stores. He set it on the counter with a satisfying clink.

Next, he retrieved the prepared ingredients from the deli drawer, each in its own container: the perfectly flaked albacore tuna mixed with just the right amount of light mayo and a precise pinch of celery salt, the thinly sliced dill pickles, the aged white cheddar already grated, the loaf of sourdough bread from the specific bakery Laurent had circled on a map.

He assembled the tools: a bowl, a spatula, the non-stick pan Laurent had insisted he buy. He moved with a concentration usually reserved for game tape, his brow slightly furrowed. He had practiced this over FaceTime with Laurent, who had sighed dramatically as Ilya nearly burned the first attempt and under-toasted the second. This was the third. It had to be perfect.

He couldn't make him coq au vin or beef stroganoff. Shane's diet was a famously limited landscape of familiar textures and plain flavors, a fact that had frustrated nutritionists and intrigued Ilya in equal measure. They would discuss it later- gently, without pressure. But for now, for this first meal together, Ilya wanted to give him something made by his own hands. Not a restaurant's impersonal order, but this. A tuna melt.

He buttered the sourdough slices with exacting strokes. He spread the tuna mixture, layered the pickles, then the cheese. He heated the broiler, waiting for the precise moment Laurent had described, so far everything looked right.

The kitchen smelled faintly of toasted bread and tuna.

Shane sat perched on one of the stools at the island, laughing.

The sound still did strange things to Ilya's chest.

He glanced over his shoulder.

Shane had one leg folded beneath him on the stool, looking entirely too comfortable in his kitchen.

Like he'd always belonged there.

Dangerous thought.

Ilya turned back toward the cutting board.

"So," he said casually. "Where are you next?"

Shane leaned forward.

"Chicago."

Ilya groaned. "Again?"

"You say that like you don't enjoy playing there."

"I enjoy winning there. Is big difference."

Shane snorted.

"Okay, fair." Ilya tossed vegetables into a bowl.

"Then Minnesota."

"That's not bad."

"Is cold."

"You grew up in Russia. Isn't it always cold there?"

"Exactly. I escaped."

That earned another laugh. Ilya found himself smiling before he could stop it.

"What about you?" Shane asked.

"Washington."

"Ovechkin still calling you pretty boy?"

Ilya looked horrified. "He called me that one time! One!"

"It was six years ago. I watched it on ESPN."

"He was drunk."

"I don't think so."

"He was singing."

Shane laughed so hard he nearly slid off the stool.

Ilya pointed at him.

"You are not allowed to laugh."

"I absolutely am. That's why it's funny." Shane wiped at his eyes. "I still have the video."

"You little menace. I must get microphone and tell everyone you are the asshole now."

The grin Shane gave him was entirely unrepentant.

Ilya stared for a second before shaking his head. "Brat."

"That's rich coming from you."

"Is accurate."

"It's annoying."

"It can be both."

Shane reached over and stole a piece of cucumber from the cutting board.

Ilya immediately slapped his hand away.

"Hey!"

"Wait."

"I was helping."

"You were stealing."

"Quality control."

"You are not quality control." Shane stole another piece anyway.

This time Ilya let him. The silence that followed settled comfortably between them, just easy.

Shane rested his chin in his palm.

"When do we play each other again?"

Ilya didn't need to think about it.

"Three weeks."

Shane blinked.

"You know that immediately?"

"Of course."

"You have the schedule memorized?"

Ilya shrugged.

"Only your games."

The words came out before he could stop them.

Shane's ears immediately turned pink.

Interesting, very interesting.

Ilya hid his smile by turning back toward the counter.

A few seconds passed.

Then quietly:

"That's kind of ridiculous."

"Yes."

"And slightly creepy."

"Probably, yes"

"And weirdly nice. I like it."

Ilya looked over. Shane was smiling softly.

The kind of smile that felt private.

Something warm settled in Ilya's chest.

Three weeks.

Three weeks until they would meet again.

For the first time in years, the thought didn't feel like a battle. It felt like something to look forward to.

They continued teasing each other until the oven beeped. Shane rested his chin in his hands, his oversized sleeves pooling on the granite, his gaze tracing Ilya's movements, the sure movements, the focused squint as he checked the cheese melt through the lid he'd placed on the pan. The fact that he didn't bother with a shirt was a very big bonus for Shane since he now felt he could look all he wanted.

Finally, Ilya slid the golden, perfectly crisped sandwiches onto a plate. He cut them diagonally, the cheese pulling in a long, satisfying string. He placed the plate in front of Shane, then popped another cold can of icy ginger ale and set it beside his meal.

He leaned against the opposite counter, arms crossed, trying to look nonchalant and failing utterly. His entire being was focused on Shane's face, waiting for the verdict.

Shane looked from the picture-perfect food up to Ilya, his eyes shimmering again. He picked up a half, took a bite, and closed his eyes. A small, almost imperceptible hum of pleasure vibrated in his throat. He swallowed. "It's perfect," he said, his voice thick. "How did you...?"

"I had a good teacher," Ilya said, the gruffness in his voice betraying his relief and pride. He pushed off the counter and took the stool next to Shane, picking up the other half of his own sandwich. "Eat. Is best hot."

And as they ate in the sunny kitchen, Shane in his borrowed clothes, Ilya in his quiet triumph, it felt like more than a meal. It felt like a promise, built not on grand gestures, but on cold ginger ale, melted cheese, and the profound willingness to learn the map of another person's heart, one simple, careful recipe at a time.

The food turned out surprisingly good. Shane wasn't about to lie. He would have to spend some extra time running off the cheese, but he wouldn't decline the incredibly sweet gesture that Ilya had made in cooking for him.

After lunch they migrated to the living room. A hockey game played quietly on the television, but neither of them paid much attention.

Somebody scored. The commentators got excited. Neither cared enough to figure out why. Shane had stretched out on one end of the couch while Ilya occupied the other. There were several feet between them, enough space to avoid feeling crowded, but close enough that the distance felt intentional rather than necessary, comfortable.

Normal. It was still strange how much he liked normal. This was the first time they were spending like this. Usually, their 'getting to know each other' time was over the phone via texts or a few calls.

"New York," Shane announced suddenly.

Ilya glanced away from the television. "What about it?"

"Best road city to spend some free time in."

"No!"

"It absolutely is."

"It is so common! Home of dinosaurs too."

"It has good restaurants."

"It smells like bad decisions."

Shane laughed. "That's part of the charm."

"There should not be charm."

"You sound eighty years old. Getting to be like your friend there."

"I am mature." Shane said with a raised eyebrow.

"You are twenty one. You should not be so mature and boring."

"You're impossible."

Ilya smiled. "You like me."

Shane rolled his eyes. "Debatable."

"Not very debatable."

The smile Shane tried to suppress gave him away immediately.

Ilya felt something warm settle in his chest. The ease between them still felt fragile, new.

Like something that could disappear if he moved too quickly.

But Shane was relaxing, he could see it- feel it.

Every hour he stayed. Every laugh. Every teasing comment. Every casual conversation.

It felt like another piece of foundation that they were building.

"What about you?" Shane asked.

"Favorite city?"

"Besides Montreal."

Ilya snorted. "I was going to say Montreal because you are there."

The words slipped out naturally.

Honest, Shane's ears turned pink.

Interesting, very interesting.

Ilya was filing that away for future use.

"Other than Montreal," Shane muttered.

"Boston, of course. Miami, Vegas, Houston." A small smile tugged at Ilya's mouth.

Shane suddenly became very interested in the hockey game.

On the television, somebody got into a fight.

Neither of them noticed.

Ilya opened his mouth to ask another question.

His phone rang. The sound shattered the comfortable atmosphere. He frowned. Svetlana wasn't supposed to call today. She was traveling with her father to meet another specialist.

The screen lit up.

Father.

Immediately, his mood soured. He declined the call.

Shane glanced over. "Everything okay?"

"Da."

A very obvious lie. The phone rang again three minutes later. And then again, and again.

Ilya's jaw tightened.

Finally Shane sighed. "Take it."

"I do not want to."

"It might be important."

"It is not." Another ring.

Shane gestured toward the phone. "You're making me anxious."

Ilya muttered something rude in Russian.

Then answered.

"What?"

His father's voice exploded through the speaker immediately. "Where the hell have you been?"

Ilya pulled the phone away from his ear, standing and going to the other room.

"I have been busy."

"Busy doing what?" The accusation was immediate. Suspicious, demanding. The familiar tone made something ugly twist in Ilya's stomach.

"I do not answer to you." A dangerous silence.

Then: "Don't speak to me like that."

Ilya felt his temper rise instantly. Years of conditioning, of resentment.

Years of swallowing every argument.

Not today. "You called me. What do you want because that would be the only reason you would call, wouldn't it be father?"

"I've been trying to reach you for weeks."

"I noticed."

"You are embarrassing yourself."

The insult landed out of nowhere. Ilya's expression darkened.

"What?"

"I hear things."

A humorless laugh escaped his father. "The drinking. The missed meetings with the Kremlin when they call you. You disappear to America and suddenly forget your responsibilities."

"The team is winning."

"That isn't the point."

"My business is profitable."

"Not the point."

"What exactly is the point then?"

His father didn't answer immediately. When he finally spoke, his voice was colder. Sharper.

"You are becoming weak. I knew it would happen but now it's a reflection on me."

Ilya's hand clenched around the phone. There it was.

The real reason for the call. Always the same reason.

Weak. Soft. Broken. Not enough. His father continued.

"I did not spend fifty years building my reputation so my son could waste his time chasing therapists and hockey players."

The room went completely silent.

Ilya froze. He stood very still. A dangerous kind of stillness.

"Do not." His voice was deadly calm. "Do not talk about him."

His father laughed. Actually laughed. "You prove my point."

Something snapped. Not the explosive, uncontrolled rage he used to know, something colder.

More dangerous. "You know what?" Ilya said quietly. "For the first time in my life, I think I understand why mama hated you."

Silence. Absolute silence. "Well, weak omega's do not last. Think about that while you fuck that boy." His father's breathing became audible. Heavy.

"What did you just say?" Disbelieving. Then furious. The shouting started immediately.

More cursing and yelling came out and Ilya ended the call.

Just pressed the button. The house fell silent except for the low sound from the tv.

His heart was pounding. His hands were shaking. Years of anger crawled beneath his skin.

For several seconds he just stood there staring at the dark screen.

Breathing. Trying not to throw the phone through a wall. Trying not to call back.

Trying not to become the man he used to be. When he finally looked up, he knew he needed to reign himself in. Shane couldn't see him like that.

The way someone waits for a wounded animal to decide whether it wants company.

And somehow that hurt worse than anything his father had said. He centered himself, holding his hand up to his mom's cross for a few seconds before walking back to the living room. He sat back close to Shane, pulling him to his side closely. The television flickered, a meaningless parade of colors and sound. Ilya's eyes were fixed on it, but his awareness was a narrow, hyper-focused beam directed entirely at the man curled against his side. Even through the chemical barrier of the scent patch on Shane's neck, Ilya could detect it- a subtle, sweetening of the air around him, a warmth that had nothing to do with the room's temperature. Pheromones, seeping through the filter. A quiet, unconscious offering.

He felt more than heard the low, contented vibration in Shane's chest, a near-silent purr of safety and satiation. Ilya kept his breathing even, his body deliberately relaxed, a statue to allow Shane to act however he wanted. He didn't dare move, lest he break the spell.

Then, the air shifted, intensifying. Shane's head tilted, and his lips, soft and warm, pressed a kiss to the center of Ilya's chest, right over his sternum. It was not a prelude to sleep. It was a question. His hand, which had been resting on Ilya's stomach, began to move, sliding down the firm plane of his thigh in a slow, exploratory stroke, then back up. The touch was tentative but deliberate, mapping the muscle through the soft fabric of his sweatpants.

Ilya remained still, a captive audience to his own awakening desire. Shane shifted lower, nuzzling his face against Ilya's abdomen, his breath hot against his skin. He moved lower, pressing a slow, open-mouthed kiss to the growing hardness there, a muffled, damp heat that made Ilya's hips jerk involuntarily. A soft, approving sound escaped Shane.

Suddenly, Shane pulled back and sat up. He swung a leg over Ilya's thighs, straddling his lap in one fluid motion. His eyes, when they met Ilya's, were glazed, his pupils so wide and dark they swallowed the deep brown almost completely. He looked drugged, blissed out, operating on a deep, instinctual level. Without breaking that hazy gaze, he grabbed the hem of the oversized shirt- Ilya's scent covered shirt, and pulled it up and over his head, tossing it aside. The morning light caught the dusting of freckles across his chest, the gentle heave of his breath.

Ilya stared, his own hands gripping the couch cushions. Do not intervene. Let him lead. See what he wants.

Shane's hands went to the waistband of Ilya's sweats, pushing them down just enough to free him. He wrapped his fingers around Ilya's length, giving a few slow, firm strokes that drew a ragged gasp from Ilya's throat. Then, still moving his hand, Shane rose up on his knees, shoved his own borrowed sweatpants down his hips, and sank back down.

The sensation was not penetration, but a breathtaking, full-body friction. Skin slid against heated skin, their erections pressed tightly together in the tight, slick channel of Shane's fist. It was a little clumsy, intimate and messy and desperate. Shane set a rhythm, his hips rocking, his fist pumping, creating a wet, syncopated friction that felt heavenly. He leaned forward, capturing Ilya's mouth in a deep, consuming kiss, swallowing his groans. Ilya's hands finally moved, gripping Shane's hips, not to guide but to anchor himself as the world narrowed to the slick, pounding heat between them and the taste of Shane on his tongue.

The climb was fast and steep, a wave building from the base of his spine. Control shattered. As the crest broke, tearing through him with blinding force, the word was ripped from somewhere deeper than thought, raw and guttural and true.

“Moi... istinnaya para,” he groaned against Shane’s mouth, the Russian ripped out of him, before it collapsed into the English, the claim absolute. “Mate.”

For a second, Shane stilled. The haze in his eyes swirled with a new, dawning intensity. He echoed, breathless, “Ilya...mate...” a dazed look in his eyes.

Then, like a film reel snapping, the dreamy clarity vanished. Ilya watched it happen in real time- the bliss shattering, replaced by a wave of cold recognition, then sheer, unadulterated panic. Shane’s eyes cleared, sharpening with horror. He looked down at their joined bodies, at the evidence of Ilya’s release slick on his hand and stomach, and flinched as if burned.

He scrambled back, yanking his sweats up, his movements jerky and frantic. “I- I’m sorry, I didn’t- I have to- ” The words tumbled out, fractured and breathless. “Team meeting. A video ch-. I forgot. It’s now. I have to go.”

He wouldn’t meet Ilya’s eyes. He snatched his discarded shirt from the floor, clutching it to his chest like a shield, and all but fled the room, leaving Ilya alone on the couch, exposed and cooling rapidly in the silent wake of the storm.

The word mate hung in the air, now toxic and accusing. It hadn’t been a request or a promise. It had been a confession. And Shane, hearing it, had run.

“Don’t do this, Shane. Not again.” Ilya stood up slowly.

“I cant. I cant do-” Tears rolled down his eyes, he was shaking, refusing to look at Ilya.

“Hollander, I’m telling you know not to do this. We can talk-” Ilya didn’t know what else to say. He thought

"I can't."

The words came out strangled.

Panicked.

"I can't do that. I can't do this."

Shane stood. Immediately putting distance between them. His breathing was uneven.

His eyes wide.

Like the word itself had reached inside him and grabbed hold of every fear he possessed.

"Ilya-"

"Stop, calm down."

"You can't just-"

"I know, please just ignore that. Come sit down."

The panic in Shane's voice was growing. And somehow that made Ilya's own panic worse.

Because he had done this. One stupid word, one selfish, unguarded moment.

One glimpse of a future he'd wanted for so long that he'd forgotten not everyone saw it the same way.

Shane grabbed his jacket from where it had been thrown over the chair.

"I think I should go."

Ilya stood there, watching Shane leave. Slowly, he crossed the room and entered the bathroom. The overhead light flooded the space. He stared at himself in the mirror. The reflection looking back seemed unfamiliar.

His hair was a mess. His eyes looked red rimmed. Older than they should have. There were dark circles beneath them from another night spent barely sleeping. His gaze dropped to the sink. Then to the medicine cabinet. His stomach twisted. He knew exactly what was inside. For months he'd ignored it. Pretended it wasn't there. Pretended he didn't occasionally think about it during bad nights. Pretended he wasn't the kind of person who kept things "just in case." But addicts always kept an emergency exit.

Always.

Even when they swore they were better. Even when they promised themselves they were done. His hand moved before he consciously decided to open the cabinet. The hinges creaked softly.

Behind bottles of aspirin and allergy medication sat an orange prescription bottle. Forgotten, The therapist at the hospital had given them freely, only warning to call him if a refill was needed. The pills inside had been prescribed after he'd broken several ribs the previous year. The injury had hurt, but of course Ilya was leary of any medication. That had been the problem. He'd taken them exactly as directed for three days before realizing how much he liked them.

Not the relief from pain, but how they gave him quiet. The blessed, impossible quiet.

No anxiety. No obsession. No constant need clawing at the inside of his skull. Just peace.

He'd flushed most of them down the toilet. Most, not all.

His fingers wrapped around the bottle. The plastic felt cold against his palm. He stared at it. Then opened the cabinet farther. The small baggie of cocaine was still there. Tucked behind everything else.

Hidden where nobody would find it. A stupid decision from a stupid night. One experiment. One moment of weakness. One reminder that he wasn't nearly as recovered as he liked pretending he was.

The sight of it made something inside him sag. Not temptation. Recognition. Because suddenly he could see the pattern stretching backward through his entire life.

His father drank. Ilya chased other things.

Attention. Approval. Victories. Sex. Competition. Anything that made people look at him.

Anything that made him feel important. Anything that made him feel wanted- less alone.

The realization settled heavily in his chest. When he'd been younger, scoring goals had been enough. The crowd cheering, the praise.

The interviews. The attention. For a little while, it filled the empty places. Then he'd needed more. More success. More money. More victories. More proof that he mattered. Nothing ever lasted. Nothing ever stayed. The feeling always faded. The hunger always returned.

Only Shane had ever mattered. Only he had ever made him feel whole.

His grip tightened around the prescription bottle. A horrible thought surfaced. Maybe his father had been right. Not about strength. Not about omegas. Not about control.

But about him. Maybe there really was something fundamentally wrong inside him.

Something broken. Something that couldn't be fixed. His eyes drifted closed. And suddenly he understood why Shane had consumed him so completely.

It wasn't just because Shane was an omega. It wasn't just because he was beautiful. Or kind. Or brilliant. Shane represented everything. Everything Ilya had spent his entire life chasing. Affection. Acceptance. Comfort. Trust. Validation. Love. Every need he'd ever had wrapped together into one impossible person.

And the worst part? Somewhere along the way it had stopped being about the need. It had become about Shane. The one who laughed at his terrible jokes. The one who stole vegetables while he cooked. The one who rolled his eyes every time Ilya called him a brat. The one who had stayed with him without expecting anything in return. Even after everything. A painful sound escaped him. Half laugh, half sob. Because that somehow made it worse. If Shane really left now, there would be no obsession left to hide behind. No excuse. No fantasy. Just grief. Pure and uncomplicated. His chest tightened until breathing became difficult. The bathroom suddenly felt too small. Too bright. He set both hands against the counter and lowered his head. His shoulders trembled. Not from tears. From exhaustion. He was so tired. Tired of fighting himself. Tired of being afraid. Tired of wanting things so badly they became unbearable. For one awful moment he couldn't see a future. Couldn't see what came after this. Couldn't imagine continuing to live if Shane ultimately decided he wasn't worth the risk. The thought hollowed him out. Because if Shane- with all his patience and kindness and understanding- couldn't love him, who could? The answer arrived immediately. Nobody. Nobody ever had. Not without conditions. Not without expectations. Not without wanting something in return. Never just Ilya. Never the broken, frightened man beneath everything else. The bottle rattled softly in his hand. His eyes fixed on it. The promise it offered was seductive in its simplicity. Not happiness. Just silence. Just a few hours without feeling this. Without hurting, without thinking, without wanting the impossible.

Shane didn't remember leaving. One second he had been standing in Ilya's living room. The next he was outside. Cool air slammed into his lungs. The front door clicked shut behind him. He kept walking, down the driveway. Past the security cameras. Past the carefully maintained landscaping. Past the expensive stone walls. Only when he reached the sidewalk did his legs finally give out. He crouched beside the curb. One hand pressed against the back of his neck. The other wrapped around his phone. His breathing wouldn't slow down. Every inhale felt too shallow, every exhale felt wrong. The world seemed tilted somehow. Like somebody had knocked everything a few degrees off balance. His thoughts spun in circles. Mate. The word echoed endlessly. Mate. Mate. Mate. His stomach twisted. For years he'd hidden what he was. For years he'd fought every instinct. Every biological impulse. Every stupid omega fantasy. Because fantasies were dangerous. Dreams were dangerous. Needing someone was dangerous. Until he met Ilya. And now Ilya had looked at him with so much love it had physically hurt and called him the one word Shane wasn't prepared to hear. Not yet. His hands started shaking. Hard enough that he almost dropped the phone. "Fuck." The curse came out breathless. He squeezed his eyes shut.

Think. Just think. He needed a ride. Back to the hotel. Back somewhere safe. Somewhere he could think. The realization immediately presented another problem. Most of the team was already in town. Tonight's game. Half the roster was probably scattered throughout Boston. The last thing he needed was somebody spotting him crouched outside an expensive gated property looking like he was having a nervous breakdown.

His parents were out. Absolutely not. His mother would somehow be on a plane before he finished explaining.

Hayden wasn't an option either. Hayden loved him. Which was exactly the problem.

Hayden would show up with backup. Possibly armed. Possibly JJ. Possibly both.

Coach? The thought lasted approximately three seconds.

Then what? Coach drives across Boston to pick him up.

His phone shook in his hand. He stared at the contacts list. For several long seconds.

Then pressed call. The line rang twice.

"Hey, Rook." Scott's voice. Calm. Familiar. Instant relief flooded Shane's chest so fast it almost made him dizzy, a sob escaped his throat.

Scott immediately paused.

"Whoa." The concern entered his voice instantly.

"What happened?"

Shane laughed weakly. Nothing funny about it.

Everything funny about how quickly Scott had figured out something was wrong.

"Scott?"

"Holz, whats wrong? Where are you?"

"Boston."

"You okay?"

No. The answer arrived immediately. No. Not even a little. Shane lowered himself fully onto the curb. The cold concrete pressed against his legs. "I don't know." The admission slipped out quietly.

There was a pause. Scott didn't rush to fill it. One of the things Shane liked most about him.

Scott never forced people to talk. He just waited. Eventually Shane spoke again.

"I think I panicked."

"Okay...are you alright? Are you safe?"

"I don't know."

"You're scaring me buddy. Where's Hayden? Can you get to JJ or Hayden from where you are?"

Despite everything, Shane almost smiled. "My bodyguards?"

"Exactly. Tell me where you are."

The silence settled uncomfortably between them.

Then Scott spoke again. "Did somebody hurt you?"

The question hit harder than expected. Because the answer was no. Absolutely not. Not physically. Not emotionally. Not intentionally. "No."

"Okay."

Scott's voice softened.

"A fight?"

"...kind of."

"A bad one?"

Shane stared at the pavement, at the cracks running through the concrete.

At the fallen leaves trapped against the curb.

"No." The answer felt ridiculous.

"I think I messed up."

"Hollander, tell me that you're safe first, okay?"

"Yea, I'm outside."

Scott went quiet. Waiting.

Shane scrubbed a hand over his face. Trying to find words. Trying to explain something he barely understood himself. A pause.

Then:

"...the alpha i've been seeing called me his mate."

"I am horrified by that. You're still a kid." Scott laughed softly.

The sound helped. A little.

"What happened?"

Shane hesitated. Not because he didn't trust Scott. Because he didn't know how to explain.

The way Ilya had looked standing in that living room. Like he'd been handed his own heart and wasn't sure what to do with it.

Scott waited. "And?"

"And I freaked out."

"Did he mean it?"

The question caught Shane off guard. He opened his mouth. Then closed it. Because yes.

That was the problem. Ilya had meant it.

Every word. Every look. Every confession.

Scott sighed softly. "Okay."

"What?"

"You're not calling me because somebody hurt you."

Shane frowned. "I'm not."

"No." Scott sounded almost amused.

"You're calling because somebody scared the hell out of you by being honest."

Shane groaned. "Oh my God."

"Pretty close?"

"Shut up."

A laugh. Then Scott's voice gentled again. "Hollander."

"What?"

"Do you want to leave?" The question settled heavily in his chest.

Simple. Direct. No hidden meaning. Just truth.

Did he want to leave? Shane looked back toward the gates. Toward the house hidden beyond them. Toward the man currently sitting inside probably convincing himself he'd ruined everything.

The thought made his stomach twist.

"No."

The answer came immediately. Without hesitation.

Scott hummed. "Okay."

"I just..." Shane swallowed. "I needed air."

"And now you did that."

"I did."

"Feel better?"

"...a little."

"Good." The silence stretched. Then Scott spoke again. "Go back."

Shane blinked. "What?"

"Go back."

"Scott-"

"You don't sound like somebody who wants to leave." His friend paused. "You sound like somebody who's scared."

The words hit squarely in the center of Shane's chest.

Because that was exactly what this was.

Fear. Terrifying, vulnerable fear.

Scott sighed. "You've spent years running from things that wanted something from you." His voice softened. "Maybe don't run from the person who's trying to figure out how to love you properly."

Shane stared at the gates. At the path beyond them. At the future waiting somewhere on the other side. His pulse gradually slowed. His breathing steadied.

For the first time since leaving the house, the panic loosened its grip. Just enough.

"I'm such a fucking idiot."

"I know."

"I hate it."

"I know that too. You'll be fine, kid."

Shane laughed despite himself. The sound felt odd. But real.

"Call me before the game. Just to check in." When the call ended, he remained sitting there for several more minutes.

Watching the clouds move overhead.

Listening to distant traffic. Breathing, thinking. Eventually he stood. His legs felt steadier now. The shaking had mostly stopped, but not completely. But enough.

He stared at the gates for a long moment. Then started walking. Back toward the house. Back toward what would be a hard conversation.

Back toward Ilya.

Because for all the things that terrified him, leaving suddenly felt far more frightening than staying.

A knock sounded against the bedroom door. Soft enough that he almost missed it.

"Ilya?" Shane.

The sound of his voice cut through everything.

Concern. Worry. Patience. No demands. No expectations.

Just concern.

Another knock. "Ilya?"

His throat tightened painfully.

Because Shane was still here. Even now. After the panic. After the misunderstanding, after every reason in the world to walk away. He was still here. Waiting.

The bottle suddenly felt heavy, like it weighed a hundred pounds. Like it represented every version of himself he was trying not to become.

His fingers loosened.

The prescription bottle slipped from his grasp and clattered into the sink.

The noise echoed through the bathroom.

Outside, Shane immediately went quiet. Listening, waiting. Giving him space. Trusting him.

The realization hurt almost as much as the rejection.

Because Shane was offering him exactly what he'd spent his entire life craving. Not approval or validation. Not obligation, but trust. And for the first time all afternoon, shame washed over him.

Not because he'd been hurt. But because the moment things became difficult, Ilya's first instinct had been to run toward numbness instead of his person. He lowered his head. Pressed both hands against the counter. And breathed.

One breath. Then another. Then another. Trying to remember everything he'd learned. Trying to remember why he'd started therapy. Trying to remember why he'd chosen to fight. Trying to believe that maybe, just maybe, being loved wasn't something he had to earn.

Ilya quickly turned and went to open the door before Shane had time to reconsider. It wasn't relief. It was terrifying- Shane could just be coming back to end things for sure. A more profound, more disorienting terror than any he'd ever known. But he calmed. If he couldn't have Shane, he could be gone in less than an hour.

He opened the door and stepped into his bedroom, watching Shane wrap his arms around himself in a shy, self soothing gesture. They stood there, staring at each other. "I'm sorry for how I acted. I didn't mean to leave like that." he said quietly.

Ilya nodded, trying to find the proper words in English. "I didn't mean to call you that out loud until you were ready. It was my mistake. We can keep things simple."

"Is that what you want?" Shane asked, his voice breaking.

Ilya looked away, embarrassed when he felt his eyes tear up and he didn't want Shane to see him being so weak.

"I want whatever keeps you with me."

He felt Shane move in front of him, "I'm scared, Ilya. This is all a lot to take in and I'm trying to accept everything I'm feeling when we're together. I'm asking you to be patient with me."

Ilya slumped forward, his full weight coming to rest on Shane, who staggered slightly but held firm. Ilya buried his face in the hollow of Shane's neck, his tears hot and immediate against the skin where no patch blocked the scent. He inhaled in ragged, hiccuping gasps, drowning in honeysuckle and the salt of his own ruin.

"I do not know how," he gasped, the words muffled, wet, desperate. "I do not know how to live without you... To be worth... this."

Shane's arms tightened around him, not restraining, but enveloping. One hand cradled the back of his head, fingers splayed in his hair, a steady, unmoving pressure. The other rubbed slow, firm circles between his shoulder blades, grounding him in the physical world as his psyche fractured.

"You don't have to know," Shane whispered into his ear, his voice a low, constant murmur against the storm. "You're already doing it. Right now. This. Letting me see you? That's it. That's all of it."

"It is weakness" Ilya argued, the old programming firing desperately.

"It's the strongest thing I've ever seen," Shane countered, his voice gaining a fierce, tender conviction. "You think breaking down a door is strength? That's easy. This?" He held him tighter. "Letting someone hold you while you fall apart? That's courage, Ilya. That's trust. That's what you give me. Not a thing. This."

Ilya shook his head against Shane's shoulder, a child denying a truth too vast to comprehend. The tears kept coming, a ceaseless tide of grief for the lonely, transactional creature he'd been, and of sheer, staggering fear for the unknown man he might have to become.

Slowly, Shane guided them. He didn't move toward the bed or the couch. He simply sank down, right there on the floor against the bedroom door, pulling Ilya with him. He arranged them so Ilya was half in his lap, his back against Shane's chest, Shane's arms locked around his torso, holding the pieces of him together. They sat in the dim light of the hallway, amidst the quiet wreckage of the morning.

"I have nothing else," Ilya confessed again, the mantra of his worthlessness. "Only this. This... need. It is a black hole. It will consume you. It will ask for everything and give only hunger in return."

Shane rested his chin on top of Ilya's head. "Then let it," he said, so simply it stole the air from the room. "Let it ask. I'm not afraid of your need. I'm afraid of you hiding it. Of you thinking you have to buy me with something else. Give me the hunger, Ilya. I can work with that. I can't work with a closed door."

The confession was so utterly disarming it finally broke the spiral. The sobs began to quiet, leaving behind a deep, trembling exhaustion. Ilya went boneless against him, utterly spent. The panic receded, leaving a raw, scraped-clean ache. Shane's scent, his warmth, his unwavering hold, were the only real things in the universe.

For a long time, they just sat on the floor. Ilya's breathing evened out, syncing with the rise and fall of Shane's chest behind him. The silence was no longer hollow. It was full. Heavy with the weight of a truth that had been spoken, and a fear that had been met, not with flight, but with an embrace.

"I do not deserve you," Ilya whispered, the last bastion of his old self.

"That's not your decision to make," Shane replied, his lips brushing Ilya's hair. "It's mine. And I've made it. I won't leave you, but we have to be careful. And give me some time."

And there, on the hard floor, wrapped in the arms of the man he'd hurt and who had seen the monster in him and called it courage, Ilya began, for the first time in his life, to learn how to let himself be really seen. Where the ugly and broken pieces of himself didn't need to be pushed back, to be held gently in another's hands, could somehow make him whole. It felt impossible. It felt like the only truth that had ever mattered.

Chapter End Notes

Well...THAT went better than it could have.

And significantly worse than it should have.

I think one of the biggest things about this chapter is that neither of them is really fighting the feelings anymore. Shane isn't confused about loving Ilya. Ilya isn't confused about loving Shane. The problem now is that love doesn't magically erase fear, trauma, insecurity, addiction, or twenty-plus years of bad programming.

Shane heard the word he's secretly wanted for years and immediately panicked.

Ilya heard that panic and immediately assumed the worst possible outcome.

Very on-brand behavior from both of them.

The bathroom scene was probably one of the hardest sections I've written in this story because it isn't really about drugs. It's about coping mechanisms. About what happens when someone's entire emotional foundation is built on external validation and suddenly the one thing holding them together feels threatened.

And then Shane came back. Because for the first time, neither of them ran all the way away.

💙 And how worried were you when Ilya opened that medicine cabinet?

I read every comment, even when I'm slow to reply, and I genuinely love seeing everyone's theories.

Thank you for being here. Seriously.

(And yes, before anyone asks, these two still have approximately seventeen million issues left to work through.) ❤️

Chapter 27: Chapter 27

Chapter Summary

The comments on the last chapter absolutely destroyed me (in the best way possible). Some of you made me laugh, some made me cry, and a concerning number of you have become entirely too good at predicting my emotional damage.

Please enjoy a chapter where these two disasters are allowed approximately five minutes of peace before I start making questionable life choices as an author again.

As always, thank you for reading, commenting, screaming, theorizing, and coming along for this ride with me. I read every single comment and they genuinely make my day.

Chapter Notes

For the first time in days, Ilya slept without waking. When consciousness finally returned, it did so slowly. The room was darker now. Early evening sunlight stretched across the far wall in long golden bands, painting everything in warm shadows. The air had cooled slightly. Somewhere downstairs the refrigerator hummed quietly.

Ilya's eyes remained closed. For several blissful seconds he simply existed. No nightmares, no panic. No desperate need clawing through his chest.

Just warmth. Warmth and the steady rise and fall beneath his cheek. His eyes opened.

Shane.

The realization settled over him immediately. Shane was still here. Not a dream, or a memory. Not another cruel trick his mind had decided to play. Still here. Ilya remained perfectly still, unwilling to risk disturbing him.

The omega was sleeping deeply now, one arm draped across Ilya's shoulders. At some point during their hours in bed they had shifted positions. Ilya was no longer sprawled across him. Instead, Shane had rolled partially onto his side and somehow pulled Ilya with him. One of Shane's hands rested in his hair, fingers tangled loosely in the strands near the back of his head.

The position should have been uncomfortable.

It wasn't.

Ilya couldn't remember the last time he'd felt this peaceful. Perhaps never.

His gaze drifted over Shane's face. The freckles across his nose. The faint crease pressed into one cheek from the pillow. The way his lashes rested against his skin. He looked younger when he slept, softer. More vulnerable.

Beautiful. Always so beautiful.

The thought came so naturally now it barely registered.

He loved Shane. That wasn't the revelation anymore. The revelation was that Shane knew. Somewhere in his mind, he had to know.

Shane knew and hadn't run.

A sharp ache settled in his chest.

Good. The ache meant he was alive.

Eventually Shane stirred. His nose scrunched first. Then one eye opened. Immediately narrowing. "You are staring at me."

Ilya considered lying. Then decided against it. "Da."

Shane groaned and buried his face into the pillow. "You are so weird."

"You are beautiful. Is difficult not to stare."

A muffled sound came from the pillow, Ilya suspected it was a curse. His smile widened.

After a moment Shane lifted his head again. His hair had become a complete disaster sometime during their nap. One side stuck straight up.

Ilya was instantly obsessed.

Shane noticed. "No."

"What?"

"I know that look."

"What look?"

"The one where you're about to say something annoying."

Ilya reached over and flattened the offending section of hair. It immediately sprang back up. His smile grew.

Shane sighed heavily. "I hate you."

"No."

"I do."

"No, you don't."

"I absolutely do." Ilya leaned forward and kissed the end of his nose.

Shane's expression became deeply offended. Then his ears turned pink.

Interesting. Very interesting.

The silence that followed felt comfortable, easy. The sort of silence neither of them had much experience with. Shane shifted onto his back, staring up at the ceiling. After a few moments his expression grew thoughtful.

"I don't really know what we're doing."

Ilya's stomach tightened. Not because the statement was negative. Because it wasn't. It was honest. "I know."

Shane glanced sideways. "What happens next?"

"Not sure." The answer surprised a laugh out of him.

"Really?"

"Shane." Ilya rolled onto one elbow. "I have spent years being disaster. Why would I suddenly know how relationship works?"

Another laugh. God, that sound.

It was becoming dangerous.

Shane shook his head.

"I've never done this."

"Neither have I."

"You have definitely dated people."

"I have slept with people. Big difference."

"That's dating."

"No."

The immediate response made Shane snort.

Ilya continued. "Dating requires emotional vulnerability. I avoided that part."

"Of course you did."

"I was very successful at avoiding it."

"Until me." The words slipped out before Shane could stop them.

Both froze. Something warm settled between them.

Not awkward or uncomfortable.

Just true.

"Da," Ilya admitted quietly. Until you.

Shane looked away first. His chest felt strangely tight. The conversation drifted after that. Neither of them seemed eager to leave the moment behind.

They talked about stupid things. Their first hockey fights. The worst hotels they'd ever stayed in. The time Shane had gotten food poisoning in Sweden and spent twelve hours convinced he was dying.

Ilya laughed so hard he nearly fell off the bed. Then retaliated by telling the story of accidentally breaking his own nose during practice and pretending nothing happened because he didn't want his father to call him weak. Shane laughed even harder.

The sound filled the room.

The house.

Something inside Ilya.

At some point they began inching closer together again. Neither acknowledged it.

Shane shifted first. Then Ilya. Then somehow they were shoulder to shoulder.

Then hip to hip. Neither remembered exactly how it happened.

Neither cared.

"What was your first impression of me?" Shane asked eventually.

Ilya didn't hesitate. "Pretty."

Shane groaned immediately. "No."

"Da."

"No."

"You were."

"I was sixteen."

"You were pretty sixteen year old."

Shane covered his face with both hands.

Ilya looked delighted.

"My first impression of you was asshole, smoking right in front of the no smoking sign. I knew you would be trouble."

"That is fair."

"You kept smirking."

"I was charming."

"You were obnoxious."

"Correct, but it got me you." The laughter faded slowly. Comfortably.

The room darkened another shade. Outside, the sun was beginning to disappear.

Eventually Shane's phone buzzed. Both of them ignored it. A minute later it buzzed again. Then again.

Shane sighed.

Reality, unfortunately.

He looked at the screen. Hayden.

Of course.

"Uh oh."

Ilya immediately frowned.

"What?"

"I think my babysitter found me."

A look of profound offense crossed Ilya's face. "He is not babysitter."

"He kind of is." Another text arrived.

Then another.

Then a call.

Shane laughed.

"Yep. Definitely babysitter."

Ilya stole the phone before Shane could answer.

"What are you doing?"

"Research."

"You can't research Hayden."

"Yes, I can. You are my partner now so I must know everything."

He absolutely could not. Should not. Shane watched him scroll through the messages.

His expression became increasingly amused, then annoyed. Then deeply suspicious.

"What?"

"He called seven times."

"I know."

"He thinks I kidnapped you." Ilya narrowed his eyes. "You told him where you were?"

"No." A pause. "Mostly."

Ilya stared.

Shane smiled innocently. The effect was ruined by the fact that he was already laughing.

"You are menace."

"You like me." The words escaped before he could stop them. Silence. Immediate silence. Neither moved. Neither looked away. The statement hovered between them.

Shane's heart skipped. Then stumbled and attempted to leave through his throat.

Ilya's expression softened.

Completely. Like somebody had reached into his chest and wrapped a hand around his heart.

"Da," he said quietly. "I do. I like you very much." Neither spoke after that. Neither needed to. Because for once, there was nothing left to explain.

The moment lasted longer than it should have.

Shane was still close enough that Ilya could feel his breath when the phone buzzed again between them. Neither moved immediately. The sound seemed absurdly loud in the quiet bedroom, dragging reality back into a space that had somehow existed outside of it for the last several hours.

Another vibration followed almost immediately.

Then another.

Shane sighed and let his forehead fall briefly against Ilya's shoulder. "That's probably Hayden."

"Ignore him."

A muffled laugh escaped Shane. "I don't think that's an option."

"Come on, just for a little while longer." Ilya attempted to pull him to another kiss, but Shane resisted.

Shane finally reached for the phone. The screen lit up in the growing darkness of the room, illuminating the familiar string of increasingly frantic messages. The further he scrolled, the harder it became to suppress his smile.

Across from him, Ilya was watching with open suspicion.

"What?"

"It's Hayden. I have to answer."

"What does babysitter want?"

Shane rolled his eyes automatically. "He's not my babysitter."

"He has called nine times."

"That doesn't make him a babysitter."

"Why does he call so many times?"

Despite himself, Shane laughed. The sound eased something tight inside Ilya's chest. He had discovered over the last day that there were very few things in the world he liked more than making Shane laugh.

Unfortunately, the smile faded almost immediately when Shane reached the newest message.

His expression changed slightly. But enough.

Ilya noticed. Of course he noticed. The atmosphere shifted instantly.

"What happened?"

Shane looked back at the screen before exhaling heavily. "Mandatory team meeting Like right now. I'll be lucky if I'm only late.."

The words settled between them.

Reality. The game tonight.

The arena.

The flight tomorrow.

All the things waiting patiently outside the walls of this house while they pretended the rest of the world didn't exist. For a moment, neither spoke.

Then Ilya groaned and dropped backward onto the mattress dramatically, throwing one arm over his eyes. "No."

The response was so immediate that Shane laughed. "I have to go."

"No."

"Ilya."

"No."

The mattress dipped as Shane shifted closer. He could see the exact moment genuine disappointment settled over Ilya. It wasn't dramatic. It wasn't manipulative. It was simply honest.

For all the progress they'd made today, for all the conversations and reassurances and promises to try, neither of them wanted this part.

Leaving still sucked.

"You'll see me in an hour."

The arm moved just enough for one blue eye to appear.

"That is long time."

"We are literally playing each other."

"You will be wearing wrong jersey."

Shane snorted.

"That's your concern?"

"It is terrible jersey."

"It's the Montreal Voyageurs. We're at the top of the league. We're going to the playoffs this season.."

"It is ugly. Terrible colors"

"It absolutely is not."

"It is."

The argument was ridiculous. Both of them knew it, but neither cared. Because arguing about hockey jerseys was easier than acknowledging the uncomfortable truth sitting underneath everything. Shane was leaving. Not even for very long, but leaving all the same.

Eventually he pushed himself upright. The movement seemed to break whatever spell had settled over the room. The moment his weight shifted away, Ilya's hand immediately closed around his wrist.

Not enough to stop him, just enough to delay him. Shane looked down.

For a second neither spoke. The vulnerability in Ilya's expression touched him harder than any grand declaration ever could.

Yesterday, Shane would have thought it was clinginess. Today he knew better. Ilya wasn't trying to keep him there. He was checking. Making sure. One last confirmation before Shane walked out the door. The realization made something ache inside his chest.

Slowly, Shane threaded their fingers together. "I'll see you at the arena."

Dark eyes searched his face.

"The arena."

"And after."

A small pause. "After." The tension eased fractionally. Not disappearing. Loosening just enough.

Shane lifted their joined hands and pressed a quick kiss against Ilya's knuckles. The surprise on his face was immediate and honestly a little hilarious.

The great Ilya Rozanov, terror of the NHL, looked completely blindsided.

Shane smiled.

"See?"

"What?"

"You will survive me leaving for a few hours."

Ilya stared.

Then narrowed his eyes.

"I have not survived anything yet."

The smile widened despite himself.

"You're impossible."

"Da."

This time the answer came with a smile.

A real one.

And somehow that made walking out the door a little easier.

Eventually, reality won.

Neither of them wanted it to.

Shane had managed to get as far as putting his shoes on before realizing he was being followed.

At first, he hadn't thought much of it. Ilya had come downstairs with him while he grabbed his jacket from the back of a dining room chair. Then he'd wandered into the kitchen while Shane rinsed out his coffee mug. Then he'd followed him into the foyer while he checked his phone and answered another increasingly irritated text from Hayden.

By the time Shane reached the front door, Ilya was still there.

Watching, hovering. Pretending he wasn't doing either.

Shane slipped his phone into his pocket and leaned back against the door, crossing his arms over his chest. "Are you escorting me out?"

Ilya frowned immediately. "No."

"Really."

"Da."

Shane raised an eyebrow. For a moment, neither moved. Then Ilya looked away.

"You've followed me through three rooms."

"It was coincidence. I have to leave soon too."

"And you had to leave while being so close to me?"

"A very unfortunate coincidence."

Shane laughed. The sound echoed through the foyer.

Something warm flickered across Ilya's face at the noise. Not amusement, but relief. Like every laugh Shane gave him was still being catalogued as evidence that everything was okay.

The realization hit Shane right in his chest, harder than expected. Yesterday, that would've scared him. Today, it just made his chest ache, he would miss him- even though they'd be in the same building together, neither would be able to just talk or touch each other.

He stepped closer, closing most of the distance between them. "It'll be fine."

The words slipped out before he could stop them.

Immediately, Ilya's eyes snapped back to his. Shane saw it then.

The tiny shift, the almost imperceptible relaxation of his shoulders.

The way his jaw unclenched, the way he exhaled. Like he'd been holding his breath.

Not because he didn't believe Shane. Because some deeply damaged part of him still expected people to leave.

"I know," Ilya said quietly. The words sounded honest. That was the difference. A few weeks ago, he would've said them while clearly not believing them.

Now? Now he was trying.

The realization settled warmly somewhere beneath Shane's ribs.

Growth, real growth. No guilt trips, or manipulation. No desperate attempt to keep him there by force.

Ilya wanted him to stay. Desperately, but he was letting him go.

Shane wasn't sure he'd ever seen anything more impressive.

The thought must have shown on his face because Ilya narrowed his eyes suspiciously. "What?"

"Nothing."

"You are looking at me strange."

"I'm not."

"Christ, Hollander. You are so boring."

Shane grinned at that. "Such an asshole." he said softly, bringing his hand to cradle the best of

"You are smiling."

Shane sighed dramatically. "I hate that you notice everything."

Ilya's expression softened. "No." His hand came up, brushing briefly against the back of Shane's neck. "You don't."

The touch lingered for only a second, then disappeared. But somehow that felt more intimate than half the things they'd done in the last twenty-four hours.

Slowly, Shane leaned forward. The kiss was brief.

Not desperate. Not hungry, just warm touch.

When they separated, neither moved very far.

Foreheads touching, breathing the same air. For one impossible moment, Shane found himself wondering if this was what normal people felt like.

Not terrified or overanalyzing everything, not hiding to conform to what was socially acceptable.

Not waiting for disaster. Just... happy. The thought was interrupted by another text.

Hayden. Again.

Shane groaned.

Ilya looked deeply offended at Hayden for interrupting their last few minutes together.

"I think he may actually come here."

"How would he know where you are?"

Shane looked at him.

Ilya paused.

"We all have Life360 on our phones now. Its not activated, but we have the option in case something happens."

That wasn't reassuring.

Not even a little.

Laughing despite himself, Shane finally stepped backward and opened the door.

Cool evening air immediately rushed inside.

For a second neither moved.

Then Shane stepped outside. And Ilya stayed where he was.

This was now a different dynamic. No chasing, no panic.

No last minute emotional breakdowns.

Just trust- Ilya needed to trust that Shane would come back to him. It was all new still. The kind of trust they were still learning, The kind neither of them were very good at.

But they were trying.

"See you in an hour."

Ilya leaned against the doorway. "You better."

Shane smiled. Then turned and headed toward the waiting car. He didn't look back. Mostly because he knew exactly what he'd find. Ilya standing there, watching him leave.

But letting him go anyway.

The second Shane opened the back passenger door, Shane pulled out his phone to call Hayden. Not a greeting, not a hello.

Just immediate suffering. "Oh, you owe me big time. Do you know how much I had to cover for you today?"

Shane blushed, he felt like he was being scolded by a parent. "Sorry?"

Hayden sighed. Long and hard.

"Are you okay? You can't just leave like that." The accusation was immediate.

Shane blinked. "I am fine. Heading back to the hotel right now."

"You should have touched base with us last night."

"I don't understand the problem."

"The problem," Hayden informed him as the car pulled away from the curb, "is that you have a group of people looking out for you and we worry when you do unpredictable things. You're the sane one in this whole place and when you start going off script we lose our heads."

A laugh escaped before Shane could stop it.

Hayden pointed immediately. "There. That."

"What?"

"That laugh."

"What about it?"

"I don't like it." Shane was still smiling. Which apparently wasn't helping.

Hayden groaned again. "I knew this would happen."

"What would happen?"

"You start having sex and all of a sudden we now have to parent you and make sure you're being safe. Might be good for Hunter and Rose, but I'm too young for this."

Shane looked out the window, Boston rolled past outside. For a moment, he considered denying it.

Instead he surprised himself.

"I'm happy, Hayd. I think I'm really happy right now."

Hayden's breath hitched over the phone. The answer seemed to catch Hayden off guard.

Because it was true.

That was the strange thing.

Nothing was fixed.

Nothing was magically healed.

The tracker still happened.

The lies still happened.

The fear still existed.

But for the first time, Shane could see the person behind all of it.

The broken, terrified person trying desperately not to become the worst version of himself.

The silence stretched.

Finally Hayden sighed.

"Then I'm happy for you, Holz. I really am but I'm just looking out for you."

"Thanks."

"Plus, you do play better after sex. Everyone knows."

"Oh God! Hayden!."

Hayden cackled over the phone. Then, after a moment: "Are you okay?"

The question landed differently than it would've yesterday.

Shane thought about it. Really thought about it.

The breakdown.

The panic.

The mate conversation.

The hours in bed.

The promises.

The fear.

The hope.

Everything.

Then he smiled softly.

"Yeah."

For the first time in a very long time, the answer felt honest.

"Yeah. I think I am."

Back at the house, the silence felt different. Not empty anymore.

Just quiet.

Ilya stood in the kitchen for a long moment after the door closed. The house still smelled like Shane. Vanilla. Honeysuckle. The faint trace of his shampoo lingering in the air.

A coffee mug sat beside the sink. The blanket they'd shared was still twisted on the couch.

Little pieces of evidence. Proof. Normally, this would've been the point where the panic started, the obsessive thoughts.

The need to call. To text. To confirm that he was okay, to make absolutely sure Shane hadn't changed his mind during the drive.

Instead, Ilya found himself smiling.

Small.

Private.

A little disbelieving.

Because Shane was gone.

And somehow everything still felt okay.

Not good or perfect. But okay.

His phone buzzed. The smile widened immediately.

Shane.

Shane- I managed to calm Hayden down.

Ilya laughed. Actually laughed. Then typed back.

IGR- Have you?

The response came less than ten seconds later.

Shane- Probably.

The smile lingered. Warm. Dangerous. Wonderful.

For the first time since Shane walked out the door, the house didn't feel empty anymore.

For the first time in years, getting ready for a game felt easy. No alcohol, no pills.

No staring at his phone every thirty seconds. No wondering if Shane would answer.

No wondering if Shane would discover everything he'd done over the past three years. No wondering if he'd gone too far.

Just routine.

He'd shower, put on a charcoal suit that Shane had complimented when they had to grab clothes from his closet. He blasted Eminem during the drive to the arena, getting into the right headspace to play. The realization hit halfway to the arena.

He wasn't cured. He wasn't fixed or suddenly healthy.

But Shane had left. And Ilya had survived.

That felt important.

The arena had the hyped energy that it usually had when they were playing Montreal. He had done the pregame interviews, of course he'd been asked about Shane. They were getting ready for warmups but he needed to talk to Shane. Of course that would be hard. They were surrounded by their respective teammates.

Everybody moving, everybody talking with purpose. The familiar chaotic energy wrapped around him the second he entered the building.

Tonight it barely registered.

His phone buzzed.

The smile appeared automatically.

Shane.

Shane- Made it.

Three simple words.

They somehow felt better than any drug he'd ever taken.

IGR- Good.

Shane- That's all I get?

IGR- I am busy professional athlete.

Ilya stood in the locker room, his heart pounding in his chest, his body humming with a familiar, dangerous energy. The game against Montreal was in an hour, and he was already wound tight, his muscles coiled like a spring. He pulled out his phone, his fingers moving over the screen with a mind of their own.

IGR- I wish you were here. I could use your... calming presence.

He hit send, watching as the the delivered tick turned into 'read'. He waited, his heart pounding in his chest, his body trembling with the effort of not moving. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then, they appeared again.

Shane- I wish I was too. But... I'm there in spirit. What do you need?

Ilya smiled, a small, satisfied smile that felt like a victory. He looked around the locker room, ensuring he was alone. Then, he walked towards the back, to the sinks. He stood in front of the mirror, his reflection staring back at him, his eyes filled with a dark, hungry intensity. He reached down, his hands gripping the waistband of his hockey pants. He pulled, the fabric stretching, then giving way, the pants sliding as low as was indecently possible, show the trail of hair down his navel to his pubic bone.

He looked at himself in the mirror, his body hard, his muscles taut, his cock already half-hard at the thought of Shane. He reached down, putting his hand into his underwear, his hand very obviously brushing against the sensitive head. He took a picture, the flash blinding, the image capturing the raw, primal hunger in his eyes.

He sent it and waited, his heart pounding in his chest, his body trembling with the effort of not moving. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then, they appeared again.

Shane- Ilya... what are you doing?

Ilya smiled, a small, satisfied smile that felt like a victory. He knew Shane was blushing, was imagining him, hard, in the locker room, in front of the mirror. He knew Shane was turned on, was thinking of him, of them, of what they could be.

IGR- I'm just... giving you something to think about. Something to... to remember me by. Until tonight. Until the game. Until I see you.

He hit send, then pulled up his pants, his body still humming with desire, with anticipation. He was playing with fire. He knew it. But he didn't care. Not tonight. Not with Shane. Not with the man he loved.

He walked back to his spot, his body still trembling, his heart still pounding. He looked at his phone, at the last message from Shane.

Shane- You asshole! How can you do that to me right before the faceoff.

Then:

I'll be thinking of you too now, obviously.

Shane looked at the picture, his eyes wide, his cheeks flushing a soft, embarrassed pink. He was alone in the locker room, huddled in a corner by the sinks, his heart pounding in his chest. He had never sexted before. He had never even considered it. But here he was, looking at a picture of Ilya, looking as if carved from marble. He took a deep, shuddering breath, his body trembling with a sudden, sharp desire. He looked around, ensuring he was alone. Then, he typed out a response, his fingers moving slowly over the screen.

IGR- I have an idea. A bet.

He hit send, the message disappearing into the digital void. He waited, his heart pounding in his chest, his body trembling with the effort of not moving. The three dots appeared, then disappeared. Then, they appeared again.

Shane- A bet? What kind of bet?

Ilya smiled, a small, satisfied smile that felt like a victory. He knew Shane was intrigued, was thinking of him, of them, of what they could be. He typed out a response, his fingers moving slowly over the screen.

IGR- If my team wins tonight, you have to stay at my house again. Like last night.

He hit send.

Shane- And if my team wins?

Ilya's heart skipped a beat. He hadn't thought of that. He hadn't thought of a scenario where Shane would win. He typed out a response, his fingers moving slowly over the screen.

IGR- You... you can ask anything of me. Anything you want. I will do it. No questions asked.

Message sent, he leaned back against the locker, his heart pounding in his chest, his body trembling with anticipation. He had just given Shane the power to ask for anything. And he had no idea what Shane would ask for. But he was ready. He was ready to give Shane anything. Anything he wanted.

The Uber had barely pulled away from the curb before Shane pulled out his phone.

For several seconds he simply stared at it.

The city moved around him in a blur of traffic lights and evening commuters. Boston was settling into rush hour. The streets were crowded. The sidewalks packed. The driver had some sports radio station playing quietly through the speakers.

Shane barely noticed any of it.

Instead, he scrolled through his contacts. Then pressed call.

The line rang twice. "Hey, kid."

Relief hit immediately. Scott always calmed him down.

Made everything feel a little more manageable.

"Hey."

There was a pause.

Then:

"You sound better."

Shane laughed softly.

"Is it that obvious?"

"Very much so. Everything good?"

The answer made something warm settle in his chest.

Outside the window, the city continued moving past. Shane rested his head against the cool glass, he could see the hotel a few blocks away.

For a moment neither spoke. Then Scott sighed dramatically.

"Okay."

"What?"

"Tell me everything."

Shane laughed. "I can't tell you everything."

"Then tell me the important part."

The smile slipped onto his face before he could stop it.

Scott immediately groaned.

"Oh no."

"What?"

"You're smiling."

Shane covered his eyes with one hand.

"I hate that everyone keeps saying that."

"Because everyone is right maybe? We want you happy kid, you're so highstrung all the time."

The smile refused to leave. No matter how hard he tried.

A few weeks ago he hadn't been sure he would ever feel normal again.

Now he was sitting in the back of an Uber smiling like an idiot.

Scott made a thoughtful sound. "You went back."

It wasn't a question. Shane looked out the window, the city lights blurring together.

"Yeah."

"And?" The single word held no judgment, just curiosity. Concern, friendship.

Everything Scott always seemed to offer without making a big deal about it.

Shane thought about how to answer. The problem was there wasn't a simple answer.

How did he explain today?

The panic.

The confession.

The crying.

The hours spent tangled together in bed.

The feeling of watching someone trust him enough to fall asleep.

The realization that Ilya wasn't just obsessed.

He was scared.

The answer came out quietly.

"It was good." The silence that followed stretched longer than expected.

Then Scott laughed, actually laughed. "That's it?"

"What?"

"Good?"

Shane smiled.

"It was."

"Jesus Christ."

"What?"

"You sound happy."

Because he did. Didn't he? The realization settled slowly. Like trying on a jacket that somehow fit perfectly. His mind was calm, not like the high alert-fight or flight mode that he had been operating under for the past few years.

Shane looked down at his hands.

"I think I am."

The confession felt bigger than it should have.

Scott immediately noticed.

"You think?"

Shane sighed.

"It's complicated."

"Of course it is."

A laugh escaped him. Because yes, of course it was.

Nothing involving him was ever simple. Nothing involving Ilya was ever simple.

Together? They were practically a natural disaster. The smile faded slightly. Not disappearing. Just softening. It was still worth it.

"I still don't know what we're doing."

"Relationship stuff?"

Shane groaned. "I hate that phrase."

Scott sounded delighted.

Shane hated him a little. "You're impossible."

"So I've been told."

The car slowed at a red light.

Shane watched pedestrians cross the street.

Normal people.

Living normal lives.

Not secretly dating rivals.

Not hiding omega status.

Not trying to untangle years of trauma.

Lucky bastards.

Scott's voice softened. "Do you trust him?"

The question caught him off guard. Not because he didn't have an answer.

Because he did. Immediately, completely. The answer arrived before he'd even finished thinking about it.

"Yeah." No hesitation. No uncertainty. Just the truth.

Scott hummed. "Okay."

The simplicity of the response surprised him.

"That's it?"

"What do you mean?"

"That's all you have to say?"

Scott laughed. "What else do I need to say? I want to meet him soon though."

Shane frowned. "I don't know."

"You trust him." The statement was matter-of-fact. Simple.

Like it solved something. Maybe it did. Scott continued. "You don't forgive him."

The certainty in his voice made Shane blink. "No."

"Good."

The response surprised him.

Scott sighed. "Forgiveness isn't a light switch, kid. Make him work for it."

The city rolled by outside.

Shane listened.

"People always act like you either forgive someone or you don't."

"Yeah."

"That's bullshit."

Shane smiled faintly.

That sounded exactly like Scott. "You can be angry and still love someone." The words settled heavily inside the car. "You can still be hurt."

A pause. "You can still trust them." Another pause. "You can even want a future with them."

Shane stared out the window. Something tight in his chest loosened. Because maybe that was it. Maybe he'd been looking at it wrong.

Maybe forgiveness wasn't the first step. Maybe it came later. After the work, after the rebuilding.

After the trust.

Scott spoke again.

"Do you know what you sound like right now?"

Shane immediately regretted asking.

"What?"

"Someone in love."

The silence was immediate. Total.

Scott burst out laughing. "Oh my God."

"Scott."

"You didn't even deny it."

"Scott."

"You didn't!"

Heat flooded his face. "Shut up."

The laughter only got worse.

By the time it finally stopped, Shane was smiling despite himself.

Outside, the hotel appeared ahead.

Scott's voice softened one final time.

"You sound good, Shane."

Not happy. Not fixed. Not even healed.

Good. Like someone who was finally beginning to breathe again.

The Uber pulled to the curb.

Shane looked up at the familiar entrance. Then smiled. "Yeah." For the first time in a long time, he meant it.

"Yeah. I think I am."

Hayden was waiting in the lobby. The second Shane walked through the doors, his friend narrowed his eyes.

Suspiciously, like a bloodhound catching a scent.

Shane sighed.

"What?"

"You look different."

The accusation came instantly.

"Different how?"

"I don't know. It's not just sex though."

The words sounded vaguely offensive. Shane rolled his eyes. "I'm allowed to be...happy."

"Are you?" Hayden fell into step beside him as they headed toward the elevators.

"Because last time I checked, you disappeared for most of the day."

"I was busy."

"Doing what?"

Shane pressed the elevator button. The doors opened.

He stepped inside, Hayden followed closely. The doors slid shut.

For a few seconds neither spoke. He felt Hayden lean down a bit closer to him, inconspicuously sniffing him.

Then Shane smiled despite himself.

Hayden saw it.

Immediately.

"Oh no."

"What?"

"You have Alpha scent all over you."

Shane leaned back against the wall.

Slowly.

Carefully.

He nodded.

The reaction was instant.

Hayden's entire posture changed.

Not relaxed.

But hopeful.

Like he'd been carrying a weight he didn't realize was there.

"Good."

The simplicity of the answer surprised him.

"No interrogation?"

"Oh, I desperately want to interrogate you. But you need a shower and a new scent patch."

Shane laughed.

The elevator climbed.

Hayden watched the numbers above the door.

The elevator doors opened.

For a moment neither moved.

Then Hayden clapped him once on the shoulder.

"Whatever happened today."

His voice was quiet.

Steady.

"Don't screw it up."

Shane's chest tightened. Because for the first time in a very long time, he actually wanted to get it right. "Yeah." The smile returned, small.

Private.

Hopeful.

"That's the plan."

Warmups should have felt normal.

They didn't.

Shane had spent years sharing ice with Ilya. Dozens of games, practices, tournaments, all-star appearances, media events, and international competitions. He knew exactly how the man moved. The angle of his stride. The way he rolled his shoulders before a faceoff. The habit of tapping his stick twice against the ice before receiving a pass.

None of that was new. What was new was the way his eyes kept finding him. Because the second he noticed himself doing it, he realized Ilya was doing exactly the same thing.

Boston spilled onto the ice several minutes after Montreal. The crowd roared. The arena lights reflected off helmets and plexiglass. Players scattered across the sheet, beginning their routines.

And somehow, despite the chaos, Shane spotted him immediately. The realization annoyed him.

Because it wasn't even difficult. Ilya emerged from the tunnel laughing at something one of his teammates said. Then his head turned. And locked onto Shane. Immediately. Like a compass needle finding north.

Like breathing, like instinct.

The smile that appeared on his face was small, private.

Shane's stomach flipped. Across the rink, Ilya's grin widened.

Shit. Without realizing it, Shane had unconsciously been slowly skating towards the Boston side of the rink, towards Ilya. Until JJ called him over to go through the line.

Shane looked away first.

It didn't help.

Shane stared at the messages, a furious blush spreading across his face.

Then typed back quickly for a few minutes then put his phone away. He needed to get his head focused.

The game itself was vicious. Exactly what everyone expected from Montreal and Boston.

Every hit was solid, every inch of ice earned. By the middle of the second period, Shane had been checked into the boards three separate times, but only by Ilya.

From how the crowd had roared, one would think that it would have laid Shane out for the rest of the game, but it was mostly noise. Other than the jostle, Shane hadn't felt a blow.

Shane knew it. Ilya knew it. The smug grin he'd flashed afterward confirmed it.

Asshole.

Montreal answered with a goal late in the second. Boston tied it midway through the third. The tension inside the arena became electric. With less than four minutes remaining, Boston broke through. The puck found the back of the net. The crowd exploded. The arena shook. And just like that, Montreal was chasing. They pulled the goalie, pressed harder.

Created chances. Nothing. When the final horn sounded, Boston had won by one.

Shane hated losing. Always had. Tonight, though? It was worse because he had wanted to impress Ilya. wanted to show him why he hid being an omega for a chance to play this game that he loved so much.

Because as players gathered for the handshake line, a familiar pair of blue eyes met his.

And immediately lit up. The bastard looked delighted. Not because Boston had won. Well. Not only because Boston had won.

Because Shane had lost the bet.

Ilya practically floated into the locker room. The victory was nice.

Beating Montreal was always great.

Beating Shane was even better.

Not because of hockey. Because of what would come after, later tonight.

His phone buzzed in his pocket.

The smile that had been living on his face since warmups returned immediately.

Probably Shane.

Probably already complaining.

Probably pretending he wasn't secretly pleased.

The screen lit up.

His smile disappeared.

Chastnyy Sledovatel.

Six missed calls.

His brow furrowed. He recognized the number. The former investigator.

The one he'd fired after the tracker disaster. The man who enabled one of the biggest mistakes of Ilya's life. The phone buzzed again. Then immediately again. Around him, teammates laughed and talked and peeled off equipment. Ilya stared at the screen. Something unpleasant settled low in his stomach. The third call came through.

This time he answered. "Da?"

The voice on the other end sounded older than he remembered. Tired, nervous. "Mr. Rozanov."

Ilya's expression darkened immediately. "What do you want?"

A pause. Then: "I have information."

Ilya continued unlacing a skate. "I am not interested."

"You should be." The certainty in the man's voice made him stop.

Slowly, Ilya stood. Around him, nobody paid attention.

The investigator continued. "You made me a very rich man."

That wasn't a compliment, it sounded guilty. The feeling in Ilya's stomach worsened.

"What information?"

Another pause. Then: "I spent months trying to understand what happened." The man's voice dropped lower. "Trying to understand how my team failed."

Ilya grabbed his phone tighter.

Without a word, he walked from the locker room.

The hallway outside was quiet.

Empty.

The door closed behind him. "What did you find?"

The answer came immediately. "Money."

Ilya froze. His pulse accelerated.

"What?"

"We traced transfers." The investigator sounded grim. "Payments."

Every instinct inside Ilya sharpened. "To who?"

"The doctor." Silence. Cold.

Absolute. Morozov.

The one who had implanted the tracker. The one who had sworn confidentiality.

The one who had insisted everything was secure. The one who had disappeared shortly after the payment went through.

Ilya felt something dark and ugly begin to unfold inside his chest.

The investigator continued. "There were deposits." A pause. "Several."

"From who?" The answer took too long. Far too long. Finally: "Christopher Hill."

Everything stopped. "And I traced where he received money from. His own breathing. The noise from the arena. All of it.

Gone.

Ilya stared at the opposite wall. Not seeing it. Christopher Hill. The name echoed through his head. The investigator spoke again.

"We found more."

Ilya's voice sounded strange to his own ears. "What more?"

"The trade request." A long silence. Then: "It wasn't about hockey."

Ice flooded his veins.

"He specifically requested Montreal."

The words almost made him fall to the floor. This had all been planned?

Controlled.

Precise.

Brutal.

"He forfeited nearly half his remaining contract value." Another pause. "He was willing to lose millions to get there." Shane. The realization hit instantly. Not Montreal.

It had been to get to Shane.

The investigator didn't need to say it. Both of them understood. The hallway suddenly felt too small, too warm. too difficult to breathe inside. He needed to get to Shane. Needed to make sure he was okay, safe.

The investigator exhaled heavily.

"There is more."

Ilya's jaw clenched.

"Tell me."

"I can't."

Danger entered his voice immediately.

"You can."

"No." The answer came surprisingly firm. "We need to meet."

The silence that followed stretched.

Long.

Uncomfortable.

Then:

"In Russia, not Moscow though. We need to meet in St. Petersburg."

Ilya's eyes narrowed.

"What?"

"There are things I don't trust over the phone."

The investigator sounded genuinely frightened now.

Not cautious.

Frightened.

And somehow that was worse.

"Come to Petersburg."

The request hung between them.

Heavy, unwelcome. Terrifying. "There are things you need to know about Christopher Hill and how everything developed."

Another pause.

Then, very quietly:

"And about Shane."

The line went silent. For several seconds, neither spoke. Ilya stared down the empty hallway. His victory suddenly forgotten. The bet forgotten. The game forgotten.

Somewhere inside the locker room his teammates were celebrating. Somewhere else in the building Shane was probably waiting to collect on their wager.

For the first time all day, unease crawled beneath his skin. Not panic.

Not yet.

Something colder.

Something sharper.

The feeling that the story wasn't over.

The feeling that he'd only just found the beginning.

Slowly, Ilya lowered the phone from his ear.

His reflection stared back at him from the dark screen.

And for the first time since Shane had walked back into his life, he felt afraid again.

For several minutes after the call ended, Ilya remained standing in the hallway.

The phone felt strangely heavy in his hand.

Christopher Hill.

The doctor.

Money.

Montreal.

The words continued circling through his head.

None of it made sense.

At least, not completely.

Enough pieces fit together to make him uneasy. Enough pieces fit together to make him want answers.

But not enough pieces fit together to understand why.

His phone was already in his hand before he realized what he was doing.

Shane.

The contact sat at the top of his messages.

Without thinking too hard about it, he typed.

IGR- Meet me at player parking lot after media.

The response came less than thirty seconds later.

Shane- This is kind of a prize for the both of us so doesn't that mean I won too?

Despite everything, a smile tugged at the corner of his mouth.

IGR- Yes, you did.

Shane-Then why are you ordering me around?

IGR- Because I am winner.

Shane-That's not how bets work.

IGR- I disagree.

A pause.

Then: Shane- Give me twenty minutes.

The knot in Ilya's chest loosened slightly.

Twenty minutes. Enough time to see him. Enough time to decide whether he should say anything. Enough time to figure out if he was overreacting.

The locker room felt louder when he returned.

The celebration was winding down. Players were changing. Reporters were being filtered through. The familiar post-game routine had resumed. Ilya barely noticed any of it. His thoughts remained fixed on Russia. On money trails. On Christopher fucking Hill.

The waiting became unbearable.

Fifteen minutes later, Shane called instead of texting. He heard as he explained that his coach put the team on lockdown immediately. The conversation lasted less than three minutes. By the end of it, his mood had somehow gotten worse. A rookie had shown up hungover. Again. This time he'd taken a nasty hit during the game and the coaching staff had apparently decided they were done being patient. Team lockdown.

Mandatory recovery meetings. Curfew checks. Nobody leaves. Nobody disappears. Nobody makes the organization look stupid. They would fly back together in the morning.

Ilya pinched the bridge of his nose. Of course. Of fucking course.

The timing was almost impressive. A few moments later, Shane's text arrived.

Shane- I'm sorry.

IGR- Not your fault sweetheart.

He watched as the text bubbles start and stop several times.

Shane- wow.

IGR- Don't be so boring, Hollander. Get used to me calling you sweet names.

Shane- Ok.

Another message appeared.

Shane- Kinda pissed that our plans are getting delayed.

Ilya stared at the screen. Oddly enough, disappointment wasn't the strongest emotion. Relief might have been.

Because now he didn't have to decide whether to tell him. Didn't have to decide how much. Didn't have to watch concern appear in Shane's eyes after everything they'd survived over the last two days.

And for the first time in his life, Ilya wanted facts before he acted.

IGR- I'll fly out to you on your next few days off.

Shane- Really? I'd really like that.

The simple certainty of it settled something inside him.

Soon.

The word felt safe, reliable. Something neither of them had trusted for a very long time.

The decision was made before he reached his driveway. The moment the front door closed behind him, he opened his laptop. Flights.

He'd have to land in Moscow but a few minutes later the charter flight to St. Petersburg would take off. He needed to leave in two hours to catch the first flight.

Perfect.

His finger hovered over the booking confirmation for less than a second.

Then he clicked it. Done. The email arrived immediately.

A strange calm settled over him. Movement, action.

Answers. He could work with those.

The uncertainty had been worse.

His phone rang once, twice.

Three times. Before his coach answered. "Rozanov."

"Coach."

A pause. Then: "What happened?"

Because coaches always knew. The answer came easily. "There is family emergency in Russia."

Not entirely a lie. The silence stretched.

Then: "When do you leave?"

"Morning."

Another pause, longer this time. Finally: "Get everything handled, then. Let me know if we can help in any way. Hope you can hurry back."

Relief loosened his shoulders.

"Thank you."

"Be ready when you get back."

"I will."

The call ended. The house fell silent again.

For a long moment, Ilya sat alone in the darkness.

The flight confirmation remained open on his screen. Moscow.

Less than twelve hours away.

His phone buzzed.

A message from Shane.

Shane- Text me when you get back to your place. A smile appeared immediately.

Shane was probably falling asleep waiting for the response.

The thought was strangely endearing.

IGR- Go to sleep, Solnyshko. I'll call you tomorrow.

Three dots appeared.

Shane- You too. If I need rest, you need it too.

Ilya stared at the message. Then looked toward the darkness outside the windows. He only ever have his mother and Svetlana worry about whether he slept enough or not. Whether he was taking care of himself.

Tomorrow, he would tell Shane. Once he understood what he was telling him, once he knew how worried he should be.

Once he had facts instead of fear. For tonight, he wanted Shane to sleep. He wanted one more night where neither of them were afraid. The thought lingered long after he shut off the lights.

Long after he climbed into bed. Long after exhaustion finally began pulling him under.

Tomorrow, he would board a plane. Tomorrow, he would find answers. Tomorrow, he would call Shane. And somehow, for the first time in years, that promise felt certain.

Chapter End Notes

And there it is.

For everyone who has been begging for softness, domesticity, cuddling, communication, emotional growth, and these two acting like actual people instead of catastrophes in hockey gear... congratulations. You won.

For everyone who got comfortable...

A lot of you caught little details over the last few chapters that seemed insignificant at the time. Some of those details may be becoming important sooner than expected.

Also, can we take a moment to appreciate that Ilya survived Shane leaving the house for a few hours without committing a felony? Character growth.

I'd love to hear everyone's thoughts and theories after this one. What do you think the investigator found? What was Christopher Hill hiding? And how worried should we be about a sudden trip to Russia?

(Answer: yes.)

Also, a little housekeeping note: over the next few updates I'll be slowly going back through earlier chapters to clean things up. Some of you have pointed out a few continuity issues, and honestly, I think I've found a much better rhythm and voice as this story has gone on. I've gotten better at translating the absolute chaos in my head into actual words on a page, so there will be small edits, tweaks, and continuity fixes sprinkled throughout the older chapters. Nothing major will change, but if you notice a sentence here or a scene there getting polished up, that's why.

Thank you all for the comments, kudos, bookmarks, and emotional support. You have no idea how much they motivate me to keep writing.

Chapter 28: Chapter 28

Chapter Summary

Hello, friends. 💙

First things first: thank you for the comments on the last chapter as always-love y'all. A few of you were suspiciously good at catching details I thought I was being subtle about. I see you. 🙄

This chapter is... a lot.

Please mind the tags and take care of yourselves. We're diving headfirst into Ilya's past, his family, his choices, and the consequences of all of them. He's not okay. In fact, he may be the least okay he's ever been.

As always, thank you to my amazing beta reader for helping me wrangle the chaos in my head into actual words.

Now come suffer with me. ❤️

The notification from the encrypted messaging app buzzed against the nightstand at 3:17 AM. Ilya, who had been packing his bag since he'd gotten home from the arena, did not startle. He simply turned his head, the movement slow and heavy with a bone weary fatigue. The light from the screen was too bright- everything was filling him with a sense of impending doom.

It was an email from Anatoly, the ex PI. The message was terse, devoid of the usual Cyrillic pleasantries.

Rozanov. New data. I will have a car waiting for you in your city. We need to meet immediately when you land.

Your city. Moscow. When he was 10 years old, his mother had tried to leave with him. They'd made it as far as St. Petersburg, waiting to meet up with her brother, before the police caught them. A runaway omega with her alpha son in a country like Russia. They'd both been so hopeful for a few days-now Ilya could see the impossibility of their escape. The distinction was a spike of ice in his gut. Anatoly was based in Prague. If he was coming to St. Petersburg, it was because the trail had led back to Russia. The news must be big.

Ilya settled into the reclining seat, pulling out the hoodie Shane had borrowed and inhaling the sweet scent. He typed a reply, his fingers stiff. When?

Flight lands Petersburg, 14:30. The car will take you to Vyborg where we'll meet.

He would be missing the next 2 games at the very best. He pulled up the schedule for Montreal and saw that he and Shane would both have an off day that they could spend time together if he caught the right flight next month. A whole 28 days without seeing his omega. He looked back down at the NHL calendar and mapped out the next few months for when they could see each other. The off season couldn't come soon enough. Montreal had a back-to-back against Florida, then a three-day break. Shane would be exhausted, buried in video review and physio. Boston again was after that. Then a West Coast road trip. He scanned forward, weeks bleeding into each other. There was a potential window. A tiny, fragile crack of light. After Montreal's game in Vancouver, before Ilya's own game in Seattle. If flights aligned perfectly, if no one got injured, if Shane wanted to... they could steal thirty-six hours. In a month. A full, grinding, desolate month.

He opened up a new email and want write to Shane but decided against it. He needed all the information before seeing what he told Shane. No need to worry him or cause him stress. It sounded like agony. He wondered if Shane would ever entertain the option of playing for Boston when his contract was up. Would they ever be able to play on the same team? Where would they end up? All he knew that this would be a discussion that they'd need to have soon-it was impossible for them to have so little time together. He had enough pull with the league but that any team would bend over backwards to have him, or even better both of them in one team.

A visceral need, sharp as a cramp, seized him. To call. To hear Shane's voice, sleep-rough and confused. To say Ya skuchayu po tebe until the words lost all meaning. His thumb hovered over Shane's number, before he clenched his hand into a fist, the nails biting into his palm. The pain was a grounding wire. Shane was asleep, his omega needed rest. He'd ensured that himself. Their last night...plus he shouldn't be making calls on the plane.

He hadn't let him sleep. He'd traced the lines of Shane's face in the dark, committed every sigh, every shift of weight, to a new and desperate memory. Sleep was a thief he refused to accommodate.

And then, cruelly, morning had come and life pulled them apart again. He had to think on a solution. Ilya didn't think he wanted Shane to continue playing hockey after they were mated, but that was the more baser instinct. He couldn't really see asking Shane to give up something that he loved so much, so Ilya would have to figure out a way to fix that.

The plane cut through the night sky over the Atlantic. Ilya ignored the plush seat, standing instead at the small window, watching the endless black below. The meeting with Anatoly had been as clinical and grim as he'd feared. He landed in St. Petersburg and as promised, he had a driver waiting for him by the doors-but also two armed security guards.

He climbed into the car and checked his phone. It would be seven in the morning in Montreal. He could technically call, but hopefully Shane would be sleeping still. He wished he still had access to the camera's in his apartment. Just to see him for a few seconds. With one quick phone call he could, but they had worked so hard to build trust again that he didn't want to break that without a better cause than that he missed Hollander.

They drove for about 30 minutes, and Ilya noticed that they had entered Vyborg, stopping in front of a non-descript building. He was escorted out of the car and walked into the building and the hostess escorted him towards the back.

"Thank you for meeting me, Mr Rozanov," Anatoly had said, sipping tea in a back room of the members-only club that smelled of old leather and older money. "How we left things never sat right with me, so to make up for the errors we had I did some more research. I mean, a man like Hill, with such a mediocre career, no prior problems. It was all just strange. Then we started to dig up things. It's about the financing. Hill was traded for a bargain. He was not a rich man. His operation- the kidnapping, the house where Mr. Hollander was taken to, the drugs, it had a patron. The money was laundered through a shell corporation registered in Cyprus. We traced the signatures."

He'd slid a grainy, printed photograph across the table. It showed a man in his late fifties, getting into a black Mercedes outside a steel-and-glass office building in Moscow. The face was familiar to Ilya from newspaper political sections and, more distantly, from his father's bitter, drunken rants about powerful men who looked down on him.

"Dmitri Vasin," Ilya said, the name tasting like ash.

"He is an associate of your father's... Seems like when Vasin got into some trouble with underaged omega's 8 years ago, your father covered it up. Vasin owes a great debt to your father. A major one, enough to exchange for several favors throughout the years. Including," Anatoly paused, "blocking your mothers family from being able to see you."

Ilya frowned. The only living family left was an uncle and some cousins from his mothers side. Everyone else had passed away or he just didn't know about them. Russian culture had been to leave the Omega's family behind once mated but his mother did make an effort to keep in touch with them. He remembered going to his grandparents funerals. Some quick conversations with aunts or cousins.

The connection was a sickening, logical spiral. Chris's 'patron' wasn't just random. And he was connected to the world Ilya had been born into, the world he'd fought his entire life to escape.

"Vasin viewed Chris as an unstable ally to return a favor, to pay off the debt. He was not pleased with the attention the incident brought. But he is a businessman. He sees opportunity in the aftermath. Specifically, in the omega who survived and the alpha who burned his asset to the ground. He is... curious. He has made inquiries."

"What kind of inquiries?"

"About Shane Hollander's had attracted the notice of Grigori Rozanov. What can a Canadian hockey player be of such interest to a retired Russian police chief. Imagine the shock when he found out a connection to a doctor in the Omega community and what his son had done? About your... attachment. Money that you had sent for your fathers expenses was being used in part to pay off Hill. Moronov wasn't as discrete as one would expect him to be." Anatoly's gaze was flat. "You are a high-profile Russian asset. Shane Hollander is a high-profile Canadian asset with a secret. This is not just personal for him. It is a potential investment. Or a potential lesson.”

Ilya sat back in his seat with a cold, clear understanding. The nightmare wasn't over. It had just put on a better suit. Shane had been targeted because of him. Shane had almost been raped because of the stupid choices he had made. He had to stay in Russia, use his own name and his father's tainted legacy as a shield. He had to be visible, draw Vasin's attention, keep it firmly on himself and away from Montreal. Away from Shane.

“Mr. Rozanov. One other thing.” Anatoly paused, as if trying to find words. “Your mother. Were you aware that she was seeking counseling? She was getting better. The pills that had been prescribed for her use...they were not what she had access to. We have the notes and tapes from her therapy sessions if you ever wanted to listen to them. But if that were my mother, and I had to make a bet, I would not believe she had willingly killed herself.”

The air in the private room, already thick with the scent of old smoke and dread, seemed to solidify in Ilya's lungs. It was no longer breathable. It was information, heavy and poisonous. Dmitri Vasin. His fucking father.

His mother's pills.

“I need the copies. Of everything,” Ilya said, his voice a low, vibrationless thing. Anatoly nodded, sliding a sealed envelope across the table. Ilya took it, the paper feeling like a live wire against his fingertips. He stood, the motion too sharp, and the two bodyguards by the door straightened. “The car will take you back to the airport. Your flight to Boston is in four hours.”

“I am not going to Boston.”

Anatoly's eyebrows lifted. “The schedule- ”

“Change it. I am staying in Russia. For a week. Maybe two.” The decision crystallized as he spoke, cold and absolute. He had to be the visible target. A Rozanov on Russian soil, flashing his teeth in the media lights, was a far more interesting toy for a man like Vasin than an omega across an ocean. He would be the lightning rod.

He didn't wait for Anatoly's agreement. He turned and walked out, the guards falling into step behind him, a silent, grim procession through the hushed, opulent hallways. He didn't stop until he was outside, the door of the club shutting with a final, muffled thud behind him. The drivers stood by the car, waiting.

"Drive," Ilya commanded, his voice rough. "Anywhere. Just drive."

The city of Vyborg passed in a blur of grey stone and slush. He told the driver to stop outside a cramped, brightly lit convenience store that sold everything from vodka to electrical tape. "Wait here," he said, and got out, needing space that wasn't moving, that wasn't watched.

The store was overheated, the air smelling of fried dough and cheap cleaning fluid. He stood in an aisle staring at a shelf of batteries, seeing nothing. The envelope burned a hole in his inner jacket pocket. His mother's voice, on a tape. Her truth, held by a stranger. His fault. Shane's face, pale and terrified in a barren room. His fault. A powerful man with a debt to his father, now looking at Shane with calculating eyes. It had all been his fault for not thinking things through.

The walls of the store pressed in. The fluorescent lights buzzed like a swarm in his skull. He couldn't get enough air. He fumbled for the door handle and stumbled back out into the biting cold, gulping in deep, ragged breaths that seared his throat. He braced his hands on his knees, head down, fighting the dizzying rise of a panic that felt like freefall.

Protect him. You have to protect him. You promised.

But he was here, and Shane was there. An ocean away. He was one man. The old Ilya would have gotten on a plane, would have broken into Shane's apartment, would have installed new cameras, hired a ring of unseen guards. The old Ilya's protection was a cage. Shane had taught him that. The new Ilya, the one who was surviving now rather than healing, had to do it differently. He had to ask.

His fingers were numb, but he pulled his phone out. The first call was to the one person he trusted implicitly on the ice, and whose judgment off it he respected, even when it was blunt.

Marlow, his assistant captain in Boston, answered on the third ring. “Roz? Do you know what time it is?”

“I need a favor,” Ilya said, bypassing all greeting. The words tumbled out. “Is important. I need you to go to Montreal for a few days.”

A long pause. “Montreal? Are you drunk? We have a game in-”

“I know the schedule. This is more important than a game.”

“What the hell is in Montreal that’s more important than clinching the playoffs? Where are you?” Marlow’s voice was wary, confused.

Ilya closed his eyes. The truth was the only card he had left to play. “Hollander. Shane Hollander.” He forced the next words past the knot in his throat. “He is my mate. And I have... I have enemies. I am in Russia handling it, but I need eyes on him. I need an alpha there, someone I trust, to just... be a presence. To make sure he is safe until I can get back.”

The silence on the other end was profound. Ilya could picture Marlow’s face- the shock, the slow dawning of a hundred puzzle pieces clicking into place. The rivalry, the intensity, the strange disappearances.

“Jesus, Ilya,” Marlow finally breathed. “Your mate? Hollander? Is he...?”

“He is an omega,” Ilya confirmed, the secret feeling both terrifying and relieving to share. “It is not public. It cannot be. For his safety, this has to stay secret. Please, Marlow. I am asking. Not ordering. I need your help.”

Another pause, then a resigned, gritty sigh. “Alright. Alright, you crazy bastard. I’ll call the coach, say it’s a family emergency. Which I guess it is. Text me his address and his schedule. I’ll be on the next flight.”

The relief was so acute it felt like a blow. “Spasibo.”

“Just don’t get yourself killed in Russia. The team needs you.”

Ilya hung up. One layer of protection. But not enough. Vasin was connected, ruthless. He needed someone who understood the shadows, who knew the world Shane had been dragged into. The next call tasted like bile, but it needed to be done. He scrolled and pressed the name he hated to see.

Scott Hunter answered with a guarded, “Hello?”

“Hunter. This is Ilya Rozanov. I need you to go to Montreal,” Ilya said, repeating the script, though it felt filthier this time. Hunter was Shane’s friend. He was the healthy alpha, the one with the pregnant omega mate, the living benchmark of everything Ilya had failed to be. “Shane is in potential danger. I am... dealing with the source. But I need someone he trusts to be with him. To stay with him. I have my teammate Marlow going as well, for an alpha presence, but Shane... he will listen to you.”

“Danger,” Hunter repeated, his voice hardening. “What kind of danger? Is this more of your shit, Rozanov? Because if you’ve dragged him back into-”

“It is my shit!” Ilya snapped, the control fraying. “It is my past, my family, my mess. It found him because of me. I am trying to fix it! But I cannot be in two places. I am calling you because I know you care him. I am calling you because I am desperate. Please. Go to him. Do not let him out of your sight. I am begging you.”

The word hung in the static-filled air between continents. Begging. Ilya Rozanov did not beg.

Hunter was silent for a long moment. “Where are you?”

“Russia.”

A sharp intake of breath. “God damn it. Alright. I’ll go. Kip will understand. But Rozanov... you explain this to him. You tell him everything. No more secrets.”

“I will. I promise.”

He ended the call. Two alphas. Two guards. It was a plan. It was logistics. But it was noise. Beneath it, a raw, screaming need was tearing him apart. He needed to hear his voice. Just for a second. Just to know he was still real, still there, still his before the fear swallowed everything.

He dialed Shane’s number. It rang, and rang, and each tone was a hammer blow to his sternum. Pick up. Please, solnyshko, pick up.

A sleep-thickened, confused voice answered. “...Ilya?”

The sound of it unraveled him. He leaned his forehead against the cold brick wall of the store, eyes squeezed shut. “Shane. Where are you?”

“Home,” Shane mumbled, the sound of sheets rustling. “In bed. What’s... what’s wrong? It’s so early.”

Home. In bed. Safe. For now. Ilya’s breath hitched. “Listen to me. I need you to listen and not to panic. I am sending two people to you today. Marlow and Scott Hunter. They are going to stay with you. For a few days.”

“What? Why? Ilya, you’re scaring me.” Shane was awake now, the sleep replaced by rising alarm.

“I need you to trust me. I will explain everything, I swear on my life, but not now. Please. Let them in. Let them stay with you. Do not go anywhere alone.”

“Ilya, where are you?” Shane’s voice was sharp, cutting through the line.

“I had to come to Russia. Some... business with my father. It is more complicated than I thought. I will be here a few days. A week, maybe. No more.” The lie was ash in his mouth, but the truth would be too much to say over the phone.

“Russia? No. No, you can’t be there, not after... Ilya, come home. Please.” The plea was pure, undiluted fear. It mirrored his own.

“I am coming home. To you. This is me making sure of that. Do you really think I wouldn’t come back to you after we finally start to figure things out?” Ilya said, forcing his voice into a semblance of calm, a low, steady alpha rhythm meant to soothe. “This is me protecting what is mine. The only way I can from here. Do you trust me, Shane? Even a little?”

A choked sound, then a whisper. “Yes.”

That single word was a lifeline. It was everything. “Good. Marlow and Hunter will be there soon. Do what they say. I will call you when I can. Ya ochen' tebya lyublyu .”

Shane gave a huff. “What does that one mean?”

“I’ll will tell you when I see you soon.” He didn’t wait for a reply. He ended the call, sliding down the brick wall until he was sitting on the frozen pavement, the phone clutched in his white-knuckled hand. He dropped his head between his knees, his whole body trembling with the aftershock of the calls, the confession, the plea.

He had mobilized a defense. He had cast his net of protection from five thousand miles away. He had heard Shane's voice and planted the seed of a lie to keep him from shattering.

The old obsession had been a silent, controlling shadow. This new devotion was a roar, a series of brutal, calculated actions that left him exposed and utterly alone on a cold street in Russia. It felt like holding a live grenade with the pin already pulled, waiting for the moment he could throw himself on top of it to spare the one person who mattered.

He took one deep, shuddering breath, then another. The panic receded, not gone, but banked, transformed into a cold, hyper-focused resolve. He stood up, brushing the grit from his pants. He looked at the waiting car, then towards the east, where the real battle lay.

He had work to do.

Entering the high end nursing home was a struggle. The nurse had tried to warn him. 'It's not a good day. The memories... they come and go. Sometimes he's in the past. He gets confused, aggressive.' Ilya had brushed past her, a man on a mission, armed with Anatoly's envelope and a need to look into the eyes of the man who had possibly condemned his mother. Had tried to take his mate away from him.

He hadn't expected a confession. He'd expected denials, rage, the usual labyrinth of lies. He hadn't expected the simple, horrifying clarity of dementia's unburdening.

'...made sure she took them all. The doctor, he understood. A grieving husband, a distraught omega... no one looked twice. It was cleaner this way, Aleksandr. Cleaner.'

Aleksandr. His uncle. His mother's older brother, who had died in a police raid a few years ago. In his father's crumbling mind, Ilya remembered being told they looked similar.

His father, propped up in a sterile bed, the room smelling of antiseptic and decay, had peered at him with milky, unfocused eyes. A slow, terrible smile had spread across his withered face. “Alexsander. You came! I told you if your family gave me a faulty Omega this would happen. She was becoming a problem. Talking to that therapist... about leaving. About taking my son. My asset. My legacy. But I at least am trying to do right by her now. We need to plan a proper funeral. She will be buried according to our customs and we won’t speak of this ever again.”

Ilya had to leave. The cold air of the afternoon hit Ilya’s sweat-dampened face like a physical slap. He braced himself against the rough brick wall beside the trash can, his body convulsing one last, dry heave that brought up nothing but acid and shame. The taste of bile was a cheap, familiar penance. His father’s words, slurred and matter-of-fact, looped inside his skull, a corrupted recording on endless playback.

Ilya had stood frozen, the envelope of his mother’s stolen peace feeling like a lead weight in his hand. He closed his eyes, remembering the bit he had managed to ask before he had to leave the room. “What did you do?” he’d asked, his voice barely a whisper.

“The pills. I switched them. The ones from the quack made her talk. The ones I gave her made her sleep. Forever. A tragedy.” His father had nodded, as if recounting a clever business deal. “The Rozanov name was preserved. No scandal. No runaway omega tarnishing my reputation. The boy stayed. He learned his place.”

A place built on a murder. A life built on a lie. Every memory Ilya had of his mother’s final months—her increasing quiet, her distant eyes, the way she’d sometimes hug him too tight as if memorizing the feel of him, reconfigured itself into something sinister. Not depression. Not a surrendering omega. A woman being systematically poisoned by the alpha who was supposed to protect her, erased for the crime of wanting freedom for her son.

The vomit had risen then, unstoppable. He’d stumbled from the room, a hand clamped over his mouth, the nurse’s concerned voice a distant echo, and made it to the trash can in the stark, tiled hallway before his body rebelled.

Now, shivering in the alley, the reality cemented itself, cold and absolute. Dmitri Vasin owed a debt to a murderer. The man who had looked at Shane with “interest” was the business associate of the man who had killed Ilya’s mother. The threads were no longer just connected; they were the same fucking thread, pulling tighter around everything Ilya loved.

He fumbled for his phone, his fingers clumsy with shock. He had to know Shane was safe. He had to hear it. The screen showed two new messages.

Marly- Landed. At his building. He let me in. Looks okay, just confused. Hunter's her too. We've got this.

Scott Hunter- I'm with him. He's safe. We're talking. He's scared. Call him when you can.

The relief was so profound it weakened his knees again. They were there. They were a barrier. For now. He leaned his head back against the brick, staring at the grey, indifferent sky. He's scared. Of course he was. Shane, who needed order, predictability, who had spent a lifetime building control, was now surrounded by it again- guards, secrets, an alpha across the world making terrifying decisions. The old Ilya would have reveled in this level of control. He was replicating the dynamics of fear, just with a different cast of jailers.

But what was the alternative? Leave him unprotected while he figured out how to remove the external threats? While the rot from his father's world seeped across the ocean?

His phone buzzed. A new email from Anatoly.

Mr. Rozanov. Tracking Vasin and his people. No action recently. Your visibility on the other hand is having an effect. He is watching you. Stay visible.

It would be nice if the night shift nurses that I've outsourced for tonight can say that he visited his old friend in the nursing home-wouldn't it be? Their shift starts this evening at 19:00. I particularly like how they leave the rooms so clean, no traces of messes from our dear old seniors.

He pushed himself off the wall. The physical sickness had passed, leaving a hollow, ringing calm in its wake. The grief and rage were still there, but they were being compressed, folded into a dense, cold core of purpose. He had two weapons now: a confession and a debt. His father's sin, and Vasin's obligation to the sinner.

He walked back to the waiting car, his steps measured. The driver glanced at his pale face in the rearview but said nothing. “The city center,” Ilya said, his voice flat. “Somewhere with photographers. A restaurant. A club. Somewhere I will be seen.”

“Yes, sir.”

The man who had burned Chris Hill alive in a shack to save Shane was still in him. That man had been fueled by a possessive rage. This new resolve was colder, clearer. It was not about possession. It was about eradication. He would burn down the entire rotten structure of his father’s legacy if it meant Shane could stand in the sunlight, safe.

This was all too much for him, but he would not back down. He would protect Shane, no matter who stood in the way.

The sterile quiet of the nursing home hallway felt like a held breath. The squeak of Ilya’s shoes was the only sound, a metronome counting down to an inevitable, violent measure. The door to Room 114 was just a slab of painted wood, but it felt like the entrance to a crypt he was about to desecrate. He pushed it open.

The room was a tableau of slow decay. The green glow of the heart monitor painted his father’s sunken face in ghastly relief. The old man’s eyes were open, and this time, they were not clouded by dementia’s fog. They were sharp, calculating, and utterly aware. They tracked Ilya’s entry with a weary, contemptuous triumph. It was as if God was permitting what was about to happen. Like He wanted Ilya to have the satisfaction of real vengeance.

“The prodigal son returns,” Grigori Rozanov rasped, his voice a dry leaf scraping stone. “Come to have another tantrum? Did you tire of the comfortable life in America?”

Ilya said nothing. He let the door sigh shut behind him, closing them in together. Words were done.

“You always were too emotional. Weak. Like her.” His father’s gaze was a physical probe, poking at old wounds. “It is why you cling to that... that thing in Montreal. That omega. He is a symptom of the sickness she put in you. Making you soft, weak.”

“You murdered her,” Ilya stated, his voice low and flat, a stone dropped into a still pool.

“I cured a problem,” Grigori corrected, his lips peeling back from yellowed teeth. “She was a leaking vessel, poisoning my legacy. Talking of leaving. Of taking you to become some... some soft Western pup.” He shifted slightly, a rustle of starch sheets. “And now you prove her failure. You run to him. You risk everything- your career, your name, your position, for a scent, for a moment of weakness. It is pathetic. How did you finally find out?”

Ilya took a step closer. The air grew colder. “You spoke to Vasin about him.”

A slow, malignant smile spread across the old man’s face. “Dmitri is a practical man. He understands investments. And liabilities. I merely pointed out that your... distraction... was affecting your value. That a focused Ilya Rozanov, unburdened by sentimental garbage, is a more valuable asset to everyone. To Russia. To the family name. He agreed that removing the distraction would be a wise favor. A father’s guidance, even from this bed, is still a powerful thing.”

The confession was not a slip of a fading mind. It was a boast. A final, twisted lesson in realpolitik from a man who viewed love as a tactical flaw and people as disposable assets. He had not just killed Ilya’s mother; he had, with a few whispered words, aimed a predator at Shane.

The last thread of Ilya’s restraint snapped.

It was not a roar, but a silence that swallowed the room. He moved, not with the calculated purpose of before, but with the terrifying, efficient violence of a predator unleashed. His hand shot out and ripped the glass pitcher of water from the bedside table. With a backhanded swing of shocking force, he brought it crashing across the side of his father’s head.

The sound was a sickening crunch-thud, glass splitting, water exploding across the pillow and wall. Grigori's head snapped to the side with a grunt of shock, a deep gash opening on his temple. Blood, shockingly vivid against the white linen, began to well and seep.

The old man's lucid eyes flew wide, not with fear, but with a kind of furious disbelief. "You-!"

Ilya didn't let him finish. He dropped the shattered pitcher and grabbed the front of his father's medical gown, hauling the frail body partway off the bed. The monitors screamed in protest, lines spiking. With his other hand, Ilya grabbed the metal bedpan from the nearby stand. It was cold, heavy, utilitarian.

"This is for her," Ilya growled, his voice a guttural thing from a deep, dark place.

He brought the bedpan down on his father's face.

The first blow smashed his nose with a wet, cracking pop. More blood sprayed, painting Ilya's knuckles, his wrist, flecking his own shirt. Grigori cried out- a short, choked sound of pure animalistic pain- and his hands came up, clawing weakly.

"This is for every lie," Ilya whispered, and struck again. The metal edge caught the old man's mouth, splitting his lip against his teeth, chipping a tooth with a tiny, sharp click. More blood, darker now, mixed with saliva.

"And this," Ilya said, his breath coming in harsh pants, his vision narrowing to the bloody ruin beneath him, "is for even thinking his name."

The third blow was to the forehead. A solid, blunt thunk. The clawing hands fell away. The furious light in his father's eyes glazed over, swimming with pain and a dawning, terminal understanding. He was not dealing with an angry son. He was facing the final, brutal consequence of a lifetime of tyranny.

Ilya dropped the bedpan. It clattered to the floor, its concave bowl now smeared with red. He released the gown, letting his father slump back, a broken doll against the blood-soaked pillow. But it wasn't enough. The rage was a living thing, demanding more.

He saw the medical tray. The scissors. Long, sharp, made for cutting bandages.

He seized them.

His father, through the blood and brokenness, saw them. A final, coherent terror flashed in his eyes. "Ilya... son..." he gurgled, the word- a bloody bubble on his lips.

It was the wrong word. It was the ultimate lie.

Ilya leaned over him. He didn't aim for the heart. That was too quick, too clean. He placed the point of the scissors low, just below the sternum. He met his father's fading gaze.

"You are no father of mine," Ilya said, each word a shard of ice.

And he leaned his weight into it.

The resistance was gruesome- a horrible, grating pop as the sharp tips pierced the abdominal wall, then a softer, wetter give as they sank deep. Grigori's body arched off the bed in a final, violent spasm, a raw, tearing scream ripped from his throat, cut short as the blades found something vital. Ilya twisted the handles, once, a brutal, grinding motion. A hot rush of blood and other fluids spilled over his hand, soaking the sheets, dripping onto the floor with a steady pat-pat-pat.

He held them there, watching the life drain from the eyes that had haunted him since childhood. The monitor's frantic shriek had become a single, flat, endless tone. The room was a charnel house. The coppery, visceral stench of blood filled the air, overwhelming the antiseptic. It was on the walls, the bedding, Ilya's hands, his clothes. Slowly, he pulled the scissors free. They came out with a sick, sucking sound. He dropped them onto the bed beside the ruin that had been Grigori Rozanov.

He felt sick. Deep in his soul. This wasn't him, yet this was the third life he had taken. Alpha laws were odd. Would he face consequences? No, he had done it in the name of defending his omega. The fact that they were not bonded yet might be an issue, but not one that couldn't be solved with some well placed bribes. But the damage to his mental health might need to be looked into when things were settled.

The door opened.

The two male 'nurses' entered. They did not startle at the carnage. Their eyes, flat and professional, took in the scene: the splattered walls, the pooled blood on the floor, the grotesque still-life on the bed, the blood-soaked alpha standing in the center of it.

Without a word, they set to work. One went immediately to the shrieking monitor and silenced it, then began the methodical process of disconnecting leads and wiping down the equipment with strong disinfectant. The other approached the bed. He first carefully pried the bloody scissors from the sheets, wiped them clean with a cloth, and placed them back on the medical tray. Then, from his kit, he produced a large, absorbent pad and pressed it firmly against the gaping wound in the abdomen, staunching the last welling seep of blood. He worked with a butcher's efficiency, wrapping the torso in a clean, disposable sheet, containing the mess.

The first nurse was already mopping the floor with a powerful solution that cut through the blood and left a sharp, chemical smell in its wake. He gathered the blood-soaked bedding, the shattered pitcher, the stained bedpan, and placed everything into thick, black biohazard bags. He produced a spray bottle and a rag, and began wiping the blood spatter from the wall, from the bedside table. In minutes, the overt evidence of violence was being erased, replaced by the smell of bleach and order.

The nurse tending the body finally looked at Ilya. He gestured to a small, connected bathroom. "You need to clean up. We have a change of clothes for you. Your size."

Ilya moved numbly. In the bathroom, under the fluorescent light, he saw himself in the mirror. A stranger stared back, pale face flecked with blood, eyes hollow, clothes drenched in gore. He stripped, letting the ruined garments fall in a heap. He scrubbed his hands, his arms, his face under scalding water, watching pink swirls circle the drain until the water ran clear. The scratches stung fiercely.

When he emerged, wearing the plain, dark trousers and sweater left for him, the transformation was nearly complete. The room was almost clean. The body on the bed was now a discreet, wrapped bundle. The floor shone wetly. The only smell was bleach and death, fast being overpowered by the chemical cleaner.

The lead nurse gave a final nod. "It is done. The chart will show a catastrophic gastrointestinal hemorrhage. A tragic, but not unexpected, complication. Very messy. These things happen with the elderly." His eyes met Ilya's. "You should go. You were never here. The night has been quiet."

Ilya walked out of Room 114. The hallway was silent. He passed the nurse's station where the same impassive man sat, now typing the official cause of death into the system.

Outside, the cold night air hit him like a physical wall. He inhaled, and the clean, frozen air scoured his lungs, but it could not reach the new stain inside him. He had crossed into a place from which there was no return. He had not just killed his father; he had annihilated him in a storm of blood and rage, becoming the very monster the old man had tried to shape. But the purpose was his own. The chain was severed. The bridge was burned, and the ashes were washed away by professionals.

He slid into the back of the waiting car. "The airport," he said, his voice a hoarse whisper.

The blood was gone from his hands, but the smell seemed to linger in his sinuses- copper and bleach, a new, permanent perfume. In the back of the speeding car, the world outside the tinted windows was a smear of darkness and distant, lonely lights. The hollow calm had returned, but it was different now. It wasn't empty. It was occupied by a single, cold axiom: One more to go.

He pulled out the burn phone Anatoly had given him. The call connected after half a ring.

“It is done,” Ilya said, his voice devoid of inflection. “Thank you for your help.”

A pause on the line. Anatoly was not a man surprised easily. “Your visibility served its purpose. Vasin’s interest has... pivoted. He is intrigued by your sudden visit but only commented that to our good friend the doctor. I think you should let us take care of them, Mr. Rozanov. I owe you an honor debt and would like to repay you.”

“Just get it done,” Ilya cut in, the words sharp as glass. “I can’t take it anymore.”

Another, longer pause. Ilya could almost hear the calculations, the risk assessments scrolling behind Anatoly’s eyes. “Mr. Rozanov... Dmitri Vasin is going to be taken care of. He is a man with resources, allies. To ‘remove’ him would create a significant... disturbance, but I swear on my honor everyone will be taken care of within the week.”

“I do not care about disturbances,” Ilya stated, staring at his own reflection in the car window- a pale ghost floating over the passing darkness. “I care about finality. You made my father’s end disappear. Make Vasin disappear. I will pay for it. You don’t owe me anything anymore.”

The silence stretched. It was not a refusal. It was a professional weighing a profoundly dangerous contract. Finally, Anatoly spoke, his tone shifting to one of pure, amoral logistics. “It will be done.”

“You have a week,” Ilya said. “I am leaving Russia. When I land, I want confirmation that the project is underway. I do not need details. I need the result.”

He ended the call before Anatoly could reply. The transaction was complete. He had just ordered an assassination, his voice as steady as if he’d ordered a car to the airport. The part of him that should have recoiled was the same part that had died on the floor of Room 114, scrubbed away by efficient men with bleach. He was building a fortress of corpses to keep his one reason for living safe.

He had sent a text to his Russian agent, asking him to book a private flight to Montreal. Image be damned.

“Stop here please.” he told the driver, giving the address of a small, onion-domed church in a older, quieter district of the city. It was the church his mother had slipped away to on rare, stolen mornings, the scent of her perfume always mixing with incense when she returned.

The car stopped on a cobblestone street. The church was dark, save for a single, flickering oil lamp glowing red beside the heavy wooden door. It was unlocked. These places always were.

Inside, the air was thick and still, heavy with the memory of centuries of smoke and whispered prayer. The icons stared down from the walls with their serene, timeless grief. The silence here was different from the nursing home. It was a waiting silence. He stood at the back, his hands hanging at his sides, feeling the profound incongruity of his presence. He was a bloody thing in a place of supposed purity.

The church was dark, save for the glow of oil lamps and the silver shimmer of moonlight through narrow windows. The icons watched him from every wall. Christ Pantocrator. The Theotokos. Saints whose names he had forgotten years ago. They all seemed to be staring directly at him. Ilya stood frozen just inside the doorway. He had not been inside a church since his mother's funeral. Not really. There had been weddings. Public appearances. Christmas services attended because cameras expected him there. He had crossed himself at the appropriate moments and recited prayers he no longer believed.

But he had not entered a church as a son. As a sinner. As a man seeking forgiveness.

The smell hit him first, incense, wax. Old wood. For one impossible second he was eight years old again, sitting beside his mother in a pew while she whispered the names of saints into his ear and told him stories about mercy.

Mercy, the word felt foreign now. The church was empty except for one elderly priest kneeling before an icon stand near the altar. His beard was completely white. His black cassock hung loose on a frame that looked barely substantial enough to support it. The priest looked up.

Their eyes met. No shock. No alarm.

Only recognition.

"Ilya Grigorivich," the priest said quietly.

Ilya blinked. "Excuse me?"

"Its been many years, but I remember those eyes and that hair. Just like your saint of a mother."

The old man rose slowly. "You look so much like your mother."

For a moment Ilya couldn't breathe. "You knew her?"

"Everyone knew her."

The priest studied him.

"She prayed for you constantly." Something inside him cracked, just a little.

The priest gestured toward a small stand near the front of the church where a cross and Gospel rested beneath an icon of Christ.

"Would you like confession? A man does not come to the house of God in the middle of the night unless he needs to unburden himself."

The answer should have been no. He was not worthy. He was stained with blood.

His father's blood. Chris Hill's blood. He would be sexual abuser from Mexico. All the violence he carried inside him. Instead he heard himself say: "Yes."

The priest draped the epitrachelion around his neck and waited. Silence stretched. Orthodox confession was different than people imagined. The priest did not interrogate him. He simply waited. Patient, still. As if God had all the time in the world. The old priest did not rush him.

The silence stretched between them, broken only by the occasional crackle of a candle and the distant groan of old wood settling somewhere in the church. The epitrachelion rested lightly across Ilya's shoulders, but it felt heavier than body armor.

For several minutes he said nothing.

He simply stared at the icon of Christ hanging above the stand. The painted eyes seemed alive- watching, waiting. Understanding. The thought made his stomach twist. Finally he spoke.

"I killed my father tonight." The words echoed softly through the empty church.

The priest remained silent.

Ilya found himself grateful for that. He had spent his entire life surrounded by men who spoke too much. Men who explained. Men who justified. Men who lied.

The old priest simply listened. So Ilya continued. Slowly at first. Then all at once. He spoke about his mother. About the nursing home. About the confession dragged from a dying man whose mind had finally become too broken to maintain its own lies. He described the pills. The murder. The years stolen from both his mother and himself. The realization that his entire childhood had been cut short for a lie. Then he spoke about Shane. About Chris Hill. About Vasin. About the realization that his father had not stopped trying to control his life even from a hospital bed. The words poured out of him in a rough, emotionless stream.

When he finished, the church fell silent again.

The priest lowered his gaze.

"You regret this."

It wasn't a question.

Ilya laughed, the sound ugly and brittle. The priest looked up. "What?"

He rubbed a hand across his face.

"He killed my mother." The statement sat between them like a stone. He would have killed Shane too."

The priest remained still.

"I know what the Church teaches." Ilya's voice grew rougher. "I know murder is a sin."

The old man nodded.

"Yes."

"I know vengeance belongs to God."

"Yes."

"I know what I did."

The priest's expression never changed. "And what did you do? Why do you think that you need absolution for God."

Ilya stared at the floor.

For the first time since entering the church he felt tired. Not physically, but soul-deep. The kind of exhaustion that came from carrying hatred for too long. "I removed a threat." The answer came immediately. Because it was the truth.

The priest was quiet for a long moment.

"And if God returned you to that room tomorrow?"

Ilya closed his eyes. Immediately he saw the blood. The scissors.

His father's smile. The casual way he'd discussed murdering his mate as though she were a broken nobody.

Then he saw Shane. Sleeping peacefully in Montreal. Alive, safe, breathing.

The answer was easy. Painfully easy. "I would do it again." The confession hung in the air.

The priest studied him. "Then why are you here?"

That question took longer. Because he honestly didn't know.

He wasn't seeking forgiveness. Not really. He wasn't seeking absolution. He wasn't even seeking understanding. Eventually he found the answer.

"Because I don't like that it was easy."

The words emerged in a whisper.

His chest tightened.

"I thought it would feel different."

He swallowed.

"After Chris Hill I told myself it was because Shane was in danger."

His hands clenched.

"Then tonight happened."

His voice cracked.

"And I enjoyed it."

The admission felt like pulling a knife through his own ribs.

"I enjoyed hurting him."

The priest remained silent.

"I wanted him to suffer."

Ilya stared at his trembling hands.

"I wanted him afraid."

His breathing grew uneven.

"And for a few minutes I was happy."

The church seemed to grow colder.

"I hate that." There it was. The real confession, not the murder. Not the violence.

The satisfaction. The part of himself that had looked into Grigori Rozanov's eyes and felt relief.

The part that had enjoyed revenge. The part that sounded far too much like his father.

The priest finally spoke. "You fear becoming him."

Ilya's head snapped up. Because yes, that was exactly it.

Not prison, or hell. Not judgment.

Him. The blood in his veins. The violence.

The capacity for cruelty. The terrible possibility that Grigori Rozanov had not created a monster. Only recognized one.

"I loved it."

The admission came out raw. Honest.

"I hated him and I loved hurting him."

His voice dropped lower.

"If Shane had been threatened again..." He couldn't finish. Because they both knew. There was no limit. No line, no law.

No consequence. Nothing he would not do. Nothing he would not become.

Not for himself. Never for himself.

But for Shane? For Shane he would burn countries.

The priest studied him for so long that Ilya eventually looked away.

When the old man finally spoke, his voice was gentle.

"That is not the same thing as your father."

Ilya frowned.

"How?"

"Because you are horrified." The answer was immediate.

Simple, certain.

The priest gestured toward the icon behind them.

"Your father celebrated his sins."

His gaze settled on Ilya. "You mourn yours."

The distinction sunk into his mind, more than any condemnation could have.

The old priest sighed. "What you did was still wrong."

Ilya nodded. He knew that.

"But remorse is not always wishing something had never happened. And you were protecting your mate, that is a god given commandment when two souls are lucky enough to be so connected."

The priest folded his hands. "Sometimes remorse is wishing there had been another way."

Something in Ilya's chest tightened painfully. Because that was exactly it.

If there had been another way, he would have taken it. If there had been a way to save his mother. A way to save Shane. He would have chosen it.

But standing in that nursing home room, faced with the truth of what his father had done and what he intended to continue doing-

Ilya honestly didn't believe another path had existed. And perhaps that certainty would damn him. Perhaps God would judge him for it.

Perhaps He already had. But Shane was alive. And if damnation was the price of that, then Ilya suspected he had paid it willingly long ago.

He did not wait for a prompt. He began to speak in Russian, his voice low, a monotone in the sacred dark.

"Bless me, Father, for I have sinned. It has been... many years." He took a breath that did not fill his lungs. "I have committed the sin of murder. With malice. With cruelty. I took a life in anger and called it justice. I felt his blood on my hands. I watched the light leave his eyes and I felt... nothing. Then I hired a man to commit another murder. I feel nothing about that, either."

He paused, the words hanging in the incense-heavy air. The priest on the other side of the screen was utterly silent.

"The man I killed... he killed my mother. He told me so. He poisoned her for the crime of wanting to leave and save me. He also conspired to have the man I love killed, to 'fix' me. I killed him for that, too. But mostly, I killed him for her. Is that a sin? To kill for a ghost? To kill for a future that someone else tried to strangle?"

No answer came. Ilya hadn't expected one.

“The man I love... I have hurt him terribly. In my obsession, I became a jailer. I thought it was protection. I was wrong. He was taken because of me. He was hurt because of me. I burned a man alive to get him back. I carry that fire inside me now. It is the only warmth I have left.” His voice cracked, just once. “I am going to him now. With these hands. I do not know how to touch him without staining him. I do not know how to love him without the shadow of what I have done consuming us both. I am afraid... I am afraid the nothingness inside me is all I have left to give him.”

He fell silent. The confession was not a request for absolution. It was an inventory. A stating of facts to the dark. He had named his crimes: patricide, conspiracy to murder, arson, obsession. He had named his wounds: a murdered mother, a traumatized lover, a soul scoured hollow.

After a long moment, a quiet, aged voice finally came through the lattice. “God forgives the repentant heart, my son. Do you repent?”

Ilya looked down at his clean, trembling hands. He saw the phantom blood. He saw the ghost of the scissors. He thought of the order he had just given to Anatoly.

“No,” he whispered, the word final and absolute. “I do not. I would do it all again. For her. For him. That is my sin, Father. The irredeemable one. I am not sorry.”

The silence from the priest’s side was total. It was the silence of a door closing.

Ilya stood, the wooden bench creaking. He left the confessional without crossing himself, without looking at the icons. He walked back down the silent nave, a shadow dissolving into the greater dark.

Outside, the cold air was a shock. He stood on the steps, looking up at the slice of starless sky between the rooftops. No peace had come. No burden was lifted. He had simply spoken the truth of his damnation into a holy ear and felt nothing. The fortress was complete, and he was its sole, damned occupant.

He got back into the car. “To the airport. Now.”

As the jet climbed over the sleeping city, pushing through the cloud layer into the clear, star-dusted blackness above, Ilya stared out the window. Below him, Russia- a tapestry of old ghosts and fresh graves, receded into the dark. Ahead, across the vast, black Atlantic, was a single point of light. Shane.

He was going home. He was a man who had confessed to murder and felt no remorse. A man who had ordered another. A man who carried the scent of a father's blood under the smell of bleach and jet fuel. He was the monster, fully realized. And his only purpose now was to wrap that monster around his omega so tightly that no other darkness could ever get in. The healing, if it was ever to come, would have to grow around the stone of what he had done. He had survived. Now he had to tell the man he was meant for him and hopefully they could forge ahead. And pray that the love he had once twisted into obsession could somehow withstand the weight of the void he now carried.

Chapter End Notes

Well.

That happened.

I don't even know if I have anything intelligent to say after this chapter other than: poor Shane is about to learn that leaving Ilya unsupervised in Russia was maybe not the best idea.

One thing I really wanted to explore here was the difference between guilt and remorse. Ilya understands what he did was wrong. He understands it damaged him. He understands that a good man probably wouldn't have done it.

The problem is that if given the choice again, he would still choose Shane.

Every single time.

Whether that's love, obsession, devotion, or something much uglier is probably the question hanging over the rest of this story.

💙 What do you think Shane's reaction will be when he learns everything?

Until next time, my lovely enablers. ❤️ We finally get to the part of the story where there's only one or two delicate parts, but the heavy heavy is over.

Chapter 29: Chapter 29

Chapter Summary

Hi hello, welcome back to the chapter where Ilya discovers that crossing continents, confronting generational trauma 🤔, and emotionally combusting does not excuse him from being walked like a dog by Shane. Kinda, maybe.

Also: We love Scott Hunter. Shane has feelings 🥺. Ilya has approximately one functioning brain cell and it is entirely dedicated to Shane Hollander ❤️

Please mind the tags ⚠️, take care of yourselves 🤗, grab a snack and some water 🍪💧, and enjoy the emotional devastation 😭, soft domesticity, and the beginning of what might possibly be a healthier version of them.

Possibly. 😊✨

The jet touched down at YUL with a jolt that felt like the world reasserting itself. The transition from the sealed, silent capsule over the Atlantic to the fluorescent buzz of Terminal 8 was jarring. Ilya moved through customs on autopilot, his documents processed without comment. He was just another tired traveler, albeit one with a hollow stare and the faint, healing scratches on his forearms hidden by his sweater cuffs.

He found a quiet corner near a bank of charging stations, the ambient noise a dull roar of rolling suitcases and fragmented conversations. He stared at his phone, the device a lifeline. He had to know. He dialed Marly.

It picked up on the second ring. “Roz.”

“How is he?” Ilya said, the words clipped.

A sigh came through the line, heavy with a day’s worth of tension. “He’s... he’s holding it together. But just barely. He’s a nervous wreck, Ilya. Pacing. Jumping at every sound from the hall. He won't eat. He just keeps asking the same questions we can't answer. 'What did Ilya get into? Is he safe?'"

Ilya closed his eyes, pressing his thumb and forefinger against the bridge of his nose. He could see it. Shane, in the controlled environment of his own home, his carefully constructed world once again invaded by unknown threats, his routine shattered, his safety contingent on the presence of near-strangers. For a man who needed order, who Ilya had noticed had little quirks when he was around new people, and for whom control was not a preference but a necessity, it would be a special kind of hell.

"Hunter finally got him to drink some tea about an hour ago," Marly continued, his voice dropping. "We had one of those calming pills from his own prescription bottle. It knocked him out. He's asleep on the couch now. Finally."

A sleeping pill. Fuck. Shane, who was so careful about what he put in his body and his mind, had been pushed to the point of needing a drug to calm down. The guilt was like cold, sick tar in Ilya's gut. He had done this. His history, his actions had forced this on the person he was supposed to protect above all else.

"You are both still there?" Ilya asked, his voice tight.

"Yeah. Hunter's making calls, rearranging his schedule with his mate I'm guessing. I'm just... sitting here. Watching him sleep. He looks younger. And scared, even in his sleep." Marly paused. "When are you getting here?"

"A couple hours. I'm waiting for rental car."

"Good. He needs to see you. Even if he's pissed. He needs to see you're in one piece. And I need answers." Another pause, more hesitant. "Rozy... what the hell is going on? You gotta give me some details. Coach is calling like crazy. This feels... dark."

"It is dark," Ilya confirmed, no point in lying to the man guarding his mate's unconscious body. "It is finished now. I've handled everything. Your job is just to be a wall until I get there. Can you do that?"

“Yeah,” Marly said, the word solid. “We’ve got him. Just get here.”

They hung up. Ilya stood motionless for a long minute, the chaos of the airport swirling around his island of static dread. A nervous wreck. A sleeping pill. Was this all he was destined to deliver? He wanted to be better, to be deserving of Shane. He refused to lose him from the choices he had made because he didn’t know how to control himself.

His stomach growled, a blunt, animal reminder. He hadn’t eaten since before the nursing home. The thought of food was repulsive, but the body had its demands. He walked to a generic food court and bought a large black coffee and a dry, oversized pretzel he had no intention of tasting. He sat at a small table, forcing himself to take bites, to swallow. The pretzel was dust and salt. The coffee was disgusting. It was fuel though, nothing more.

Around him, people lived their small, immediate lives- a family argued over gate changes with a clerk, a couple shared headphones, a businessman typed frantically on his cell phone. Their lives were intact, unlike his, and he would not be okay until he had Shane back in his arms.

A text came through with a notification that the car was ready. He disposed of the uneaten food and joined the queue. The process was mindless: scanning his drivers license, murmuring thanks to the attendant, the shuffle down to the garage. He found the car and tossed his bag in the passenger seat and started the GPS.

Ilya pressed his forehead against the cool window for a minute before starting to drive. He wondered if Shane would be happy to see him. He should have called him more while being away.

But what was he bringing home? Not the obsessed controller who had installed cameras. That man had been burned away in the fire that killed Chris Hill. He was bringing home the man forged in the aftermath: the survivor, the hollow man, the patricide. A man who had looked into the abyss of his own capacity for violence and had not looked away. A man who had confessed his sins and felt no remorse. And his only plan was to ask the man he loved- the structured, kind, traumatized omega currently sleeping under a chemical haze- to somehow find a way to exist beside it. To trust that the void would protect him, not consume him.

Their ride through Montreal's midnight streets was a blur of familiar landmarks seen through a pane of smoked glass. Ilya registered none of it. His body was in the backseat, but his mind was trapped in a loop of sterile rooms, blood spray, and the flat, electronic scream of a heart monitor. The only thing pulling him forward was a gravitational tug towards a single address.

He pulled up to Shane's home. Ilya parked and grabbed his bag, getting out and stood on the sidewalk, looking up at the dark windows of the apartment. A single light glowed from the first floor.

He walked up the driveway, eager to just see Shane at the very least, the silence was oppressive. He stood before the door, his fist hovering. He didn't pound. He knocked softly, three times, the sound absurdly polite against the roar of his own heartbeat.

The door opened with swift, controlled movement. Scott Hunter filled the doorway, his expression not surprised, but grimly expectant. He took one look at Ilya's face- pale, hollow-eyed, a walking monument to exhaustion and something darker, and his jaw tightened.

Without a word, Scott stepped out, forcing Ilya back with his presence, and pulled the door shut quietly behind him. They were alone on the small, cold landing, the late-night silence of the building pressing in.

"You look like shit," Scott said, his voice low but razor-sharp. He didn't invite him in. He was blocking the door, an alpha guarding a den. That pissed him off a bit.

"I need to see him," Ilya said, the words scraped raw.

"You need to talk to me first," Scott countered, crossing his arms. His gaze was a physical weight, assessing, distrustful. "What in the actual fuck, Rozanov? I get a call from you, sounding like you're about to lose your shit, begging me to fly across the country to babysit your... your what? Your rival? Your secret pen pal? Shane's been a mess. A terrified, pacing, silent mess. He took a sleeping pill because he couldn't stand being in his own skin. So you're going to stand out here in the cold and you're going to tell me what gives you the right to turn his life inside out like this."

“This is none of your business, old man. I appreciate you coming to help, but I can take it from here.”

“No. you want to get into this house then you tell me what the fuck is going on. That’s my friend in there and he’s just starting to get better so you tell me everything.” The accusation was deserved. It was the voice of reason, of healthy boundaries, of everything Ilya had trampled. He met Scott’s eyes, too tired for deflection, too empty for his usual arrogant mask.

“We’ve been together all this time. That whole rivalry thing is mostly from the league and reporters,” Ilya said, each word deliberate, dragged up from the void inside him. “He is my...” He faltered. No word felt sufficient. Mate was too biological, too possessive. Lover felt too small for the cataclysm of feeling. “We are in a relationship. A private one. It is... complicated. More than complicated.”

Scott’s eyebrows shot up, but the anger didn’t dissipate; it morphed into an assessing, more protective outrage. “A relationship? The kind that requires guards and Shane having his nervous fits? The kind that leaves him needing pills to sleep?”

“The kind,” Ilya forced out, the confession like swallowing glass, “that my family’s poison tried to destroy. There was a threat. From Russia, connected to my father. It was aimed at him to get to me. I went to end it.” The images flashed: the scissors, the blood, the clean-up. He could feel the ghost of the warmth on his hands.

“You ended it,” Scott repeated, his voice dangerously quiet. “How?”

Ilya didn’t flinch. “Permanently.”

A long, heavy silence stretched between them. Scott was no fool. He was an alpha who’d fought his own battles, who lived in a world where threats to an omega could evoke primal responses. He looked at Ilya- really looked at the profound hollows under his eyes, the faint, fresh scratches on his hands going up under sleeves, the utter lack of anything resembling victory in his posture. He saw a man who had walked through fire and carried the ashes in his soul.

“And now?” Scott finally asked, the edge in his voice blunted slightly by a dawning, grim understanding.

“He is my mate, Hunter. In every way that matters. We would be bonded already, if...” He swallowed. “If I had not broken everything first. If he will still have me, after this. After everything.”

The raw, unvarnished truth of it hung in the cold air. This wasn’t a hockey feud or a casual secret. This was a claim, stark and desperate, laid bare to another alpha who understood the importance of it.

Scott studied him for another long moment, his protective stance slowly relaxing from a barricade to a weary acknowledgment. He sighed, the sound thick with resignation. “He’s asleep on the couch. He fought it, but... he couldn’t stay in his own head anymore.” He uncrossed his arms and took a step back, his hand on the doorknob. “Marlow’s been taking turns with me to sit with him. Don’t wake him up. Just... sit. Be there. The explanations you owe him is going to be a hell of a lot longer than this. He has a lot of people who love him, Rozanov. Alpha or not we’ll take him away from you if we see you hurt him.” He opened the door.

The warmth and faint, familiar scent of Shane’s home washed over Ilya, a balm and a brand. He stepped inside, and Scott moved past him, back towards the kitchen, giving a curt nod to Marly who looked up from his phone.

And then Ilya saw him.

Shane was curled on his side on the large sofa, wrapped in a blanket, one hand tucked under his cheek. In sleep, the lines of anxiety were smoothed away, but he didn’t look peaceful. He looked young and utterly depleted, his breathing deep from the medication.

Ilya’s knees nearly buckled. The vast distance between the blood-soaked nursing home in Vyborg and this quiet, vulnerable vision was a chasm his soul couldn’t cross. He was an obscenity in this space of gentle order.

He didn't approach. He stood rooted just inside the doorway, as he had in the hotel room months ago, obeying the silent command to keep his distance. He simply looked, drinking in the proof of Shane's safety, each breath a painful reminder of the cost.

He had survived. He had ensured Shane's survival. But the man asleep on the couch was not healed. He was sedated. And the man standing watch over him was not healing. He was hollowed out, a weapon, unsure if it was still safe to touch.

The door clicked shut behind Scott Hunter, sealing Ilya in the warm, quiet space of Shane's living room. Marly looked up from his phone, his expression shifting from weary vigilance to one of profound relief. He stood, giving Ilya a long, slow once-over, taking in the pallor, the hollow eyes, the way he stood just inside the threshold like a ghost unsure it was permitted to haunt.

"Jesus, Roz," Marly breathed, voice low. He didn't offer a handshake or a clap on the shoulder. The moment felt too fragile for that. "You look like shit."

Ilya didn't answer. His entire focus was across the room. Shane was a curled shape on the sofa, buried under a cream-colored blanket, one hand visible, fingers loosely curled. The soft light from a single lamp painted his profile in gold and shadow. He was so still. The deep, even rhythm of his breath was the only sign of life, the main focus of Ilya's attention.

Marly followed his gaze. "He's out. Has been for a couple hours. Didn't go down easy." He moved to collect his jacket from the back of a chair. "I'm gonna head to my hotel. Get a few hours." He paused next to Ilya on his way to the door. His voice dropped further, a gruff whisper. "You owe me. Big time. And not for the flight. For making me see him like that. Hollander is a good guy. Shitty team, but he plays a clean game and whatever is going on here, he doesn't deserve to go through something like that again. I'll tell coach we spoke. Just let me know how many days you're going to be out for."

Ilya gave a single, stiff nod, his throat too tight for words. You have no idea what I owe, he thought, the debt a mountain inside him. "Thank you, Marly."

"Call if you need anything. Hunter's in the kitchen," Marly said, and then he was gone, the door closing with a soft, final click.

Alone. Ilya didn't move. He stood sentinel, drinking in the sight. This was the reality he had fought for, bled for, damned himself for. Not a concept, not a mission objective. A man. His man, his mate. Sleeping under the chemical veil Ilya's own actions had necessitated. The guilt was a cold, heavy stone in his gut. He wanted to fall to his knees. He wanted to flee. He did neither. He just watched, memorizing the peaceful rise and fall of Shane's chest, a peace he knew was borrowed and fragile.

Minutes bled into one another, marked only by the slow sweep of light from a passing car outside. Then, a shift. A small, muffled sound from the couch. Shane's brows drew together, his head turning restlessly on the cushion. The medication was wearing off, and the real world, the fear, the confusion- was seeping back in at the edges of his subconscious.

His eyes fluttered open, glassy and unfocused. They scanned the dim room, lost, until they landed on the dark figure standing by the door. There was no fear. Just a slow, dawning recognition that bypassed all conscious thought. A soft, wounded noise escaped him - a whimper that was all omega, all need.

"Ilya...?" His voice was slurry with sleep and drugs, barely a whisper.

Before Ilya could answer, could even move, Shane's hand emerged from the blanket, reaching out into the empty space between them. His fingers flexed, grasping at air. It was the most helpless, trusting gesture Ilya had ever seen.

It shattered his paralysis. In three long strides, he crossed the room and sank to his knees beside the couch. He didn't reach to take Shane's hand; he simply presented himself, within reach. "I am here, solnyshko. I am here."

Shane's hand found his sweater, fisting in the fabric with a strength that belied his drowsy state. He tugged, a weak but insistent pull, and Ilya leaned in closer. Shane nuzzled his face into the space between Ilya's jaw and shoulder, a blind, instinctive search for comfort, for scent. A broken, whimpering sigh warmed Ilya's skin.

Then Shane's other hand came up, clumsy and drowsy, patting at Ilya's neck, his collarbone. His fingers, soft and seeking, found the edge of the synthetic scent patch Ilya always wore in public- a bland, neutralizing square that hid the true, storm, leather, pine and winter spice of his alpha signature. In his groggy, vulnerable state, Shane seemed confused by it. He pawed at it, his whimpers growing more distressed. With a drowsy, determined grunt, his nails caught the adhesive edge.

He peeled it off.

The sound of the adhesive releasing was loud in the quiet room. Ilya froze, a jolt of something primal and electric shooting down his spine. He should stop him. This was too much, too intimate, a boundary crossed in a state of altered consciousness. But he was powerless to move.

As soon as the patch was gone, Shane buried his face directly into the exposed skin of Ilya's neck. He inhaled, a deep, shuddering drag of breath that made his whole body go limp with relief. And then it came- a low, thrumming, contented purr that vibrated from Shane's chest into Ilya's own. It was a sound of pure, instinctive omega satisfaction, of homecoming, of comfort. A sound Ilya had craved to hear from him, in their most unguarded moments. It was a gift and devastation.

Tears, hot and sudden, pricked at Ilya's eyes. He swallowed hard against the knot in his throat.

"Okay," Ilya whispered, his voice rough with emotion. "Okay, lyubimyy." Gently, he slid one arm under Shane's knees and the other around his back. He lifted him, blanket and all, as if he weighed nothing. Shane instinctively curled into him, his face still buried in Ilya's neck, his purr a steady, calming engine. Ilya carried him a few steps and settled into the corner of the large sofa, arranging Shane fully in his lap, a precious, warm bundle of trust and need. He wrapped his arms around him, holding him close, his chin resting on top of Shane's head. He closed his eyes, just breathing him in, letting the purr resonate through his own bones, a temporary salve on his fractured soul.

He had never had a partner go into subspace without sex before. He had felt Shane do it several times, but he always stopped it, knowing someone like Shane would have a harder crash, but the biological, omega state of vulnerable surrender- a retreat from overwhelming fear into a primal sense of safety provided by a trusted alpha. Shane's mind was not fully present; it was floating, cushioned by medication and instinct, seeking anchor in Ilya's scent and strength. This time, he let Shane fully go under, wanting to prove to both of them that Ilya could be the proper alpha, that he could provide safety in a normal context.

The kitchen door swung open. Scott Hunter walked in, holding two mugs of tea. He stopped dead at the sight before him: Ilya, eyes closed, holding a purring, pliant Shane possessively in his lap, the discarded scent patch a small, glaring semi transparent square on the carpet.

“What the hell?” Hunter’s voice was sharp, cutting through the tranquil haze. He set the mugs down with a clatter. “Shane? Shane, are you awake?”

Shane stirred at the sound of his friend’s voice, a faint line appearing between his brows. He didn’t open his eyes, just nuzzled deeper into Ilya’s neck, his purr stuttering slightly.

“Hunter,” Ilya warned, the word a low rumble. The alpha in him, the possessive, protective beast, surged at the interruption, at the threat to this fragile peace. A growl built in his chest, visceral and automatic, before he could clamp down on it. He forced it back, taking a sharp, controlling breath. He could not, would not, alpha-posture at the man who had kept Shane safe for these few days. “He is... he is not fully here. The pill. And... this.” He gestured weakly with his chin, indicating Shane’s state.

Hunter approached, his face etched with concern. He crouched in front of the couch but stayed a few feet away, ignoring Ilya to focus on Shane. “Shane? Buddy, can you look at me? Are you okay? Did he do something?” He reached out, as if to touch Shane’s shoulder.

Ilya’s arms tightened infinitesimally, a reflex he couldn’t suppress, but he didn’t otherwise move.

“Scott...?” Shane’s voice was muffled against Ilya’s skin, thick and distant. He blinked slowly, his eyes hazy and unfocused when they finally opened. He looked at Hunter, but his gaze was soft, dreamy, recognition filtered through a dense fog. “S’okay. Alpha’s here.” He said it with the simple, unquestioning certainty of a child stating the sun is up.

Hunter’s eyes snapped to Ilya’s, a storm of conflict in them- protective fury warring with dawning, uncomfortable understanding. He’d heard the purr. He saw the utter, vulnerable trust in Shane's posture. He saw the raw, desperate care in the way Ilya held him, a man holding the only valuable thing left in a ruined world.

"Is he coherent?" Hunter asked tightly, his question aimed at Ilya now, a demand for a status report.

Ilya looked down at Shane, who had closed his eyes again, his breathing deepening back toward sleep, soothed by their voices. He gently shook him. "Shane. Solnyshko. Hunter is asking you a question. Can you answer him?"

Shane made a soft, protesting noise. "Sleepy. 'M safe. You smell... sooo good." His hand fisted loosely again in Ilya's sweater, anchoring himself.

Ilya met Hunter's gaze again, his own eyes bleak. "That is the most coherent he has been. He is in between. Medication is wearing off, but his instincts... they took over." He stated it as a fact, without pride, only a heavy acknowledgment of the biological truth that underpinned their damaged bond. "He needs to sleep it off properly. Here. Where he feels safe."

Hunter stared at them for a long, tense moment. The image was undeniable: the fierce, possessive Russian alpha who had just returned from some unspeakable mission, cradling the vulnerable, trusting omega who was, for all intents and purposes, his mate. It was a picture of profound devotion and profound dysfunction, inextricably linked.

Finally, Hunter let out a long, weary breath. He stood up, running a hand through his hair. "I'll be in the guest room. First door on the left. You... don't move. If that purr stops, if he seems in distress, you come get me. Immediately." It was an order, but also a concession. A reluctant transfer of guard duty.

Ilya nodded. "I will."

Hunter gave Shane one last, worried look, then turned and left the room, leaving the two of them alone in the lamplight.

Ilya rested his head back against the couch, holding Shane close. The purr continued, a fragile vibration against his chest. He was home. He was holding his world. And his world was asleep in his arms, trusting the monster to keep the nightmares at bay. The weight of it, the beauty and the terror, was enough to crush him. He simply held on, listening to the purr, waiting for the dawn, and dreading the moment Shane would wake up and have to look at him with clear, conscious eyes.

The deep, drug-induced sleep had Shane out for hours. Ilya didn't move. He remained anchored to the corner of the sofa, Shane a warm, purring weight in his lap, his own body humming with a fatigue that went beyond the physical. He watched the slow creep of dawn through the blinds, painting grey light across the room. He cataloged every shift of Shane's breathing, every flutter of his eyelids beneath their closed veil.

The purr had softened to a nearly inaudible tremor, a contented idle. Then, it stopped. Shane's breathing hitched, changed rhythm. His brows knitted, and he let out a soft, confused sound as consciousness, full and clear, began to reclaim him.

His eyes opened. They were no longer glassy or distant. They were Shane's eyes- intelligent, observant, a little wary. They focused on Ilya's face, inches from his own, and for a heart-stopping second, there was only blank confusion. Then, memory and recognition flooded in, followed by a wave of pure, unguarded relief that made his features soften.

"You're here," Shane breathed, his voice raspy from sleep and disuse. A tentative hand came up, his fingers brushing against the stubble on Ilya's jaw, as if verifying he was real. "You're really here."

"Da," Ilya whispered, the word thick. "I am here."

The smile that broke across Shane's face was like the sun piercing storm clouds. It was tired, but it was genuine. It held none of the fear or tension from the previous day, only a profound, simple gladness. He didn't ask questions. He didn't demand explanations. In that first, waking moment, he just accepted Ilya's presence as the answer to every unnamed anxiety.

He shifted in Ilya's lap, winding his arms around Ilya's neck, and pulled him down.

The kiss was not gentle. It was a hungry, desperate reclaiming. Shane's mouth was soft and insistent, his tongue seeking entry with a need that spoke of days of fear and separation. Ilya groaned into it, his own control fraying instantly. He kissed him back with equal fervor, one hand tangling in Shane's sleep-mussed hair, the other splayed across his back, holding him impossibly closer. It was heat and salt and the sweet, familiar taste of home. It was an anchor in the roiling sea of his guilt.

For long, blissful minutes, there was only this- the slide of lips, the shared breath, the desperate press of bodies seeking to erase anything and everything that wasn't in their little bubble. Shane made small, needy sounds in the back of his throat, his hips canting up unconsciously, seeking friction. His hands roamed Ilya's back, his shoulders, as if memorizing the terrain of him all over again.

Ilya was losing himself in it. The void inside him yearned for this warmth, this oblivion. To lose himself in Shane's body, to feel wanted and needed in this most basic way, was a temptation so fierce it was agony. His own body responded fiercely, a sharp, aching want that clouded all thought.

But the images surfaced anyway, unbidden. The blood spray on the wall. The scissors. The flatline. The cold order to Anatoly. He saw them superimposed over Shane's trusting, eager face.

With a raw, torn sound, Ilya broke the kiss. He pulled back just enough to rest his forehead against Shane's, his breathing ragged. "Shane... wait. Pozhaluysta. Stop."

Shane blinked, dazed, his lips kiss-swollen and wet. "What's wrong?" he murmured, trying to close the distance again. "I missed you. I need..."

"I know. I missed you too," Ilya said, his voice pained. "I need you more than air. But... you need to know. Before we... you need to know what I did."

The haze of desire in Shane's eyes slowly cleared, replaced by a focused, sober attention. The structured, analytical part of his mind was engaging. He searched Ilya's face, reading the shadows there, the grim set of his mouth. He didn't pull away, but he stilled. "Okay," he said softly. "Tell me."

Ilya didn't move from their embrace. He needed the contact as a lifeline to get through this. He kept his forehead against Shane's, his eyes closed, speaking into the intimate space between them.

"I got a call after our game. A threat came from my father. A man named Vasin owed my father a debt. My father... he saw you as a threat to his control over me. He pointed Vasin at you. As a favor." He felt Shane tense slightly, but he pressed on, the words coming in a low, relentless stream. "I went to Russia to confirm it first, then I went to see my father."

He took a shuddering breath. "He confessed. To killing my mother. Making it look like suicide. He was... proud of it. And he told me what he had done. Pointing Vasin at you." Ilya's arms tightened around Shane. "He would never have stopped. He would have kept trying to erase anything he thought made me weak. And you... solnyshko, you are everything to me. You are not a weakness. You are my only strength. But to him, you were a disease to be cut out."

Shane was silent, listening, his breath warm on Ilya's skin.

"So I took care of it," Ilya whispered, the confession finally laid at Shane's feet. "I made sure he could never threaten you, never even think your name again. The people who wanted to hurt you because of me are gone."

He didn't describe the violence. He didn't mention the blood, the clean-up crew. He didn't describe the cold, clinical phone call to Anatoly. He gave Shane the unvarnished truth of the result, sparing him the grisly mechanics. The guilt was his to carry, not Shane's to imagine.

The silence that followed was profound. Ilya braced himself for recoil. For horror. For the realization to dawn in Shane's eyes that he was holding a murderer.

Instead, Shane let out a long, slow breath. He shifted, not away, but closer, burying his face back into the crook of Ilya's neck, the now-bare skin where his scent bloomed strongest. He nuzzled there, inhaling deeply. Then, his voice muffled against Ilya's skin, soft but clear, he spoke.

"Thank you."

Two words. They shattered Ilya completely.

He pulled back, gripping Shane's shoulders, searching his face with desperate, disbelieving intensity. "What? Shane... lyubimyy... do you understand what I am telling you? I killed him."

Shane met his gaze, his own eyes clear and strangely calm. Ilya could see his mind working, organizing the information he'd just received. He saw through the noise to the core equation. "He killed your mom. He was going to have me killed. He hurt you your whole life." He stated it as a series of facts. "You stopped him. You kept him from hurting anyone ever again. You kept me safe." He reached up and cupped Ilya's cheek, his thumb stroking over the high bone. "You came back to me."

Ilya stared at him, utterly lost. "You are thanking me? For becoming... this?"

"I'm thanking you for choosing me," Shane said simply. "Even when it meant becoming that. I wish it hadn't. I wish... I wish so much it hadn't. But you did it for me." His lower lip trembled, not with fear, but with a surge of emotion. "No one has ever... Ilya, no one has ever fought for me like that. Not ever."

It was an acceptance so absolute, so unconditional, it felt like absolution from the only source that mattered. It didn't erase the sin, but it reframed the sacrifice. Shane wasn't condoning the monster he was, he was acknowledging the love that had created it, and choosing to stand with the man who carried it.

Shane's thumb kept moving against Ilya's cheek, slow and careful, but his expression had changed. The first rush of relief had faded enough for the rest of it to settle in.

“You killed him,” Shane said again.

Ilya’s stomach dropped. He nodded once.

“And Vasin?”

“Gone.”

“Are they both gone?”

“Yes.”

Shane swallowed. His eyes flicked away from Ilya’s face for the first time, drifting toward the pale morning light filtering through the blinds. His mind was working. Ilya could see it happening, could practically hear the pieces clicking into place behind those sharp, intelligent eyes. His father. The threat. Russia. The nursing home. The terrifying emptiness Ilya had carried home with him.

“Does anyone know it was you?” Shane asked.

“Not in a way that can come back to you.”

“That wasn’t what I asked.”

The quiet correction hit harder than anger would have.

Ilya looked down at their joined hands. Shane’s fingers were still threaded through his, still warm, still holding on. “Some people know enough,” he admitted. “People I trust. But no one who will speak. My father had enemies. Vasin had enemies. There will be explanations, stories. There always are.”

Shane’s jaw tightened. “And you?”

“I will be fine.”

“That’s not an answer either.”

Ilya finally looked at him. Shane’s eyes were bright now, not with fear of him, but with something worse. Fear for him.

“I don’t know what happens next,” Ilya said quietly. “I know you are safe. That was all I could think about. It was the only thing that mattered.”

Shane stared at him for a long moment. Then he shifted closer, his knees pressing between Ilya’s thighs, his hand sliding from Ilya’s cheek to the back of his neck.

“I’m not scared of you,” Shane said.

Ilya went still.

“That’s not what I’m trying to figure out.” Shane’s voice wavered just slightly, but he didn’t look away. “I’m trying to figure out how you went there alone. How you did all of that alone. How you came back to me with all of it inside you and thought you had to carry it by yourself.”

The words split something open in Ilya’s chest.

“I did not want you to see me like this.”

“Ilya.” Shane’s fingers tightened at the nape of his neck. “I’ve seen you at your worst. I’ve seen you scared. I’ve seen you cruel. I’ve seen you trying so hard to act like nothing can touch you that you almost destroyed both of us.” His voice softened. “And I still wanted you. I still want you.”

Ilya’s breath caught.

“But I don’t want you to keep deciding that loving me means you have to become something terrible by yourself.” Shane pressed his forehead to Ilya’s. “You don’t get to disappear into your own head and call it protecting me.”

For a moment, Ilya could not speak. He could only close his eyes and breathe in the warm, familiar scent of Shane, letting the words settle somewhere deeper than guilt.

“I do not know how to do this differently,” he admitted.

“Then we figure it out,” Shane whispered. “Together. But you tell me when you’re thinking about something crazy. You call me. You call Marlow. You call Svetlana. You call anyone. You don’t just decide you have to burn the world down alone.”

Ilya’s throat worked painfully. “Okay.”

Shane pulled back just enough to look at him. “Okay?”

“Okay,” Ilya repeated, more firmly this time. “I will try.”

It was not a grand promise. It was not enough to erase anything. But Shane’s face softened anyway, as if he understood that for Ilya, trying was the closest thing to faith he had ever been able to offer.

Overwhelmed, Ilya could only pull him into a crushing embrace, his face buried in Shane’s hair. He didn’t cry, but his entire body shook with the force of the release of emotions.

And then he felt it again. The vibration. Starting deep in Shane’s chest, a low, resonant purr of pure, instinctive contentment and safety. It wasn’t the drowsy purr of subspace. It was a conscious, deliberate offering. A biological affirmation of trust and belonging. Shane curled into him, molding his body to Ilya’s, the purr a steady, physical promise against Ilya’s heart.

In that moment, holding his purring omega who knew the darkest truth of his soul and had chosen to stay, Ilya understood the difference. Obsession demanded control at any cost. Love, true love, was this: presenting your bloodstained hands to the person you adored, and having them not flinch, but hold on tighter. It was the terrifying, beautiful risk of being known, of being seen at his base level, and being chosen anyway.

The purr was still vibrating through Ilya, a tangible thread stitching his shattered pieces back together, when the floorboard in the hall creaked. Scott Hunter stood in the doorway, his expression a careful mask of neutrality that didn't reach his eyes. He'd given them the night, but the morning demanded accountability.

"Shane," Scott said, his voice deliberately calm. "You're awake. How are you feeling?"

Shane, still curled in Ilya's lap but now fully present, turned his head. The simple, trusting contentment on his face softened slightly, his mind visibly shifting gears from the primal to the social. "Better, clearer."

"Good." Scott took a step into the room, his gaze flicking to Ilya, a silent warning to remain still, before settling back on his friend. "We need to talk." He didn't gesture at Ilya; he didn't need to.

Ilya felt Shane's muscles tense, but not with fear. He was mentally categorizing, preparing, what he'd say. Shane sat up a little straighter, though he didn't leave the circle of Ilya's arms. That, in itself, was a statement.

"Uh, we're together?" Shane said, his voice quiet, looking up at Ilya for confirmation. Ilya smiled down at him, briefly wrapping gentle hands around his lower jaw and neck. "We're... together. Yea. We're in a relationship. Have been for a while. It's private. It has to be."

“Is he why you were so messed up for-” Scott trailed off, the unspoken word hanging in the air.

Shane’s nod was a small, definitive movement-cutting Scott off. “Yes. And because of the league. And because of... everything that happened.” He swallowed, his hand finding Ilya’s where it rested on his stomach, threading their fingers together. “It’s complicated, Scott. It’s been messy and hard and really, really fucked up. But it’s real.”

Scott crossed his arms, his protective stance at odds with the reluctant understanding in his eyes. He’d seen them. He’d heard the purr. He couldn’t argue with the biological, emotional truth of it. “Does anyone else know? Hayden? JJ? Your parents?”

“No,” Shane said quickly, a flicker of anxiety breaking through his calm. “Just you and Marlow now. And... please. Please, don’t tell them yet. Not like this. I need to... I need to figure out how to tell them myself. On my terms. When things are calmer.” The plea was raw, born from his deep-seated need for control over his own narrative, especially one involving the most vulnerable part of himself.

Scott studied him for a long moment, then his shoulders slumped in resignation. He was a protector, but he was also a friend who respected autonomy. “Alright. But ‘soon’ isn’t ‘never,’ kid. They love you. They’ll want to know why you’ve been... like this. And they’ll figure out he’s the reason.” He shot another look at Ilya, this one less hostile, more weary. “You’ve got a lot to answer for, to more people than just him.”

“I know,” Ilya said, the first words he’d spoken since Scott entered. They were gravelly, but clear. An acknowledgment of the debt that extended beyond this room.

“I’ll tell them,” Shane promised, squeezing Ilya’s hand. “I will. Before the end of the season. I just need a minute to breathe.”

Scott accepted this with a nod. “I have to get back to New York. Kip’s got a doctor’s appointment.” He walked over, crouching again to be at eye level with Shane. “You call me. For anything. If you need out, if you need help, if you just need someone to sit with you. Understood?”

“Understood. Thank you, Scott. For everything. And I’m sorry I threw a book at you.”

Scott laughed and waved it off. With a final, speaking glance at Ilya- a look that promised retribution if this peace was broken, Scott stood and left. The sound of the front door closing a few minutes later marked a shift in the atmosphere. They were truly alone.

For several seconds, neither of them moved.

The apartment felt different without Scott’s watchful presence in it. Quieter. Softer. Dangerous in a way Ilya had not expected, because there was no longer anyone standing between him and the unbearable fact of Shane’s trust.

Shane was the first to break the silence.

“When did you last eat?”

Ilya blinked. “What?”

“When did you last eat?” Shane repeated, more firmly.

“I had coffee.”

“That is not food.” Shane stared at him.

Ilya looked away. “I tried to eat large pretzel at the airport but it was disgusting.”

The corner of Shane’s mouth twitched despite everything, but the expression disappeared quickly. He stood up from Ilya’s lap, smoothing his hands over his sweatpants as if trying to organize himself through movement. “Sit.”

“Shane-”

“Sit down.”

The quiet authority in his voice stopped Ilya more effectively than any command from a coach, a teammate, or a man twice his age ever could have. Ilya sat back against the couch.

Shane disappeared into the kitchen. Ilya heard cabinets opening, the refrigerator door, the faint clink of a plate against the counter. The sounds were painfully ordinary. Domestic. The kind of sounds Ilya had never imagined belonging to him.

He leaned his head back against the couch cushion and closed his eyes.

A few minutes later, Shane returned carrying a plate with toast, sliced fruit, and a small bowl of yogurt. There was tea in the mug Scott had left behind. Shane set everything down on the coffee table and sat beside him, close enough that their knees touched.

“You need to eat,” Shane said.

“I am not hungry.”

“I don’t care.”

Shane’s cheeks flushed slightly, but he held his ground. “You flew from Russia to New York to Montreal. You haven’t slept. You look like you’re going to fall over if you stand up too quickly. You can’t tell me you came here to protect me and then act like your body doesn’t matter.”

The words landed somewhere tender.

Ilya looked down at the plate. “You are angry?”

“Yes. You need to take care of yourself.”

“But you are feeding me.”

“Yes.” A tiny, reluctant smile touched Shane’s mouth. “Both things can be true.”

Ilya picked up a piece of toast. His hands were steadier than they had been at the airport, but only barely. He took a bite because Shane was watching him, because Shane had made it, because for once in his life he wanted to be someone who could accept care without turning it into a debt.

The toast tasted like nothing at first.

Then Shane’s hand settled gently on his knee.

And suddenly it tasted like warmth.

They ate in silence for a while. Shane nudged the fruit closer whenever Ilya stopped. Ilya did not argue again. When he had finished half the plate, Shane handed him the tea.

They ate in silence for a while.

Or rather, Ilya ate.

Shane sat beside him with his own untouched piece of toast on a small napkin, his tea cooling slowly between both hands. At first, Ilya assumed he had simply made more than he wanted. Then he noticed the way Shane kept breaking the toast into smaller pieces without bringing any of them to his mouth. One piece became two, then four. His fingers moved with absent, precise purpose, arranging the crumbs into a neat little line along the edge of the napkin.

“You are not eating,” Ilya said quietly.

Shane’s hands stilled.

“I’m not hungry.”

“You have not eaten since when?”

Shane looked down at the toast. "I had tea earlier."

"Not enough. Eat with me, please."

A flicker of irritation crossed Shane's face, so quick Ilya might have missed it if he had not been watching him so closely. "Neither was your pretzel, apparently."

Ilya watched him carefully. There was something too deliberate about the way Shane held himself. His shoulders were tight. His jaw was set. He looked exhausted, pale beneath the warm living room light, as if the last several days had hollowed him out from the inside and he had decided that hunger was simply one more sensation he could refuse to acknowledge.

"You need to eat too," Ilya said.

"I will later."

"Shane."

"I said later." The sharpness in his voice hung between them. Immediately, Shane looked away. His fingers curled around the mug, knuckles paling slightly. "Sorry," he murmured. "I just... I don't feel good."

Ilya's anger disappeared as quickly as it had come. He understood that tone. It was not defiance, not really. It was the brittle edge of someone trying to maintain control over the only thing left within reach.

He reached for Shane's hand, stopping just short of touching him. "Can I?"

Shane looked at him, then gave the smallest nod.

Ilya laid his hand over Shane's. Shane's fingers were cold.

"You do not have to eat all of it," Ilya said softly. "One bite. For me."

Shane's eyes flickered. "That's manipulative."

"Yes," Ilya admitted. "But I am very tired and emotionally damaged. You should be gentle with me."

A weak laugh escaped Shane before he could stop it.

Ilya lifted the small piece of toast Shane had broken apart and held it out between them. "One bite, solnyshko."

For a long moment, Shane stared at it.

Then, with visible reluctance, he took it from Ilya's fingers and put it in his mouth. He chewed slowly, like the act required more effort than it should have. When he swallowed, his throat worked hard.

“There,” Ilya murmured. “Good boy.”

Shane’s cheeks flushed at the praise. “Don’t make it weird.”

“I make everything sound like sex. Is my gift.”

That earned him another tiny smile.

But Shane pushed the rest of the toast away after that, folding the napkin carefully over the crumbs as if closing the subject. Ilya did not press him again. Not now. He had already learned what happened when he mistook control for care.

Instead, he kept his hand over Shane’s and finished the rest of his own food.

Later, he would remember the untouched toast. The tea gone cold. The way Shane had looked almost relieved when the plate was moved out of reach.

But in that moment, Ilya only thought Shane was tired.

Ilya looked at him over the rim of the mug. “You are very bossy when you are frightened.”

Shane’s eyes dropped to his own hands. “I know.”

“You should be.”

That made Shane look up.

Ilya reached out slowly, giving him time to pull away, and brushed his thumb across the back of Shane’s hand. “You should tell me what to do sometimes.”

The vulnerability in Shane’s expression nearly undid him.

“I don’t want to control you,” Shane said quietly.

“I know.” Ilya’s voice was rough. “That is why it would be different.”

Shane turned his hand over beneath Ilya’s, lacing their fingers together. “Then eat the rest.”

Ilya obeyed.

Shane let out a long breath, the remaining tension leaving his body. He leaned back against Ilya, but his mind was already ticking forward to the next necessary task. He reached for his phone on the coffee table, his movements regaining their typical, efficient precision.

“Hey, Coach? Yeah, it’s Shane.” He listened, his free hand rubbing Ilya’s thumb absentmindedly before he stood and started pacing. “I know, I know. I’m sorry. It’s... my shoulder’s just really barking today. The flight aggravated it. I think if I could just have today to rest it, get some treatment, I’ll be good for the road trip.” He paused, listening, his expression one of focus. “Yeah, of course. I’ll be on the plane tomorrow afternoon. I promise. Thanks, Coach.”

He ended the call and set the phone down, a faint blush coloring his cheeks as he turned shyly to look at Ilya. “I got today. We have today. I have to be on the plane to Seattle tomorrow by three.”

The gift of time. A stolen, fragile day for just the two of them. Ilya absorbed the information, but one part of Shane’s performance snagged in his mind, sharp and sudden.

Slowly, deliberately, Ilya stood. In one fluid motion, he managed to reach Shane. Shane looked up at him, questioning, but Ilya didn’t speak. He simply reached down, took Shane’s waist in his hand. Then he guided him back, step by step, until Shane’s shoulders met the wall beside the windows.

Ilya caged him there, one hand planted flat on the wall by Shane’s head, the other curling possessively around his hip. He leaned in, his body a line of heat and intent, his eyes searching Shane’s face.

“So,” Ilya said, his voice a low, alpha rumble that vibrated in the small space between them. “You told your coach you are hurt to spend more time with me?”

It wasn’t a question about the lie. It was a question about the truth he’d woven into it. The vulnerability he’d invoked.

Shane held his gaze, the shyness still there but met with a growing steadiness. He gave a single, small nod. “It’s the only thing they’d accept without sending a team doctor. A sore ‘beta’ shoulder gets a tape job and a ‘suck it up.’ It’s a card. I had to play it. They keep saying they need me for the playoffs.”

The wave of feeling that crashed over Ilya was too vast to name- protectiveness, awe, a devastating sense of unworthiness, and a fierce, blazing pride. This brilliant, resilient man was choosing him, strategizing for him, risking for him.

Ilya didn't have words for it. So he showed him.

He bent his head and captured Shane's mouth in a kiss that was nothing like the desperate, hungry reunion from before. This was deep, claiming, and unbearably tender. It was a vow sealed in the warmth of shared breath. He poured everything into it- the gratitude, the devotion, the terrifying, all-consuming love that had driven him to murder and now held him, gentle, against this wall.

Shane melted into it, his hands coming up to clutch at Ilya's sweater, a soft sound of surrender and welcome humming in his throat. For a long while, there was only this: the slow, exploring kiss, the press of bodies, the silent communication that bypassed the need for apologies or explanations. They had today. However they had gotten it, whatever it cost, they had this one, stolen day to just be. To remember what they were fighting for, in the quiet, before the world demanded them back.

The kiss was a deep, searching thing, a silent conversation that spoke of fear dispelled and a terrible, hard-won peace. Ilya poured every ounce of the devotion that had driven him to monstrous acts into the gentle slide of his tongue, the careful nip of his teeth. Shane answered with a soft, eager noise, his hands fisting in Ilya's sweater, curling around his hair, grabbing his arms - anywhere he could reach, pulling him closer until not a sliver of light could pass between them.

But then, with a sudden, firm pressure of his palms against Ilya's chest, Shane broke the kiss. His eyes were dark, intent, and filled with a quiet, determined fire Ilya hadn't seen directed at him. Not since before the surveillance, before the collapse of their relationship the first time.

Without a word, Shane pushed.

It wasn't a violent shove. It was a guided, insistent pressure. Ilya, so much larger and stronger, allowed himself to be moved, his boots shuffling backward on the rug, his gaze locked on Shane's face. Step by step, Shane walked him backward until the backs of his knees hit the low edge of the coffee table. He stumbled, off-balance, and sank down onto the soft cushions of the sofa.

Shane followed him down, not into his lap this time, but settling on his knees on the floor between Ilya's spread legs. The morning light from the window haloed his messy dark hair, lit the fierce, focused expression on his face. He placed his hands on Ilya's thighs, his touch firm, anchoring.

"Shane," Ilya breathed, a warning and a plea tangled together. His heart was a frantic drum against his ribs. This was too much, too fast. He still felt dirty, as if his sins were a solid film on his skin, and this- this pure, intimate offering felt like a sacrilege.

"Shhh," Shane murmured, his thumbs rubbing slow circles on the denim. His gaze was unwavering. "My turn. Let me."

It wasn't a question. It was a reclamation. For months, their dynamic had been defined by Ilya's taking, his controlling, his obsessive need. Even the rescue had been a violent, overwhelming act of possession. When they reunited, Ilya had pushed for Shane to be more vocal, a more active participant to where he'd like their intimacy to lead to. Shane usually shyed away from fully taking the lead. This, Shane was saying, was different. This was a gift, given freely. A choice.

He held Ilya's gaze as his hands went to the buckle of his belt. The click of the release was loud in the quiet room. The rasp of the zipper followed. Ilya could only watch, mesmerized, as Shane carefully drew him out. He was already fully hard, aching, the reality of Shane's touch after so much deprivation and horror making him dizzy.

Shane didn't hesitate. He leaned forward, and his mouth, that clever, stubborn, beautiful mouth, was on him.

The heat was an electric shock that tore a ragged groan from Ilya's throat. His head fell back against the couch, his hands gripping the cushions so hard the fabric threatened to tear. It was wet, and perfect, and so devastatingly enthusiastic it made his eyes burn. Shane took him deep, his throat working, then pulled back to lavish attention on the head with soft, sucking kisses and flicks of his tongue. He was methodical, attentive, learning what made Ilya's hips jerk and what drew broken curses from his lips.

"Bozhe moy...Shane... solnyshko..." Ilya panted, the words torn to shreds. He was unraveling at an alarming speed. The stress, the fear, the soul-deep exhaustion, the overwhelming relief of being here, his mate safe, with Shane's mouth on him- it was too much. The coil in his gut tightened with a swift, brutal urgency. He was going to come. Already. It was embarrassing, pathetic.

A soft, humming sound vibrated through him. Shane's purr. He'd started purring again, the sensation buzzing against Ilya's most sensitive skin. When he opened his eyes and looked down at Shane, his usually awkward shy Omega was looking right at him. The pride in it was unmistakable. See? See what I can do to you? It was a gentle taunt, a reclaiming of power that was also an act of profound love.

"Shane, I-ya ne mogu -I can't-" Ilya gasped, his body bowing off the couch.

He knew he was seconds away. He wanted to open his mouth and warn Shane but no sound other than a grunt came out. Coming in his mouth, without warning, forcing him to swallow... it felt like another violation. Another act of taking without consent, however small. With a Herculean effort that felt like tearing his own spine out, Ilya fumbled a hand down, his fingers tangling in Shane's hair. Not to push him deeper, but to pull him gently, insistently, off.

Shane resisted for a second, a muffled sound of protest around him, before relenting. He pulled back, his lips wet and swollen, confusion and a flicker of hurt in his dazed eyes. "Ilya? What's-"

"I am sorry, I am too close," Ilya choked out, his voice wrecked. "I do not want to... not in your mouth, not like that. Not without you..."

It was too late for elegant explanations. The pressure was a tsunami. Wrapping his own hand around his slick length, he gave two, three rough, frantic strokes before his orgasm ripped through him with a force that stole his vision. A raw, guttural cry was torn from his throat as he came, stripes of white painting his own stomach and the dark fabric of his sweater, his body convulsing with the intensity of it.

For a moment, there was only the sound of his own ragged breathing, the pounding of his heart. Shame and overwhelming sensitivity washed over him. He'd lost control. He'd stopped Shane. He'd made a mess.

He blinked his eyes open, expecting to see withdrawal, or at least confusion.

Instead, Shane was watching him, his gaze soft and impossibly fond. A small, smug smile played on his kiss-reddened lips. Then, without a hint of hesitation, he leaned forward again.

Ilya flinched, a weak protest on his lips, but Shane ignored it. He didn't go for Ilya's spent cock. He dipped his head and swiped his tongue, broad and deliberate, through the mess on Ilya's lower abdomen. He licked a stripe up through the cum cooling on the sweater, then carefully cleaned the head of Ilya's cock with a few soft, kittenish laps that made Ilya jolt with oversensitivity.

When he sat back, he licked his lips, the pout from a moment before entirely gone, replaced by a look of serene, possessive satisfaction. "I wouldn't have minded," he said quietly, his voice husky. "But thank you. For thinking of it."

He rested his cheek on Ilya's thigh, his purr restarting, a low, contented rumble. Ilya, utterly spent and emotionally flayed, could only let one trembling hand fall to rest in Shane's hair, his thumb stroking the soft strands. The monster was sated, cherished, and meticulously cleaned up after by the only person who wasn't afraid of his mess. The devotion, he realized with a sinking, awe-filled heart, wasn't just his to give anymore. It was being given back to him, in ways he was only beginning to understand.

Shane's quiet, purring contentment against his thigh was a fragile, perfect thing. Ilya let his hand rest in Shane's hair, the tremors of his own release still echoing in his bones, basking in the simple, shocking reality of being tended to. Of being wanted, even in his messy, post-coital state.

After a long moment, Shane lifted his head. His eyes were clear, the last vestiges of drowsy subspace gone, replaced by a purposeful calm. He stood up, his movements fluid, and extended a hand down to Ilya.

"Come on," he said, his voice soft but firm.

Ilya took his hand, allowing Shane to pull him to his feet. He expected to be led to the shower. Instead, Shane turned towards the hallway, tugging him gently along. Towards the bedroom.

A fresh, different kind of tension coiled in Ilya's gut. This was new territory. After the surveillance, the violation of privacy, Shane's bedroom had become a symbol of the ultimate boundary Ilya had shattered. He had watched him sleep through a camera lens. He didn't deserve to cross that threshold.

But Shane was leading him, his grip sure. He pushed the door open and pulled Ilya inside, then released his hand. He pointed to a spot by the wall, near the door. "Stay there," he instructed, not unkindly, but with the focused authority of a man on a mission.

Ilya obeyed, leaning his shoulders against the wall, folding his arms. He watched, utterly captivated, as Shane turned to face the bed.

What followed was a methodical, mesmerizing ritual. Shane stripped the neatly made bed with efficient tugs, letting the duvet and sheets pool on the floor. From the closet, he pulled out extra blankets- a soft grey fleece, a thick, nubby knit in cream. From a drawer, he retrieved several items of clothing Ilya recognized with a jolt: the dark hoodie from Boston Shane had kept, a t-shirt Ilya had left behind months ago, a pair of sweatpants that smelled faintly of Ilya's detergent.

His heart clenched. Shane had kept them. Not hidden away, but close.

Shane began to build. He spread the largest blanket as a base, then layered the sheets and other blankets, not haphazardly, but with deliberate criss-crossing and tucking, creating a deep, padded basin in the center of the mattress. His brow was furrowed in concentration, his movements precise. He would smooth a section, then pause, his head tilting as he assessed it, before adjusting a fold by a mere inch or two.

Then, with a care that bordered on reverence, he began weaving Ilya's clothes into the fabric of the nest. The hoodie was arranged so the sleeve curled around a pillow. The t-shirt was tucked along one side, its collar peeking out. The sweatpants were folded into a soft lump at the foot. Each piece was placed, considered, and sometimes minutely repositioned until it satisfied some internal, critical schema.

Ilya watched him place the dark hoodie beside the pillow, the sleeve curled inward as if it had been waiting for someone to tuck themselves against it. Then Shane picked up the old t-shirt, holding it for a second too long before pressing it carefully into the blankets.

“You kept them,” Ilya said softly.

Shane froze.

The flush that had been creeping up the back of his neck deepened. He did not turn around. “I was going to throw them out.”

Ilya said nothing.

“After that time,” Shane continued, his voice quieter now. “After I found out about the cameras. After everything.” His fingers worried at the hem of the shirt. “I took all of it out of the closet. I put it in a garbage bag. I thought if I got rid of anything that smelled like you, maybe I would stop looking for you everywhere.”

Ilya’s chest tightened so sharply it almost hurt to breathe.

Shane gave a small, humorless laugh. “I couldn’t do it.”

He finally turned around, but his eyes stayed fixed on the nest instead of Ilya.

“I could still smell you in hotels. In airports. On my own clothes sometimes, even when I knew it wasn’t really there.” His voice wavered. “And I hated that I missed you. I hated that I was angry at you and scared of you and still wanted you anyway.”

Ilya’s throat closed.

“So I kept them,” Shane admitted. “Not because I forgave you. Not then. I just...” He swallowed. “I didn’t know how to make myself stop.”

The room was silent except for the faint hum of the city outside.

Ilya pushed away from the wall, then stopped himself before he crossed the room. Every instinct in him wanted to take Shane into his arms, to apologize until there was nothing left of him. But this was Shane’s space, Shane’s time to express himself. He would not invade it.

“You do not have to explain missing me,” Ilya said finally, his voice low. “I understand.”

Shane looked up at him then. His eyes were bright, but steady.

“I’m not explaining it because I’m ashamed,” he said. “I’m telling you because I want you to understand what this is.”

He gestured to the nest. To the blankets. To the pieces of Ilya woven into the careful structure of safety.

“This isn’t me forgetting,” Shane whispered. “It isn’t me pretending you didn’t hurt me.”

Ilya's heart beat once, hard and painful.

"It's me choosing you anyway," Shane said. "But differently this time." It was a choice made with open eyes.

Ilya stood completely still, afraid that if he moved, the fragile moment would break. Shane turned back to the nest, smoothing one last wrinkle from the grey blanket. "I need things to feel safe," he said, almost defensively. "I need them to be where they're supposed to be. I need to know what happens next."

"I know," Ilya said.

"And I need you to ask before you take."

The words were quiet, but they struck with the force of a blade.

Ilya lowered his head. "I will."

Shane looked over his shoulder at him. "You promise?"

Ilya met his gaze. "I promise."

Only then did Shane pick up Ilya's sweater from where it had been discarded and carry it to the center of the nest.

Ilya couldn't help the grin that spread across his face. It was a helpless, awed thing. This was Shane's mind made physical. His need for order, for safety, for control- so brutally stolen from him by Ilya's past and Ilya's own actions, being rebuilt here, in this quiet room. And he was building it around Ilya's scent, incorporating the remnants of him into a structure of security. It was the most profound act of trust Ilya had ever witnessed.

A faint, pink flush colored the back of Shane's neck as he worked, as if he could feel Ilya's gaze tracing his every move. Finally, he stepped back, surveying his work. His shoulders relaxed, a small, satisfied sigh escaping him. The nest was perfect.

He turned then, and his eyes met Ilya's. The flush was on his cheeks now, too, a mixture of shyness and defiant pride. He walked over to where Ilya stood by the wall. Without breaking eye contact, he reached for the hem of Ilya's soiled sweater.

"Lift your arms," Shane murmured.

Ilya complied, his breath catching as Shane pulled the sweater up and over his head, leaving him bare-chested. Shane didn't linger. He turned, carrying the sweater- still marked with the evidence of their earlier intimacy, back to the nest. He didn't treat it as something soiled; he treated it as a vital, final component. He folded it carefully and placed it right in the center, where a pillow would normally go.

Then, at last, he climbed into the nest. He moved within it, shifting, settling, until he was reclined in the center, surrounded and cushioned by the blended fabrics of their lives. He looked utterly at home. Utterly safe.

He turned onto his side and looked at Ilya, still standing by the wall. His expression was open, hopeful, and fiercely vulnerable. He held out his hand in invitation.

For a moment, Ilya was paralyzed. The ghost of the man he had been, the one who would have taken this as a right, who would have swaggered in and claimed it as his due rose up in shame. But that man was gone, burned away. The man who remained knew the priceless value of this offering.

He pushed away from the wall. He crossed the room, his bare feet silent on the floor. He didn't climb in with alpha possessiveness. He approached the nest as he would a sacred space, which it was. At the edge, he paused, meeting Shane's gaze, asking for final permission.

Shane's fingers flexed, beckoning.

Ilya carefully lowered himself into the nest. It was astonishingly soft, enveloping. The scents were overwhelming- clean cotton, Shane's sweet omega signature, and everywhere, his own. It was like being held inside their combined essence. He settled on his side, facing Shane, their bodies not quite touching, separated by a breath of air.

Shane watched him, his eyes scanning Ilya's face in the dim room light. Then, with a final, soft sigh of completion, he closed the last inch between them, curling his body into Ilya's, tucking his head under Ilya's chin. He fit perfectly, as if the nest had been engineered to bring them to this exact point of connection.

Ilya wrapped his arms around him, holding the most precious, meticulously crafted thing he would ever be allowed to touch. Here, in the sanctuary built by Shane's own hands and mind, the void inside Ilya didn't feel so hollow. It felt... quiet. Waiting. For the first time since the nursing home, since the confession, since the blood, he felt not like a monster in hiding, but like a man being carefully, deliberately, pulled in from the cold.

For a while, neither of them spoke.

Shane lay tucked beneath Ilya's chin, one arm draped across his waist, his fingers lazily tracing the bare skin of Ilya's stomach. The nest held them close on every side, soft blankets and old clothes creating a small, warm pocket of safety in the middle of a world that had never seemed interested in letting them keep it.

Ilya listened to Shane breathe.

He wanted to stay exactly like this forever. He wanted to lock the bedroom door, turn off both of their phones, and let the league, the reporters, the coaches, Russia, Montreal, Boston, all of it, disappear outside the walls of this apartment.

But Shane was already thinking.

Ilya could feel it in the subtle shift of his body. The way his fingers stopped moving. The faint tension returning to his shoulders. Shane's mind was never still for long. It organized. It planned. It found the next problem and began building walls around it.

"Where do you play next?" Shane asked quietly.

Ilya's chest tightened.

"Not sure," he said. "But I will not be playing."

Shane tipped his head back enough to look at him. "Because of your dad?"

"Yes."

The word sat between them, strange and heavy. His father was dead. The sentence should have felt impossible. Instead, it felt like the quiet after a gunshot. Final, empty.

Ilya reached blindly for his phone on the nightstand. The screen lit up with a flood of missed calls and messages: his manager, his agent, teammates, people who had no idea what had happened and people who knew too much. He stared at the name of his manager for a moment before opening the thread.

His fingers hovered over the keyboard.

My father passed away. I will need a few days away from the team. Please make the appropriate announcement. I do not want calls from media.

He read it twice.

There was no grief in the words. No lie, exactly. His father had died. Ilya simply could not make himself add the language everyone expected. Devastated. Heartbroken. Asking for privacy during this difficult time.

He sent it anyway.

The message disappeared into the thread.

Shane watched him carefully. “Are you okay?”

Ilya gave a humorless little laugh. “No.”

Shane’s expression softened.

“But I will be,” Ilya added. “Eventually.”

Shane reached up, brushing his fingers over Ilya’s cheek. “You don’t have to be okay right now.”

Ilya turned his face into Shane’s palm and closed his eyes for one brief second.

Then Shane reached for his own phone.

The shift in mood was immediate. Necessary. Cruel.

“I have Seattle,” Shane said, scrolling through his calendar. “Then two days back in Montreal. Then we’re in Florida for three games.”

Ilya opened his eyes. “Florida.”

Shane nodded. “The second game is in Tampa. I have a sponsorship thing the morning after. It’s stupid. Some hockey equipment campaign. They already booked it months ago.”

“I can come.”

Shane looked at him.

“I can fly in for the day,” Ilya said, already doing the math in his head. “I will be in Florida. You finish your stupid sponsorship thing. Then I see you.”

A small smile pulled at Shane’s mouth. “You’d fly all the way to Florida for one day?”

“For six hours if that is all you give me.”

The smile faded into something softer. More vulnerable. “It might only be six hours.”

“Then I will take six hours.”

Shane looked back down at his phone. His thumb moved across the screen as he checked the next few weeks, comparing dates with the kind of precision that made Ilya ache. They were not planning a vacation. They were trying to find scraps of time between games, flights, practices, sponsor obligations, media appearances, and the possibility of playoffs.

“After Florida,” Shane said slowly, “we both have games for almost three weeks.”

“Toronto,” Ilya said, remembering. “You play there.”

“Yeah. We have one night between games.” Shane glanced at him. “You could come in after your game. I could meet you at the hotel.”

Ilya nodded, though something sour twisted in his stomach. One day in Florida. One night in Toronto. Then nothing.

“And after that?” he asked.

Shane’s fingers stopped moving.

“After that...” He swallowed. “It depends on playoffs.”

The words hung in the nest like a storm cloud.

Ilya hated them.

He hated the playoffs. He hated the league. He hated every person who would look at Shane in a locker room, on a plane, in a hotel hallway, and get more of him than Ilya did. He hated the thought of weeks stretching between them again, of waking up in Boston with Shane’s scent fading from his clothes and no certainty of when he would be able to touch him next.

The old instinct rose fast and sharp.

Tell him to skip it. Tell him to fake another injury. Tell him to come with you. Tell him that none of it matters compared to this.

Ilya swallowed it down.

Shane had already lied to his coach for him. He had already made himself vulnerable, already offered Ilya a place in his nest and a place in his life after seeing the worst of him. Ilya would not ask him for more sacrifices just because he was afraid of being alone.

Not now.

“Then we wait,” Ilya said.

Shane looked at him, surprise flickering across his face.

Ilya forced himself to keep his voice even. “You have your team. Your playoffs. Your career. I will not ask you to choose between them and me.”

“Ilya-”

“I mean it.” He tightened his arms around Shane, not enough to trap him, only enough to feel him there. “I do not like it. I hate it. But I will not make you smaller so I can feel less lonely.”

The silence that followed was different from the others. It was not heavy with fear. It was heavy with the fragile, unfamiliar shape of trust.

Shane’s eyes filled, though he blinked quickly as if annoyed by it.

“You really mean that?” he whispered.

Ilya kissed his forehead. “I am trying to become someone who does.”

Shane’s breath caught.

Then he shifted closer, pressing every inch of himself against Ilya’s body, as if he could make up for the coming distance now. “Florida,” he murmured. “Then Toronto.”

“Florida,” Ilya agreed. “Then Toronto.”

“And after that...”

“We will see.”

Shane nodded against his chest.

It was not enough. It would never be enough.

But it was real.

Ilya set both phones facedown on the nightstand, shutting out the schedules and the messages and the world waiting to take them apart again. Then he pulled Shane closer inside the nest, burying his face in the soft dark hair at the crown of Shane’s head.

For today, he had him.

For today, Shane was safe.

For today, Ilya did not ask for more than Shane was willing to give.

And for a man who had spent his whole life taking whatever he wanted before someone else could take it from him, that restraint felt almost like love.

Chapter End Notes

Well. They finally got a little bit of peace. 🥰💛

Not peace peace, because these two are incapable of doing anything normally 🙄, but they got a nest, some purring, a hard conversation 💔, and a very reluctant attempt at boundaries. Progress is progress. 😭✨

Ilya is learning that loving Shane cannot mean making every decision for him. Shane is learning that being loved does not have to mean being controlled. Neither of them has this figured out yet, but they are trying—and for these two, that is huge. 🧡

Also, I am deeply sorry about the schedule discussion at the end 😭 Hockey is cruel, long distance is cruel, playoffs are cruel, and apparently I enjoy making them count down weeks until they can touch each other again. 💔

Tell me your favorite moment! 👁️ Scott threatening Ilya? 😞 Shane making Ilya eat? 🍞 The nest? Shane choosing him with open eyes? 🙄 Or Ilya trying very hard not to ask Shane to sacrifice more for him? 😭

And as always: thank you for every comment, scream, keyboard smash, theory, and emotional support message 😭💬🧡 You make writing these chapters so much more fun, and I genuinely love seeing what moments y'all like. 🧡✨

Chapter Summary

Okayyyyyyy, I have seen the comments. I have seen the theories. I have seen several of you staring directly at Shane's stomach like you're about to request an ultrasound. 😭

All I will say is that Shane has been having some very big feelings lately, Ilya has approximately zero chill, and perhaps they should both be banned from making life-altering decisions while emotional, exhausted, and within ten feet of a hotel bed.

Enjoy the All-Star chaos. And maybe keep an eye on Ilya. He is having a normal one. Probably.

Thank you to my Beta reader who convinced me that sex is good to keep in this, and that its part of the plot. Thank you to my assistant at work that helped me with this while we were supposed to be busy during actual work and to my boss who lets me do whatever I want

The first thing Shane became aware of was warmth. A deep, solid, radiating warmth along his back, and the heavy, comforting weight of an arm draped over his waist. Then, scent - real, unfiltered alpha scent, pine and leather, woven into the very fabric of the nest around him and emanating from the skin pressed against his. It was safety. It was home.

He blinked slowly awake in the grey pre-dawn light, his mind still soft and pliable from sleep. Ilya was a solid wall of heat behind him, his breathing deep and even against the nape of Shane's neck. One of Ilya's hands was splayed possessively over his lower stomach, the other pillowed under Shane's own head, there legs were interlocked below the soft sheets. Every point of contact was a live wire of quiet, sleepy pleasure.

Shane shifted minutely, a soft sigh escaping him as he pressed back into that warmth. The movement stirred Ilya from sleep. A low, sleepy rumble vibrated through Shane's spine, and the arm around his waist tightened, pulling him even closer. Ilya nuzzled into the junction of his shoulder and neck, his lips and stubble a delicious scratch against sensitive skin. No words. Just a deep, instinctive sound of contentment.

This was different. In the past, their morning couplings had often been desperate, hungry things- a frantic reclamation after time apart, or a tense prelude to another separation. This was slow, syrupy. They had nowhere to be. The world outside the nest was muted, held at bay for at least the next few hours.

Ilya's hand on his stomach began to move, a slow, sweeping caress from his navel down to the waistband of his soft sleep pants, and back up. His other hand came up to gently tilt Shane's head, giving him better access to his throat. Ilya kissed the line of his jaw, his temple, his cheekbone, each press of his lips reverent and unhurried. Shane melted into it, turning in the circle of his arms until they were face to face, noses brushing, sharing the same sleep-warm air.

The kiss that followed was just as slow. A lazy exploration. Ilya tasted of sleep and something uniquely, fundamentally him. Shane parted his lips on a soft sigh, and Ilya's tongue slid in to meet his, a languid dance that had no goal but this closeness. Shane's hands came up to cradle Ilya's face, his thumbs stroking over the sharp planes of his cheekbones, feeling the faint scratch of stubble.

The heat between them built not in a sudden flash, but like the sun gradually heating a room. Ilya rolled them gently, coming to rest over Shane, his weight a perfect, grounding pressure. He kissed a path down Shane's throat, over his collarbone, pushing the soft cotton of his t-shirt aside with his nose and mouth to lavish attention on a nipple. Shane arched off the nest of blankets with a breathy gasp, his fingers tangling in Ilya's sleep-mussed hair.

Everything was hazy and perfect. The slide of skin on skin as their remaining clothes were pushed out of the way was electric. Ilya's touch was everywhere, mapping him with a devotion that made Shane's chest ache. He was floating in a sea of sensation, anchored only by Ilya's body and scent.

Then Ilya shifted. He reached over the side of the nest, his hand fumbling for the small drawer in the bedside table.

The sound of the drawer opening was like a crack in the perfect, sleepy silence. Shane's heart, which had been beating a slow, contented rhythm, gave a hard, unhappy thud. He knew what was in that drawer. The small, foil-wrapped squares. Ilya's hand emerged, one of them held between his fingers.

A cold little knot formed in the pit of Shane's stomach, so at odds with the warmth everywhere else. He watched, his pleasure momentarily suspended, as Ilya tore the packet open with his teeth. The sound was obscenely loud. Ilya's movements were careful, deliberate, as he sheathed himself.

It was an act of consideration. Of responsibility. Ilya was being good. He was following the rules they'd implicitly set, protecting Shane from consequences neither of them were ready for. Shane knew this. Logically, he appreciated it. His omega suppressants were highly effective, but they weren't infallible, and the risk, to his career, to their chaotic lives- was monumental.

But in the secret, yearning core of his very soul, the part that was still floating in that hazy, primal space, he hated it. He hated the barrier. He hated the faint, clinical smell of the latex that cut through their mingled scents. He hated the reminder that even here, in their most private sanctuary, the outside world and its dangers had to be managed.

In the past, in the feverish, obsessive height of their early relationship, Ilya had sometimes forgotten. In his single-minded focus on possession, on claiming, the condom had been an afterthought, skipped in his urgency. And a treacherous, secret part of Shane had... hoped. Had felt a dark, thrilling spike of something like victory when Ilya, lost in him, had neglected that final step. It was wrong. It was reckless. But it had felt like the most profound intimacy imaginable.

Now, Ilya never forgot. This new, careful, post-therapy Ilya was meticulously responsible. And Shane missed the recklessness. He missed the feeling of Ilya being so overcome with wanting him that every other consideration burned away.

He didn't know how to say it. The words stuck in his throat, tangled up with fear and shame. You don't have to. I'm safe. I want to feel you. Just you. It felt too vulnerable, too much like asking for a vulnerability he wasn't sure he had the right to request. What if Ilya said no? What if he looked at him with that new, careful rationality and explained all the reasons it was a bad idea? The rejection would shatter this fragile morning peace.

So he said nothing. As Ilya moved over him again, his body now sheathed in that hated barrier, Shane wrapped his legs around his waist and pulled him down into a desperate kiss, trying to recapture the perfect, unthinking haze of before. He poured all his wordless frustration and longing into it, arching up to meet him as Ilya finally, slowly, pushed inside.

It was still good. It was Ilya, his alpha, moving in him with a tenderness that was almost worse than the old roughness. But in the secret part of his heart, Shane mourned the loss of that raw, unfiltered connection. He turned his face into the pillow as the pleasure built, not just to muffle his sounds, but to hide the conflicted, yearning expression he couldn't school from his face. He came with Ilya's name a choked sob on his lips, his body clenching around the barrier, wishing with a fierce, silent ache that it wasn't there at all.

The stolen day bled away in a haze of quiet intimacy. They didn't leave the nest. They talked, in hushed, fragmented sentences. They slept again, now naked and tangled together. They kissed, slowly, with a tenderness that felt like a new language they were both clumsily learning. Ilya cataloged every second, storing it against the coming deprivation.

The afternoon arrived with the cruel clarity of alarm clocks. Shane had a 3 PM flight to catch for the West Coast road trip. The process of disentangling from the nest felt like a physical amputation.

Ilya moved first, driven by a need to be useful. He made coffee, and while Shane showered, he placed a call to the private chef he'd retained for Shane months ago - a discreet, talented beta named Laurent who handled meal prep for several professional athletes in the city.

"Laurent, it's Ilya. He leaves today for the road. The usual travel packs, please. High protein, complex carbs. But listen," Ilya's voice lowered, his gaze fixed on the closed bathroom door. "The last delivery report. You noted the chicken and rice portions were only half-eaten. The vegetable portions untouched. Is this pattern?"

A pause on the line. "It's been... yes, Mr. Rozanov. Over the last few weeks, since the, uh, increased stress, I'd say. Caloric intake is down about thirty percent from his baseline. He's picking at it. Very restrictive. It's not a macro shift; it's avoidance."

A cold knot formed in Ilya's stomach. Stress manifesting as control over the one thing Shane could always control: his diet. His fuel. His performance. "Can you make adjustments?"

Smaller, more frequent packs. More of the foods he gravitates to when he's calm. The mango slices he said were good. The almond butter added to some food. Do not make it a thing he has to think about."

"Understood."

He hung up as Shane emerged, dressed in travel gear, his hair damp. The vulnerability of the nest was gone, replaced by the focused, professional mask of Shane Hollander, Montreal's star player. The sight was a twist in Ilya's heart.

The goodbye was a quiet, aching thing in the foyer. No grand promises. Ilya framed Shane's face in his hands, his thumbs stroking over his cheekbones. "You eat what Laurent sends. You sleep. You call me when you land. Ya tebya lyublyu."

"Are you going to tell me what that means?" Shane whispered, his eyes bright and a silly smile growing on his face.

"Ah, yes. Russian lessons will start soon for you. First I think I'll teach you "Fuck me harder... very useful for you." Ilya said against his lips.

Shane laughed at that, pulling away for a few seconds. He kissed Ilya, once, soft and final. Then he shouldered his bag, gave a small, shaky smile, and walked out the door to the waiting team car.

The silence in the house was deafening.

Ilya didn't move for a long time. He loved the smell of his home. It was the scent of them together all over this room. He went to get ready and took a quick shower. He left the clothes from yesterday in Shane's hamper and pulled out a fresh outfit from his bag. He locked up the house and made his way to the airport, hoping that he wouldn't be noticed and be able to board his flight without incident.

Four hours later, Marly let himself in with the door code Ilya had given him previously. He found Ilya in the kitchen, staring blankly at the coffee maker.

“He got off okay?” Marly asked, dropping his bag.

“Da.”

Marly nodded, opening the fridge and pulling out two water bottles. He tossed one to Ilya. “So. What’s the plan, Roz? You’re not just gonna mope in empty house.”

Ilya caught the bottle, the cold shock a welcome anchor. “He got to his hotel so now I wait for him to have time for a call. We have games.” He took a swig. “I need a new agent. Mine has too many ties to Russian endorsements. People my father knew.”

Marly leaned against the counter, understanding immediately. “Cleaning house.”

“I am building a new one,” Ilya corrected quietly. “My rookie contract is almost up. I want to see the offers. All of them. Officially.” He didn’t say the rest, but the implication hung in the air: he was looking for a path, a team, a city that could potentially accommodate an impossible future. One that might, somehow, include Shane.

“Smart,” Marly grunted. “You want to leave Boston though? We have a good team, I think. And Hollander? He wouldn’t switch teams?”

“I don’t think so.” Ilya said, a faint frown touching his lips, “He overheard his GM say they would offer anything to keep him. But is true, they based their entire line to revolve around Shane. That, and he would not be too happy to leave Montreal.”

Marly whistled softly. “Still can’t believe it. You and Hollander. How the hell did you manage to pull that off. I mean look at him. Everyone wants him and that’s without him being an omega being known.”

“It is not a complication, he knows he’s mine.” Ilya said, though his chest tightened. “It is a fact.” He looked at Marly. “And if you talk about him like piece of meat again, I’ll rebreak your nose..”

Marly studied him, then nodded. “Fine, but you’re buying me the most expensive steak in this state tonight.”

“Done.”

The separation was a dull, constant ache. They worked at their communication like it was a new drill, deliberate and awkward at times they'd promised.. Ilya would text a picture of his terrible fast food orders to get a rise out of Shane. Shane would send a screenshot of a confusing play from the game tape, asking for his read. Ilya would call late at night, his voice a low rumble from his empty bed, and they would talk about nothing and everything.

It was during one of these calls that Shane shared the news, his voice bright with genuine happiness. “Hayden and Jackie just announced it. She’s pregnant again. Due in the off-season.” A beat. “And Scott texted. Kip had the baby. A boy. Seven pounds even. They’re naming him Henry.”

Ilya’s congratulations were automatic, sincere for Shane’s friends. But a sharp, ugly spike of jealousy, hot and immediate, lodged beneath his sternum. Shane was sharing joy with him, but the joy was about other people’s families, other people’s bonds. He wished, with a ferocity that shamed him, that Shane was flying to see him. That they were the ones sharing news that would make their friends cheer.

“That is wonderful,” Ilya managed to say, his voice even.

“I’m going to try to fly to see them during our break between Vancouver and Edmonton,” Shane said, already planning, his tone shifting into logistical mode. “It’s a tight turnaround, but I think I can make it work for a really short visit.”

The jealousy curdled into a cold, hard lump. He would cross the continent for a newborn, but their own stolen days were measured in hours, begged from coaches with lies about sore shoulders.

“They will appreciate that,” was all Ilya said.

He didn’t voice the jealousy. He recognized it now for what it was: the old sickness, the possessive obsession, twitching in its grave. He let the feeling fester for a short second, acknowledged it, and then quietly packed it away. This was the work. This was the difference. Love was celebrating Shane’s joy for others, even when it highlighted his own absence.

Later, alone in his silent home in Boston, he stared at the ceiling. The future was a tangled knot. Shane’s roots were deep in Montreal. His own contract was a question mark. A new agent needed to be vetted, one with no ties to the shadows he was fleeing. They were two stars in separate, demanding orbits.

But for now, there was this: the daily text, the late-night call, the shared, silent understanding of what had been sacrificed and what was being slowly, painstakingly rebuilt. It wasn’t a nest. It wasn’t a binding claim. It was a thread, fragile but tenacious, stretched across a continent, holding the weight of all their complicated, damaged, relentless love. It would have to be enough. For now.

The thread between them thrummed with a new, quiet tension after the baby news. Ilya’s jealousy, though banked, simmered like a low-grade fever. It manifested not in accusations, but in a hyper-vigilant focus. His calls became more frequent, his questions more detailed. Did you eat? What did Laurent pack? How many hours did you sleep? The concern was genuine, but it was edged with a need to be the primary source of comfort, the first line of defense against a world that claimed so much of Shane’s time and energy.

Shane felt it. He heard the subtle shift in Ilya's voice, the way a simple question about his day could feel like an audit. Part of him, the part that still lived in the shadow of their prior dynamic, bristled. But the larger part, the part that remembered the man sobbing on the floor, understood. He answered with patience, sending pictures of his finished meals, detailing his days. It was an offering of transparency, a way to soothe the beast of Ilya's anxiety without surrendering to it.

The road trip was a grind. The win in Vancouver was followed by a brutal, travel-weary loss in Edmonton. Shane played well, but he felt hollow, his energy sapped. Alone in his hotel room after the game, the silence was oppressive. He pulled out his laptop, not to review tape, but to open the folder of blueprints and 3D renderings for his new house. He zoomed in on the master suite, on the clean lines of the walk-in shower, on the private patio overlooking the planned garden. This was his future. Solid. Independent. His.

His phone lit up with a call. Ilya.

"Are you looking at the plans for your house, or studying?" Ilya said by way of greeting, his voice a warm rumble in the quiet room.

Shane smiled, a real one, despite his fatigue. "How do you know that?"

"You get certain tone when you are thinking about lines and angles. Is softer. More... quiet. Am I right?"

Shane's breath caught. He was right, as usual. "Yeah."

"Good. Building is almost done, yes?"

Shane blinked, leaning closer to the screen. "Should be. I have an inspection next week that my mom will go to and then it should be done soon after."

A low, almost embarrassed chuckle. “Good for you, Mr. Real Estate. I have very smart Omega. I have been reading. About architecture. It is... interesting. I can see why you like it. Your mind works good with that type of information.”

The revelation made Shane’s stomach flip, a warmth spreading through Shane’s chest and he closed his eyes, just listening to Ilya. Ilya wasn’t just asking about his day; he was trying to learn his language. He was studying the blueprints of Shane’s dreams, not to criticize, but to help him build them stronger. The possessiveness was still there, but it was being reforged into stewardship.

“Thank you,” Shane whispered, his throat tight.

“Do not thank me. Just make sure the builder is not an idiot.” Ilya’s tone shifted, the gruffness returning. “You sound tired. More than usual.”

“Just a long flight. We play Calgary tomorrow.”

“Eat. Sleep, ptichka. I will let you go.”

But neither of them hung up. The silence stretched, comfortable now, filled with the shared vision of a sun-drenched patio that existed only on a screen and in their mutual imagination. Ilya stayed on the phone until he heard Shane’s breathing slow and the soft snores a few minutes later.

Back in Boston, Ilya closed the architecture textbook on his lap. The jealousy was still a cold stone in his gut, but he had found a way to move it. He couldn’t be the one giving Shane a child, not right now. It was a pathetic substitution, he thought sometimes. But it was action. It was a form of love that asked for nothing in return but the safety of the beloved.

His phone buzzed with a notification- an encrypted alert from the security system he'd had installed at Shane's construction site. Motion detected after hours. He opened the live feed, his body coiling. A lone figure, a kid by the look of it, trying the lock on the construction trailer. Ilya's finger hovered over the button to trigger the remote alarm and alert the private security firm he'd also hired.

Then he stopped. This was the old way. The controlling way. Taking over, handling it without a word, being the unseen protector. Shane had said he wanted the hunger, not a closed door.

He took a screenshot. He sent it to Shane with a simple text.

IGR- Site security alert. Kid at the trailer. Nothing serious. Do you want me to handle it, or do you want to call your project manager?

The response came a minute later.

Shane- I'll call Michael. He knows the local cops. Thank you for telling me. Its probably just a kid messing around.

It was a small thing. Insignificant. But Ilya leaned back in his chair, a different kind of warmth settling over him. He had shared a problem, not just a solution. He had offered control, not just taken it. The thread between them didn't feel like a leash he was holding; it felt like a line they were both holding onto, keeping each other from drifting into their separate darknesses.

In Calgary, Shane lay in the dark after dealing with the security alert. The talk with Ilya over the blueprints, the way he'd shared the security issue... it stirred the secret yearning awake. The memory of the other morning, of the condom, of the barrier, felt sharp again.

His heats were usually a distant, regulated event on his calendar, suppressed and managed, relegated to a week during the summer. The idea of going off his suppressants was always a risk. The risk was catastrophic. But the want... the want was a live wire. It wasn't just about a baby. It was about the most profound vulnerability he could offer. It was about giving Ilya something that couldn't be taken back, a biological truth. It was about seeing if Ilya, in that most primal moment, would choose the claim or the caution.

He knew it was a dangerous fantasy. It would be insanely irresponsible to have a baby while both of their contracts were about to be up for renewal. When he didn't have an idea on how to declare his omega status without losing everything. It would be crazy. Besides the fact that they hadn't fully discussed their relationship status, he didn't know how Ilya felt about babies. It would be unfair to pin this information on him after Shane had been going back and forth for so long about where to go with their feelings. It was unfair. It was everything they were trying to move beyond.

He rolled over, punching his pillow. This was the work, too. Not just managing Ilya's demons, but managing his own. His need for a proof so absolute it bordered on self-destruction at times.

They had their game the next night. Shane scored the game-winning goal, a wicked wrist shot top shelf. The arena noise was deafening. In the quiet of the phone later, Ilya's voice was full of a pride so fierce it was like another presence in the room.

"You were magnificent. A predator."

Shane, buzzing with post-game adrenaline and a deeper loneliness, closed his eyes. "I wish you were here."

The silence on the line was heavy. Then, Ilya's voice, rough with the same want. "I know, zayka. I know."

The thread on Ilya's sanity felt stretched sometimes, thin but strong. It held the weight of Ilya's anxiety of not being able to see Shane whenever he wanted, of shared security alerts and lonely hotel rooms. But he could not push for too much. Sometimes he could feel that Shane missed him too. He could hear it in Shane's voice when he was having a bad night and was determined to be the one to help him.

The distance became a physical ache, a constant hum of wrongness in Ilya's bones. The "work" of healthy communication- the sharing of their day to day thoughts, the transparent conversation that they started having about their therapy sessions, began to feel like it was helping, but it was hard to be apart for so long.

Dr. Kostova said she was proud of his progress. She asked him to keep writing his thoughts when he felt overwhelmed and asked to limit Shane's calls. She was worried that Ilya was becoming too dependant on Shane to stabilize his moods. They were not fully mated yet and that could be mentally damaging to Ilya.

Ilya disagreed. They were practically bonded already in actions if not officially and he hoped that Shane would be ready for that soon. He expected that during the summer they would be able to spend more time together in a continuous stretch for the first time. He just had to make it until then.

"I am doing the things," Ilya stated flatly during one session, his back against the headboard of another anonymous bed. "I ask about him. I listen. I do not demand. I learn his classes so we can talk about them." He raked a hand through his hair. "And it changes nothing. The emptiness is the same."

"What does the emptiness feel like?" his therapist asked.

"It feels like he is forgetting," Ilya snapped, the words escaping before he could cage them. "He sends the pictures of his meals, he answers my calls, he talks about his games. He is fine. He is moving through his world, and I am... a chore on his checklist. 'Call Ilya. Reassure Ilya.'" The jealousy, now fully fermented, spilled over. "He flies across the country to hold another man's baby. He has time for that. He has the energy for that. For me, he has tired voice at the end of a long day."

There was a pause on the line. "You've mentioned this before- the comparison between the attention he gives others and the attention he gives you. What does that mean to you?"

“It means I am not a priority!” The outburst was raw, echoing in the empty room. He lowered his voice, venomous and pained. “It means his life is complete without me. He has his team, his friends, his new house, his... his future. I am a complication. A problem he has to manage. He misses the idea of me, perhaps. The sex. The comfort. But he does not need me. Not like I...” He trailed off, swallowing the rest.

“Not like you need him,” the therapist finished gently.

Ilya said nothing, which was confirmation enough. The core fear was laid bare- that his love was a bottomless, desperate need, while Shane’s was a manageable, compartmentalized affection. That he was, in essence, an exhausting burden. Something that was forgettable if not being beneficial, like he had been for everyone else his whole life.

“And the evidence for this?” the therapist pressed. “The phone calls he initiates? The way he shares his private plans with you?”

“Obligation!” Ilya fired back. “He is a good person. He feels responsible for the mess he is tied to. It is pity. Or it is... a transaction. He gives me pieces of his time to keep me calm, to keep me from becoming what I was. It is a strategy. He is managing me.”

He heard the distortion in his own logic, the paranoia of the old sickness twisting the new, careful threads between them. But feeling it and believing it were two different things. The loneliness was a more convincing argument.

After the session ended, he felt worse, not better. The professional had mirrored his thoughts back to him, and they sounded pathetic, small, and unlovable. He stalked around the hotel room, his skin too tight. He opened his laptop, not to the architecture texts, but to a private, encrypted folder. It held no illicit photos, but something equally intimate: his own notes. The journal he’d started.

He was studying Shane’s patterns like game tape, searching for a deviation, a sign of erosion or deepening need. All he saw was consistency. And consistency, to his starved heart, felt like indifference. Out of the 36 entries he’d made so far, 29 were focused on Shane.

His phone buzzed. A notification for a charity gala in Montreal next month. Shane's team was involved. Shane would be there, smiling in a tuxedo, surrounded by people who wanted a piece of him. Ilya would be elsewhere, playing a game in another city. Shane had invited him, along with Marlow but the schedule wouldn't allow it.

The spiral tightened. He needed a scent, a taste, a physical reminder that he was real in Shane's world. He went to his closet and pulled out the hoodie he'd taken from Shane's house weeks ago- the one Shane had worn, now carefully folded and stored in a sealed bag. He tore the bag open and buried his face in the fabric.

The scent was faint, almost gone. Just a ghost of honeysuckle under the clean smell of his own laundry detergent. It was worse than nothing. It was decay. It was proof that everything faded.

He threw the hoodie across the room. It landed in a silent heap.

He didn't call Shane that night. He knew his voice would betray the churning, needy darkness inside him. He sent a simple text:

IGR- Long day. Talk tomorrow. Sleep well.

The three dots appeared, lingered, then disappeared. No reply. Just a thumbs-up emoji an hour later.

Ilya stared at the screen, the blue light washing out his face in the dark room. The silence was killing him. He was jealous. At the teammates that got to see Shane everyday. At the group friends Shane trusted who he dropped his plans for and would get on a plane to visit it only for a few hours. jealousy. He had given it a shape: the shape of Shane living a full life without him. And he had no idea how to live inside it.

He opened the blueprints for Shane's house again, zooming in on the master suite. It was a large house. Built for a family. The master suite had definitely been planned for a couple. You two weren't even speaking when the plans were being drawn.

Had Shane designed this house without a thought towards him? Was this just a plan to have another alpha there-someone better, more dependable?

He quickly stood up and went to his medicine bag, taking an anxiety pill and downing the whole water bottle. They would have time together this summer. At least a few days to get important conversations out of the way.

The five-day wait was an exquisite form of torture. Each hour stretched, rubbery and dense. Ilya moved through his own games in a fog of focused fury, channeling all the pent-up frustration and jealous longing into brutal, efficient play. He scored, he hit, he dominated- all while a clock ticked in the back of his skull, counting down to the moment the final buzzer would sound and he could shed the uniform and become just a man racing toward his mate.

They were out of the playoffs. It was not a surprise since he'd missed a week almost. He was still one of the best players of the league of course, but he didn't exactly dominate the game like he'd done for the past 3 years. This year Shane was definitely going to be winning the awards race and Ilya didn't care too much at this point.

Shane, two time zones away, was no better. He played well, but his focus was split. The ice felt like a waiting room. He caught himself staring at the arena clocks during shifts, calculating the shrinking distance between now and then. His skin felt too sensitive, as if already anticipating the scrape of Ilya's stubble, the bite of his hands.

The reunion was not poetic or tender. It was a collision.

Ilya's flight landed late. He took a car directly to the hotel he'd booked- a different, discreet one a few blocks from where the all star teams were lodging. He'd texted the room number. He let himself in, dropped his bag just inside the door, and stood in the center of the dark suite, vibrating with an energy that had no outlet.

The electronic key beeped. The door opened.

Shane stood there, backlit by the hallway light, still in his team-issue track suit, pacing the room. He looked rumpled, tired, and so beautiful it stole the air from Ilya's lungs.

For a suspended second, they just stared, drinking each other in across the dim room. The distance, the jealousy, the silent fears- they all compressed into that single, silent point of connection.

Then Ilya dropped his bag. It hit the floor with a soft thump. They moved at the same time.

It wasn't a walk, it was a closing of distance in two strides. Ilya's hands were on Shane's face, Shane's were fisted in Ilya's shirt, and their mouths crashed together with a hunger that was five days, five weeks, a lifetime in the making.

The kiss was not tender. It was devouring. A clash of teeth and tongue and desperate, shared breath. Ilya tasted the faint mint of Shane's toothpaste and the unique, essential flavor of him. Shane tasted coffee and the long flight and Ilya. They stumbled further into the room, a four-legged creature of pure need, mouths locked, hands pulling and clutching. Ilya backed Shane against the nearest wall, the impact shuddering through them both, but they didn't break the kiss. It deepened, turned wetter, more frantic. Ilya's hands slid from Shane's face down his neck, his shoulders, gripping hard enough to bruise, as if to verify that his mate was really there. Shane moaned into his mouth, the sound vibrating against Ilya's tongue, and his hips jerked forward, seeking friction.

Ilya tore at the zipper of Shane's track jacket, shoving it off his shoulders. Shane yanked Ilya's Henley up, breaking the kiss only long enough to pull it over his head before their mouths found each other again, more desperate than before. They shed layers in a frantic, uncoordinated dance, pants kicked away, socks lost, until they were both bare, skin to searing skin, pressed between the wall and Ilya's relentless body.

Ilya's mouth left Shane's to blaze a trail down his throat, sucking a dark mark into the tanned skin over his pulse. Shane's head thumped back against the wall, a guttural "Ilya" ripped from him. His hands were everywhere- in Ilya's hair, clawing down his back, gripping his ass to pull him closer, harder.

"Bed," Ilya growled against his collarbone, his voice unrecognizable.

They didn't make it to the bed so much as fall onto it in a tangled heap of limbs. Ilya rolled, pinning Shane beneath him, and the kissing began anew, slower now but no less intense, a rediscovery of territory. Ilya worshiped him with his mouth, the shell of his ear, the flutter of his eyelids, the strong line of his jaw, the sensitive dip between his pectorals. He took one nipple into his mouth, swirling his tongue until Shane was arching off the mattress with a broken cry, then gave the same devoted attention to the other.

But when his mouth moved lower, over the quivering plane of Shane's stomach, he stopped. He lifted his head, his eyes, black with desire, meeting Shane's hazy, pleading ones.

"No," Ilya said, the word a soft, dangerous command.

He moved back up Shane's body, kissing him deeply, before shifting to his side. He propped himself on an elbow, his free hand beginning a slow, torturous exploration. He traced the lines of Shane's ribs, the curve of his hip, the inside of his thigh. He wrapped his fingers around Shane's erection, which was already leaking and painfully hard, and gave one long, smooth stroke that made Shane sob.

Then he let go. He spent the next hour in a masterclass of exquisite torment. He would touch, then retreat. Kiss, then deny. He used his hands, his mouth, the rough friction of his own body, to bring Shane to the very precipice of release, over and over, only to pull him back with a murmured "Nyet, not yet," or a stilling hand. He learned every gasp, every twitch, every pleading whimper that signaled Shane was about to fall, and he became a sculptor of that edge, keeping him suspended in a state of agonized, rapturous need.

Shane unraveled beautifully. He became a writhing, begging mess. Tears of frustration leaked from the corners of his eyes. "Please, Ilya, please... I can't... just let me..."

“What do you want?” Ilya murmured against his throat, his own body a tightly coiled spring of denied pleasure.

“You. I want you. Fuck me. Please, just fuck me, hard.”

The raw need in Shane’s voice, the surrender, was what finally broke Ilya’s control. With a growl, he reached for the nightstand, fumbling for the condom. But Shane’s hand shot out, gripping his wrist. His eyes, though glazed with pleasure, held a shocking clarity, a desperate challenge.

“No. Just you. I want to feel you.”

The words hung between them, a grenade with the pin pulled. Ilya stared, his heart hammering against his ribs. It was everything he wanted, everything he feared, the ultimate claim and the ultimate risk. He saw not just desire, but a test in Shane’s eyes. Choose me. Choose this. Choose us.

He didn’t reach for the drawer again.

He positioned himself, the broad head of his cock pressing against Shane’s entrance, slick with pre-come and the evidence of their long edging. He looked down, meeting Shane’s gaze, and pushed inside in one slow, relentless, breathtaking inch.

The feeling was catastrophic. The heat, the tightness, the shocking, barrier-less intimacy of it. Shane cried out, his body arching, taking him deeper. Ilya buried his face in Shane’s neck, groaning as he sheathed himself fully, feeling Shane’s body clutch around him in spasms of overwhelmed sensation.

He began to move, setting a deep, pounding rhythm that shook the bedframe. It was hard, almost violent, a physical expression of all the pent-up longing and fear. Each thrust punched a ragged sound from Shane’s lungs.

“Harder,” Shane begged, his nails digging into Ilya’s back. “More, Ilya, please, I need more...”

It still wasn’t enough. The angle, the depth- Shane needed something else, something final. Ilya understood. In one fluid, powerful motion, he gripped Shane’s hips and flipped them over.

Now Shane was straddling him, impaled, looking down with wild, blown pupils. He braced his hands on Ilya’s chest and began to move, finding a frantic, riding rhythm, taking Ilya even deeper. His head fell back, cords standing out in his neck. It was glorious, but the begging continued, a broken litany.

“Knot me... please, Ilya, I need it... need you to... claim me...”

The words were the final key. Ilya’s control shattered. With a roar that was pure possession, he surged up, wrapping his arms around Shane and rolling them again, pinning him beneath his weight. He drove into him with a final, brutal pace, each thrust aimed now for that deepest, most primal connection.

The pressure began to build, an insistent, swelling fullness at the base of his cock that was both biological and spiritual. Shane felt it, his eyes flying wide with a mix of terror and ecstasy. “Yes... yes...”

With one last, searing thrust, Ilya pushed forward and held. The knot swelled, locked, tied them together in a searing, exquisite stretch that was beyond pleasure, beyond pain, it was a fusion. Ilya’s orgasm ripped through him, endless waves of release that seemed to pull Shane’s own climax from the very roots of his soul. Shane screamed, his body clamping down in rhythmic, vice-like pulses around the knot, milking it, welcoming it.

Ilya collapsed, his full weight a final anchor, his face buried in the sweat-damp hollow of Shane’s throat. They were fused, pulsing, utterly joined. The world ceased to exist outside the frantic beat of their hearts and the profound, binding truth of their bodies.

As the waves subsided, leaving them trembling and breathless, knotted together in the wrecked sheets, Ilya lifted his head. He looked into Shane's utterly shattered, bliss-filled face. No barriers. No secrets. Just the raw, terrifying, magnificent truth of what they were, and what they had chosen.

He didn't make the mistake of calling him mate again. He didn't need to. The word was now a physical fact, throbbing between them. He simply brushed his lips against Shane's, a whisper of a kiss, and whispered, "Moy."

Mine.

Time lost all meaning. There was only the slow, shared rhythm of their breath, the occasional aftershock that made them both gasp, and the profound, inescapable fullness that bound them together. Ilya remained perfectly still, his weight carefully distributed, his arms a secure cage around Shane. He could feel the frantic hammer of Shane's heart gradually slowing against his own chest, settling into a heavy, languid thump. Shane's eyes were closed, his face slack, lips slightly parted. He had floated away, submerged in the blissful, weightless void of subspace.

Ilya monitored him with a fierce, silent focus. He counted breaths, noted the healthy pink flush returning to Shane's skin, felt the last tremors of overstimulation fade into total boneless relaxation. This was a gift, this utter surrender, and Ilya guarded it jealously. He pressed a kiss to Shane's damp temple, inhaling the scent of sweat, sex, and the fading, sweet haze of his omega's release.

Slowly, infinitesimally, the demanding swell at the base of his cock began to soften. The tie loosened its urgent grip. Ilya waited until it was safe, before he finally, carefully, withdrew. A soft, sensitive whimper escaped Shane's throat at the loss, but he didn't stir from his deep headspace.

Gently, Ilya gathered him up. Shane was pliant, his limbs heavy and loose as Ilya lifted him, cradling him against his chest. He carried him into the bathroom, where he turned on the shower since it seemed impossible for either of them to disconnect long enough to let Ilya start a bath. He stepped into the large glass enclosure, adjusting the water until it was a perfect, heavy cascade of heat.

He stepped under the spray, holding Shane close, letting the water sluice over them both, washing away the physical evidence of their coupling. The water was a shock of sensation on oversensitive skin. Ilya reached for the soap, working up a gentle lather in his hands. He began to wash Shane with a methodical, worshipful tenderness. He started with his hair, massaging his scalp, rinsing the suds away with a cupped hand. He soaped his back, his arms, the long line of his legs, every touch meant to ground, to soothe, to communicate care without words.

As he washed Shane's chest, his thumbs brushing over his nipples, a change began. Shane's breathing hitched, deepened. A faint tremor returned to his limbs. His lashes fluttered. Ilya watched, his own heart aching, as awareness slowly seeped back into Shane's features. The faraway peace blurred, sharpened into confusion, then softened into a dazed, weary recognition. His eyes, hazy and beautiful, focused on Ilya's face.

"Hey," Ilya murmured, his voice a low rumble under the patter of the water. "Welcome back, Lyubov' moya."

Shane blinked water from his lashes. A slow, wobbly smile touched his lips. He leaned forward, resting his forehead against Ilya's collarbone, nuzzling there. "Ilya."

The word was a sigh of homecoming. Ilya turned them, bracing Shane against the cool, tiled wall, the water cascading over their shoulders. He kissed him then, not with the devouring hunger of before, but with a deep, searching sweetness that spoke of gratitude and awe. Shane responded lazily, his mouth soft and yielding.

The kiss deepened, and the embers of desire, banked but never extinguished, glowed hot again. Ilya's hands slid down Shane's slick back, over the curve of his ass, gripping and lifting. Shane understood, wrapping his legs around Ilya's waist with a fluid grace that belied his earlier exhaustion. The new position brought their bodies into exquisite, full-length contact.

Ilya reached between them, his fingers finding Shane's vaginal entrance, now slick with water and the natural readiness of his body. He pressed one, then two fingers inside, working him open with a slow, patient thoroughness that made Shane moan into his mouth. The preparation was different now- not for a frantic, knotting claim, but for a deeper, more encompassing intimacy. They rarely made love like that so Ilya focused on Shane's face for permission.

When he was sure Shane was ready, Ilya aligned himself. He caught Shane's gaze, holding it as he pressed forward, not into the familiar, clenched heat of before, but lower, into a tighter, channel. A sharp, surprised inhale from Shane. A slight, instinctive tightening.

Ilya stilled, completely. He kissed Shane again, swallowing the faint hiss of discomfort, kissing his jaw, his throat. "Shhh," he whispered against his skin. "Easy. Just breathe. Take me. Just like this."

He waited, letting Shane's body adjust to this new, different fullness. The water beat down on them, a warm, insistent rhythm. Slowly, the tension bled from Shane's shoulders. He relaxed around Ilya, a slow, deliberate yielding that was more profound than any frantic taking. Ilya began to move, a slow, rolling thrust of his hips that sank him deeper with each pass.

This was not fucking. This was something else. A claiming, yes, but also a revelation. Each stroke was a discovery of new, untouched territory. The angle was different, the sensations startlingly intimate. Shane's arms tightened around Ilya's neck, his face buried against his wet skin, his breaths coming in hot, ragged puffs. The slight pain had transmuted into a deep, stretching pleasure that seemed to resonate in his very core.

Ilya set a relentless, deep rhythm, using the wall for leverage, the water making their skin slide together with a slick, sensual friction. He forced Shane's face away from his neck to gauge his reactions. He watched Shane's face, mesmerized by the play of overwhelmed pleasure, by the trust that allowed this final vulnerability. He felt a different kind of peak building, not the explosive, possessive crest of the knot, but a slower, warmer tide of connection that felt just as binding.

When release took them, it was a shared, shuddering sigh rather than a roar. Ilya spilled deep inside his mate, his own climax triggering Shane's, a softer, rolling wave that left them both trembling and clinging to each other under the relentless, cleansing spray.

For a long time, they just stood there, entangled, breathing, as the water cooled around them. Ilya finally reached out and shut it off. The sudden silence was loud. He reached for a large, fluffy towel, wrapping it around Shane before securing one around his own waist.

He carried a boneless, satiated Shane back to the bed, careful to avoid the dirtied areas. They collapsed onto it, damp and spent, facing each other. No words were needed. Ilya pulled the covers over them and gathered Shane close, tucking his head under his chin. Shane's hand came to rest over Ilya's heart, his breathing evening out into sleep within minutes.

Ilya lay awake in the dark, listening to that breath, feeling the warm weight in his arms. The jealousy, the distance, the fear, the anxiety- they were gone, banished for now by the overwhelming, physical act of what they had shared. He had claimed, and been claimed, in almost every way possible. The emptiness was gone, filled to bursting. He pressed his lips to Shane's hair and finally, for the first time in weeks, slept a deep and dreamless sleep.

The deep, post-claim sleep was absolute, but Ilya's internal clock- and a persistent, tender hunger, woke him hours later. The room was still dark, the city outside a silent, distant hum. Shane was a warm line against his side, breathing deeply, his face smooth and untroubled in sleep.

Ilya watched him for a long moment, the possessive ache in his chest softening into something sweeter, more reverent. He wanted to worship. Silently, he slid down the bed, the sheets whispering. He nudged Shane's legs apart with his shoulders and, without preamble, took him into his mouth.

Shane woke not with a start, but on a slow, cresting wave of pleasure. A deep, confused groan vibrated in his chest, his hips lifting instinctively into the wet heat. "Ilya...?" His voice was thick, disoriented.

Ilya hummed in response, the vibration earning a sharp gasp. He worked him with a devoted, languid pace, all slow suction and swirling tongue, rebuilding the pleasure from the ashes of their earlier exhaustion. Shane's hands fumbled down, tangling in his hair, not guiding, just holding on as he was pulled fully awake by sensation.

When Shane was fully hard, trembling on the edge, Ilya drew off with a wet sound. He brought his hand down, his fingertips gently seeking the other, more familiar entrance, wanting to prepare him, to open him up for more.

The moment his finger made contact, Shane's body changed. The pliant, melting tension vanished. His thighs stiffened, a subtle but definite flinch running through him. He didn't pull away, but the welcoming heat was gone, replaced by a guarded tightness.

Ilya froze. He lifted his head, looking up the length of Shane's body. Shane's eyes were open now, watching him in the dim light. There was no fear, but a clear, quiet hesitation. The memory of the shower- the newness, the slight pain, the overwhelming fullness was still too present. His body was saying not there, not yet.

Without a word, Ilya withdrew his hand, his eyes never leaving Shane's. He saw the flicker of relief, of gratitude. Then he lowered his head again and took Shane back into his mouth, redoubling his efforts. This was what was needed. This alone.

He used his lips, his tongue, the gentle pressure of his throat, until Shane was arching off the bed with a broken, surrendering cry, his release flooding Ilya's mouth. Ilya drank him down, soothing him through the shudders with soft, flat presses of his tongue until Shane went limp, boneless and spent.

Ilya moved back up the bed, gathering Shane into his arms. He pulled the covers over them both and arranged Shane against his chest, their legs tangling, again. Shane's head found its home in the hollow of Ilya's shoulder, his breath slowly steadying.

For a long time, they just lay there in the dark, staring at each other from inches away. Ilya traced the arch of Shane's eyebrow, the curve of his lip. Shane's finger drew idle circles over Ilya's pectoral.

"You've killed me, Rozanov." Shane said with a silly smile. After a moment, "I missed you," Shane whispered, the words a puff of air against Ilya's skin. "It's... harder when you're gone. Everything is."

"I know," Ilya murmured, his thumb stroking Shane's freckles. "My mind, it becomes a bad place. I watch the clock. I read your texts too many times."

"I could tell." Shane smiled, a small, sad thing. "You asked about my lunch three days in a row. I read it through all the messages when you're anxious."

“I was... checking.” Ilya admitted, no defensiveness left in him. “It is a habit I am trying to break. It is not control. It is... fear.”

“I know.” Shane shifted, pressing a soft kiss to the center of Ilya’s chest. “We’re both... figuring it out.”

The silence returned, comfortable now, filled with the warmth of skin and the rhythm of shared breath.

“The summer,” Ilya said after a while. “What are your plans?”

Shane’s finger stilled its circling. “Quiet. I have the cottage on the lake that will be finished. Just... training on my own. Peace. No media, no schedule.” He took a slow breath. “My parents might come up for a week. Maybe Hayden and Jackie and the baby, if they’re up for it.”

He fell quiet. Ilya waited. He could feel the unspoken question hanging in the space between them. He could see it in the way Shane’s eyes searched his, in the slight catch in his breathing.

Ask me, Ilya thought, pouring the permission into his gaze, into the steady stroke of his hand on Shane’s back. Ask me to come.

But Shane’s courage seemed to falter. The invitation trembled on his lips, then retreated. Asking Ilya to invade his private, peaceful sanctuary for two whole months was a vulnerability of a different magnitude. It was one thing to steal nights in hotel rooms; it was another to share the mundane reality of a whole summer. What if Ilya grew bored? What if the closeness became claustrophobic? What if he said no?

“It will be good for you,” Ilya said softly, when it was clear Shane wouldn’t ask. “The quiet. You need it.” He leaned in and kissed him, a slow, lingering promise. “And I will be wherever you want me to be. A phone call away. Or a flight away. The distance does not matter if I know you are happy.”

It was both a gift and a subtle push. I am giving you the out, but I am telling you I would cross any distance.

Shane’s eyes shimmered in the dark. He understood. He kissed Ilya back, pouring a tumult of gratitude and frustration and longing into it. The question remained unasked, but it lived between them now, a shared, fragile possibility hanging in the pre-dawn air, as palpable as the scent of their skin and the echo of their heartbeats.

The grey light of a rainy dawn found them still tangled, but the clock was a tyrant. Ilya’s flight was in three hours. The warm, sleepy bubble they’d built was already thinning, pierced by the harsh reality of itineraries and obligations.

Shane felt it first, a deep, hollow ache blooming beneath the pleasant soreness. A few hours. After weeks of starving, they’d been given a feast and then told to stop after the first course. He was wrung out, emotionally porous, every nerve ending raw from the intensity of their reunion and the looming separation. He watched Ilya dress with a silent, sinking sadness, memorizing the way his shirt stretched across his shoulders, the efficient click of his watch clasp.

The goodbye happened at the hotel room door yet again. They stood facing each other, the space between them already feeling like a chasm. No words seemed adequate.

Ilya reached for him first, one hand cupping the back of Shane’s neck, his thumb stroking the sensitive skin just under his jaw. “Look at me,” he commanded, his voice low.

Shane’s eyes, which were already threatening tears, snapped up and locked onto his. Ilya leaned in and captured his mouth in a kiss that was not sweet, but fierce. A branding. A promise and a punishment for leaving. Shane kissed back with equal desperation, his hands fisting in the front of Ilya’s jacket, trying to pull him back into the room, back into the nest, back into the world where they were the only two people that mattered.

When they broke apart, both were breathless. Ilya kept his hand on Shane's neck, holding his gaze. A slow, wicked smirk touched his lips. "I love," he murmured, his thumb stroking his freckles, "how easily you go soft and sweet for me. How you just... float away. Is a beautiful thing to watch."

The words, so intimate and possessive, cut through the sadness with a spark of familiar heat. Shane huffed a weak laugh, shaking his head. "You're an asshole."

"Your asshole," Ilya corrected, his smirk softening into something more genuine. He pulled him in for one last, searing kiss- softer this time, a silent repository for all the words they didn't have time to say. I'll miss you. Be safe. Wait for me.

Then, he let go. He opened the door. "I'll see you later," he said, the words an anchor. "Same team finally."

Shane nodded, unable to speak past the lump in his throat. He stepped out into the hallway, the door clicking shut behind him with a sound of terrible finality. He stood there for a moment, leaning his forehead against the cool wall, gathering the shattered pieces of his composure before he had to walk back into his real life.

Inside the room, Ilya did not move immediately. He stood in the silent emptiness, now suffused with their scent and the ghost of their heat. He took a slow, deep breath, committing it to memory. Then, he collected his bag.

His ride to the other hotel was a blur of grey rain. In the back of the car, he pulled out his phone.

IGR- The way you taste is going to haunt me. I can still feel you on my tongue.

IGR- At the All-Star game. When we are in same locker room. I am going to find you in showers. I am going to push you against the tiles and make you come so quietly you have to bite my shoulder to stay silent while our team is on other side of wall.

IGR- I want to fuck you on the bench. After everyone leaves. Where they all sit and talk strategy. I want you to smell like me and ice and come when you go back to your hotel.

They were a promise: the separation was temporary. Shane felt the heat bloom over his face as the car parked in front of the hotel. He paused to sign some jersey's and other memorabilia for the fans waiting so late at night. He noticed a few of posters for the all star team and several of them had Ilya's signature already. He felt himself blush again and went over to the small group and signed, the posters had them right next to each other, obviously photoshopped, but Shane hoped he could get a copy for himself.

Tomorrow night would be a first, it would be different. They wouldn't just be stealing hours in a hotel. They would be on the same bench, in the same team, a unit in front of the entire world. It was a test, and a tantalizing glimpse of maybe a future that felt, for the first time, tantalizingly within reach. He made his way to the hotel doors, signing a few more things, a determined smile on his face. The waiting was agony. But the prize was worth it.

The All-Star practice ice was a symphony of casual skill, a showman's playground where the league's best glided through drills with a flashy, effortless grace. Then there was Ilya.

As captain, he ran the practice not like a showcase, but like a war council. The easygoing atmosphere evaporated the moment he blew his whistle. His voice, a sharp, carrying baritone in Russian-accented English, cut through the chill air. "Enough circles. We are not here for figure skating. We play tomorrow. We play to win. First line, with me. Let's go."

Shane felt a thrill that had nothing to do with the temperature. This was Ilya unchained in his element—not the possessive lover or the tormented man, but Kapitan Rozanov, a force of pure, demanding will. He didn't yell. He commanded. And the other superstars, used to being the center of their own universes, fell in line, intrigued by the shift in gravity.

When Ilya skated to the wing, ceding the center ice position to Shane with a single, pointed nod, it was a statement louder than any speech. He was the captain, but he was building his attack around Shane. The trust, the strategic deference, made Shane's chest tighten with a fierce, proud warmth.

And then they started to play.

It was like magic. It was better- inevitability. From the first puck drop of the scrimmage, they moved as a single organism. Ilya, on the wing, was a relentless hunter, checking opposing players with a vicious intensity that created turnovers before the opposing line could blink. He'd strip the puck, and without looking, fire a no-look, tape-to-tape pass to the space Shane was already exploding into.

Shane, at center, became the calm, lethal eye of the hurricane Ilya created. He received those passes in stride, his head always up, reading the entire sheet of ice. He didn't need to search for Ilya; he just knew. When he curled behind the net, drawing defenders, Ilya was already slicing to the far post, his stick clattering on the ice for a split-second before the puck arrived from Shane's backhand.

They communicated in a language of glances, of subtle shifts in posture. A tilt of Ilya's head meant he was cutting across the slot. A tap of Shane's stick on the ice meant he was holding, waiting for the seam to open. They anticipated, compensated, and amplified each other's instincts in a way that left the other players, even these elite talents, glancing at each other in open astonishment.

During a water break, Bennett, the veteran goalie for their squad, skated over, his mask tipped back. "Holy shit, guys. That's... that's not fair." He nodded at Ilya. "Rozanov, we just run everything through you two. You," he pointed at Shane, "you do your magic, Pretty boy."

Shane blushed at the nickname that had started in his own team a few weeks ago when a commercial he shot started airing. A few other players murmured agreement. Leverage the unstoppable chemistry. Build the entire strategy around the two players who were quite literally reading each other's minds.

Ilya took a long pull from his water bottle, his gaze sweeping over the group. He shook his head, a firm, definitive motion. "No."

The group fell silent.

"This is All-Star game. Is for show, yes, but also for respect." His eyes found each of them. "You are all here because you are best. You all deserve spotlight." He gestured between himself and Shane. "What we have... it works because it is surprise. Because it is new. If we make it only us, they will adjust. They will shut it down. And you,” he pointed his bottle at the others, “you will stand and watch. That is not winning. That is vanity.”

He skated a few feet away, drawing a quick X on the ice with his skate. “We play as a unit. We move puck. We create for everyone. What we have,” he nodded again to Shane, a flicker of something intensely private passing between them before his captain’s mask slid back into place, “it opens ice. It creates chaos. We use that chaos for all of us. Not just for me and Hollander.”

It was a masterclass in leadership. He’d acknowledged their unique synergy, praised the team’s talent, and presented a unified, more dangerous strategy- all while refusing to hog the glory. The players exchanged looks, then nods. The message was clear: follow this guy, and everyone eats.

As they lined up for the next drill, Shane fell in beside Ilya. Under the cover of the scraping skates and shouted instructions, he murmured, voice low, “You’re a pretty good captain, Rozanov.”

Ilya didn’t look at him, but a corner of his mouth quirked up. “I am good at many things, Hollander,” he said, his tone dry. “Leading men to victory is only one of my talents.”

He shoved off towards his position, leaving Shane smiling at his back. The ice felt different beneath his blades.

The All-Star game was a circus of skill and showmanship, but for their line, it had become something else: a declaration. The chemistry between Ilya and Shane wasn’t just good; it was telepathic. They built their team’s four-goal lead not with flashy solo efforts, but with a series of subtle, devastating plays that spoke of a shared hockey brain.

Before the puck drop, Marly had glided over during warmups, knocking his glove against Ilya’s chest. “Try to blink, Rozy. Your eyes are gonna get stuck on him. We get it. You like the view.”

Ilya just grunted, his gaze already tracking Shane, who was laughing at something Pike was saying from the bench. Pike. Ilya suppressed an eye-roll. How that talentless agitator had wormed his way onto the roster was a mystery, but if Shane's smile was that bright because of him, Ilya would tolerate it. For now.

The game itself was a masterpiece of their unspoken language. When Shane snapped a wicked wrist shot top shelf for his hat trick, the arena erupted. Ilya reached him first, cutting through the celebrating crowd of their teammates. He grabbed the back of Shane's helmet, yanking him close, and planted a loud, smacking kiss on the side of the cage, right by his ear. "Moy genial'nyy tsentr," he growled, the Russian lost in the noise.

The fans roared, not with shock, but with delight. It was classic Rozanov- unexpected, bold, a touch antagonistic even in celebration. The "rivals" narrative made it perfect theater. Shane, flushed and grinning inside his helmet, shoved him away playfully, the moment feeding the energy of the entire building.

With two minutes left, the game was effectively over. Their team was dominating. Ilya stole the puck from behind the line, feeling the clock wind down. He saw Shane, hovering near the far blue line, Ilya tapped his stick on the ice three times in rapid succession- tap-tap-tap, a signal they had discovered that worked during practice for some odd reason. They were just too connected.

Shane's head turned, not all the way, but just enough. He knew. He began a half-turn, ready to receive the breakout pass and carry it into the offensive zone to kill the clock.

The pass left Ilya's stick, crisp and perfect, heading for Shane's tape.

But Shane didn't focus on the puck. His eyes, visible through his visor, found Ilya's across the ice. A huge, triumphant, shared smile broke across his face. It was a split-second of pure, unguarded connection- a look what we did.

That split-second was all Dallas Kent needed.

Kent, a hulking defenseman known for his punishing, often late, hits, saw the distraction. He launched himself, a freight train of bad intentions. He didn't go for the puck. He went for the man.

Ilya's world narrowed to a horrifying silent film. He saw Kent's trajectory. He saw Shane, still smiling, turning his head back just as the massive shoulder connected.

The sound was sickening. A brutal, wet crunch of equipment and body meeting the unyielding boards, followed instantly by the sharp, spiderweb crack of the plexiglass. Shane's body went limp, crumpling against the boards before sliding in a boneless heap to the ice. His stick clattered away.

The arena's celebratory noise cut off as if severed by a knife.

For less than a heartbeat, there was absolute silence. Then, the whistle blew, shrill and desperate.

Ilya was already moving. He covered the distance in a blur of speed he didn't know he possessed, his skates throwing up a spray of ice. He shoved Kent away with a vicious, two-handed push that sent the bigger man stumbling, not caring about the penalty, not caring about anything but the still form on the ice.

He dropped to his knees, his gloves off, his hands hovering over Shane. Shane looked unconscious, but his eyes were dazed, blinking rapidly against the pain. A thin trickle of blood was already seeping from his hairline down his temple, stark against the white ice.

"Baby, don't move," Ilya heard himself say, his voice strangely calm, a direct contrast to the tsunami of terror roaring in his ears. He framed Shane's helmet with his hands, holding him still. "Look at me, Shane. Open your eyes!"

The medical team swarmed around them, pushing Ilya back with firm hands. He resisted for a moment, a growl building in his throat, more medics surrounded them, finally pulling Ilya away. Suddenly, Marly was behind him, pulling him further away by his chest. "Calm the fuck down. You're making it obvious."

As they carefully stabilized Shane's neck and loaded him onto the stretcher, Ilya stood frozen just outside the circle of activity. The raucous All-Star game was now a silent, grim tableau. He looked down at his own hand, the one that had made the pass over his face. He saw a small, red smear on his palm- Shane's blood, transferred from his temple.

The world did not go red. It went white. A silent, blinding static of pure rage that erased the arena, the noise, the rules, everything but the target: Dallas Kent, who was already being escorted towards the penalty box with a smug, unaffected shrug.

Ilya's body moved before his mind could engage. He took two powerful strides and launched himself into a full-speed charge, his skates biting into the ice like claws. The distance closed in a heartbeat.

Marly, from his spot on the blue line, saw the murder in Ilya's eyes a second too late. "ROZ, NO!" he bellowed, pushing off in desperate pursuit.

Ilya didn't hear him. He hit Kent from the side, a brutal, illegal check that sent them both crashing into the boards with a thunderous impact. Before Kent could even register the attack, Ilya had him by the jersey, hauling him down to the ice. He didn't throw a single hockey punch- those were for games. These were street blows, vicious and precise, driven by a year's worth of possessive fear and five minutes of sheer terror. A right cross split Kent's lip. A left hook glanced off his brow.

Ilya snarled unintelligible words, guttural Russian-English hybrid lost in the chaos as he drew his fist back again.

Then, weight descended on him. Marly wrapped his arms around Ilya's chest from behind, hauling with all his strength. "That's enough! Ilya, STOP!"

Two other players- a goalie and a massive defenseman from Edmonton- piled on, grabbing his arms. It took all three of them to peel Ilya off, his skates scrambling for purchase on the ice, his eyes still locked on a dazed, bleeding Kent. The dam had broken. Seeing their captain erupt, other players dropped gloves, old rivalries and team loyalties igniting. The pristine All-

Star game ice became a war zone of shoving matches and wild swings as referees blew whistles uselessly and linesmen waded into the fray.

It took two hours. Two hours of closed-door meetings with furious league officials, of cold legal language outlining fines for conduct detrimental to the game, of a stony-faced suspension handed down. Fifty thousand dollars. Two games. Ilya signed the paperwork without reading it, his knuckles raw and swollen.

The moment he was released, he cornered a harried-looking arena medic. “Hollander. Which hospital?”

The medic, intimidated by the intensity rolling off the big Russian, stammered the name. Ilya was already moving, shoving through a service exit into the cool night air. He spotted an Uber idling nearby, its driver staring at his phone. Ilya yanked the back door open.

“Drive. Now. Mount Rainer hospital.” He shoved a wad of cash through the partition.

Fifteen minutes of agonizing silence later, the car pulled under the bright ER awning. Ilya was out before it fully stopped, ignoring the driver’s shout. He slammed through the automatic doors, his hockey bag still slung over his shoulder, his face a mask of dried blood - Kent’s or His own and stark fear.

The receptionist looked up, her eyes widening. “Sir, you can’t-”

“Shane Hollander. He was brought in. Where is he?”

His voice, low and frayed, brooked no argument. She checked her computer, gave him a room number on the neurology floor. He took the stairs three at a time.

The hallway was quiet, a stark contrast to the arena’s roar. The smell of antiseptic clawed at his throat. He found the room, the door slightly ajar. His hand, trembling slightly now that the adrenaline was leaching away, pushed it open.

The room was dim. Shane lay in the bed, propped up on pillows. He was asleep. A stark white bandage was taped to his temple, and the beginnings of a spectacular bruise bloomed around his left eye. He looked pale, small, but the monitors showed his strong heartbeat.

For a long moment, he just stared at Shane from across the room. Ilya took a single, shaky step into the room, letting the door sigh shut behind him, sealing them in a new, fragile kind of silence.

The sight of Shane in the hospital bed stopped Ilya's heart. The vibrant, powerful athlete was reduced to a pale figure against white sheets, made smaller by the bulky padding strapped around his chest and the stark bandage on his temple. The monitors beeped a soft, rhythmic counterpoint to the roaring guilt in Ilya's ears.

He stepped inside, letting the door click shut. Without a word, he turned the lock. The world outside- the league officials, the fines, the press- ceased to exist. He moved to the windowed wall and yanked the privacy curtain along its track with a sharp rasp, enclosing the bed in a thin, beige cocoon.

Only then did he approach.

He stood over Shane, his shadow falling across the bed. The urge to touch, to verify he was whole, was a physical ache. He reached out, his hand trembling slightly, and brushed the pad of his thumb with infinite gentleness over Shane's unbruised cheek. The skin was warm.

Shane's eyelids fluttered. They opened, unfocused for a moment, before landing on Ilya. A slow, loopy grin spread across his face, utterly incongruous with the setting. "Hey," he slurred, his voice thick. "There you are."

"Here I am," Ilya whispered, his own voice rough.

"I feel great," Shane announced, his words running together. "They gave me the good stuff. Like... floating. No pain. It's awesome." His heavily-lidded gaze wandered over Ilya's face, noting the dried blood, the grim set of his mouth. “You look mad. Don’t be mad. S’not your fault.”

But it was. The words were a knife twist. If he hadn’t looked at me. If I hadn’t smiled. If I had just kept my eyes on the play. “It is my fault,” Ilya said, the words ash in his mouth.

Shane shook his head, a clumsy, exaggerated motion. “Heeyyyyyyyyy! Nuh-uh. Was gonna ask you something. Important.” He blinked, trying to focus. “After the game. Was gonna ask... to come. To the cottage. This summer. Just us.” A dreamy sigh escaped him. “Wanted you there. For my heat. Wanted it to be you.”

The confession, delivered with the unvarnished honesty of the heavily medicated, struck Ilya with the force of a physical blow. He actually swayed on his feet. The cottage invitation was one thing- a hope he’d sensed but hadn’t dared claim. But the heat... That was a surrender of a different magnitude. It was above the biological need, trust, and vulnerability fused into the most profound offer an omega could make.

And he had ruined it. He had made this moment happen in a sterile hospital room, not in the soft light of a warm hotel room. The promise was now tangled with wires and bandages and the smell of antiseptic.

“Shane...” Ilya’s voice broke. “I was so worried. So scared when you didnt move.” He couldn’t form his thoughts correctly. The guilt was a crushing weight, and the gift Shane was offering felt like a jewel he’d dropped in the mud.

Shane’s grin faded slightly, sensing the shift. His drugged brain tried to navigate the storm on Ilya’s face. “S’okay,” he mumbled, his eyes drifting closed again. “We can still go. When I’m not... I’m not broken.” He reached out a clumsy hand, patting the air until it found Ilya’s wrist. His grip was weak. “Don’t be sad. Just stay.”

Ilya turned his hand, lacing their fingers together. He brought Shane’s knuckles to his lips, pressing a desperate kiss against them. He stayed there, kneeling by the bed, holding the hand of the drugged, trusting man who had wanted to give him everything, while the monitors beeped on, measuring a heartbeat that Ilya felt solely responsible for protecting, and had, in one moment of shared pride, failed.

Ilya stayed on his knees, holding Shane's hand, the weight of the confession settling over him. The guilt was a cold stone, but Shane's warm, clumsy fingers in his were a tether.

Shane's eyes fluttered open again, his gaze swimming around the room before landing on Ilya with renewed, druggy interest. "Your face is all... swoopy," he announced, his words syrupy slow. "Like a really mad painting. A sexy, mad painting."

Ilya couldn't help it- a faint, pained huff of air escaped him, almost a laugh. "Thank you, I think."

"I'm serious." Shane's head lolled against the pillow. "When I'm in heat. At the cottage. I'm gonna climb you like that painting. You'll be my tree. A big, grumpy, Russian tree." He nodded sagely, as if this were a profound plan. "Gonna lick you. Like a lollipop. Everywhere. For hours. Days. 'M gonna be so... sticky."

Ilya felt a hot flush creep up his own neck, a bizarre mix of anguish, tenderness, and sheer, unadulterated shock. "Zayka, you are on many drugs."

"The best drugs," Shane agreed happily. He tried to wave his free hand expansively and winced as the motion tugged at his IV. "Ow. Okay, no waving. But the heat thing. I've been thinking. A lot. Usually I just... you know. Handle it. But with you..." He leaned in conspiratorially, though his voice remained a stage whisper. "I wanna do it all. The stuff in the books that Rose got me. I wanna be like... a monkey. A sexy monkey. Just hanging off you and screaming."

Ilya had to press his forehead against their joined hands to hide his face. His shoulders shook. It wasn't quite laughter; it was the hysterical release of unbearable tension. "You are insane."

"I'm inspired," Shane corrected, supremely confident. He sighed, a contented, blissful sound. "I'm gonna make you so tired. You'll be like... a noodle. A big, strong, useless noodle. And I'll feed you soup. Noodle soup! For the noodle!" He giggled at his own joke, the sound utterly goofy and unselfconscious.

“I think you should rest, sweetheart,” Ilya managed, his voice muffled against Shane’s skin.

“Good. ‘Cause I’ll be busy. Being a monkey.” Shane’s energy was flagging, his blinks growing longer. “A monkey who loves his tree. My grumpy, beautiful tree who is crrazzzyyy.” His eyes drifted closed, the silly grin softening into a sleepy smile. “Don’t be mad at the tree, okay? The tree is good. The tree is the best.”

He was asleep again within seconds, his breathing deepening, his hand going slack in Ilya’s grasp.

Ilya slowly raised his head. The raw, desperate guilt was still there, a fundamental truth he would have to reckon with. He carefully unfolded Shane’s fingers and stood, his joints protesting. He didn’t leave. He pulled the single, uncomfortable chair close to the bed, sat down, and resumed his vigil. He watched the steady rise and fall of Shane’s padded chest, listened to the beeping monitor, and committed every insane, perfect, drugged-out word to memory. The world outside could wait for a few minutes.

Chapter End Notes

Well this was fun to write. While at work. When I’m supposed to be super responsible... My assistant is a freaky deaky. Now I have two gay besties to help me with the smut 🙄🙄 First of all, to everyone asking if Shane is pregnant already: I see you. I hear you. I am lovingly placing that question in a locked box and sliding it across the floor for later.

Maybe he is...Maybe he isn’t...Maybe Shane is just having the most omega-brained month of his entire life.

Maybe Ilya has finally broken both of their self-control meters beyond repair.

Who can say? Certainly not me. I am innocent.

What I will say is that Shane’s feelings around pregnancy, heats, claiming, and vulnerability are becoming a lot harder for him to ignore. He can rationalize all he wants about timing, contracts, his omega status, and whether it’s responsible, but the want is there now. Loudly. And Ilya, for once, is trying very hard not to take more than Shane is ready to give, which makes everything messier because Shane may actually want him to stop being so careful. wink wink

Also, yes, Ilya being on the same team as Shane for the All-Star game did something irreversible to both of them. That chemistry was dangerous enough before they were emotionally attached. Now? Disaster. Beautiful disaster.

Questions for the comments because I am nosy:

❤️ Do you think Shane actually wants a baby right now, or does he want the proof of being chosen?

❤️ Was Ilya right to hold back and be careful, or is Shane going to have to finally use his words?

As always, thank you for reading and screaming with me. I love y'all ❤️ Next chapter will be Friday. Maybe Thursday if the vibes are right lol

Chapter 31: Chapter 31

Chapter Summary

Hi y'all! ❤️

Before we begin, I have some very important people to thank.

First, a huge thank you to my incredible beta reader for putting up with me and my run on sentences.

Also, a massive thank you to my two resident gays who continue to answer all of my very specific questions with alarming enthusiasm and somehow make every scene even better. You two are absolute legends.

Now... I'd also like to acknowledge my sister.

She read this chapter and told me I should take out some of the steamier scenes.

My beta reader and my bestie both immediately told me, and I quote, "Absolutely not!" and "It's part of the plot"

So naturally, I listened to the more logical people.

You're welcome. 😊

Now enjoy these two idiots finally getting some uninterrupted time together. They've earned it.

(Probably.)

The stale, antiseptic air of the hospital room had become a secondary prison. For thirty minutes, Ilya had stood rooted to the spot by the window, a silent sentinel watching the slow, metronomic rise and fall of Shane's chest beneath the thin hospital blanket. The omega was asleep again, the powerful painkillers pulling him under a soft, merciful tide. The angry purple swelling around his temple, the stark white of the bandage, the unnatural pallor of his skin- each detail was a hot brand pressed against Ilya's mind. He had catalogued them all, the grim proof of failure.

The murmured conversation outside the door had been a low, persistent hum for the last ten minutes. Yuna's voice, sharp with maternal worry, David's calmer, grounding tones, and the measured, clinical responses of the doctor. They were discussing scans, concussion protocols, long-term implications for an athlete. Ilya understood every third word, his English folding under the weight of his own panic. His brain. They are talking about his beautiful, strange, brilliant brain.

The handle of the door jiggled slightly. A testing turn. Ilya's own body went wire-tight, they were finished. They were coming back in.

His gaze snapped from the door back to Shane. Peaceful. Vulnerable. His. This stress could all over with just two small bites. In less than a couple of minutes, he could tie Shane to him forever. The thought was a reflex, a deep, primal current that ran beneath the newer, more fragile layer of his therapy-born restraint. The promise he'd made- to respect boundaries, to not touch without permission, felt like a physical barrier thrumming with voltage. But they were about to be interrupted. The sanctity of their stolen time was about to shatter yet again.

He moved quickly. Three long strides carried him to the bedside. Up close, he could see the faint dusting of freckles across Shane's nose, the dark fan of his lashes against his cheeks, the soft, parted bow of his mouth. The scent of him, muted by hospital sterility and pain, but still fundamentally Shane, the unique, warm signature that existed in the back of Ilya's throat as 'home' - was almost unbearable.

Ilya bent, the world narrowed to the space between their lips. He didn't dare touch him anywhere else, his hands clenched into white-knuckled fists at his sides. The kiss was a ghost of a thing, a brush of warmth so soft it was less a physical act and more a transfer of a promise to be back soon, a desperate sealing of a vow. As he pulled away a millimeter, his lips moved against Shane's skin.

"Ya tebya lyublyu," he whispered, the Russian words rough and guttural in the quiet room. A confession not for Shane to hear, but for himself. A truth so absolute that he had to use a language Shane didn't understand, like a secret planted in the soil of his sleep.

The door handle turned fully. Ilya was a shadow detaching itself from the bed. He was at the room's other door, a private bathroom, in two heartbeats. He slipped inside, leaving it cracked just enough to see Yuna and David re-enter, their focus immediately going to their son. The moment their backs were turned, he flowed out into the empty hallway, a phantom in a designer suit, and was gone.

The return to his hotel room had escalated torment. The silence was like a heavy weight on his chest. The space, which had felt claustrophobic before, now opened like a chasm. Every second that ticked by on the stark digital clock was a second Shane was in a world where Ilya was not present, not watching, not ensuring his safety. He paced, the expensive carpet wearing a path. He poured a vodka shot, stared at it, poured it down the sink. His skin felt too tight, his senses hyper-alert yet receiving no input. The ghost of Shane's scent on his skin was a torture device. He took one of the small, white emergency pills from the bottle in his pocket, dry-swallowing it with a grimace. It would blunt the sharpest edges of the panic, but it did nothing to fill the hollow, howling void where his connection to Shane should be.

He didn't sleep. He watched the sky lighten from black to bruised purple to a sickly gray, each shade a dull copy of the sunrise they'd watched Shane's bed for what seemed like a lifetime ago.

At 8:17 AM, his phone buzzed with a summons, not from Shane, but from the Raiders' front office.

Coach Brannigan- Meeting. Now.

Ilya opened the video link to the meeting and looked into the coach's office. The room was all polished oak and framed jerseys, the smell of leather and stale coffee. Brannigan, a grizzled alpha with a reputation for bluntness, didn't offer him a seat.

"Rozanov."

Ilya nodded, leaning against the hotel headboard, his arms crossed. A defensive posture he didn't bother to disguise.

"You want to explain to me what the hell that was last night?" Brannigan began, tossing a newspaper on his desk within view of the camera. On it was a frozen frame from the game broadcast: Ilya, face a mask of feral rage, being physically restrained by two teammates as medical staff attended to Shane on the ice. “You looked like you were about to fucking kill someone because Hollander took a hit. A legal hit.”

Ilya’s jaw worked. “It was a late hit. Blindsided someone who didn’t have the puck.”

“It’s hockey. It happens. Your reaction was not warranted.” Brannigan leaned forward, his posture full with dominance and frustration. “It was personal. The media is already sniffing. They’re asking questions we don’t have answers for. So I’m asking you: what is your deal with Shane Hollander?”

The air in the room thickened. Ilya held the coach’s gaze, letting the silence stretch, letting the man feel the cold, controlled danger radiating from him. When he finally spoke, his voice was low and utterly flat. “If my game play is not affected, is not your concern.”

“The hell it isn’t! That display affects the team! It’s a distraction!”

“My points. My time on ice. Look at them,” Ilya said, each word a chip of ice. “Then tell me I am distracted.”

Brannigan’s face flushed. He was an alpha used to compliance. Ilya’s quiet, unyielding defiance was a language he didn’t understand. “This isn’t over, Rozanov. Whatever this is, you bury it. Deep. Or there will be consequences.”

Ilya pushed off the bed. The meeting was over. He had said all he would say. “I am here to play hockey. I play hockey. That is all. If you have a problem with me, trade me.”

He turned the meeting off and flung his phone on the bed. It would be a bluff. The teams owners were not going to let him go. The more penalty time, the more unhinged interviews he did, the more revenue he made for the team. His jerseys always sold out. They would be stupid to let him go.

He navigated to Shane’s contact and typed-

IGR- How is your head this morning?

He stared at the screen, the little icon showing the message was delivered. He imagined Shane's phone, perhaps on his bedside table in that hospital room, lighting up with his name. A little pulse of I am here. I am thinking of you.

One minute. Two. Five. The screen remained unchanged. Delivered. Not Read.

A cold trickle, distinct from the earlier panic, began its seep into his veins. Maybe Shane was still sleeping. Maybe his parents had his phone. Maybe the painkillers...

He pulled up his contacts. He had the Hollander's contact information stored, acquired through his previous means. His thumb hovered over Yuna's number. But what was the protocol? What narrative existed in the Hollander household this morning? Had Shane told them about the man who burned another man alive for him-the full story? About the trackers, the surveillance, the desperate, broken alpha who was trying, trying, to be something softer? Or was Ilya still just "Rozanov," the rival, the inconvenient Russian complication?

He couldn't risk it. A wrong move now could unravel everything.

He shoved the phone back into his pocket. The hollow space inside him was no longer howling. It was freezing over, a silent, expanding tundra. He had kissed him. He had whispered the truth into his skin. He had walked away.

And now, there was only silence. A void where an answer should be. And in that void, the old, familiar demons began to stir, whispering that respect and distance were luxuries for men who hadn't already lost everything once before.

He felt his anxiety rising. Ilya moved through it with a cold, military precision, folding shirts and stacking them in his open suitcase with a rigidity that betrayed the tremor in his hands. His flight to Boston wasn't for three hours. His plan, carved into his mind with the sharp edge of necessity, was to return to the hospital. To see him. Just a glimpse from the doorway. To confirm with his own eyes that the color was returning to Shane's face, that the rhythm of his breathing was strong and even. He had already calculated the risk: the Hollanders might be there. The nurses might recognize him. It didn't matter. The compulsion was a physical ache, like a ghost-limb throbbing for its missing half.

A sharp, perfunctory knock at the door shattered the sterile silence. Before he could answer, it opened. Marly stood there, his usual easy-going demeanor replaced by a tense, watchful concern. He held his tablet like a shield.

"Ilya. You need to see this."

"I am packing."

"It's about last night." Marly insisted, stepping inside and closing the door. He didn't wait for permission, navigating to the sports channel and turning the volume up before handing the tablet over.

Ilya's hands wanted to refuse. His eyes betrayed him, locking onto the screen.

There it was, in high-definition, multi-angle slow motion. Kent- a hulking alpha with a reputation for clean, brutal hits -lining up Shane as he cut across the neutral zone with the puck. The contact was shoulder-to-head, a fraction of a second late. Shane's body went limp, a marionette with its strings cut, before crashing into the boards in a horrifically boneless heap.

The broadcast cut to a different camera. This one was trained not on the fallen man, but on Ilya. It captured the exact moment his brain processed the sight. The transformation was terrifying. His face, usually a mask of arrogant, the playful smile on his face, dissolved. His eyes widened, the pupils swallowing the ice-blue irises into pools of pure black fury. A snarl ripped from his throat, inaudible over the crowd noise, a raw, animal sound that had no place on a hockey rink. He dropped his stick, ignored the play completely, and launched himself across the ice not towards the puck, but towards the other player. It took two teammates- big, strong alphas themselves, and Marly wrapping their entire bodies around him to haul him back, his skates scrambling against the ice, his gaze never leaving Shane's motionless form.

“- an absolutely vicious reaction from Rozanov,” a commentator’s voice, slick and excited, filled the hotel room. “You have to wonder what’s behind that. These two have been dueling since they were teenagers.”

Another voice, calmer, analytical, chimed in. “Look at the history. World Juniors. World Championships. They’ve been mirror images, pushing each other to the absolute pinnacle of the sport. There’s a deep, deep respect there, even beneath all the rivalry. You don’t react like that for just anyone. These are the sports two most valuable players, they’re equal, so I’d bet seeing his counterpart go down like that must be worrisome for even someone like him.”

A third clip, from a different network. A former player, an older beta, nodded sagely. “I’ve been saying it for years. The rivalry between Hollander and Rozanov is the best thing to happen to hockey in a generation. It’s built on a foundation of pure respect from what I’m seeing now. Rozanov wasn’t thinking about the game. He was seeing Hollander as a teammate, a young player like himself.”

Respect. The word echoed in the plush, quiet room, a sickening parody of the truth. They were building a narrative, a clean, heroic, sportsmanly myth out of the tangled, bloody wreckage of his obsession. They were painting his feral, possessive terror as noble admiration.

Ilya felt bile rise in his throat. His fingers clenched around the edge of the tablet.

Marly was watching him carefully. “They’re eating it up, Ilya. The ‘fierce respect’ angle. The ‘warrior’s code’ thing. It’s playing really well. Better than... other explanations might.”

Ilya understood the subtext. Better than the truth of a toxic bond, of surveillance and fire and a love that had curdled into something dangerous. The media was offering him a shield, a palatable lie to hide behind. He should have felt relief. Instead, he felt violently ill.

Another channel. A slow-motion replay of his face, frozen in that scream of rage. A caption below: ROZANOV’S INSTINCTIVE LOYALTY. The disconnect was so profound it was dizzying.

He thrust the tablet back at Marly. “They understand nothing,” he said, his voice gravel.

“Maybe,” Marly said softly, taking the tablet. “But this narrative... it might give you some space. Some breathing room. People aren’t asking the wrong questions right now.”

Space. Breathing room. Concepts that felt alien. The only space that mattered was the distance between his hotel and Shane’s hospital room, and it was a distance that screamed in his veins.

His phone, face-down on the dresser, remained dark and silent. No response. The void of it was louder than all the commentators in the world.

“I have to go,” Ilya said, turning back to his suitcase. He zipped it with a final, sharp sound.

“The airport?” Marly asked.

“No,” Ilya said, his back to his friend. He picked up his keys, his wallet, the small bottle of pills. “First, the hospital.”

Marly didn’t try to stop him. He just sighed, a heavy sound of resigned understanding. “Tell him... tell him we’re all thinking of him. That hit would’ve knocked anyone down.”

Ilya gave a short, sharp nod. He would tell him nothing of the sort. He would stand in the hallway, a shadow and he would look. He would feed the starving, terrified thing inside his chest with a single glimpse. And then he would get on a plane all the way back to Boston. Alone.

The text arrived as he got on the elevator. A single word, stark against the sterile white of his phone screen.

Shane- hi.

Ilya's entire world, which had been vibrating on the edge of a catastrophic fracture, stilled. The air rushed from his lungs in a soundless, punched-out gasp. He stared at the screen, the two letters burning into his retinas. Hi. The most mundane, the most monumental word in the English language. It was a lifeline thrown into a maelstrom.

"Out," he said, the word a cracked whip in the silent room.

Marly, who had been hovering by the door watching the news analysis with a furrowed brow, blinked. "What?"

"Get out. Now." Ilya didn't look up from the phone. His thumb was already moving, finding the FaceTime icon, his heart a frantic, caged bird against his ribs. The need to see him was more urgent than oxygen.

Understanding dawned on Marly's face. He didn't argue, just gave a curt nod and slipped out, closing the door with a soft, final click.

Ilya's hand was steady as he initiated the call. A miracle of will. The ringing tone echoed in the empty room, each pulse a lifetime. One ring. Two. His throat tightened. What if it was a mistake? What if it was Yuna, or David, checking his phone? What if he'd changed his mind-

The screen flickered. Connected.

And there he was.

Shane. Propped up in what looked like a guest bed, pillows piled behind him. The harsh, unforgiving light of the hotel room was gone, replaced by the softer, diffused glow of a bedroom lamp. The bruise on his temple was a lurid, violent splash of color against his unusually pale skin, the bandage stark. But his eyes... his eyes were clear. The fog of pain and concussion had receded, leaving the familiar, intelligent, guarded brown gaze that Ilya knew like the map of his own soul. He looked exhausted, shadows pooling beneath his eyes, but he was present. He was Shane.

“Bozhe moy,” Ilya breathed, the Russian prayer slipping out unbidden. He drank in the sight, a man in a desert finding an oasis. “You are... you look...”

“Like I got hit by a truck?” Shane finished, his voice a little rough, a little thin, but his. A ghost of a smile touched his lips, then vanished. “Hi.”

“Hi,” Ilya echoed, the word feeling absurdly inadequate. He leaned closer to the screen, as if he could bridge the digital divide through sheer force of need. “I have been... I was...” He couldn’t articulate the scale of the panic. It would sound like what it was: madness. He settled for the raw, unvarnished truth. “I was very worried.”

“I’m okay,” Shane said, and it sounded like he was reciting a doctor’s report. “Concussion, grade two. A few bruised ribs. Nothing’s broken. They want me to take it easy for a week, no screens, no stimulation.” He gestured vaguely at the phone, a wry twist to his mouth. “I’m already failing that. But I’ll be cleared for playoffs.”

The calm, factual delivery was so quintessentially Shane. But Ilya’s instincts, honed to a razor’s edge by obsession, caught the subtle tension in his jaw, the way his eyes didn’t quite hold the screen.

“A week,” Ilya repeated, his voice low. “That is... very fast.” The image of Shane’s limp body on the ice flashed behind his eyes. The thought of him being cleared to step back onto that ice, into that violence, so soon, sent a fresh wave of cold dread through him. He wanted to demand, to forbid. The old, possessive alpha rose in his chest, snarling. He forced it down, his knuckles white where he gripped the phone. “You are sure?”

“The doctors are sure,” Shane said, a defensive edge creeping into his tone. It was the same tone he’d used when insisting he could handle his suppressants alone, that he didn’t need monitoring. A tone that walled Ilya out. He looked down, picking at the edge of the blanket. A long, heavy silence stretched between them, filled only with the faint static of the connection.

Then Shane looked up, but not at the camera. His gaze was fixed somewhere over his phone, his expression shifting into something uncertain, vulnerable. “Ilya,” he began, then stopped. He swallowed. “Last night... in the hospital. I have this... fuzzy memory. It’s probably just the drugs.” He finally met the camera, his eyes searching Ilya’s pixelated face. “Did you... were you there? At some point? Or was I dreaming?”

“Yes,” Ilya said, he couldn’t help the smile when he thought about how his usually calm, boring omega had acted while high. The word simple and heavy as a stone dropped into still water. “I was there. You were...very happy to see me. I could not stay too long.”

A complicated wave of emotion passed over Shane’s face- relief that his memory had an anchor, followed swiftly by a deep, flustered embarrassment. A soft groan escaped him, and he pressed the heel of his hand to his forehead, wincing slightly at the pressure on his bruise. “God,” he muttered, the sound thick with frustration. “Okay. Yeah. I thought... it felt real.”

Then, abruptly, he lowered the phone. The screen on Ilya’s end dissolved into a chaotic, blurry swirl of blue- the fabric of Shane’s t-shirt, the indeterminate shadows of the room. Ilya was left staring into this intimate, abstract void, the sudden loss of Shane’s face a physical shock. He could hear Shane’s unsteady breathing, a little shaky, a little overwhelmed.

“Solnyshko?” Ilya asked softly, the endearment slipping out into the blue blur. “Are you... is this too much?”

There was no verbal answer. Just the soft, ragged sound of Shane’s breath, and the profound, aching silence of a man hiding from the camera, and from the unbearable weight of being seen. “Um, I said some...”

Ilya fully grinned then, enamoured at the embarrassed flush crossing his face. “What? Do you not want to, what was it...” Ilya narrowed his eyes playfully, tapping his temples as if searching for the words, “oh now I remember! You want to ‘climb me like a tree’ I’d like that very much though. We cannot forget that very important detail of your speech.”

The blue blur on the screen trembled slightly with Shane’s shaky exhale. Ilya’s grin softened into something tender, aching. He could picture it perfectly: Shane’s face buried in the pillow, the tips of his ears flushed a brilliant, mortified red. The memory of last night- Shane, dovey and grinning, his words slurry but devastatingly clear, was a treasure Ilya would hoard forever. It was a glimpse of the unguarded, unfiltered omega he'd only ever seen in fragments, a side Shane's brilliant, analytical mind usually kept under lock and key.

"Shane," Ilya said, his voice dropping into a low, soothing register meant to calm spooked omegas. The blue blur on the screen trembled slightly with Shane's shaky exhale. Ilya's grin softened into something tender, aching. He could picture it perfectly- Shane's face buried in the pillow, the tips of his ears flushed a brilliant, mortified red. The memory of last night- Shane, doozy and grinning, his words slurry but devastatingly clear, was a treasure Ilya would hoard forever. It was a glimpse of the unguarded, unfiltered omega he'd only ever seen in fragments, a side Shane's brilliant, analytical mind usually kept under lock and key.

"Shane," Ilya said, his voice dropping into a low, soothing register meant to calm spooked animals. "milyy moy. Look at me. Please."

There was a long pause, then the phone shifted. Slowly, Shane brought it back up. His face was indeed flushed, his eyes screwed shut for a second before he forced them open, meeting Ilya's gaze with a look of pure, agonized chagrin.

"I didn't... I mean, I might have said... things," Shane mumbled, the words tripping over each other. "The drugs, they... my filter was just... gone. Completely offline."

"I know," Ilya said, his smile gentle. "And it was the most honest, wonderful thing I have ever witnessed. You were... luminous." He let the sincerity bleed into every syllable, needing Shane to understand this wasn't mockery. It was reverence. "You asked me to stay. You told me you missed my voice. You said..." He paused, watching Shane's eyes widen in dawning horror. "You said many true things your brilliant, overthinking brain would never normally permit you to say."

Shane groaned again, dropping his forehead against the phone's camera with a soft thump, once more obscuring Ilya's view. "Oh my god. Stop. I'm dying."

"You are not dying. You are embarrassed. There is difference." Ilya waited, giving him space. When Shane remained hidden, he continued, the playful lilt leaving his voice, replaced by a solemn gravity. "Shane. Listen to me. If remembering this... makes you want to take back the invitation, to pull away again, I will understand. I will hate it, but I will understand. My promise stands. You set the pace."

The blue fabric stilled. Shane's breathing, loud in the speaker, evened out slightly. He didn't move the phone.

"But," Ilya continued, the word a soft confession in the quiet, "I hope you do not take it back. I hope you let it be what it was: a gift. A moment of truth. Nothing to be ashamed of."

Another minute stretched. Then, with palpable effort, Shane lifted the phone. His face was still pink, but the raw embarrassment was being wrestled under control, replaced by a familiar, cautious thoughtfulness. He bit his lower lip, a nervous habit Ilya hadn't seen in months. It sent a pang of fierce longing straight through Ilya's chest.

"You're not just... saying that?" Shane asked, his voice small. "Because I was hurt? Or because you feel... obligated?"

The question was a blade, cutting to the heart of every doubt- Ilya's pathological protectiveness, his confusing obsession with devotion. Shane was seeking the assurances that he needed, searching for the hidden angle.

Ilya made sure his face showed nothing but stark, open honesty. "No obligations. No pity. I am saying it because I can't think of anything that I would want more than to spend time with you, alone, for longer than a few hours. Because I have missed you. Not just the fucking, but the... the daily noise of you. I would love to just be with you. The stupid jokes, silence while you think, I want to see that in person instead of phone." Ilya paused, hoping that the words were coming out right. "I am saying it because I want to hear all of it, always. High, sober, angry, happy. All of it. I cannot think of anything I'd rather do."

Shane studied him, his intensity focusing through the screen, parsing Ilya's micro-expressions for truth. Seemingly satisfied, the tension in his shoulders eased a fraction. He reached up and tugged on an eyelash, something that Ilya knew was something of a self-soothing gesture when he was getting overwhelmed. "So... the summer. What I said about... maybe spending some of it. Together. You meant that? You want that?"

The answer was a reflex, a truth so fundamental it bypassed his brain and came straight from his marrow. "Yes." No hesitation. No calculated pause. "Any part. All of it. A day, a week, just tell me when I can book the flight.”

A real, fragile smile finally touched Shane’s lips, smoothing the worry from his brow. “Okay. Okay, good. Because I... I think I do too. My doctor and I are... she’ll be happy that I’m having a full heat.” A furious blush spread across his face. “For... obvious reasons. But I think if you want-if you can stay for maybe two weeks, we can, I don’t know. Maybe ease into things?”

Of course. Structured, safe, managed. It was so perfectly Shane it made Ilya’s heart squeeze. “I will follow any plan,” Ilya vowed. “Any rules. You write the plan, solnyshko. I will be your most obedient servant.”

The smile grew a little wider, a little more real. “Don’t push it,” Shane said, but there was no heat in it.

From the blurry background of Shane’s screen, a distant sound filtered through: a door opening, the murmur of voices - Yuna’s distinct cadence, David’s lower rumble. Shane’s eyes flickered away from the camera, the moment shattering.

“I have to go,” he said, the regret clear in his voice. “They’re back.”

“Call me,” Ilya said instantly, the words a plea and a promise woven together. “Tonight. When you can. We will make the plan.”

“I will,” Shane whispered. He looked at Ilya one more time, his gaze soft, unguarded. “Bye, Ilya.”

“Spokoynoy nochi, solnyshko,” Ilya murmured.

The call ended. The screen went dark, reflecting Ilya’s own face back at him- exhausted, hollow, but for the first time since the game, alight with a fragile, burning hope. He stared at the silent phone in his hand, the ghost of Shane’s shy smile imprinted on his vision. This was good. they had a plan- now just to wait. A call to receive tonight. And a summer, however fractionally offered, that stretched before him like a promise of salvation.

A few hours after Ilya landed and made it to Boston, Shane had still not called, but with a soft, sequential buzz of text notifications. Ilya, who had been staring at the same page of a book for forty-five minutes without absorbing a word, snatched his phone from the desk.

Shane- Headache. Can't do voice. But I'm here.

Shane- Doctor Morrison came by the house. Said I'm on track.

Relief, sharp and clean, cut through Ilya's constant low-grade anxiety. He typed back, his fingers clumsy with haste.

IGR- This is good. What is the track?

Shane- Rest this week. Light skating in 7 days. No contact. No full game for probably 10-14 days. But I'll be on the bench for the playoffs if we make it.

IGR- You will make it.

It was a statement of faith in his ability, not just for the sport. Shane's team would advance because Shane had been having such a great season, they were in the perfect position to advance, even if Shane would miss a few games.

Shane- Your flight. To Ontario. We should lock it in? I mean if you still want to.

IGR- I have already looked. June 28th. Arrives 3:15 PM. I figured it would give us enough time to do the interviews and everything after one of us wins the cup.

Shane- You didn't book it yet?

IGR- I was waiting for your ok.

Shane- Right. Okay. Well, if you're sure, booking the tickets sounds like a plan.

Shane- I'll pick you up.

IGR- You do not have to.

Shane- I want to. The cottage is about an hour away. We've never driven together before, so it might be nice.

The texting paused. Ilya watched the text bubbles go on and off for a minute.

Shane- Plus I think I want to spend every minute with you that I can for however long you want to stay.

A faint, aching smile touched Ilya's lips. Of course. Shane was engineering this, building a safe space for the both of them. His car, a space he controlled, was the perfect first for Shane.

IGR- I will book it now.

There was a pause. Ilya could imagine him, propped up in bed, ice pack on his temple, calculating.

Shane- That's 7 weeks from now.

Shane- 12 if... if both our teams go all the way.

IGR- I know.

Shane- It's a long time.

IGR- We have survived longer separations.

IGR- This one has an end date. And a plan. Is different.

The silence that followed was contemplative, not empty. Ilya could feel the weight of the unspoken history in it- this was different. This was the promise of a solid stretch of time, just the two of them, together.

Shane- Yeah. It is different.

Shane- I have to sleep. The light from the screen is... not great.

IGR- Go. Sleep, dorogoy.

Shane- I know.

Shane- Goodnight, Ilya.

Ilya stared at the final message. I know. Not an echo, not a reciprocation, but an acknowledgment. An acceptance of the truth, if not yet a readiness to hold it. It was enough. It was more than enough.

He booked the flight immediately, the confirmation email appearing like a talisman in his inbox.

For the first time in years, Ilya Rozanov had a future to look forward to. He had a date. A plan. A framework. He had the ghost of a smile that belonged only to him, and the quiet, certain knowledge that in a few weeks, he would step off a plane and into the environment of Shane Hollander's favorite place on earth, and the long, careful work of coming home would begin.

The hit came in Game Five of the second round, a ruthless, legal check into the boards that drove the breath from Ilya's lungs and sent a lightning bolt of white-hot agony through his ribs. He heard the crack more than felt it, a sickening, internal sound. He finished the shift on pure, snarling instinct, but when he got to the bench, the team doctor took one look at his ashen face and shallow breathing and shut him down.

"No fracture, but you've got a hell of an intercostal sprain, maybe a cartilage separation. You're done."

Boston lost the game. They lost the round two days later with Ilya in a suit, watching from the press box, a constant, dull throb in his side that was nothing compared to the hollow ache of elimination. The medication helped with the pain, but it did nothing for the silence. The season was over.

He flew back to his sterile Boston apartment and did the only thing he could: he became a spectator.

He watched every remaining Montreal game. He saw Shane return to the lineup in the Eastern Conference Finals, wearing a full cage, moving with a calculated caution that spoke of lingering headache and medical caution. He saw the moment, midway through Game Three, when the caution fell away, and the old, brilliant, instinctual Shane re-emerged, weaving through defenders with that impossible grace. Ilya's own ribs twinged in sympathy with every hit Shane took, but a fierce, burning pride eclipsed the pain. That is my omega. Look at him.

The Stanley Cup Final was a spectacle. Montreal versus Vegas. Ilya watched from his dark living room, a single glass of water in his hand. He saw the sweat, the blood, the sheer desperation. He saw Shane, in Game Six, with the series tied 3-3, take a pass at the blue line, dance around a hulking defenseman, and snap a shot that rang off the crossbar and in. The arena erupted.

Ilya didn't move. He just watched, a faint, unbreakable smile on his face as the clock ran down, as the Montreal players flooded the ice, a wave of red and blue and screaming joy. The camera found Shane, helmet off, hair plastered to his forehead, his face a sublime canvas of shock, exhaustion, and dawning, incomprehensible elation. He was swept into a crush of teammates, bear-hugged, head-rubbed, a prized possession of the mob.

Then the camera panned. It found Yuna and David Hollander, being escorted down to the ice. Yuna was crying, her hands pressed to her mouth. David had an arm around her, his own eyes bright. They reached Shane, and the three of them embraced, a tight, private unit in the middle of the public frenzy. A family, a foundation.

Ilya's smile didn't falter, but the silence in his apartment became auditory, a high-pitched ring in the aftermath of the broadcast's roar. He remembered his own Cup win, a year ago. The noise, the confetti, the crushing weight of the trophy on his shoulders. And the profound, gutting loneliness that had followed him off the ice. No family. No one whose eyes sought only him in the crowd. Svetlana had been there that night, too, a fierce, loving comfort in the aftermath. But it wasn't the same.

He pushed the memory out. This was not his night to mourn old ghosts. This was Shane's.

Later, after the trophy had been hoisted, the photos taken, the initial chaos channeled toward the locker room, his phone buzzed on the coffee table. A FaceTime call. The caller ID made his heart stutter: SHANE.

He answered. The screen was a chaotic, blurry jumble of celebration. The noise was a wall of sound- shouting, laughter, the clang of lockers, the hiss of showers, music blaring. He couldn't see a face, just flashes of red fabric, bare shoulders, the gleam of the Cup passing somewhere in the background.

"Ilya?!" Shane's voice, breathless and grinning, fought to rise above the din.

"I am here!" Ilya called back, holding the phone closer, as if proximity could bridge the chaos.

"I can't- hold on-" The image swirled, then stabilized slightly. Shane had wedged himself into what looked like a equipment alcove, the noise marginally dampened. His face was flushed, his eyes blazing with a light Ilya had never seen before. The Stanley Cup was visible over his shoulder, being kissed by a passing teammate. "Did you see?"

"I saw everything," Ilya said, and he knew his own voice was too soft, too full of a devotion that had no place in this cacophony, but he didn't care. "You were magnificent."

Shane's smile was incandescent. "It doesn't feel real! My head is- God, everything is so loud-" He winced, but it was a happy wince. The concussion sensitivity, amplified by a thousand.

"I know. Do not stay on the phone. Go. Be with your team."

“I wanted to hear your voice,” Shane said, the words rushed, earnest.

It was not just noise. It was the soundtrack of Shane’s ultimate triumph, and he was choosing to share the raw, overwhelming heart of it with Ilya. The gesture was worth more than any quiet, private call later could ever be.

“I’m so proud of you, Hollander,” Ilya said.

Shane blushed hard, almost preening at the compliment. “Okay, I gotta- they’re looking for me- next week, right?”

“June 28th,” Ilya confirmed, the date like a lifeline thrown across the roaring sea between them.

“Okay! Bye!”

The call ended as abruptly as it began, swallowed by the celebration. Ilya lowered the phone. The silence of his apartment rushed back in, but it was different now. It was no longer empty. It was filled with the echo of that glorious, shared noise, and the palpable, ticking countdown of the days.

Svetlana found him an hour later, letting herself in with her key. She took in the dark room, the TV playing recaps of the game, of Montreal going crazy with fans on the streets and bars, the man sitting perfectly still on the couch. “You watched?”

“Yes.”

“And?”

“He called. From the locker room.”

Svetlana's eyebrows shot up. A slow smile spread across her face. "That's my boy." She came over, squeezed his shoulder. "You okay?"

Ilya looked at her, then out the dark window. The hollow ache was still there, the loneliness a familiar coat he could not shed. But beneath it, warm and steady, was that new thing: a patient, waiting pride.

"I will be," he said. And for the first time, he almost believed it.

The Stanley Cup parade was a riot of noise and color on the muted television screen, a stark contrast to the methodical silence of Ilya's penthouse. Red and blue confetti swirled over a sea of ecstatic faces in Montreal. Shane, perched on the back of a convertible, looked simultaneously overwhelmed and radiant, holding the Cup aloft with a wide smile while sitting between JJ and Hayden. Ilya watched for a moment, a familiar, complicated pride tightening his chest, before turning back to the open suitcase on his bed when the camera focused on other team members.

Packing for spending an extended time with Shane was not easy. The question- what does one pack when the plan is to be naked most of the time?- was both a genuine question that he had not guideline for and he didn't want to assume anything. He moved through his large closet trying to come up with different outfits to cover all options.

He started with the lounge wear: soft, expensive cotton pants, a hoodie he knew Shane really liked, a few thin, worn in t-shirts. Clothes for comfort, not for performing. Next, workout gear- a concession to the reality of their bodies and the shared, ingrained need for movement. He packed his own coffee, the particular bitter Russian blend Shane had once grimaced at but Ilya still liked it. He grabbed shoes and underwear, his electronics, and his journal.

Then, his hand hovered over the small, discreet toiletry bag. From it, he withdrew a single, unlabeled prescription bottle. His suppressants. He held it for a long moment, the plastic cool against his palm. Taking them was a daily act of will, a chemical muzzle on the most primal part of his nature. He hated them. They made the world feel muffled, like a pane of thick glass between him and his own instincts. But they were also a peace offering, a tangible promise. See? I can be calm. I can be safe. You will not be overwhelmed. He tucked the bottle into a zippered compartment, just in case Shane changed his mind at the last minute, their vacation wouldn't be ruined.

His phone buzzed on the nightstand. He didn't need to look to know it was Shane. The updates had been a constant, gentle stream throughout the day.

Shane- Parade is loud but crazy. I've never seen so many people at once. Was it like that for you?

IGR- Was better. I did my parade shirtless, remember. People loved it.

Shane- My mom would murder me. She's crying again.

Shane- This is the last event. Then it's just... us.

Us. The word shimmered between them, full of promise. The quiet of a lakeside cottage. The quiet of a space with no cameras, no teammates, no family. Just them, together.

IGR- I am packed.

Shane- Already? Your flight isn't until the end of the week.

IGR- I am prepared.

He was. And he was not. He was prepared for different scenarios for their time together. The good memories- the easy banter, the competitive drive, the shocking tenderness. And the bad- the chilling discovery of the trackers, the betrayed silence, the lingering phantom smell of gasoline and burning flesh that sometimes haunted Ilya's dreams.

Things were, as Shane's text had said, seemingly going really good. The daily contact was a lifeline. But Ilya, whose entire being was wired to analyze Shane's every micro-expression, heard the caution in that "seemingly." He felt it in the pauses between messages, the way Shane still sometimes ended calls abruptly when his family entered the room. The foundation was being rebuilt, but it was still new, feelings were still raw. One wrong step could sink into it and leave a permanent mark.

He folded a final sweater, his movements precise. On the TV, the camera zoomed in on Shane accepting a giant ceremonial key from the mayor. He looked so young. Trying so hard to appear like the perfect, confident man that everyone was looking up to. So beautiful. Ilya's chest ached with a love that was still, despite all his therapy, all his medication, a terrifyingly possessive thing. He wanted to devour that burden, to carry every ounce of it himself. The old, monstrous instinct whispered that Shane should be able to be an omega that Ilya controlled, curated, and owned.

He shut the suitcase with a definitive click, silencing the thought. That was the old path. The path that led to fire and ruin and would lose him Shane. The new path was letting Shane see that he was better, deserving of him. The faith he had for Ilya to be the man who had earned to be forgiven for unconscionable things might still have room for the man he was trying, desperately, to become.

He was packed. He was prepared. He was terrified. And for the first time in a while, the countdown in his head didn't feel like a sentence. It felt like a heartbeat.

The roar of the parade faded into the echoing silence of the car, which then he turned on the radio for some background noise, of some soothing instrumental music. Shane drove straight from the final press conference, a duffel bag of sweat-damp celebration clothes in the trunk and the heavy satisfying fact that he'd won the Stanley Cup so early in his career. He felt it in his chest. He'd done it- and Ilya had been so proud of him every time that they spoke over the last couple of days. The need for quiet was a physical thirst. More than that, the need to prepare was an itch in his hands, a compulsion in his orderly mind.

The cottage welcomed him with the faint, dusty scent of pine and closed-up stillness. He opened every window first, letting the early summer air, cool and carrying the scent of the lake, sweep through the rooms. Then, he began. The cleaning service had been by earlier that week to make sure things were free of the construction debris, but he didn't want a stranger's scent in here, this place was only for Ilya and himself.

The grocery list was a notepad on his phone, meticulously curated over the past week. It wasn't all guesswork. It was very intentional, he wanted to make sure they wouldn't need any time away from each other or to . He stood in the brightly-lit supermarket aisle, his baseball cap pulled low, and reconstructed Ilya's pantry from memory: the specific brand of salted black licorice Ilya craved after games, the expensive jar of pickled garlic he'd eat straight with a fork, the dark, bitter rye bread. He added the obvious- coffee, the bitter Russian blend- and then the things he'd simply noticed Ilya reaching for over and over: yogurts with sweet mix-ins, almonds, a particular type of sparkling water. He bought the Cokes, of course. The staple of their hotel room minibars and Ilya's fridge. He filled a cart with all the favorites he read about, provisioning for the whole summer so they wouldn't need to be apart.

Back at the cottage, he put everything away in its precise place. He cleaned surfaces that were already clean. He washed the blankets on the sun-bleached sofa and made up the bed in the main bedroom with fresh sheets, his hands pausing on the cotton. This was the room. This was where it would happen. His heat was a predictable, ticking clock in his biology, due to arrive like a storm front precisely two days after he would stop taking his suppressants. The thought sent a jolt of pure, undiluted anxiety through him, sharp enough to override the lingering exhaustion from the playoffs.

He'd never spent a heat with anyone. His entire adult life had been so focused on his goals. To not let anyone find out his secret, to prove to himself and to his parents that their years of sacrifice weren't in vain. The idea of being that vulnerable, that exposed, with Ilya- with the alpha whose love had once been indistinguishable from obsession- was terrifying. It was also, a deeper, more shameful part of him whispered, the secret hope he'd barely allowed himself to name.

On the second day of waiting, the silence of the cottage began to press in on him. He took out his rarely used burner phone, his thumb hovering over his doctor's contact. Dr. B had answered on the second ring.

"Shane. I saw the games. Congratulations. And how is the head?"

They went through the concussion follow-up briefly, Shane assuring her the headaches were down to a rare twinge sometimes. Then, he took a breath that shuddered in his chest. "The, um. The other thing. My cycle. It's... due. Soon."

A pause on the line, clinical and assessing. "I see. And has that relationship has changed from our last discussion?"

“Yes.” The word was a whisper. “He’s... coming here. In two days. For at least my heat, maybe longer.”

Another pause. He could hear the rustle of papers, the click of a keyboard. “Shane, you know the statistics. The chance of conception during a partnered, un-suppressed heat is exceptionally high. If pregnancy is not a desired outcome at this time, I would strongly recommend the birth control injection. It suppresses ovulation for that cycle only. It’s effective, gets out of your system fairly quickly, and has fewer systemic side effects than your standard suppressants.”

Pregnancy. The word wasn’t abstract. It was a series of images and facts for Shane: a positive test, the media firestorm, the end of his career as he knew it, the terrifying transformation of his body, the loss of control. It was also, treacherously, an image of Ilya’s stunned, reverent face, his large hands, impossibly gentle, on a rounded stomach. His mother’s tears of a different kind. A tiny, impossibly beautiful tiny person with Ilya’s ocean blue eyes.

His career. Their careers. The relationship that was still so new, so fragile, built on therapy and promises and whatever the next few weeks would build. It was insane to want a baby right now.

“Get me the shot please,” he said, his voice firm, deciding. The part of him that was a strategist, a survivor, won out. “Overnight it if you can with instructions.”

“I’ll send it to the pharmacy in town that you can trust. No names and they have a drive through. You can pick it up tomorrow. Administer it in the thigh, 48 hours before the anticipated start of your symptoms.” She relayed the clinical details, and Shane committed them to memory.

The silence stretched again. He could hang up. He had what he needed. But the other question, the terrifying one, was a lump in his throat. His face grew hot. “Dr. B?”

“Yes, Shane?”

“When... when it happens. With an alpha there. What... what should I expect?” He forced the words out, each one a struggle. “I’ve only ever... been alone. And on some of the suppressants. It was just... painful.”

Her voice softened, just a degree. “It will be intense. It depends on the alpha, but the usual effects are the drive to nest, to be close, will be overwhelming. Your sensitivity to his scent will be magnified a thousandfold. It will likely guide everything- what feels safe, what feels necessary. Physically, it can be... profound. The presence of a trusted alpha can mitigate the fever and the muscle aches significantly. The experience can shift from one of illness to one of...” She searched for the clinical term. “...heightened reciprocal connection. Clear, ongoing consent is paramount, even when verbal communication may be difficult. Have you established non-verbal signals? A way to check in? Do you trust this Alpha to respect your boundaries?”

Shane’s mind raced. They hadn’t. They had a plan for summer, for talking, for driving from the airport. They didn’t have a plan for this. “No, I mean, yes I trust him but we haven’t spoken much about the details.” he admitted, his blush deepening.

“Establish them before the symptoms begin. A tap, a word, a gesture. It is your responsibility to yourself, and his to you, to have that framework.” She paused. “He is aware of the timing?”

“Yes. I told him.”

“And his response?”

A soft hum from Dr. B. “Then make a plan, Shane. That is what you are good at. Prepare the space, prepare your body, prepare your signals. Control what you can. It will help.”

He hung up, the phone warm in his hand. The cottage was perfectly ready. The groceries were stocked. The bed was made. The injection would be in his hands tomorrow. He had a list of things to research: non-verbal safe words, nesting behaviors, alpha-omega dynamics during a partnered cycle. He had a plan to formulate.

He walked to the large window overlooking the lake, its surface like a sheet of hammered silver under the grey sky. In two days, Ilya would be here. The silence would be filled. And the deepest, most hidden part of himself- the omega he had spent a lifetime medicating into silence- was stirring, awake, terrified and yearning, counting down the hours.

The drive to the pharmacy in town felt like a test. Shane waited at the drive-thru and he checked his phone again, sending a quick text to Rose when she asked if he wanted to come to her movie shoot while he was free for a few days. The brim of his hat casting a shadow over his face, as he mumbled the pick up order number Dr. B had texted him over the speaker. A small box came down the delivery tube. He muttered his thanks and was back in the safety of the cottage within an hour.

Back at the cottage, he didn't open it immediately. He placed it on the kitchen counter and stared. It was a decision that had to be made. It was the only choice, even though it made him feel strange. We are doing this, but we are not risking a pregnancy yet. The logic was impeccable. The emotions were like a turbulent sea beneath the ice. Part of him, the part that had meticulously planned his career since he was fourteen, was screaming in approval. The other part, the newly-awakened, deeply uncertain omega, felt a pang of something like regret. It was insane. They were athletes at their peak. Their relationship was a carefully negotiated ceasefire. A child was a nuclear bomb for his life right now. And yet... the image wouldn't leave him: Ilya's fierce, focused intensity, the terrifying depth of his devotion, turned not on possession but on nurture. It was a fantasy so dangerous he had to physically shake his head to dispel it.

His laptop became his like his command center. He cleared his browsing history twice, his face perpetually flushed, as he dove into medical journals, obscure omega-focused forums, and dry anthropological texts. He learned about the "reciprocal calming effect" of a bonded alpha's presence, the potential for a partnered heat to reduce systemic stress markers even as it amplified sensory and emotional intensity. He read clinical descriptions of nesting behaviors- the drive to create a secure, scent-saturated environment. That, he understood. He'd already done it. The groceries weren't just supplies; they were offerings. The cleaned cottage wasn't just tidy; it was a den.

But the personal accounts were what truly unmoored him. Stories of overwhelming connection, of words becoming unnecessary, of a harmony that transcended the physical ache. Others spoke of claustrophobia, of feeling consumed, of the terrifying loss of self.

Which would it be? With Ilya, it could so easily be both. The man was a paradox- a predator who had learned to kneel, a storm contained by sheer will. Would his presence feel like a shelter or a cage?

The question of non-verbal signals was the most immediate problem. No one could script or fully plan out a heat, but he could script a safety protocol. He picked up his phone, his thumb slick with nervous sweat.

Shane- We need a safe word. Or a safe signal. For next week.

IGR- You have one in mind?

Shane- Not sure. I've been reading some blogs. I read that words might... not work. Some omega's use like this tap method. Three rapid taps would mean stop. Check in.

IGR- Three taps. I understand.

Shane- And you need one too. In case you... need to stop. Or step away.

There was a long pause. Shane could imagine Ilya's frown, the slight crease between his brows as he processed the idea that he, the alpha, might need an escape hatch.

IGR- I do not think I would need one. You already listen to what I say, when we are together.

Shane- Okay. if you're sure.

With that agreed on, Shane felt much more comfortable.

The next thirty-six hours were filled with heightened perception. The cottage, a place designed for Shane to be able to fully relax, felt like it was fully of electric anticipation, as if the very walls were trembling with the foresight that they'd be witness to a monumental shift in this relationship.. He found himself rearranging the living room furniture, pulling the largest, softest armchair closer to the fireplace. He took one of Ilya's forgotten practice jerseys from his own duffel bag- a relic he'd never admitted to keeping- and folded it carefully, placing it on the foot of the bed. It might be a bit embarrassing to let Ilya know that he'd taken it but it was one of his most treasured possessions and he needed it close by..

His body began its subtle, familiar countdown. A low-grade thrum of energy in his veins, a sensitivity in his skin so that the brush of his cotton shirt felt like a whisper. His sense of smell sharpened exponentially. He could distinguish the damp earth by the shoreline from the dry pine needles on the path, the waxy scent of the cleaning products from the dusty sweetness of the old books on the shelf.

The silence was no longer empty. It was thick with anticipation, a held breath. He tried to read, but the words swam. He tried to watch a game tape, but the strategies seemed trivial, distant. All that was real was the space, the slowly gathering pressure in his own body, and the phantom sensation of a presence not yet arrived.

On the final evening, he stood on the dock as a slow drizzle began to fall, misting the lake and shrouding the opposite shore. The air smelled of petrichor and wet wood. Growing up, he loved the smell. Loved being outside during summer rains and now he'd get to share that with Ilya.

He went inside, locking the door behind him. The cottage was ready. The protocols were in place. The injection would be in his system. His research was a jumble of facts in his head. All that was left was the waiting, and the terrifying, thrilling surrender to an unknown experience. He was no longer just Shane Hollander, champion. He was an omega preparing for his alpha to spend a long stretch of time with him for the first time. He curled up on the sofa, the soft fabric smelling faintly of laundry detergent, and waited for the world to change.

The Range Rover felt like a spaceship. Too quiet, too smooth, the scent of its pristine leather interior still somehow sterile despite the pine-scented air freshener that they'd clipped to a vent. A gift from team ownership for winning the Cup. It was practical, reliable, and the windows were so darkly tinted they turned the bright afternoon into a perpetual, private twilight. Shane was grateful for that. It made the terminal's bustling curb much more manageable.

He'd parked in the exact spot they'd texted about. Column 3B, by the taxi stand. His hands were tight on the steering wheel, knuckles pale. The nervous energy wasn't the bad kind, not the tense energy that used to coil in his stomach before facing Ilya on the ice. This was a high-frequency buzz in his veins, a static of what if and I missed you and please let this be okay. He'd run through the script in his head a dozen times. Park. See him. Smile. Hug? No, too much. A nod. Get the suitcase. Open the trunk. Say something normal.

The script evaporated the moment Ilya emerged from the sliding glass doors.

He moved through the crowd with an unconscious, predatory grace that made everyone else seem like background extras. A single rolling suitcase, sleek and black. His outfit was simple- black sleeveless shirt, black shorts, a black baseball cap on backwards- but on Ilya, it looked like a uniform. The shirt showed the powerful cut of his shoulders and arms, the beautiful constellations of birthmarks that were splattered in the most fascinating patterns across his upperbody, familiar scars from old hockey wounds. He looked... incredible. Not just handsome, but present. Solid. Real after weeks of being a voice on the phone or a pixelated image.

Shane's heart did a complicated, painful squeeze against his ribs. The nerves were still there, a skittering flock of birds in his chest, but they were drowned out by a wave of pure, uncomplicated happiness so sharp it made his eyes sting. He unlocked the doors.

Ilya saw the car, a faint smile touching his lips. He loaded his suitcase into the back with efficient ease, then slid into the passenger seat. The car's interior seemed to shrink, the air pressure changing instantly, becoming richer, heavier. He brought with him the scent of airplane air and faint cologne, but underneath it, the essential, grounding scent of Ilya- clean, sharp, alpha, home. It hit Shane's senses like a physical touch, and he had to consciously stop himself from leaning into it.

"Hi," Shane said, the word too loud in the quiet cabin.

"Hello, solnyshko," Ilya said, his voice a low rumble. His blue eyes scanned Shane's face, taking in the probably-too-wide eyes, the flush on his cheeks. The scrutiny should have felt unbearable, but it felt like being seen for the first time in a while.

The control was gone. Shane's body moved on its own. He leaned across the center console, bracing one hand on Ilya's chest, and pressed a quick, closed-mouth kiss to his lips. It was over in a second. A peck. Chaste. But his lips tingled, and the thankfulness for the darkened windows was a prayer in his mind.

Ilya went perfectly still for a heartbeat, loving when Shane initiated physical touch like this.

Shane pulled back, fumbling with his seatbelt, putting the car in drive. "So, um. The drive's about an hour. Maybe a little more with traffic leaving the city. I stocked up on snacks. And drinks. The, uh, the licorice you like is in the bag behind your seat if you want it now. The traffic report said the 400 was clear but there was construction on the 11, so I mapped an alternate route that goes through some smaller towns. It's prettier, less trucks, but it adds about twelve minutes, do you mind? I should have asked. We can just take the highway if you're tired."

The words spilled out of him, a nervous, rambling stream. He could feel Ilya's smile beside him, a warm, silent presence. He didn't interrupt, just let Shane talk himself out, his gaze a gentle weight on Shane's profile.

When Shane finally paused for breath, his right hand fluttering restlessly on the gear shift, Ilya reached over. He didn't grab, didn't command. He simply slid his palm under Shane's twitching hand, turning it over. His thumb stroked once, slowly, over the racing pulse in Shane's wrist. Then he lifted Shane's hand and pressed a deliberate, soft kiss to the center of his palm.

The effect was instantaneous and catastrophic to Shane's composure. A jolt, white-hot and sweet, shot straight up his arm, pooling low in his belly. His breath hitched. The dim interior of the car suddenly seemed even darker at the edges as his vision tunneled on Ilya's face. His scent glands tingled, a faint, responsive warmth at the base of his neck. It was the most innocent touch, and it felt more intimate than anything they'd done in months.

Ilya watched the reaction play out over Shane's face with a fascinated, darkening gaze. He didn't let go of his hand. His thumb continued its slow, maddening stroke. "Hey now," he said, his voice a low, rough caress. "Stay focused for a little while longer, sweetheart."

The endearment, the gentle command, the sheer possession in the touch- it should have sent alarm bells clanging. It did. But they were muffled, drowned out by a deeper, older instinct that purred at the attention. This was different. This wasn't the obsessive control of the trackers. This was Ilya, seeing him come undone from a single kiss on the hand, and choosing to steady him instead of devour him. For now.

Shane swallowed, forcing his eyes back to the road, his fingers curling slightly around Ilya's. "I'm focused," he managed, his voice uneven.

"Good," Ilya said. He didn't release Shane's hand. He laced their fingers together and rested their joined hands on his own thigh, a point of burning, constant contact.

The rest of the drive passed in a blur of green and dappled sunlight. Shane talked, quieter now, about the cottage, about the lake, about the loons he'd seen that morning. Ilya listened, interjecting with a soft question or a low hum, his thumb tracing idle patterns on Shane's skin. The protocols, the injection, the safe signals, the terrifying, thrilling approach of his heat- all of it was still there, a structured list in the back of Shane's mind. But for this suspended hour, in the twilight cocoon of the car with Ilya's hand solid and warm in his, it all just felt like a future they were driving toward together. The destination was no longer a place of fear, but simply the next point on the map, the place where the quiet would truly begin.

The gravel of the driveway crunched under the Range Rover's tires as Shane pulled to a stop in front of the cedar-shingled cottage. The engine cut, leaving a sudden, profound silence broken only by the distant soft cry of some birds coming from the treeline. For a moment, neither of them moved. The journey's gentle hum was over; the destination was now, solid and real around them.

Shane unbuckled his seatbelt with a sharp click that sounded too loud. "I can get your bag," he said, already pushing his door open.

"Ne nado," Ilya said, his voice leaving no room for argument. "I can carry my own bags." He was out of the car before Shane could round the hood, hefting his suitcase from the back with ease. The simple, dismissive gesture was pure Ilya- a reflexive assertion of control, of providing, even over something as trivial as a suitcase. Shane's hands fluttered at his sides for a second before he shoved them into the pockets of his shorts.

He led the way up the flagstone path, fumbling with the key in the lock. "It's, um, it's keypad too, but I never remember the code my dad set, so..." The door swung inward, releasing the scent of sun-warmed wood, clean linen, and the faint, lingering trace of Shane's own citrus-and-honeysuckle omega scent into the cooler, pine-scented air outside.

Ilya stepped across the threshold, his sharp blue eyes taking in the open-concept space: the vaulted ceiling with exposed beams, the wall of windows framing the glittering lake, the overstuffed, inviting furniture. He set his suitcase down quietly by the door.

"It's huge for one person, but the layout is really efficient," Shane started, the words beginning to tumble out again as the nervous energy sought an outlet. He pointed toward the kitchen. "The appliances are all new, they were just put in a few days before I got here. And see that door? That leads down to the outdoor shower from the dock, but we can go later if you want. The best thing is the water- we had a new well drilled a when the foundation went up, so now it's all filtered and super fresh, you can actually drink from the tap, which is kind of a big deal out here, most places you can't- "

He was gesturing toward the kitchen faucet as if demonstrating a marvel, his back momentarily to Ilya. He didn't see Ilya begin to move.

Ilya didn't walk toward him; he began a slow, silent circuit of the room's perimeter, a predator familiarizing itself with new territory. His boots were soundless on the wide-plank floor. He listened to the cadence of Shane's voice, the adorable, detailed ramble about water pH and pump warranties, a smile playing on his lips. He completed his arc, coming up behind Shane as he was explaining the filtration system.

With a gentle, inexorable pressure, Ilya guided him backwards, not with his hands, but with the sheer presence of his body until Shane's shoulders met the cool, unyielding surface of the floor-to-ceiling window. The vast panorama of the lake was at his back. Shane's ramble cut off with a soft, startled gasp. He was caged, not by arms, but by the solid wall and the alpha standing before him, close enough that their bodies almost touched.

"Shh," Ilya murmured, the sound a warm vibration in the space between them. "It's just me and you here. No need to be nervous."

He bent his head, one hand coming up to cradle the side of Shane's face, his thumb stroking the arch of his cheekbone. His other hand settled firmly at the base of Shane's spine, holding him in place. Then he kissed him.

This was nothing like the hurried peck in the car. This was slow, deep, and utterly controlled. Ilya set the pace, a languid exploration that was as much about possession as it was about greeting. He tilted Shane's head just so, kissing him with a focused intensity that demanded and received complete surrender. Shane melted into the kiss with a shuddering sigh, his hands coming up to clutch weakly at Ilya's sleeveless shirt, his earlier nervous tension dissolving like sugar in hot water. The structured thoughts about wells and filters evaporated and everything else flew out of his mind, replaced by the simple, overwhelming sensations of Ilya's mouth, Ilya's scent, Ilya's solid warmth against him.

When Ilya finally pulled back, it was only by a fraction. He kept his forehead resting against Shane's, his breath mingling with Shane's soft, panting exhales. A low, satisfied rumble sounded in his chest. He looked down at the omega in his arms- flushed, pliant, eyes dazed and heavy-lidded.

A slow, triumphant smile spread across Ilya's face. He brushed his thumb over Shane's kiss-swollen bottom lip. "There," he said, his voice a dark, tender caress. "All better."

Shane smiled up at Ilya, a soft, dazed expression that made his eyes crinkle at the corners. All the architectural commentary had been blissfully scoured from his mind, replaced by a single, warm fact: Ilya was here. He was real. And he had just kissed the nervous tension straight out of Shane's body.

With a quiet, confident tug, Shane grabbed Ilya's hand- the same hand that had been kissed into stillness in the car- and pulled. He didn't lead him on a tour. He led him the few short feet to the large, overstuffed sectional sofa that faced the wall of windows and the lake. Then, with a strength that seemed to surprise even himself, Shane pulled Ilya down on top of him as he let himself fall back into the deep, forgiving cushions.

There was a grunt, a shift of weight, and then Ilya was there, braced above him, a solid wall of muscle and heat. The world narrowed to the cradle of the couch, the frame of Ilya's shoulders blocking out the light, and the overwhelming, rightness of his weight.

Ilya's control, so evident at the window, fractured for a single, glorious second. His eyes darkened, the pupil swallowing the blue until only a thin ring remained. A low, involuntary growl vibrated through his chest and into Shane's. "You make me a little bit crazy," he breathed, He whispered against Shane's neck.

"Maybe," Shane whispered, his hands coming up to frame Ilya's face, his thumbs stroking the sharp planes of his cheekbones. He didn't give Ilya time to think, to retreat into restraint. He pulled him down and sealed their mouths together.

This kiss was not slow. It was an inferno.

It was all desperate, open-mouthed hunger and the slick, hot slide of tongue. Shane arched up into it, a soft, broken sound escaping his throat as Ilya met his hunger with a ferocity that was barely leashed. Ilya's hand fisted in Shane's hair, not to hurt, but to hold, to angle his head exactly where he wanted it, and Shane surrendered to the guidance with a shudder of pure relief. This was a language they had never forgotten.

The taste of him- coffee, and that essential, spicy-dark alpha flavor that was Ilya's alone-flooded Shane's senses. He could feel the hard lines of Ilya's body through their clothes: the bunch of his thighs where they pressed against Shane's hips, the formidable strength of his chest, the relentless ridge of his arousal. It should have been terrifying, this evidence of raw, alpha need. Instead, it sent a bolt of answering heat straight through Shane's core, liquid and demanding. His own body responded, a sweet, aching throb that made him rock up against the solid weight pinning him down.

Ilya's other hand slid from Shane's back, down over the curve of his hip, gripping with a possessiveness that made Shane gasp into the kiss. The fabric of their shorts was a maddening barrier. Ilya broke the kiss with a ragged breath, trailing his mouth down the line of Shane's jaw, his teeth scraping lightly over the pounding pulse in his throat, just above the scent gland he had never claimed. The sensation was electric, a promise and a threat that made Shane's vision blur.

“Ilya,” Shane gasped, his own hands scrambling, pulling at the hem of Ilya’s black shirt, seeking skin. He needed to feel the heat, the scars, the reality of him.

With a swift, efficient motion, Ilya pulled the shirt over his head and tossed it aside. The afternoon light from the window gilded the sweat-slicked planes of his chest, the dark neat trail of hair leading down, the stark black of his tattoo against his tanned skin. He was a masterpiece of brutal, focused power. Shane’s breath hitched. He mapped him with his hands, his fingers tracing the familiar ridges of abdominal muscle, the old, silvery slash of a skate blade over a rib, the pounding of his heart.

Ilya watched him, his chest heaving, his gaze molten. He captured Shane’s wandering hands, pinning them gently above his head on the couch cushion with one of his own. The dominance of the gesture was absolute, but his touch was careful, his thumb stroking Shane’s wrist in a silent question. Shane’s answer was to strain against the hold, not to break it, but to feel its strength. He was trembling, every nerve ending alight.

Leaning down, Ilya took his mouth again, this kiss slower, deeper, a drowning pull. He released Shane’s wrists, and Shane’s arms immediately wound around his neck, holding on as if he were the only solid thing in his tilting world. Ilya’s hand slid under Shane’s shirt, his palm searing against the smooth skin of his stomach, riding up over his ribs. Shane jerked, a sharp, sensitive gasp caught between their lips. Ilya stilled instantly, his hand softening, becoming a soothing, warm weight instead of a demand.

It was that- the terrifying, precise control over his own immense power, the way he could shift from devouring to comforting in a heartbeat- that undid Shane completely. A wave of emotion, too vast to name, crashed over him. He tore his mouth from Ilya’s, burying his face against the hot skin of Ilya’s neck, breathing him in, his body shaking.

Ilya froze above him, every muscle locked. “Shane?” His voice was gravel, strained with concern. “Solnyshko? Did I- ?”

“No,” Shane mumbled against his skin, his voice thick. He pressed a clumsy kiss to Ilya’s collarbone. “No. Don’t stop. Just... just hold on to me.”

A shudder ran through Ilya’s frame. He carefully lowered his full weight, blanketing Shane in heat and safety, his face buried in Shane’s hair. They lay like that for long minutes, tangled on the couch, the only sounds their ragged breathing slowly syncing and the distant lap of water against the shore. The frantic edge of the makeout had burned away, leaving them in the glowing, vulnerable embers of something deeper, something that felt dangerously like a new beginning being forged in the quiet of the old cottage.

The silence was a living thing between them, thick with the echo of ragged breaths and the scent of arousal. Shane, his face still buried in the warm haven of Ilya's neck, felt the world slowly solidify back into shapes and consequences. The dizzying, safe weight of Ilya atop him was a siren song, begging him to forget everything else. But the part of his brain that ran on protocols and risk assessments- the part that had kept him alive and hidden for so long- finally sparked back to life.

With a soft, shuddering sigh that was equal parts regret and resolve, Shane pressed one last kiss to the damp skin beneath Ilya's jaw and began to gently extricate himself. Ilya, sensing the shift, immediately eased his weight, rolling to the side to give him space, though his arm remained a loose, possessive band across Shane's back.

Shane sat up, the blush returning with a vengeance, heating his face and neck. He couldn't meet Ilya's eyes, focusing instead on his own hands twisting in his lap. The couch cushions between them felt like a newly drawn border.

"We should... we should talk. Before... before things get..." He gestured vaguely between them, the words failing. Before I lose the ability to think in straight lines. Before the heat takes the choice away.

"Da," Ilya said, his voice low and gravelly with restrained desire. He shifted, mirroring Shane's position so they sat facing each other on the wide sofa, a careful foot of space separating their knees. He didn't try to bridge it. He understood the need for a demilitarized zone for this conversation. "Talk."

Shane took a deep, steadying breath, pulling the clean, pine-and-lake air into his lungs, trying to dilute the intoxicating concentration of alpha scent that clung to him. "While we're here. This summer. I need... I need us to be as honest as we can be. To communicate everything. Even the hard things. Even the stupid, nervous things." He finally looked up, meeting Ilya's intense blue gaze. "I can't do guesswork. Not with this. Not with you."

Ilya's expression was utterly serious, the remnants of predatory hunger banked into embers of focused attention. "No guesswork," he agreed, a solemn vow. "You say things. I say things. We listen."

"Okay." Shane's fingers plucked at a loose thread on the couch. "So. My heat. It's coming a day or two after I stop taking one of the pills." He forced the clinical words out. "I spoke to my doctor. I got a... birth control injection. It'll prevent pregnancy during this cycle. I'm going to take it tomorrow."

He chanced a glance at Ilya's face. There was no anger, no flash of offended alpha pride. Just a deep, thoughtful consideration. Ilya nodded slowly. "This is what you want? For now?"

"Yes. It's... it's too much. The idea of... of that, right now. With everything. With our careers, with this fragile thing between us. We have to at least spend this time together to figure things out."

"Then it is good," Ilya said, simple and firm. "Your body. Your choice." He leaned forward slightly, elbows on his knees, his gaze holding Shane's. "But, Shane... I want you to know. For me, the idea of making babies with you... it is not a fear. It is a hope. A hope for maybe... next year. Two years. When you are ready. If you ever are. I want it to be on the table. To be something we can... look at together. When the time is right."

The words landed not as pressure, but as a breathtaking declaration of a shared future. It wasn't a demand for immediate submission to their instincts, but an invitation to a profound, eventual partnership. It acknowledged Shane's autonomy completely, while offering the vision of a destiny Ilya desperately wanted. Shane's throat tightened. He could only manage a small, jerky nod.

Seeking safer, more concrete ground, Shane grasped for the other looming reality. "Our contracts. They're up soon."

"Yes."

"I... I want to stay in Montreal. I think. It's my home. My team. My... structure." It was the truth, plain and simple.

Ilya didn't hesitate. "Then you stay." He said it as if it were the easiest decision in the world. "I will look. Boston, for another year or two maybe. Or... another team closer. If you want me closer." The offer was staggering in its simplicity. He was willing to upend his own career, his own life, to orbit Shane's stability. It was the antithesis of his old obsession- not to pull Shane into his world by force, but to move his own world to align with Shane's.

The magnitude of it, the trust in that offer after everything, threatened to overwhelm Shane. "You'd do that?"

"For you?" Ilya's lips quirked in a faint, weary smile that held a universe of devotion. "Solnyshko, I warned you before. I gave you the chance to walk away and you didn't take it. After that, there is no devil in hell or God in heaven who could take you away from me. I will do whatever you need. I will be whoever you need me to be if at the end of our long lives, we are together, a gaggle of grandbabies around us. I bet we'll die the same day. There is no me without you anymore."

Shane, emboldened by the honesty, slowly reached out his hand, palm up, Ilya looked at it for a heartbeat, then placed his own hand over it, his long fingers lacing through Shane's. Not pulling, just holding.

"Okay," Shane whispered again, the word filled with more meaning than any other. It was an acceptance. A beginning.

The heavy talk left a new kind of quiet in its wake, one that felt clean instead of strained. Shane unfolded his legs, the pins and needles a welcome distraction. "C'mon," he said, standing up. "I'll show you the rest of the place. You know, so you can pick your room."

Ilya raised an eyebrow, "My room?"

"Yeah. There are two guest rooms. Well, three if you count the office with a pull out." Shane led him down a short hall, pointing to doors. "This one gets the morning sun, which is nice, but it's bright at like, 5 AM. This one faces the woods, so it's darker, quieter. The bed's a little firmer though, which you might like? Or hate. I don't know."

He was rambling again, but it felt different now. Lighter. The honesty had vented a pressure valve. Ilya followed, a silent, amused shadow.

"I think," Ilya said, his voice a low rumble behind him, "Too small. I'll used to big beds."

Shane snorted, pushing open the last door at the end of the hall. "Shut up. This is the only room with a King sized bed."

The master bedroom. It was dominated by a large, wrought-iron bedframe, the mattress piled with the soft, grey blankets Shane had washed. The same wall of windows looked out over the lake, the water now painted with the long, golden streaks of the late afternoon sun. It was serene, beautiful, and utterly, intimately Shane's. The scent of him- clean cotton, his specific shampoo, the underlying warmth of omega- was strongest here, woven into the very air.

Ilya stopped in the doorway, his playful demeanor evaporating. His gaze swept the room, not as a visitor assessing accommodations, but as a hunter in a sanctum. The intensity of his focus was a physical touch.

Shane felt a fresh flutter of nerves, but beneath it, a bold, teasing impulse rose. He turned, leaning against the doorjamb, aiming for nonchalance. "So? Which will it be? The dawn's early light special, the gloomy forest suite, or the- "

Shane landed with a soft 'oof' and a burst of laughter, the breath momentarily knocked from him. He was still giggling when Ilya climbed over him, caging him in with his arms, his torso hovering just above Shane's.

"Hey now," Shane gasped, still grinning, playing his role to the hilt. He put a hand on Ilya's chest in mock protest. "No funny business, sir. I'm just an innocent bellboy. You shouldn't treat the staff this way!."

Ilya leaned down, his nose brushing Shane's, his smile all wicked promise. He licked a line from Shane's scent gland all the way up to his ear, hearing him purr. Grinning, his voice dripping with faux innocence. "Do not worry. I am an excellent tipper. I know exactly how to treat bellboys." The double meaning hung in the air, rich and delicious. Shane's laughter softened into a breathless smile, his eyes shining with affection and a spark of desire.

"Oh yeah?" Shane challenged softly, his hands coming up to link behind Ilya's neck. "Prove it."

Ilya did, by closing the distance and kissing him

Shane landed amidst the blankets, a gasp caught in his throat. He looked up, his heart hammering against his ribs. Ilya stood at the foot of the bed, his chest rising and falling with a deep, controlled breath. The setting sun haloed him from behind, casting his face in shadow, but Shane could see the gleam of his eyes, the set of his jaw. All the careful restraint, the patient distance, had been stripped away, leaving only a stark, hungry truth.

"No other room," Ilya said, his voice thick and final.

He didn't pounce. He moved onto the bed with a predatory grace that made the frame creak softly, crawling over Shane until he was caged beneath him once more, but this time there was no glass wall at his back, only the yielding mattress and the unyielding reality of Ilya's intent. He braced himself on his forearms, his face inches from Shane's. The scent of him, sharp alpha and desire, flooded Shane's senses, a dizzying, welcome assault.

"Tell me now," Ilya breathed, the words a rough vibration against Shane's lips. "The word, solnyshko. Your little taps. Tell me to stop, and I stop. Tell me to go to another room, and I go. But if you do not..." He dipped his head, his nose tracing the line of Shane's jaw, inhaling deeply at the pulse point beneath his ear. A shiver, violent and sweet, racked Shane's frame. "If you do not, then there is no more distance. Not tonight, or any other night after."

Shane's mind, usually a whirlwind of analysis and contingency plans, went blissfully, utterly silent. There was only the weight, the heat, the scent, and the profound rightness of it. He lifted a hand, his fingers trembling as they traced the severe line of Ilya's brow, then slid into the dark hair at the nape of his neck. He didn't say the safe word. He didn't tap.

Instead, he arched his neck, a silent, vulnerable offering, and whispered, "No more distance."

It was like breaking a dam.

Ilya's mouth crashed down on his, and this kiss was a forrest fire that made their earlier one seem like a matchstick light. It was all consuming, a desperate, hungry reclaiming. Shane met it with equal fervor, his hands dragging down Ilya's back, clawing at the fabric of his shirt until Ilya reared back just enough to rip it over his head and toss it aside. The sight of him- all tanned skin and defined muscle under the golden light- stole the air from Shane's lungs.

Then Ilya's hands were on him, everywhere, mapping him with a frantic, reverent urgency. He peeled Shane's shirt off, his calloused palms skating over his ribs, his stomach, his chest, pausing to thumb at his nipples until Shane cried out, back bowing off the bed. Every touch was electric, a direct line to the molten core of need pooling low in Shane's belly. His own shorts felt like a torturous constraint, the fabric rough against his aching erection.

"Ilya," he gasped, the word breaking on a moan as Ilya's mouth left his to blaze a trail down his throat, over his collarbone, laving attention on one peaked nipple. "Please..."

Ilya understood. He shifted, his hands hooking in the waistband of Shane's shorts and underwear, dragging them down in a long pull, ripping his own shorts off until they were both bare, skin to searing skin.

The feeling was earth shattering. The full, hot, heavy weight of Ilya's erection pressed against his own, the slick slide of pre-cum between them, the sheer, breathtaking intimacy of being completely exposed. Shane's vision hazed. He wrapped his legs around Ilya's hips, heels digging into the hard muscles of his ass, pulling him closer, needing more friction, more pressure, more everything.

Ilya groaned, a raw, animal sound, and buried his face in Shane's neck. "You feel... Bozhe... you feel like heaven." His hips began a slow, grinding roll, setting a rhythm that was pure, undiluted pleasure. Shane clung to him, matching the pace, his own sounds- soft whimpers, choked gasps, Ilya's name- spilling into the quiet room.

But it wasn't enough. The friction was exquisite, but it was a promise, not the culmination. Shane's body, thrumming with the pre-heat sensitivity, screamed for more. For completion. He fumbled between them, his hand brushing Ilya's length, making him shudder violently.

"Wait," Ilya rasped, catching his wrist. He pressed a hard, desperate kiss to Shane's palm before reaching over to the nightstand. Shane heard the drawer open, the rustle of a box. He'd put lube and condoms there days ago, a hopeful, terrifying preparation. Now, the sound was the most beautiful he'd ever heard.

Ilya sheathed himself with quick, efficient motions, his eyes never leaving Shane's face. He slicked his fingers, and then those fingers were pressing, carefully, inexorably, at Shane's entrance. Shane sucked in a sharp breath, his body tensing for a split second- before he forced himself to relax, to breathe. This was Ilya, they've gone without before, and it was close, but he wasn't in heat yet.

"I know," Ilya murmured, kissing his temple, his cheek, his lips. "I know, lyubimyy moy. I am here. Just me." His finger slid inside, a slow, burning stretch that quickly melted into a deep, shocking fullness. Shane moaned, pushing down against it. A second finger joined, scissoring, stretching, preparing him with a meticulous care that was its own kind of worship. By the time a third finger curled, brushing that devastating spot deep inside, Shane was a writhing, pleading mess, tears of overwhelming sensation gathering in the corners of his eyes.

"Now," he begged, his voice shattered. "Ilya, now, please, I need- "

Ilya withdrew his fingers. He positioned himself, the broad head of his cock pressing where Shane was stretched and slick and desperate for him. He looked down, his face a mask of such fierce, tender agony it made Shane's heart crack open.

"Look at me," Ilya commanded, softly.

Shane opened his eyes, meeting that burning blue gaze.

Ilya pushed in.

It was a slow, inexorable invasion, a claiming that was also a surrender. Shane cried out, his nails biting into Ilya's shoulders, as he was filled, stretched, completed in a way that was profoundly more than physical. As if they were at the end of a long, lonely exile. Ilya held himself still, buried to the hilt, his entire body trembling with the effort of control, letting Shane adjust, letting him own the moment.

"Okay?" Ilya gritted out, a single bead of sweat tracing a path down his temple.

Shane could only nod, his throat too tight for words. He rolled his hips, a tiny, experimental movement, and the sensation was so intense it wrenched a sob from his chest. It was all the permission Ilya needed.

He began to move.

It was not a gentle rhythm. It was deep, powerful, relentless strokes that drove the breath from Shane's lungs and coherent thought from his mind. Each thrust was a punctuation mark in a sentence of raw need, hitting that perfect spot inside him again and again until pleasure coiled, tight and white-hot, at the base of his spine. The world narrowed to the slap of skin, the creak of the bed, the ragged symphony of their breathing, and Ilya's low, Russian curses muttered against his skin.

Shane was unraveling, hurtling toward the edge. He clawed at Ilya's back, his heels urging him deeper, faster. "Ilya, I'm- I can't- "

"Come for me," Ilya growled, his pace becoming punishing, his own control fraying. "Let me see you. мой ."

The possessive endearment, the sheer command in his voice, was the final trigger. Shane's orgasm ripped through him with silent, devastating force, his body seizing, his vision whiting out as he spilled between them, pulses of pleasure so intense they bordered on pain.

The clenching, fluttering heat of Shane's climax tore Ilya's restraint to shreds. With three more brutal, driving thrusts, he followed, his own release punching a raw, guttural shout from his throat as he buried himself deep and stilled, shuddering through the waves.

For a long time, there was only the sound of their ragged breathing slowing, and the distant cry of the loon on the lake. Ilya, his weight a welcome anchor, collapsed carefully onto his side, pulling Shane with him, keeping them joined. He nuzzled into the sweat-damp hair at Shane's temple, his arms a vise around him.

Slowly, sensation by sensation, Shane returned to himself. The ache of pleasant exertion. The cool air on his overheated skin. The solid, steady beat of Ilya's heart against his back. And beneath it all, a profound, trembling peace. The ghosts of the past- the fear, the betrayal, the fire- were still there in the shadows of the room. But here, in this bed, in this tangled, sated closeness, they held no power. There was only this- honesty earned, trust tested and not found wanting, and a love, once obsessive and sick, now purified in the sweat-slicked, quiet dark, becoming something that felt, for the first time, like it could truly be their own.

The peace of the afterglow was a living thing in the room, thick and honeyed. Shane lay boneless against Ilya's chest, listening to the steady, slowing drum of his heart. The sweat on their skin was cooling, a slight chill beginning to seep into their limbs. Ilya's arms were locked around him, not as a cage, but as a mooring line in a calm sea.

"You're getting cold," Ilya murmured into his hair, his voice a drowsy rumble. His hand stroked down Shane's spine, a possessive, soothing gesture.

"A little," Shane admitted, nuzzling closer into the heat Ilya still radiated. The idea of moving, of breaking this perfect, tangled stillness, felt impossible.

Ilya shifted, and for a heart-stopping second Shane thought he was pulling away. Instead, Ilya simply tightened his hold and rolled, gathering Shane against him as he sat up on the edge of the bed. Shane made a soft, protesting noise, limbs feeling like lead.

"Come," Ilya said, the word not a command but an invitation. He stood, Shane held securely against his chest, and carried him the short distance to the en-suite bathroom. He flicked the light on- a soft, dimmable glow- and set Shane down gently on the closed toilet lid before turning to the large, deep soaking tub.

Shane watched, his mind still floating in a pleasurable haze, as Ilya bent to start the water. He tested the temperature with his wrist, adjusting the taps with careful precision. The sound of rushing water filled the small room, steam beginning to curl into the air. Ilya found bath salts under the sink- something piney and clean that Shane's mother must have left- and poured a generous amount under the stream.

This was new. This meticulous, domestic care. Ilya had taken care of him like this before, but this felt different, this felt like so much more. Ilya was focused on the water's heat, on creating comfort. It made Shane's throat feel tight.

When the tub was full, Ilya turned off the taps and came back to him. He didn't speak. He simply reached for Shane, his hands firm on his hips, guiding him to stand and then helping him step over the high rim and into the steaming, fragrant water. The heat was a shock, then an instant, total relief, seeping into his sore muscles and the pleasant ache between his legs. He sank down with a sigh that trembled at the end, the water rising to his chest.

Ilya followed, his larger body displacing water that sloshed gently against the porcelain. He settled behind Shane, his legs bracketing him, and pulled him back to rest against his solid chest. The position was one of utter vulnerability, surrounded and supported. Shane's breath hitched, a faint echo of old panic- trapped- before it melted under the sheer, undeniable safety of the embrace. This was chosen. This was given.

For long minutes, they just existed. Shane let his head loll back against Ilya's shoulder, watching the steam rise. Ilya's arms were loosely around his waist, his chin resting on Shane's damp hair. The world was this water, this warmth, this silent, breathing presence at his back.

Then Ilya's hands began to move. They slid up his chest, over his shoulders, then back down his arms in long, slow strokes. He wasn't arousing. He was mapping. Re-learning the territory of Shane's body without the frantic hunger of before, with something closer to reverence. His fingers traced the line of a collarbone, the ridge of a bicep, the delicate bones of his wrist.

“You are so beautiful,” Ilya whispered, the words breathed into the shell of his ear. “Every part.”

Shane shivered, a different kind of heat gathering low in his belly. The exhaustion was still there, but beneath it, a slow-burning ember was being coaxed back to life by the hypnotic motion of those hands. He felt Ilya’s own body responding, a firm, thickening pressure against the small of his back.

Ilya’s hands drifted lower, skimming over his stomach, dipping beneath. One broad palm spread over Shane’s lower abdomen, a warm, heavy weight. The other hand drifted lower still, fingers combing through the coarse hair, then lower, until they just brushed against his softening length.

A jolt, sharp and sweet, went through Shane. He gasped, his hips giving an involuntary twitch.

Ilya stilled instantly. His hand retreated to Shane’s hip, holding him steady. “Still want?” he asked softly, the soft words a gentle check-in in the steam-filled air.

Shane nodded his head, turning it to press his forehead against Ilya’s stubbled jaw. “Yes, please,” he whispered. He reached back, his hand finding Ilya’s thigh under the water, and gave it a reassuring squeeze. Then, gathering his courage, he guided Ilya’s hand back to where it had been.

A low, approving hum vibrated against his back. This time, Ilya’s touch was not a question, but a promise. He took Shane in hand, his grip firm and knowing, stroking him with a lazy, devastating rhythm that had nothing to do with urgency and everything to do with pleasure drawn out and savored. The water lapped around them, amplifying every sensation, the slosh of their movements a quiet, intimate soundtrack.

Shane was content to be worked back to the heady floating feeling, to let the pleasure build in slow, cresting waves. But a deeper need stirred. He wanted to turn the tables, to offer the same worship. With effort, he shifted in the cradle of Ilya’s legs, turning in the water to face him. Water slopped over the side of the tub.

Ilya watched him, his eyes dark pools in the steam, his expression one of raw, open want. Shane didn't hesitate. He leaned in and kissed him, a deep, wet, searching kiss that tasted of salt and pine. As he kissed him, his own hand found Ilya under the water, wrapping around his hard, silken length. Ilya groaned into his mouth, his hips jerking up into the touch.

They found a rhythm, a slow, synchronous dance of hand and tongue and shared breath. It was messy and inefficient and perfect. The water made everything slippery, a sensual slide of skin on skin. Shane broke the kiss, panting, to trail his mouth down Ilya's throat, over the prominent Adam's apple, to the powerful juncture of his shoulder. His teeth scraped lightly over the unmarked skin where a claiming bite would go. Ilya shuddered violently, a broken, Russian curse spilling from his lips.

"Shane," he gasped, his own hand moving faster on Shane, his control fraying. "I am close... I cannot..."

"Then don't," Shane breathed against his skin. "Don't wait."

It was all the permission needed. Ilya's orgasm hit him like a silent storm, his body bowing, his face pressed into Shane's wet hair as he spilled over Shane's fist with a series of ragged, choked gasps. The sight, the feel of it, the raw sound of his release, tipped Shane over the edge mere seconds later, his own climax a bright, shattering burst that left him trembling and sightless, held upright only by Ilya's arms.

They slumped together in the cooling water, a tangled, sated heap of limbs. Ilya reached blindly for the plug with his toe, and they listened to the water begin to drain, a slow, gurgling echo of their own spent energy.

Ilya held Shane as he turned the showerhead on to rinse everything off, then reached for a towel, wrapping it around Shane first with a tenderness that felt monumental, before slinging one around his own hips. He led Shane, who was now swaying on his feet with pure exhaustion, back to the bed. They didn't dress. They simply collapsed between the sheets, skin to skin, Ilya pulling the blankets over them and tucking Shane securely against his side.

Outside, an owl cried out, a lonely, wild sound across the dark water. Shane listened to it, then to the steady, strong beat of Ilya's heart under his ear. The ghosts of their past difficulties were still there. The memory of the trackers, the terror of the kidnapping, the smell of gasoline- they lingered in the corners of Shane's mind sometimes. But here, in this bed, with this man who would burn the world for him and was now learning, painstakingly, how to build a quieter, safer one, the ghosts had no power. They had faced the precipice of their old, toxic love and had, for this night at least, stepped back from the edge and found something softer on the other side. It was a fragile peace, hard-won and easily shattered. But for now, in the deep cottage dark, it was enough. It was everything.

The deep, black quiet of the cottage was split by a shift in the atmosphere, not a sound. Shane woke not from a dream, but into a new, pressing awareness. The pleasant aches from earlier were a distant memory, replaced by a low, insistent thrum that seemed to originate in his marrow. The pre-heat sensitivity had graduated into its first true wave- a feverish warmth under his skin, a deep, hollow ache in his core that was less about pain and more about a profound, physical wanting. The blankets were too heavy, the air too still.

And beside him, a furnace. Ilya was asleep, one arm thrown possessively over Shane's waist, his breathing a deep, even tide. But his scent in the dark was amplified, a complex, intoxicating tapestry of clean sweat, alpha musk, and the faint, reassuring aroma of his skin. It called to the ache in Shane, a magnetic pull that overrode the last vestiges of sleepy logic.

Shane turned carefully in the circle of Ilya's arm. He studied the shadowed planes of his face in the moonglow slipping through the windows- the severe brow relaxed in sleep, the fan of dark lashes, the stern mouth gone soft. This was the man who had burned a monster to ashes for him. This was the man who had tracked his every move. This was the man who, for ninety-five days, had kept a promise that must have felt like carving out his own heart.

The words formed, simple and terrifying in their vulnerability. He leaned in, his lips brushing the shell of Ilya's ear, his voice a sleep-roughened whisper in the absolute quiet. He moved closer, kissing softly wherever he could reach until he felt Ilya start to stir.

"Ilya... make love to me."

The effect was slow. Ilya's breathing hitched, stopped. His eyes flew open, pupils wide and black in the dim light, fixing on Shane's face with a shock so profound it looked like pain. For a long, suspended moment, he just stared, as if deciphering a code in a lost language. Make love. Not fuck me, not I need you, not any of the desperate, hungry phrases they'd traded before. This was something else. A request for connection, not just culmination.

A ragged breath tore from Ilya's throat. Emotion- too vast, too raw- flooded his features, threatening to crack the careful control he wore like armor. He couldn't hold Shane's gaze. With a broken, stifled sound, he turned his face and buried it in the curve of Shane's neck, his nose pressing against the unmarked, vulnerable scent gland there. His shoulders trembled, once, with the force of feeling he had no words for. He'd never heard it like that. From anyone. Especially not from Shane, whose honesty was a blade that could either cut or surgically remove a tumor.

Shane felt the damp heat of Ilya's breath, the slight tremble in the large body pressed against his. He understood. He brought his hands up, one sliding into the dark silk of Ilya's hair, the other spreading wide over the powerful, tense muscles of his back. "It's okay," he murmured into the quiet. "Just you. Just me. Like this."

It was permission, and it was a guide. Ilya drew in a shuddering, deep breath, filling himself with Shane's scent- citrus, clean sweat, and the rising, sweet-tart fragrance of his approaching heat. When he lifted his head, his eyes were wet, but his gaze was fiercely tender. He didn't speak. Words had failed him. Instead, he began to speak with his hands.

He touched Shane as if he were something precious and newly discovered. His palms smoothed over Shane's feverish skin, learning the texture all over again in the intimate dark. He kissed him, but not with the consuming hunger of before. This was a slow, deep, searching kiss, a conversation of lips and tongue and shared breath that said I am here, I am with you, this is real. Shane melted into it, a soft sigh escaping into Ilya's mouth, his body arching into the touch, the hollow ache within him pulsing in time with his heartbeat.

His preparation was even more meticulous than before, his fingers working Shane open with a patient, reverent focus that made Shane clutch at the sheets, his toes curling. The fullness was exquisite, a slow stretch that promised everything. Ilya wished he had more patience to explore, to taste the slick, to sit up and watch every expression crossing Shane's face, but he was only human.

When Ilya finally guided himself to Shane's entrance, he paused, his forehead resting against Shane's, their breath mingling. He looked into Shane's eyes, his own blazing with a blue-fire intensity that held a question, a plea, and a vow all at once. Male omega's usually only liked vaginal sex during their heat, and for Shane to offer this to him humbled Ilya once again.

Shane answered by wrapping his legs around Ilya's hips, pulling him down. "Yes," he breathed. "Like this."

Ilya slid inside with a single, slow, inexorable push that stole the air from both their lungs. It was a joining that felt less like possession and more like homecoming. There was no frantic pace, no driven hunger to lose themselves. Ilya set a rhythm that was deep, rolling, and devastatingly slow, each measured stroke a deliberate act of worship. He braced himself on his forearms, cradling Shane's face, never breaking eye contact. The physical sensation was overwhelming- the perfect, filling stretch, the friction on that breathtaking spot inside him with every unhurried thrust- but it was the emotional nakedness that undid Shane completely.

Tears welled in his eyes, blurring the intense, beloved face above him. In this slow, quiet darkness, with Ilya moving inside him with such deliberate tenderness, the ghosts felt finally, truly banished. The trackers, the fear, the fire... they were part of the past. This, the sweat-slick slide of their bodies, the unbroken gaze, the shared, shuddering breaths- this was the present.

"Ilya," Shane gasped, his voice breaking on a sob that was pure feeling. "Is this... is what we're feeling real? Tell me it's real."

Ilya's rhythm faltered. He stopped, buried deep, his entire body going rigid. A storm of emotion crossed his face- anguish, hope, a love so profound it seemed to terrify him. He opened his mouth, but no sound came out.

Instead of words, he did what he had always done best- he answered with his entire being. He leaned down and captured Shane's mouth in a kiss that was a confession. It tasted of salt- his tears or Shane's, neither knew- and of promise. A determined hope of a man learning a new way to love. It was I love you and I am sorry for what happened before and you are my everything all fused into the desperate, tender meeting of lips and tongue.

He began to move again, his thrusts gaining a new, purposeful intensity, as if he could physically impress the truth of his answer into Shane's very soul. Shane cried out, the pleasure cresting into something boundless, a wave of pure, white-light certainty that shattered through him. His climax was a silent, full-body convulsion, a release that felt as emotional as it was physical, tears streaming freely down his temples into his hair.

The feel of Shane pulsing around him, the broken, trusting sound of his release, broke the last of Ilya's control. With a final, deep drive and a raw, choked groan against Shane's shoulder, he followed, spilling inside him, his own release feeling like a surrender and a claiming all at once.

He collapsed, careful of his weight, turning them so Shane lay half on top of him, their bodies still joined, hearts hammering a frantic, slowing rhythm against each other. The room was silent save for their ragged breathing. Ilya's arms were locked around Shane, his face once more buried in his neck, his breaths coming in hot, damp gusts against Shane's scent gland.

Finally, his voice emerged, rough and shredded, the words muffled against Shane's skin. "It is real," he whispered, the sound barely audible. "It is the only real thing I have ever known."

Shane listened to the fierce, pounding heart under his ear. He felt the solid warmth wrapped around him, the lingering, full ache inside him. He smelled their scents mingled in the air- alpha and omega, no longer at war, but intertwined. The question had been answered, not with a speech, but with a silence that spoke volumes, and a tenderness that felt stronger than any obsession.

For the first time, the devotion didn't feel like a cage. It felt like the walls of the cottage around them- solid, familiar, built to keep the wilderness out, and the warmth in. He closed his eyes, and for the first time in memory, drifted back towards sleep in the arms of his alpha, not with trepidation, but with a peace so deep it felt like forgiveness.

The first thing Ilya was aware of was the silence. Not the empty, echoing silence of his penthouse or hotel rooms, but a deep, living quiet, broken only by the soft lap of water against the shore and the distant, sleepy call of a bird. The second thing was the weight, the warm, solid weight of Shane Hollander asleep in his arms, his back pressed against Ilya's chest, their legs tangled together under the soft, rumpled sheets.

Dawn was just beginning to bleed into the room, painting everything in shades of cool blue and soft grey. Ilya didn't move. He barely breathed. He simply existed in the moment, his body a haven of unaccustomed calm.

After a moment, he slowly maneuvered Shane to turn and curl against him again. He let his gaze trace the landscape of Shane, memorizing it anew in this fragile peace. The fan of dark lashes against his cheek, so much longer and darker than anyone would guess from his game-face scowl. The smattering of faint, golden freckles across the bridge of his perfect nose and over his cheekbones- a secret map Ilya had spent years cataloguing every time they were together. In the subdued light, they were like dusted cinnamon. Shane's lips were slightly parted, his breathing deep and even, the faintest hint of a snore catching on each exhale. It was the most endearing sound Ilya had ever heard.

He was made for me.

The thought came, not as the old, jagged possession that had driven him to practically insane, but as a quiet, awe-filled certainty. Every detail- the arch of his brow, the slope of his shoulder, the way his body fit so perfectly against Ilya's own as if carved from a complementary stone- felt like a miracle, as if the stars aligned to make sure they would get this exact moment. This was the prize his monstrous father had told him he had to seize and control. But here, in the quiet, Ilya understood the old man had been wrong. You didn't seize a miracle. You were granted it. And you spent your life being grateful, being careful, being worthy.

His hand, which had been splayed possessively over Shane's stomach, shifted slightly. His thumb stroked the soft skin just below his navel. A deep, complex ache bloomed in his own chest. The injection. The 'not now'. He understood the logic. He championed the logic. Their careers, the media, the terrifying fragility of what they were rebuilding- it was all a house of cards. A pregnancy would be a hurricane.

But the alpha in him, the part shaped by a culture that measured an alpha's worth in legacy and lineage, felt a sharp pang of disappointment. Their first shared heat. The biological imperative was a drumbeat in his blood. To create something that was part of Shane, part of him, a living testament to this all consuming love... the want was a physical hunger.

He closed his eyes, breathing in the scent of Shane's sleep-warm skin. He didn't say 'never'. He said 'not now'. And Ilya had promised to follow any plan. He thought of Kip, Old Scott's omega, round with a child that was welcomed, planned for, celebrated in a healthy home. That was the model. Not a secret, not a scandal, not a chain. A choice, made together, in sunlight. He could wait for that. For when Shane's ready. The disappointment softened, tempered by a patience that felt new and strangely strong.

For the first time in memory- perhaps in his entire life- the constant, low-grade hum of anxiety was gone. The loneliness that had been his most faithful companion since his mother's death was absent. The intrusive thoughts- the images of Shane hurt, of Chris's leering face, of his own father's raised fist- were silent. They weren't defeated; he knew they lurked in the shadows of his mind, waiting for a moment of weakness. But for now, in this bed, with this omega breathing softly against him, they held no power.

This was what healing was supposed to feel like. Not the absence of pain, but the presence of something so good it made the pain irrelevant. This was the peace he had burned a man alive to try and purchase, only to realize it couldn't be taken. It could only be given. And Shane, in his infinite, careful grace, was giving it to him.

He pressed the lightest, most reverent of kisses to the juncture of Shane's neck and shoulder, where his scent was strongest. He didn't wake him. Let him sleep. Let him have this uncomplicated rest. They had the whole day ahead of them. The heat was coming, they would both need as much rest as they could get. Ilya closed his eyes again, matching his breathing to Shane's, and let the quiet certainty settle into his bones. He was exactly where he was meant to be.

The gentle grey light of dawn had warmed into a soft, buttery gold when Shane finally stirred. He didn't open his eyes at first, simply stretched, a long, languid arc of his body that pressed every deliciously sore muscle back against the solid warmth of Ilya's chest. A low, contented hum vibrated in his throat.

Ilya, who had not moved, tightened his arm in response. "доброе утро," he murmured into Shane's hair.

"Mmf." Shane turned in his arms, blinking sleepily up at him. The freckles Ilya had been worshipping in the dawn were now highlighted by the sun, his brown eyes soft and unguarded. This was a Shane few had ever seen- ruffled, peaceful, and utterly at home. He smiled, a small, private thing, and leaned up to brush a kiss against Ilya's chin. "Shower?"

The shower was all steamed glass and the echo of water on tile. They moved around each other with a new, unspoken synchronicity. Ilya adjusted the temperature; Shane reached for the shampoo. The simple act of washing, performed for each other, felt as intimate as anything they'd done in the night. Ilya's hands, so capable of violence and perfect stickhandling, were infinitely gentle as he worked lavender-scented lather through Shane's hair, his fingertips massaging his scalp until Shane's eyes drifted shut with a sigh.

Rinsed clean, Shane turned, the water sluicing down his back. His gaze, clear and deliberate now, traveled down Ilya's body. Without a word, his hands settled on Ilya's hips, steering him back until his shoulders met the cool, wet tile. Shane looked up, holding his gaze for a heartbeat- a silent question, a reaffirmation of control- before he slowly sank to his knees on the textured shower floor.

The sight stole the air from Ilya's lungs. Shane Hollander, on his knees for him. Not in submission, but in offering. His hands, steady and sure, guided Ilya to fullness, and then his mouth, hot and wet and perfect, took him in. Ilya's head thudded back against the tile, a guttural curse lost in the spray. His hands fisted, wanting to tangle in that damp hair, to guide the pace, to take. But he forced them to stay flat against the tile, his knuckles white. This was Shane's to give. He watched through slitted eyes, mesmerized by the slide of Shane's lips, the focused devotion on his face, the way his own body responded with helpless, escalating pulses of pleasure. It was over too quickly, a sharp, breathtaking climax torn from him that left his legs trembling. Shane stayed with him through it, nuzzling the scent gland by his crotch, before rising gracefully and accepting the kiss Ilya pulled him into, deep and tasting of shared intimacy and clean water.

Breakfast was a quiet. Shane, wrapped in a soft hoodie, scrambled eggs while Ilya made bacon with Shane's direction. They moved in the kitchen like partners in a well-rehearsed dance. But when Shane served himself, scraping a modest portion of eggs onto his plate with a single piece of toast, Ilya's brows drew together.

"This is all?" he asked, his voice carefully neutral.

Shane shrugged, a faint pink tingeing his ears. "Not that hungry yet."

Ilya said nothing, but two minutes later, he silently forked a piece of bacon and a second scoop of eggs onto Shane's plate. His expression dared Shane to argue. Shane looked at the added food, then at Ilya's stubborn jaw, and a small, real smile touched his lips. He picked up his fork. It wasn't control. It was care. The difference was everything.

Over coffee, Shane thought about what was next. "There's a nature trail that starts at the back of the property. Goes about three miles in a loop to a lookout. Or we could take the canoe out. The water's still pretty cold, but we could swim if you're interested." He glanced out at the lake, then back at Ilya, his eyes softening. "Or... we could just be. Here."

Ilya reached across the table, covering Shane's hand with his own. "We just be," he said.

They ended up on the large sofa, controllers in hand, a hockey video game flashing on the screen. The competitive fire ignited instantly. "You are using the same move over and over again. Is predictable," Ilya taunted, his fingers a blur.

"My predictable move is about to score on your predictable goalie," Shane shot back, his tongue caught between his teeth in concentration.

Ilya, trailing by a goal, resorted to sabotage. He leaned over and blew a soft, distracting stream of air against Shane's neck, right over his scent gland. Shane jolted, his player on screen stumbling, and Ilya stole the puck, racing down the virtual ice to score. "Cheater!" Shane laughed, shoving at his shoulder.

"Is strategy," Ilya insisted, grinning unrepentantly.

They played for hours, the rivalry as fierce and fun as it had been on the ice a lifetime ago, but now without the sharp edge of real enmity. They were evenly matched, trading wins and insults, their laughter echoing in the sunlit room. The structured, intense man and the obsessive, driven one found a perfect, playful equilibrium in pixelated competition.

As the afternoon light began to lengthen, the controllers were abandoned. Shane, pleasantly tired, slumped against Ilya's side, his head finding its familiar place on his shoulder. Ilya's arm came around him, his hand idly stroking Shane's arm.

The ghosts were silent. The future, with its contracts and decisions and potential injections, was for another day. For now, there was only the shared quiet, the residual thrill of competition, the solid warmth of the other's body, and the profound, simple peace of a day spent doing nothing, together. It was a healing all its own.

The golden afternoon bled into a soft, violet-tinged evening. The competitive buzz of the games had faded into a comfortable, shared lethargy. It was Shane who eventually stirred, his stomach giving a soft, audible grumble that made Ilya smirk.

"We should eat," Shane said, untangling himself from Ilya's side with a reluctant sigh.

The kitchen became a new arena, their styles a stark, amusing contrast. Shane approached cooking as he did everything: with intense, focused precision. He diced an onion into even dices, his knife skills frighteningly efficient. He measured spices into his palm with a critical eye, tasting the air as they hit the hot oil.

Ilya, meanwhile, operated with the chaotic energy that he did most things with. He didn't measure; he poured, sprinkled, and adjusted by some internal instinct Shane found fascinating.

"You are making a mess," Shane observed, not critically, but with a sort of awe, as Shane splashed a bit of wine into the pan.

"It's called flavor," Ilya retorted, grinning. "Your way looks like a chemistry experiment. I cook off vibes"

"My way is correct."

“My way is edible and faster.”

They bumped hips by the stove, vying for space, and Shane caught Ilya’s wrist before he could oversalt the sauce. “Trust me,” Ilya murmured, taking the shaker. Their eyes held, the playful argument dissolving into something warmer. Shane’s breath hitched, and he nodded, relinquishing control.

They ate at the small table by the windows, the lake now a sheet of black glass reflecting the first stars. The food was a bizarre, delicious fusion of Shane’s perfectly balanced herbed chicken and Ilya’s robust, garlicky pasta. Shane served himself again, and again, Ilya’s eyes tracked the portion- still smaller than what Ilya knew he needed, especially with the metabolic demands of his the upcoming heat. The old, controlling impulse rose, a sharp desire to command him to eat more, to physically ensure his strength. But he saw the easy smile on Shane’s face, the relaxed slope of his shoulders, and he bit the words back. Maybe, he reasoned, forcing his own jaw to unclench, it takes time for the athlete’s mindset to switch off. Maybe he needs days to remember what hunger feels like without a training schedule. He would not poison this perfect, quiet mood. He would watch, and wait.

After cleaning up- Shane meticulously washing, drying and Ilya putting away- Shane padded over to the large, upholstered ottoman. He popped the lid, revealing a hidden trove of comfort: thick wool blankets, soft fleece throws, and a pile of down pillows. The omega in him, feeling safe and sated, purred to life.

With quick, efficient movements, Shane began building a nest right there in the center of the living room floor. He arranged the pillows into a soft wall, layered the blankets for texture and warmth. It wasn’t the frantic, desperate construction of a heat-driven need, but the contented creation of a den. A safe place.

Ilya watched, leaning against the kitchen doorway, his heart doing a slow, painful squeeze in his chest. He saw the focused calm on Shane’s face, the innate need for order and security being met. Without a word, Ilya pulled the soft, worn t-shirt he’d thrown on over his head and held it out.

Shane looked up, saw the offering, and rolled his eyes, but a faint, pleased blush colored his cheeks. He took the shirt and without hesitation, tucked it into the very center of the nest, against the largest pillow. Ilya’s scent would be the heart of it. The trust in that simple act was a physical warmth in Ilya’s veins.

They chose a movie, something action-packed and undemanding, but from the first explosion on screen, their attention was elsewhere. Wrapped in the nest, surrounded by shared scent and softness, the film became background noise. Shane leaned back against Ilya's chest, and Ilya's arms came around him, his chin resting on Shane's head.

It started with Ilya pressing a kiss to his temple. Then Shane tilted his head back, seeking his mouth. The first kiss was soft, a continuation of the evening's peace. But the nest, the darkness, the feel of Shane pliant and warm in his arms, stoked a low-burning ember. The kisses deepened, turning slow and languid, then hungry and searching. Shane turned fully in his embrace, his hands coming up to cup Ilya's face, and the movie was forgotten.

There was no rush, no driven urgency like the night before. This was exploration, rediscovery. They kissed until their lips were swollen and their breaths came in soft, shared pants, until the only light was from the forgotten television flickering blue across their skin. They kissed until Shane, with a final, sweet sigh, went boneless against him, his head finding its home in the hollow of Ilya's shoulder. Ilya held him, rearranging the blankets around them, his own eyes heavy.

The last thing he was aware of before sleep took him was the perfect, weightless silence in his mind, and the scent of their nest- wool, clean cotton, pine, and the two of them, blended into one.

The second day unfolded in a seamless, sun-drenched echo of the first. Time lost its rigid structure, measured not by clocks but by the arc of the sun across the lake and the quiet rhythms of their bodies. They made love in the late morning light, slow and deep on the rumpled sheets, a gentle reclamation. They made love again in the early afternoon, drowsy and sated on the sofa, a lazy exploration. It was always slow, always gentle, a conscious preservation of the fragile peace. There was an unspoken agreement in every tender touch: they were storing calm. They both knew the storm of Shane's heat was gathering on the horizon, a pressure change in the air between them, and these quiet unions felt like fortifying the walls before a gale.

Shane's parents called twice. Yuna's voice, sharp with concern even through the speakerphone, asked about headaches, about rest, about food. David's calmer tone inquired about the lake level, the boat motor. Shane answered with a patience Ilya had never witnessed, his voice soft, reassuring. "I'm good, Mom. Really. I'm just... relaxing." Ilya, chopping vegetables for lunch within earshot, felt a complicated warmth at the inclusion when Shane had set the phone on speaker.

Then, just a few minutes later, Shane's phone rang again. He glanced at the screen and a different, easier smile touched his lips. "Hey, Rose."

Ilya's knife stilled on the cutting board. Rose Landry. The name was a spark to tinder. She was a friend, she represented a part of Shane's life- the normal, uncomplicated, Canadian part- that was forever closed to him. He heard Shane's light laugh, a sound that was still too rare. "Yeah, the cottage is great... Just laying low... No, you're not interrupting..."

The casual intimacy of it, the sound of another person effortlessly accessing a smile Ilya felt he had to mine for with painstaking care, was intolerable. A cold, familiar jealousy, the old possessive ghost he thought he'd buried, slid through his veins. He set the knife down silently.

He crossed the room as Shane was saying, "I'll probably be back in the city next month maybe, we can- " and took the phone from his hand. He ended the call without a word and tossed it onto the cushions behind them.

Shane's eyes widened, not with fear, but with startled understanding. "Ilya- "

He was cut off as Ilya spun him and pressed him back against the cool, solid log wall of the cottage. This was not the gentle taking from the bed or the sofa. This was not a request. It was a declaration, driven by a dark, churning emotion Ilya couldn't name. He kissed him, hard, a claiming that was all teeth and desperate tongue. His hands pushed at the waistband of Shane's shorts, his own already shoved down.

"Okay," Shane breathed, the word a shaky exhale against Ilya's mouth. Not a protest. A surrender.

It was fast, and it was rough against the unyielding wall. Ilya drove into him with a single-minded intensity that bordered on punishment- for Rose, for the world, for the part of Shane he could never fully own. He braced Shane with his body, his hands gripping his hips hard enough to leave bruises.

And Shane... Shane changed.

During their gentle lovemaking, Shane was present. His hands mapped Ilya's back, his mouth answered every kiss, his whispers were a shared secret. He was a participant, an equal in the dance.

Now, pressed against the wall, he went quiet. His grasping hands stilled, falling to brace against the logs. His head tipped forward, his breathing shifting into deep, even patterns. His eyes, when Ilya caught a glimpse, were hazy and distant. He surrendered completely, yielding not just his body but his will, floating away on the current of Ilya's control. He slipped into that silent, submissive space where nothing existed but sensation and the alpha who commanded it.

The realization hit Ilya like a bucket of ice water a moment before his own climax tore through him. He finished with a guttural groan, his forehead thudding against the wall beside Shane's head, shame and a terrible, thrilling possessiveness warring in his chest.

He softened, but didn't pull away, holding Shane up as his own legs trembled. He pressed an apologetic kiss to Shane's sweat-damp shoulder. "Come back to me, sweetheart," he whispered. I'm sorry.

Shane just hummed, a low, contented sound, still floating somewhere far away. It took a full minute for him to blink back into himself. When he did, he leaned back into Ilya's hold, his body pliant. "S'okay," he mumbled, his voice thick.

They cleaned up in silence. The easy rhythm of the day was fractured a bit. As they made a simple dinner, Ilya watched Shane move, his mind churning. The duality was stark, and it terrified him. Gentle Ilya brought forth Shane's partnership, his laughter, his trust. The jealous, possessive Ilya- the ghost of the man who'd hired trackers- evoked a total, deep surrender. It was a power more absolute than any he'd ever wielded, and the part of him shaped by his father's brutal lessons thrilled to it. The part of him that loved Shane, the part in therapy, recoiled.

Shane seemed unbothered, curling into the nest on the couch afterward as if nothing had happened. But Ilya lay awake long after Shane's breathing evened out in sleep, staring at the ceiling. The peace of the cottage was still real. But within it, he had discovered a new, dark thread in the tapestry of their intimacy. He had seen the ghost of his old obsession, and he had seen how willingly Shane's traumatized body and mind could appease it. It was a dynamic that could so easily curdle, slipping back into the sickness of before. He couldn't ignore it. It would need to be examined, spoken of, before the summer ended. But not tonight. Tonight, he pulled Shane closer, breathing in the scent of his hair, and clung to the fragile peace, guarding it even from the shadows in his own heart.

The moon cast a cold glow, leaving the cottage in the deep, velvety muted colors that only exists far from city lights. They were in their nest, the blankets a soft chaos around them, the movie credits long since finished rolling in silence on the screen. Shane was a warm, boneless weight against Ilya's side, his breathing slow. The ghost of the earlier encounter against the wall, however, lingered between them like a scent Ilya couldn't ignore.

His hand, which had been stroking Shane's arm, stilled. The words felt too loud for the quiet, but they had promised honesty.

"Shane," he began, his voice a low rumble in the dark. "Earlier... when I was... not gentle. You went away. Into your head."

Shane didn't tense, but Ilya felt the minute shift in his breathing, a quiet alertness.

"I worry," Ilya continued, forcing the admission out. "You can slip into it so... easily. Is it... are you okay when that happens?"

There was a long silence. Shane's fingers traced idle patterns on Ilya's chest, over his heartbeat. When he spoke, his voice was thoughtful, distant in a different way.

"It's not like being hurt," he said finally. "It doesn't feel like a bad kind of quiet. Not like after... him." They never said Chris's name. "That was cold. And empty. This is... warm. And full."

He paused, gathering his thoughts with the careful precision Ilya knew so well. "My brain, it's always... on. Analyzing. Planning. Running scenarios. What I said, what I didn't say, what play to make, what the media will think, what my parents need, what my body is doing... it's a constant... noise." He let out a soft breath. "When you take over like that, when it's clear you're in control and I can't... mess it up... the noise just stops. It all goes quiet. There's just... feeling. And trust. It's not that I'm not there. I'm just... not in charge. And for a little while, that's... a relief."

He tilted his head back to look at Ilya, his eyes reflecting the faint starlight from the window. "I like it. I like knowing you can take me apart like that and I'll be safe. That you want to, but you'll also put me back together." A faint, self-deprecating smile touched his lips. "It probably sounds messed up."

Ilya listened, his heart a complicated, aching knot in his chest. He understood the relentless noise of a mind that couldn't stop. His was filled with darker symphonies- fear, possession, violence. Shane's was a cacophony of responsibility and hyper-vigilance. The idea that his own dominating instinct could provide Shane a respite was intoxicating and terrifying in equal measure. It was a power he craved and feared abusing.

"It does not sound messed up," Ilya murmured, his hand coming up to cradle the side of Shane's face. "It sounds like a gift you give me. A very big trust." He searched Shane's eyes. "But you must tell me. If it ever feels... cold. Or empty. You must tell me."

Shane held his gaze, then nodded slowly. "I will. I promise." He nuzzled into Ilya's palm. "But... it hasn't. Not with you. Not since... everything. It feels different now. It feels like a choice."

The words settled in Ilya's soul, quieting his own rising noise of fear. This wasn't the traumatized surrender of the kidnapping. This was Shane, with his brilliant, analytical mind, consciously choosing to hand the reins to Ilya within the safe parameters they were building. It was an intimacy as profound as any physical act.

He leaned down and kissed him, a slow, sealing promise. When he pulled back, he rested his hand on Shane's stomach, over the faint, firm muscles. "Then it is our secret," he whispered. "Our quiet place."

Shane's answering smile was soft and real. He turned, settling back against Ilya, pulling his arm around him like a living blanket. The last tension from the day bled away, leaving only the deep, trusting quiet of the nest. Ilya closed his eyes, breathing in the scent of their peace.

He would examine this dynamic, yes. They would have to talk about its edges, its dangers. But for now, he would simply accept the gift of it- the profound trust that allowed Shane to find quiet in his arms, and the immense responsibility that came with holding that silence sacred. It was another thread in the new thing they were weaving, strong and complex, nothing like the brittle chain of his old obsession.

Chapter End Notes

Just a cottage, a lake, and two men who have spent thirty-one chapters trying to convince themselves they don't desperately want this.

I know this chapter is slower than the previous few, but I really wanted them to have room to breathe. They've been living in survival mode for so long that learning how to simply exist together feels just as important as all the dramatic moments.

And yes... Shane getting the birth control injection was intentional. I know some of you have been side-eyeing every mention of heats and babies for the last couple of chapters. 😂 I'm not saying anything else because I enjoy watching the theories roll in.

I also really wanted to show how different Ilya is becoming. The old Ilya would have walked into that cottage and taken everything he wanted. This Ilya waits. He checks in. He listens. He still wants Shane with every fiber of his being, but now that desire is guided by respect instead of obsession. Growth doesn't erase who he is, it changes how he loves.

As always...

❤️ What was your favorite moment?

❤️ Anyone miss unhinged Ilya? He might be making an appearance in two chapters lol

❤️ Did Ilya kissing his palm completely ruin anyone else?

Thank you all for reading, commenting, screaming, and theorizing with me every single chapter. This story has become so much bigger than I ever imagined because of all of you.

See you next chapter... where these two finally get to discover what a partnered heat actually looks like.

Good luck to all of us. ❤️

Chapter 32: Chapter 32

Chapter Summary

I don't even know how to introduce this chapter without screaming into the void. 😊

This one has been living in my head for months. So many conversations, promises, fears, and little moments from earlier chapters finally come together here. If you've been patiently waiting for these two emotionally constipated hockey players to actually talk to each other... well... here is your reward. 😊

Before you dive in, a few thank-yous:

💙 To my amazing beta reader for catching all of my "oopses," because apparently words are hard after staring at the same chapter for days.

🌈 To my gay besties for helping me create the spicy scenes... and for collectively traumatizing my husband every time I asked, "baby come here and help Tony help me visualize something." 😊

💜 And finally, to my dear sister, who clutched her invisible pearls throughout this chapter and repeatedly told me to take certain scenes out. Naturally, every time she did... I made those scenes longer. 🙄

As always, thank you all for reading, commenting, screaming, theorizing, and coming along for this ride with me. I hope you love this chapter as much as I loved writing it.

The deep, calming quiet of the cottage that night was broken by a whisper of fabric moving. but by a decision. Shane slipped from the warmth of the bed and Ilya's arms, the wood floor cool under his bare feet. He slipped on the first pair of boxers he saw, Ilya's from the size. In the bathroom, the small, clinical package waited on the counter. He stared at it, his mind clear. It was the right choice, the responsible choice. The only choice that made sense for the athletes they were, for the fragile new thing they were building. In an hour, the window would close. He could feel the ache in his body already, the warmth blooming around his scent glands, it was cutting it close for this to be effective.

He jumped when the bathroom door nudged open. Ilya stood there, silhouetted by the faint moonlight from the bedroom, gloriously, unconcernedly naked. His sleep-rough voice was a low scrape in the dark. “Solnyshko? What is wrong?”

“Nothing’s wrong, I have to take the shot.” Shane said, his voice tighter than he intended. He held up the syringe. “It’s time.”

Ilya’s eyes tracked to the instrument, and for a heartbeat, the air changed. Shane saw the knowledge flash in his gaze, the alpha understanding that with a few well-placed, stern commands, he could override this. He could appeal to the part of Shane that craved submission and obedience, the part that had just confessed to finding quiet in surrender. The power imbalance hung between them, taut and real.

But Ilya simply stepped into the room. He didn’t grab, didn’t command. He came behind Shane and ran his large, warm hands up and down the tense line of his spine, a soothing, grounding pressure. “Do you need help?” he asked, his voice now carefully neutral.

The offer of aid, not control, untied the knot in Shane’s chest. He nodded, a quick, jerky motion. “Please.”

Without a word, Ilya took the syringe and the alcohol swab from his trembling fingers. He sank to his knees on the bath mat, a posture of service that felt more intimate than any dominance. He swabbed a patch on Shane’s inner thigh close to the scent gland there, his touch clinical and gentle. “Look at me,” he murmured.

Shane dragged his eyes from the needle to Ilya’s face. In the dim light, Ilya’s expression was solemn, etched with a painful respect. He held Shane’s gaze as he pressed the needle in and depressed the plunger. A quick, sharp sting. A decision was made final.

Ilya disposed of the syringe and pressed the cotton ball to the spot, his other hand coming up to rest on Shane’s hip. He stayed there, kneeling, for a long moment, just breathing with him. The choice was made. He had helped cement it.

“Thank you,” Shane whispered, the words thick.

Ilya stood, pulling Shane into a tight, wordless hug. His skin was warm, his scent a shelter. He didn't say he agreed or that he was disappointed. He simply held him, accepting the weight of the choice as shared.

Back in the bed, sleep was impossible for Shane. The injection felt cold, like threads seeping in and around the warm tapestry of their night, and his mind snagged on it. Ilya, sensing his wakefulness, shifted to face him, his hand coming to rest on Shane's cheek.

"You are thinking too much," Ilya murmured.

A shaky breath escaped Shane. "Yeah."

Ilya was silent for a while, his thumb stroking Shane's freckles. Then, his voice even softer, he asked the question that had clearly been weighing on him. "Shane... when we are together... when I am inside you here," he slowly trailed his hand down, bypassing his flaccid cock and circling his vaginal entrance. "... you always tense at first. Every time. Does it... not feel good? We do not have to do that. There are other ways." The offer was genuine, laced with a worry that he was causing pain.

The offer, so utterly sincere, cracked something open in Shane's chest. He'd thought he'd hidden it, that the flinch was internal and invisible. But Ilya saw everything. He always had.

Shane's eyes burned. He shook his head against the pillow. "No. It's not that. It feels... it feels perfect after a second. It's just..." He struggled for the words, the honesty they'd promised feeling like scaling a cliff. "The first moment of... when you're first inside me, the pain kinda feels good." He blushes fiercely. "It's a loss of control. My body likes it, but growing up I heard... things. My teammates used to joke about male omega's versus beta's. That omega's became clingy and desperate. I never wanted to be that. We had to all have a lecture one day because a soccer captain had raped an omega. My teammates didn't even blink. It was like whatever happens, happens. I swore to myself that wouldn't happen to me. Ever. It was so hard hiding- making excuses not to be in the showers. I had to be better than everyone else so they didn't have room to think about how strange I was. I was the odd ball. The only Asian kid, I wasn't too social. I didn't like going out. Everything about me was wrong, but I was good on the ice. My parents were so proud, the school and my coaches were always saying how amazing I was. That would have all gone away if I slipped and someone saw me in the showers.” Shane stopped for a few minutes. He pulled away from Ilya so that he could look up at the other man.

“But with you, I don’t feel that way. I don’t feel embarrassed or like there’s something wrong with me, but sometimes, I just think my body needs to get used to being not on the defensive” he rushed to add, feeling Ilya go rigid. “Never by you. But by...everything. It’s been so hard to hide things from my friends, pretending that I’m fine to my parents... then I meet you. You invaded my life even before we met. It’s a stupid, automatic flinch. But then I feel it’s you, and it... it all melts away. It becomes good. It becomes everything.”

He felt Ilya’s entire body go rigid beside him, he sat up, needing to make sure he was getting his point across. A low, wounded sound escaped Ilya, and Shane went to grab his hands in his.

“It passes,” Shane whispered urgently, turning to face him, his hand finding Ilya’s cheek. “It passes so fast because it’s you. Because I know you’ll stop if I ask you to. Because I did choose this. But that first split second... my body remembers before my brain can catch up.”

Ilya was silent for a long time, his breath shuddering. When he spoke, his voice was thick. “I hate that I cannot fix that for you. That I... contributed to it.”

“It’s not your fault,” Shane said firmly. He shifted closer, pressing his forehead to Ilya’s shoulder. “And you just... waiting through that second. Letting me feel it and come back to you... that helps. It makes the memories weaker. You always bring me back to you.”

Ilya’s arms tightened around him, almost desperately. “We will go as slow as you need. Forever. Or we will not go there at all. Your choice. Always.”

The confession hung in the dark, raw and ugly. Ilya’s breath caught. Shane could feel the fury and the grief radiating from him, a silent storm directed at a dead man.

“Moy bednyy mal’chik,” Ilya breathed, his voice aching. He pulled Shane closer, tucking his head under his chin, wrapping him up so completely Shane felt surrounded by Ilya’s scent, his warmth.

Ilya held him for a long time, his lips pressed to Shane's hair. When he finally spoke, his voice was a vow shaped in the dark. "I understand. I will fight anything for you, every time, until is nothing but dust." He paused. "And if you ever want to stop anything we are doing... you tell me. No shame. Ever."

The tension finally bled out of Shane, replaced by a weary, profound relief. They had shone a light on another dark corner of the past. Ilya hadn't gotten angry. He hadn't taken it as a rejection. He had offered a change in tactics, a respect for the battlefield of Shane's own body.

"Okay," Shane whispered. He nestled deeper into Ilya's hold, their bed feeling safer than ever. The injection was working in his bloodstream, the cold threads slowly moving through his veins. And Ilya, his once-terrifying alpha, was with him, and promised to fight his battles with infinite patience. It was a different kind of devotion, quieter than possession, stronger than obsession.

A few hours later, Ilya surfaced from a thin, anxious sleep. The first thing he registered was the change in temperature. The body curled against his own was no longer just warm; it was radiating a dry, febrile heat that seeped through Shane's out of his naked torso and into Ilya's skin. Not the drenching sweat of full heat yet, but like the kindling before the blaze. Shane's breathing had deepened, each exhale a soft, almost inaudible sigh.

Carefully, moving inch by inch, Ilya extricated himself from the limbs and blankets. Shane made a small, distressed sound in his sleep, his hand flexing where it had been pressing against Ilya's chest. The instinct to crawl back in, to wrap himself around that heat and stoke it, was a physical ache. Mine. Needing me.

He stood in the dark bedroom, forcing a breath. The ghost of his father's voice whispered one solution: claim, take, dominate. The newer, painfully learned voice of his therapist and his own hard-won love suggested another: care, provide, support.

He padded silently into the kitchen. The research he'd done in the lonely weeks before coming here scrolled through his mind like a checklist. Hydration is paramount. Easy calories, something that can be eaten without too much effort. Electrolytes. Omega metabolism spikes; they burn through energy reserves. He thought of the painfully small portions on Shane's plate all day, the athlete's discipline warring with a body about to undertake a massive biological task. It wasn't enough. He filled a large glass with water and ice, the cubes cracking loudly in the silent cottage. Then he took the container of leftover roasted chicken from the refrigerator. He shredded a generous portion into a bowl, warming it just enough to take the chill off, to make it easy. He added a pinch of salt. He smiled at the fridge. It was well stocked with prepared meals to last them for the rest of the week.

When he returned to the bedroom, Shane was awake. He'd pushed the blankets down to his waist, his eyes glazed and heavy-lidded in the moonlight. He watched Ilya approach, tracking his movement with a slow, drugged focus.

"You're hot," Ilya stated, his voice low. He set the water and bowl on the nightstand.

"Starting," Shane confirmed, his voice rough. He looked at the offerings, then back at Ilya, a complex expression crossing his face- gratitude, vulnerability, a hint of shame at being seen in this needful state.

Ilya sat on the edge of the bed. He didn't command. He presented. He held the glass to Shane's lips first. "Small sips."

Shane obeyed, drinking until Ilya pulled the glass away. "Too fast will make you sick," Ilya murmured, an echo of the clinical articles he'd memorized. He then picked up the bowl and fork. He speared a few pieces of chicken. "Now this. Slowly."

"I can do it," Shane said, but his hand, when he raised it, trembled slightly.

Ilya captured that hand, lacing their fingers together and lowering it back to the sheet. He held the fork steady. "Let me," he said, and it wasn't an alpha's order. It was a request, a plea to be allowed to provide this specific care. "Please."

Shane studied him for a moment, then gave a tiny nod. He parted his lips.

Ilya fed him, piece by careful piece, watching his throat work. He said nothing, his entire world narrowed to this simple, sacred task: ensuring the omega he loved consumed what he needed to weather the storm Ilya's own presence would intensify. The possessive joy he felt was not in the control, but in the capability- in being the one trusted to meet this need, not with demands, but with quietly offered chicken and ice water. It was a new kind of devotion, built not on tracking devices, but on watching for tremors in a hand and remembering the importance of taking care of his mate. In the quiet dark of the night, it felt more profound than any declaration.

Ilya held the cool glass to Shane's lips, his other hand cupping the back of his head to steady him. Shane drank obediently, small, measured swallows, his throat working. The water was what his body craved. When the glass was half-empty, Ilya set it aside and picked up the bowl of warm, shredded chicken.

"Now some more of this," he said softly, bringing a forkful to Shane's lips.

Shane's head turned slightly, his nose wrinkling. The glazed look in his eyes was deepening, the lucid awareness of earlier being slowly submerged by the rising tide of his biology. "Not hungry," he mumbled, the words slightly slurred.

"You need to eat," Ilya said, keeping his voice low and even, the same tone he'd use to coax a nervous animal. "Your body will burn everything. You will need the strength."

Shane shook his head, a weak, stubborn motion. He brought a hand up, not to push the fork away, but to press vaguely against his own stomach. "Don't... don't need it. Getting... getting fat. Slow."

The words, mumbled into the dim room, landed like a physical blow on Ilya's chest. They weren't the petulant refusal of a child, nor the disciplined denial of an athlete. This was something sadder, more ingrained- the ghost of a young omega who'd spent a lifetime trying to make his body conform, less omega, to survive in a world built for alphas and betas. It was the echo of the boy who'd hidden in empty showers, who'd calculated every aspect of his life to retain control over anything he could.

A fierce, protective ache tightened Ilya's throat. The old Ilya would have seen this as a failing to be corrected, a weakness in his possession. The man kneeling by the bed now saw only a wound that needed tending.

He didn't argue. He didn't try to reason with the pre-heat fogged mind. He leaned in closer, his voice dropping into a register that was not a request, but a firm, unwavering directive. It was the voice of an alpha providing care, a command meant to bypass fear and soothe instinct.

"Shane. Look at me."

Shane's heavy-lidded eyes drifted up to meet his. The submission there was deeper now, a willing surrender to the authority in Ilya's tone.

"You will eat this for me," Ilya said, each word clear and deliberate. He held the fork steady. "It is not about weight. It is about fuel. You are not getting fat. A sick, weak body will not please me, and you do want to please me, right? You need your strength for this week. Now, open."

For a heartbeat, Shane hesitated, the lifetime of conditioning warring with the newer, deeper trust. Then, with a soft sigh that seemed to come from his very bones, he parted his lips.

Ilya fed him. Piece by slow piece. He watched the tension ease from Shane's jaw as he chewed, the automatic obedience allowing his body to accept what it truly needed. There was no pleasure in this control, only a solemn responsibility. Each bite was a confirmation for Ilya that Shane needed him to take care of him, to protect him from everything, even if it was just from himself.

When the bowl was empty, Ilya set it aside. He wiped Shane's mouth gently with his thumb, then helped him sip more water. The feverish heat was more pronounced now, a dry fire radiating from Shane's skin, but some of the restless anxiety had bled away, replaced by a pliant exhaustion.

“Good,” Ilya murmured, the command leaving his voice, replaced by pure warmth. “So good for me, solnyshko.”

He rearranged the blankets, making sure that Shane was comfortable. Shane’s eyes were already closing, the simple act of eating having taken the last of his conscious energy. He turned onto his side, instinctively seeking Ilya’s warmth, and Ilya slid in behind him, molding his body to Shane’s back, a living shield against the coming storm.

The heat was beginning in earnest. But Shane was nourished. He was safe, and he was loved. And it really was love, not just because they were mates. Ilya loved him for everything he was- the man who he became enraptured with upon meeting and he needed to know that. As Shane’s breathing evened out into a deeper sleep, Ilya pressed his lips to his damp hair and made another promise into the dark- he needed Shane to know how he felt before the heat took his consciousness fully.

The feverish heat radiating from Shane’s skin had intensified, a dry, restless energy that made him shift against the sheets with soft, pained sounds. The rational part of him was slipping away, submerged under the biological tide. Ilya watched, every instinct screaming to soothe, to fix. He remembered the research, the simple advice: cool wet cloths, hydration, comfort.

Without a word, he slid his arms under Shane’s limp body. Shane murmured a protest, but it was weak, his head lolling against Ilya’s shoulder. Ilya carried him to the bathroom, the world narrowed to the weight in his arms and the frantic beat of his own heart.

He set Shane down on the closed toilet lid, supporting him against the cool tile of the wall as he started the shower. He adjusted the taps carefully, running the water cooler than usual, testing it on his own wrist until it was a refreshing, gentle chill. He helped Shane step under the spray.

The effect was immediate. Shane gasped, his eyes fluttering open, a flicker of clarity returning as the cool water ran over his overheated skin. He leaned his forehead against the tile, his breathing deepening from panicked pants to something more even. Ilya stayed with him, a solid presence, his hands gently guiding the water over Shane’s back and shoulders, washing away the anxious sweat. It was a silent, methodical care. No demands, no claims. Just the steady, cool rain and the safety of not being alone.

When the heat seemed leached from his skin, replaced by a more manageable warmth and a slight shiver, Ilya turned off the water. He wrapped Shane in a large, soft towel, drying him with the same focused tenderness, before lifting him again and carrying him back to the bed.

This time, he didn't lay him down. He sat against the headboard and arranged Shane in his lap, cradling him against his chest, enveloping him in warmth and the steady rhythm of his heartbeat. The nest of blankets was around them, like a private little bubble.

Shane was quiet for a long moment, listening to that heartbeat. Then, his voice small and raw, he confessed into the dark. "I'm scared. For the next few days. Of... losing myself. Of what it'll be like."

Ilya's arms tightened. He pressed his lips to Shane's damp hair. "Do not be scared," he murmured, the words a vow. "This is natural. This is our new start. Right here." He took a deep breath, giving shape to the future he'd been building in the quiet of his own mind for months. "We will figure it out. How to keep you in the league, as you are. How to be together. We will get married. We will have babies, when you are ready." The words felt both terrifying and right. "We will have everything. But we start here. Now. With this. However it comes. I am not afraid."

He felt Shane tremble against him. Then, Ilya said the words he had felt since the moment he saw Shane Hollander shyly walk up to him almost four years ago, words that had been poison in his obsession and were now, finally, a healing truth. "I love you, Shane."

The silence that followed was profound, filled only with the echo of the declaration. Then Shane shifted, turning his head to look up at Ilya. In the dim light, his eyes were clear, free of heat-fog for this single, suspended moment. All his walls were down. All his fears were laid bare, and in the center of them was this absolute truth.

"I love you, too, so much." Shane whispered, the words a release, a homecoming.

A peace, deeper than any Ilya had ever known, settled in his bones. He traced the line of Shane's jaw, his thumb brushing over his lips. The old, poetic Russian slipped out, a final, vulnerable offering of his soul.

“Schastye moyo,” he breathed, his voice thick. “If I loved you like no other, would you love me the same?”

Shane didn’t hesitate. He reached up, his hand curling around the back of Ilya’s neck, pulling him down until their foreheads touched. He nodded, their breath mingling, Shane couldn’t stop the tears from escaping. His answer was simple, devastating, and complete.

“My life is only life with you in it.”

It was the final lock clicking open. Ilya kissed him then, trying to pour all everything he was feeling all at once. When they parted, Shane’s eyes were drifting shut again, but the frantic edge of the heat had been softened, surrounded by something stronger. He nuzzled into Ilya’s chest, his movements becoming deliberate as he tugged and rearranged the blankets around them both, building a smaller, perfect nest within the circle of Ilya’s arms. An omega, safe in the heart of his alpha’s devotion.

Ilya held him, watching as sleep finally claimed him. The fever was still there, his heat was almost upon them. But the foundation beneath them was now unshakeable, they had named it. They had chosen it. Love, not as a chain, but as the ground upon which they would finally stand together.

Ilya held him through the creeping hours of the night, a vigilant sentinel, guarding over his mate. The dry heat coming off Shane’s skin was a tangible force. Every so often, Ilya would reach for the water glass, murmuring, “Solnyshko, drink,” and Shane would obey, his throat working on autopilot.

A deep, complex part of Ilya loved this. Loved the utter trust, the seamless obedience, the way Shane’s brilliant, analytical mind quieted into simple reliance. It soothed the raw, possessive edges of his alpha nature, the part that had once mistaken control for care. But even as he cherished it, he knew he would not want this version of Shane forever. He missed the sharp, questioning gaze, the million rapid-fire questions when presented with a new play or a strange rock on the lakeshore. He missed his capable, stubborn, fiercely independent omega. This surrender was a gift for the crisis, not the blueprint for their life.

When Shane finally dozed again, his breathing a shallow, hot flutter against Ilya’s neck, Ilya remained awake. His own blood was beginning to sing in response, a familiar, rising pressure at the base of his spine. His rut, a shadow to Shane's heat, was stirring. He could feel the aggressive pulse of it, the urge to pin and claim and lose himself. He closed his eyes, focusing on the weight in his arms. Easy. For him. You must go easy. His goal was to have Shane willing to go into another heat in a few months, and he wouldn't want to if when he came out of this he would find himself bruised and sore. The last of his own rut suppressant was leaving his system, but his will had to be the stronger cage. He would not be his father. He would not be the monster from the hotel room. He would be the man Shane had just said he loved.

Just before dawn, Shane woke with a sudden, frantic energy. He pushed out of Ilya's arms with a strength that belied his feverish state, his eyes wide and unseeing, fixed on some internal, urgent blueprint.

"Shane?" Ilya asked, shifting to follow.

But Shane was already moving, a creature of pure instinct. He stripped the bed with clumsy, desperate hands, whining when a sheet tangled. He dragged blankets from the ottoman, from the linen closet, piling them in the center of the mattress. He arranged pillows, then immediately rearranged them, a soft, distressed whimper escaping when the symmetry didn't satisfy his heat-addled brain. He pulled Ilya's discarded shirt from the earlier nest and pressed it to his face, inhaling deeply before tucking it with reverent care beneath a pillow. He was building a fortress, a sanctuary, and Ilya was, for the moment, just another resource-accepted, needed, but not consciously seen.

Ilya watched, his heart aching. This was his omega stripped bare, not just of clothes, but of every learned restraint, acting on a biological instinct older than language. He stayed quiet, still, letting the compulsion run its course. Only when Shane began to slow, his movements becoming sluggish and confused, his whimpers more frequent as exhaustion battled the drive, did Ilya move.

He rose and went to him. "Enough, Milyy moy," he said softly, his voice cutting through the fog. "It is perfect. It is ready."

Shane blinked up at him, dazed, a sheen of sweat on his brow. Ilya didn't ask. He simply bent, hooked an arm under his knees and behind his back, and lifted him. Shane went limp, his head falling against Ilya's shoulder with a final, exhausted sigh.

Ilya carried him a few steps to the newly constructed nest and carefully lowered them both into its center. He arranged Shane against him, pulling the rearranged blankets and pillows around them until they were swaddled in a cloud of fabric and shared scent. Shane trembled, the fever peaking, the first true slickness heating the skin between them.

“So good,” Ilya murmured into his hair, one hand stroking firmly down the tense line of his spine. “You built a perfect place for us. So clever. So strong.”

A shudder ran through Shane, and then, from deep in his chest, a sound emerged- a low, thrumming purr of pure, unconscious contentment. Ilya could very quickly become addicted to the sound. A wave of pure, possessive tenderness crashed over Ilya, so potent it momentarily stilled the rising drumbeat of his own rut. Shane melted into him with a shuddering exhale, his head falling back against Ilya’s shoulder.

For long moments, there was only the sound of their breathing and the crackle of the fire in the hearth Shane had insisted on lighting. Then, Shane’s voice, small and muffled against Ilya’s skin, broke the quiet.

“Ilya?” A pause, filled with the hammering of two hearts. “When... when this is over. Would you... would you want us to be bonded?”

The question, asked with such vulnerable hesitation, stole the air from Ilya’s lungs. A claiming bite. The ultimate, irreversible seal. The act his father had taught him was about ownership, a brand to prove conquest. The act he had fantasized about in his darkest, most obsessive moments, imagining his teeth breaking Shane’s skin, making him irrevocably his. He heard the offer of a lifetime of trust from the omega who had every reason to fear permanent marks. He felt the weight of it, sacred and terrifying.

Ilya’s arms tightened. He pressed his lips to the very spot on Shane’s neck where his teeth would go, feeling the frantic pulse beneath his mouth. “Da,” he breathed, the word a vow. “More than anything in this world.” He felt Shane relax infinitesimally. But Ilya wasn’t finished. He had a condition, born not of control, but of a desperate need to build something that could withstand everything- the media, the league, their pasts.

“But on one condition,” Ilya said, his voice gaining a firm, solemn edge. He shifted Shane in his arms just enough to look into his eyes. “We also get married.”

Shane blinked, surprise cutting through the heat-haze. “Married?”

“Yes. A bond is for us. In here.” He tapped his own chest, then Shane’s. “It is private. Sacred. But marriage...” Ilya searched for the words, wanting to be crystal clear, to avoid any shadow of his old, coercive patterns. “Marriage is a promise to the world. It is a contract, a family, a foundation everyone can see. It is for your parents, for the lawyers, for the league. It is... armor.” He cupped Shane’s face, his thumb stroking his cheekbone. “I am not proposing now. This is not the right time. I will do it properly. With a ring, on my knees, when you are clear-headed and can tell me to go to hell if you want.”

He took a shaky breath, laying his heart completely bare. “I just need you to understand what this, what you- mean to me. It is not just my omega in my nest. It is my husband in our home. My partner for every contract, every championship, every quiet morning. That is what I am working for. That is the future I see.”

Shane stared at him, his eyes wide and glistening. The heat was there, a flush on his skin, but his mind was present, absorbing every word. He saw the earnest, almost fearful intensity in Ilya’s blue eyes, the absolute absence of manipulation. This wasn’t a trap. It was a blueprint.

A slow, real smile broke through Shane’s fevered expression. He turned fully in Ilya’s arms, straddling his lap in the heart of the nest, and framed Ilya’s face with his hot hands. “Okay,” he whispered, his voice thick. “Okay. Bonded and married. But you’re right. Do it properly. Later.” He leaned in, their foreheads touching. “But the answer will be yes.”

Relief, profound and dizzying, washed through Ilya. He captured Shane’s mouth in a searing kiss that was all promise and no possession. When they parted, Shane’s purr returned, louder this time, a contented engine thrumming through them both. He nuzzled into Ilya’s neck, scenting him deliberately, and Ilya felt the sharp, sweet pang of his rut align with Shane’s heat, not as a taking, but as an answer.

“Yours,” Shane murmured against his skin, the word both a surrender and a claim.

“Mine,” Ilya agreed, holding him in the perfect nest. “And I am yours. Now, and when I marry you.” The future, once a haunted, lonely plain, now had a shape. It had a ring, a bite, and a foundation stronger than any obsession. For now, in the warm, scented dark, that was enough.

The air in the nest was thick with the scent of pine, fever, and desperate want. Shane’s request hung between them, not just a question, but a seismic shift. Bonding. Now. Before the heat stripped him of all coherent thought.

Ilya’s entire body went rigid. The fantasy of it had haunted him for years, but now, faced with the reality, every protective instinct roared to life. “Net,” he breathed, his voice strained. “The bite... it will hurt. The pain, with the heat, it will be too much. After, when you are clear-”

“I don’t want to be clear,” Shane interrupted, his eyes blazing. The structured, conflict-avoidant omega was gone, burned away by a need for something absolute. “I want it now. I want to go into it knowing I’m yours. That you’re mine.”

With a fluid, determined movement, he climbed into Ilya’s lap, straddling him in the center of their sanctuary. He didn’t kiss him. Instead, he leaned forward, his lips brushing the corded muscle of Ilya’s neck, right over the pounding, prominent scent gland. Then he nipped. Not hard, but a deliberate, teasing scrape of teeth over the most sensitive alpha skin.

It was like a spark to a powder keg.

A raw, guttural growl tore from Ilya’s throat, the sound vibrating through both of them. Every thread of his hard-won control, every promise to go slow, shattered. His hands locked onto Shane’s hips, fingers digging in.

He surged up, and Shane met him, a perfect, desperate alignment. In one brutal, fluid motion, Ilya sheathed himself fully inside Shane’s slick, welcoming heat at the exact moment he drove his teeth deep into the offered curve of Shane’s neck.

Shane’s cry was sharp, a sound of piercing pain that melted instantly into a keening wail of ecstasy. His body arched violently, forcing Ilya even deeper. The twin sensations- the blinding stretch within, the sharp, claiming puncture of the sharp bite, short-circuited every nerve ending. He was being unmade and remade in the same second.

Ilya pulled his head back for a fraction of a second, his mouth wet and copper-tinged. His voice was a dark, ragged command against Shane's ear. "Now you. Bite me. Now. As hard as you can."

He guided Shane's head to his own throat, to the gland Shane's teeth had just teased. It was an order, an invitation, a demand for mutual ruin. Shane, lost in a haze of pain and devotion, obeyed. He sank his teeth into Ilya's flesh with all the strength he possessed.

The world dissolved.

A blinding, white-hot circuit completed. Pleasure, pain, possession, surrender - it all fused into a single, indivisible current that locked their souls together. Ilya's growl turned into a continuous, possessive snarl as his hips began to piston, his thrusts turning rough, deep, and relentless. The careful lover was gone, incinerated by the primal alpha finally claiming his mate.

His hand slid from Shane's hip, splaying wide and firm against the small of his back, pressing him down, holding him in place for every driving impact. The other hand fisted in the sheets beside Shane's head. This was not lovemaking. This was a conquering, a branding. An instinct older than language, older than themselves, older than fear.

Shane clung to him, his own bite unwavering, his body convulsing around Ilya's in waves of overwhelming sensation. He was pinned, claimed, and utterly consumed. The structured mind that feared loss of control had voluntarily leapt into the volcano, and was now being forged into something new in the fire.

When the final, cataclysmic release tore through them, it was simultaneous. Ilya's roar was muffled against Shane's ravaged neck, Shane's scream was swallowed by Ilya's skin. They spilled into each other, the bond sealing not just with blood and seed, but with a shared shockwave of absolute, terrifying completion.

Slowly, the world swam back. Ilya, trembling with the aftershocks, gently loosened his jaw and eased Shane's teeth from his throat. He rolled them, gathering Shane's limp, trembling body against him, tucking him into the curve of his own body. The nest was in disarray, the sheets stained with sweat and blood.

He nuzzled the fresh, glistening bite on Shane's neck, lapping gently at the wound with a soft, apologetic rumble. Shane shivered, a broken, satiated sound escaping him. He turned his head, his dazed eyes finding Ilya's. The fear was gone. The anxiety was gone. In its place was a profound, weary peace, and a new, almost invisible blue thread in the brown of his irises- the reflection of a bond accepted.

"Mine," Ilya whispered, the word no longer a threat, but a fact, heavy and sacred.

"Yours," Shane sighed back, his purr restarting, weaker but deep, a vibration of pure belonging. He traced the matching wound on Ilya's throat with a reverent fingertip.

The bond was a live wire between them, a searing, golden circuit that pulsed with every shared heartbeat. The initial, shocking pain of the bites had subsided into a deep, throbbing ache- a brand, a seal, a truth etched into their skin. Shane lay trembling beneath Ilya, his body humming with a new, terrifying awareness. He could feel Ilya's hunger, his awe, his fiercely protective joy, not as an emotion to be interpreted, but as a tangible presence in his own chest, a second storm system colliding with the hurricane of his heat.

Every nerve ending was exposed, singing with the need for more- more contact, more friction, more of the alpha whose scent was now woven into his very cells. The careful, gentle lovemaking of the past days felt like a distant memory, a prelude to this consuming inferno.

Shane's hands scrabbled against Ilya's sweat-slicked back, his blunt nails digging into the hard muscle. He was burning up from the inside, the slick between his thighs a hot, desperate flood. He could feel Ilya's erection, thick and heavy against his thigh, but Ilya was holding himself still, his face a mask of agonized restraint, his blue eyes black with a rut that was now perfectly, dangerously synchronized with Shane's heat. The new bond screamed at the distance.

“Alpha,” Shane gasped, the word ripped from a raw throat. He arched his back, pressing his aching core against Ilya. “Please... don’t be careful. Not now.”

Ilya shuddered, a drop of sweat falling from his brow onto Shane’s collarbone. “The bite... you’re hurt...”

“I don’t care!” Shane’s voice broke on a sob of frustration. He bucked beneath him, a frantic, omega motion. “The bond... it needs... I need you to fuck me. Hard as you can. Please, Ilya. I need it. I need to feel you everywhere.”

He saw the last vestige of Ilya’s control snap. A low, continuous growl rumbled from Ilya’s chest, vibrating through Shane’s own. Ilya’s hands, which had been braced gently, now gripped Shane’s hips with a force that would leave bruises, yanking him into position.

“You are sure?” Ilya’s voice was a guttural, alpha command, stripped of all softness.

“Yes!”

Ilya didn’t let him finish. He drove into him in one brutal, shearing thrust that punched the air from Shane’s lungs. It was nothing like before. There was no slow stretch, no gentle accommodation. It was a claiming, a conquering, a brutal reaffirmation of the bond written in blood. Shane cried out, a sharp, shattered sound that morphed into a wail of pure, unadulterated ecstasy. The pain was there, a bright, sharp edge, but it was instantly swallowed by a pleasure so profound it felt like annihilation.

Ilya set a punishing pace, each thrust a deep, grinding impact that shook the bed and stole coherent thought. The world narrowed to the slap of skin, the ragged symphony of their breaths, and the blinding, white-hot focus of where their bodies joined. Shane clung to him, his legs locked around Ilya’s waist, meeting every drive with a desperate lift of his hips. He was sobbing, babbling, words fracturing into nonsense.

“More... harder, alpha, please...”

Ilya's growls were punctuated by rough, Russian curses. He shifted his angle, and on the next thrust, he hit a spot so deep and perfect that Shane's vision whited out. A scream tore from his throat, his body bowing off the mattress.

"That's it," Ilya snarled, his voice thick with feral pride. "You take it. You take everything I give you. My mate."

The word, spoken in the midst of the violent taking, unlocked a deeper, more primal need in Shane. The pleasure was building to an impossible peak, but it wasn't enough. The bond, the heat, the brutal fucking- it all screamed for completion, for the final, physical lock.

"Knot me," Shane begged, the words a broken whisper against Ilya's shoulder. Then, louder, a desperate chant. "Ilya, please, knot me, need your knot, need you to fill me, please, alpha, please..."

The plea acted on Ilya like a trigger. His rhythm became erratic, frantic. The pressure at the base of his cock, the knot, began to swell, a thick, insistent promise. Shane felt it, the stretch becoming immense, overwhelming, perfect. He was so open, so ready, his body demanding this final claim.

"Now," Ilya commanded, his voice ragged with his own impending release. He drove in one final, deep time, and the swollen knot pushed past the tight ring of muscle, seating itself fully inside Shane with a feeling of devastating, absolute fullness.

Shane's climax detonated. It was not a wave, but a supernova, a silent, seizing explosion that ripped through every cell. His scream was soundless, his body convulsing around the thick knot locking Ilya inside him. The bond between them flared white-hot, and through it, Shane felt the shattering cascade of Ilya's own orgasm- a roar of pure, alpha triumph and a bottomless, reverent love that was its foundation.

Ilya collapsed over him, his teeth finding Shane's bonding bite again, not to break skin, but to hold, to soothe, as he pumped his release deep into Shane's clutching heat. The knot held them fast, a physical anchor as the storms within them slowly, slowly subsided.

For long minutes, there was only the sound of their gasping breaths and the faint, wet sounds of their joined bodies. Ilya, with immense care, rolled them to their sides, never letting the knot pull. He gathered Shane against him, his arms a vise around him. He nuzzled the bleeding bite, licking gently at the wound.

Shane was boneless, floating in a haze of endorphins and profound, soul-deep satisfaction. The heat was still present, a banked fire, but the desperate edge was gone. He was full, claimed, and bound. He could feel Ilya's satiated exhaustion, his protective possessiveness, his awe, all through the golden thread now permanently tying their souls together.

"Moy prevoskhodnyy," Ilya whispered, his voice wrecked.

Shane couldn't speak. He made a soft, purring noise and pressed back against the knot, against Ilya's chest, into the safety of the bond. The nest was destroyed around them, the sheets soaked and tangled. But they were, for the first time, truly and irrevocably one. The obsession had burned itself out in this final, mutual conflagration, leaving only the quiet, unshakeable certainty of the bond. There was no more hiding. He was found, claimed, and loved, not just in spite of the storm, but within the very eye of it.

The world had shrunk to the humid, scent-saturated confines of the nest. The violent peak of the bonding and the heat had ebbed and flowed, leaving in its wake a trembling, bone-deep exhaustion. Shane lay sprawled on the ruined sheets, every muscle liquid, his mind floating in a hazy calm. The fresh bonding bite on his neck pulsed with a low, steady ache, a sweet, claiming pain that anchored him to the man whose large hand was splayed possessively over his stomach.

Ilya, however, was already shifting from mate back to caretaker. The primal fog of the rut was receding, burned away by the new, golden awareness of the bond. Through it, he could feel the echo of Shane's utter depletion- a hollowed-out tiredness that went beyond the physical.

“Sleep,” Ilya murmured, his voice a gravelly rasp against Shane’s temple. It wasn’t a suggestion.

Shane made a weak noise of protest, his eyelids fluttering. “M’not...”

“You are,” Ilya stated, the alpha timbre leaving no room for argument. He pressed a kiss to Shane’s damp hair. “A short nap. For me.”

It was the “for me” that did it. Shane’s resistance, already feeble, dissolved. He nodded, a tiny movement, and let his eyes close. His breathing evened out almost instantly, slipping into the shallow, vulnerable sleep of complete surrender.

Ilya moved with a quiet efficiency. He fetched a bowl of cool water and a soft cloth from the bathroom. Kneeling beside the bed, he began to wipe the sweat and spend from Shane’s skin. His touch was reverent, each pass of the cloth a silent apology and a reaffirmation. He blotted the tender skin around the bonding bite with extra gentleness, a possessive thrill coursing through him at the sight of his teeth permanently etched into Shane’s skin. Mine. In almost every way that counted.

Next came the water. He lifted Shane’s head gently, coaxing his lips apart. “Drink, solnyshko,” he whispered. Shane obeyed even in sleep, swallowing the cool liquid Ilya trickled into his mouth.

When Shane was as clean and comfortable as he could be made, Ilya turned his attention to his legs. They were trembling slightly, the powerful muscles strained and locked from hours of tension. Ilya warmed a dollop of lotion between his palms and began to knead.

He started at the ankles, his thumbs working in firm, circular motions up the tight cords of Shane’s calves. He could feel every knot, every tremor. He worked in silence, his focus absolute. This was his love language. In that moment, his only purpose was to take care of his mate. As his hands slid higher, massaging the dense quads, he sent a gentle, questioning pulse down the bond. Not words, but an impression: Soreness? Pain?

A soft, sleepy sensation floated back- discomfort, yes, a deep muscular fatigue, but no sharp pain. Just the good, used ache of a body that had been thoroughly loved and claimed. Ilya's chest tightened. He continued his ministrations, worshiping the very limbs that carried his omega through the world.

When the last of the tension seemed to ease from Shane's body, Ilya finished by pressing a kiss to the inside of each knee. He looked up. Shane was watching him through heavy-lidded eyes, not fully awake, his gaze soft and his unfocused gaze let Ilya know how he was even without the bond connecting them.

A new, quiet hunger stirred in Ilya- not the ravenous need of the rut, but a deep, yearning tenderness. He wanted to give, to worship, to erase any lingering shadow of fatigue with a different kind of pleasure.

Without a word, he shifted down the bed. He hooked his hands under Shane's knees, gently urging them apart. He pressed a kiss to the inside of one thigh, then the other, breathing in the intimate, musky scent of them together. Then he lowered his mouth.

He took his time. This was not about driving them toward another climax; Shane's system was too spent for that. This was about sensation alone. About the soft, wet heat of his mouth, the lazy swirl of his tongue, the devoted attention to every sensitive inch. He licked and suckled with a focused patience that was its own kind of claiming, mapping Shane's body with a reverence usually reserved for sacred things.

Shane gasped, a weak, shattered sound. His hands fisted in the sheets, not pushing him away, but anchoring himself as a different, more delicate fire was stoked from the embers. "Alpha..." he breathed, his voice thin with overwhelmed sensation.

Ilya hummed against him, the vibration drawing a broken whimper. He felt the faint, trembling tension build in Shane's body- not the powerful crest of an orgasm, but a slow, sweet unraveling. He gentled his mouth, softening his touch until it was just the ghost of pressure, the barest hint of suction.

It was enough. Shane's release was a quiet sigh, a gentle shudder that rolled through him, leaving him even more pliant and boneless against the mattress. A single tear traced a path from the corner of his eye into his hairline, not of pain or sadness, but of sheer, overwhelming tenderness.

Ilya moved back up the bed, gathering Shane's utterly spent form against his chest. He licked his own lips, tasting the proof of his devotion. Shane nuzzled into his neck, his purr restarting, a weak but steady rumble of pure, uncomplicated contentment.

"Zayka," Ilya whispered into the quiet. He held the entirety of his world in his arms, cleansed, watered, soothed, and loved into a state of perfect peace. The obsession that had once been a cage had burned itself to ash, and from the ashes, this was what grew: a devotion that knew how to claim, and knew, with even greater certainty, how to cherish.

The night had deepened around the cottage, a velvet black punctuated by the chorus of peepers from the lake's edge. Inside, the feverish peak of the heat had broken, leaving Shane languid and pliant, curled against Ilya on the sofa. But a different, deeper burn had taken its place, the constant, low-grade hum of the new bond, a live wire connecting their nervous systems, making the very air between them feel charged. He pressed a kiss to the tender, bruised skin of the bonding bite on Shane's neck, feeling him shiver. "Come."

He carried him out through the sliding glass doors to the back deck. The night air was cool, raising goosebumps on their skin. The hot tub sat like a sunken jewel, steam curling lazily from its surface into the star-dusted sky. Ilya carried Shane down the steps, the hot water a shock that quickly became an embrace. Shane sank into it with a groan, his head tipping back against the rim, his eyes closing. The water buoyed his exhausted body, the jets soothing the muscles, a muted thrum against his skin.

Ilya followed, his larger body displacing water as he settled opposite. For a moment, they just watched each other through the steam. Shane's cheeks were flushed, his lips parted, his brown eyes dark and heavy-lidded. The bonding bite stood out starkly on his throat, a purple-and-crimson brand Ilya had put there. The sight of it, of his mark on Shane's skin in this private, watery world, sent a possessive thrill so sharp it was almost a pain through Ilya's core.

"Look at me, sweetheart." Ilya said, his voice a low rumble that competed with the bubbling water, "You with me? Are you ok?"

“I am,” Shane breathed, his gaze not quite focusing on Ilya’s face.

He moved through the water, not with his usual predatory grace, but with a deliberate, inevitable slowness, like a tide coming in. The water swirled around him. He didn’t stop until he was caging Shane against the rim of the tub, their legs tangling under the surface. “This is real. The bite is real. The bond...” He placed a hand over Shane’s heart, then over his own. “...is real. You feel it. That hollow space in your chest is now filled with me.”

Shane’s breath hitched. He could feel it- a foreign, comforting weight behind his sternum, a second rhythm syncing with his own. “I feel it,” he whispered.

“Good.” Ilya’s hands found Shane’s hips under the water, his grip firm. “Now you will feel everything else.”

He kissed him, deep and claiming, a slow mimicry of the bite. When he pulled back, his mouth traveled down Shane’s jaw, to his ear. “You are so open for me now,” he murmured, the words a dark, rough caress. “So soft, so ready. Just for me.” One hand slid between them, beneath the water, his fingers finding Shane’s vagina with unerring accuracy. He was right. Shane was slick and yielding, his body already pulsing gently around Ilya’s teasing fingertips. “Your body knows its alpha. It remembers this fat cock filling it up. Begging for it again.” A violent tremor wracked Shane. The clinical, structured part of his mind was offline, incinerated by the bond and the heat. All that was left was raw nerve endings and the devastating sound of Ilya’s voice weaving filth and possession together. He whimpered, his head falling back against the tile.

“You want it?” Ilya growled, nipping at his earlobe. “You want this thick cock splitting you open in this hot water? Making you scream where only the stars can hear?”

“Alpha,” Shane gasped, the word torn from him.

“How?” Ilya demanded, his fingers still circling, dipping inside but not giving him what he needed. “How do you want it? Tell me. Use your pretty mouth.”

Shane’s mind blanked. Coherent speech was beyond him. “I... I can’t...”

“You can,” Ilya insisted, his voice dropping to a sinful whisper. “Tell me how your greedy little hole wants to be fucked. Or I will get out of this tub and leave you here, aching and empty.”

It was a bluff, the bond screamed at the very thought of separation- but the threat worked. Shane’s eyes flew open, wild and desperate. “Hard!” he blurted out, the confession ripped from a place of pure id. “Fuck me hard, Alpha, please, I need it- ah!”

Ilya drove into him with a single, powerful thrust that shoved Shane up the wall of the tub, water sloshing over the sides. The stretch was immense, breathtaking, the warm water doing nothing to lessen the sensation of being utterly filled. Shane cried out, a ragged sound swallowed by the night.

“Like that?” Ilya snarled, his composure fracturing, his own need laid bare. He pulled out almost all the way and slammed back in, setting a brutal, pounding rhythm that made the water churn around them. “This what you need? My cock fucking the sanity out of you? Making you forget your own name?”

“Yes!” Shane chanted, his nails scraping against Ilya’s shoulders under the water, his legs locking around Ilya’s waist to take him deeper. Each filthy word was a spark on tinder, each deep stroke a promise of oblivion. He was unspooling, coming apart, the structured world he’d built his life upon dissolving in the steam and the sweat and the searing stretch.

“You are mine,” Ilya grunted, his hips a relentless piston, his own control fraying at the edges. The dirty talk was a rope he was using to pull them both into the abyss. “This tight, perfect body is mine. This clever mouth is mine. This sweet cunt,” he punctuated the crude word with a particularly vicious thrust that made Shane see stars, “dripping for me, taking me so deep... it belongs to me. Say it.”

“Yours!” Shane sobbed, the admission a release as potent as the physical one coiling in his gut. “All yours, alpha, please, I’m gonna-!”

Ilya’s hand snaked between them, his fingers finding Shane’s clit under the water, rubbing tight, frantic circles. “Come for me,” he commanded, his voice breaking. “Come on my cock like the good, bonded omega you are. Show me what I own.”

The command, the friction, the overwhelming fullness, the blinding truth of the bond- it was too much. Shane shattered. His orgasm ripped through him with a silent, seismic intensity, his body seizing, clamping down on Ilya in rhythmic, pulsing waves. His cry was a choked gasp against Ilya’s slick shoulder.

The feel of Shane milking him, the blinding feedback loop of pleasure through the bond, tore Ilya’s own release from him. He buried himself to the hilt with a guttural roar, his teeth finding the bonding bite once more as he spilled into Shane, the hot water swirling around them as they shook together through the aftershocks.

For a long time, they stayed like that, pinned together by pleasure, the only sounds their ragged breaths and the gentle lap of water. Slowly, Ilya softened, slipping from Shane’s body. He gathered Shane- boneless, trembling, utterly spent- into his arms, holding him above the water, cradling him like something precious salvaged from the deep.

He nuzzled the fresh bite, then kissed it gently. No dirty talk now. Just a breath against damp skin. “Mine.”

Shane, beyond words, could only manage a weak, satiated hum. He turned his head and pressed his own lips to the matching mark on Ilya’s throat. The bond between them thrummed, not with frenzy, but with a deep, quiet completion.

The next forty-eight hours existed outside of time. The fever, having crested in the violent, bonding storm, settled into a deep, relentless tide that pulled Shane under completely. He surfaced only in brief, hazy moments, and when he did, he was... in that headspace where only physical feelings existed.

The fiercely intelligent, analytical mind that could deconstruct a power play in seconds was offline. In its place was a quiet, pliant creature of instinct. He could move- shifting in the nest, reaching blindly for Ilya, but he couldn't speak. Words were too complex. When he was awake, his dark eyes would simply fix on Ilya, wide and unblinking, a universe of trust and need contained in that silent stare. He was floating in that warm, submissive space he'd described, but now there was no shore in sight.

Ilya's world narrowed to a single purpose: the preservation of his mate.

He became a study in efficient, silent care. He blended protein shakes with bananas and honey, holding the cup to Shane's lips, stroking his throat to encourage swallows. He fed him bites of soft fruit, plain rice, whatever chicken or fish that had been prepared, anything easily digestible. He tracked water intake with the same focus he once gave to game tape, coaxing sips between waves of fever.

When Shane's temperature would spike, his skin burning dry to the touch, Ilya would carry him to the bathroom. He'd fill the tub with lukewarm water, a shock to the system that made Shane gasp and cling to him. They'd sink into it, and for a while, it was just holding. Ilya would cradle Shane against his chest, letting the cooler water leach the fever from his limbs, whispering nonsense in Russian against his damp hair. "Moy khoroshiy mal'chik. Ya zdes'. Vse v poryadke."

But the water, the closeness, the scent of his bonded omega in need, was a potent trigger. The care would seamlessly bleed into claiming. Shane, pliant and wordless, would turn in his arms, his body seeking even in its stupor. Ilya would take him there, against the sloped porcelain, movements slow and deep, a relentless rhythm meant more to reaffirm the bond than to chase a peak. Shane would arch silently, his mouth open on a soundless cry, his hands fluttering against Ilya's back. It was sex as a biological function, a grounding ritual for both of them. Ilya would watch his face, ensuring the pleasure was outweighing the discomfort, using the bond as his guide as much as sight.

Afterward, he'd drain the tub and refill it with fresh, cool water, and they would simply lie together again, Shane's head heavy on his shoulder, until the heat built once more and the cycle repeated.

In the nest, during the brief periods of exhausted sleep, Ilya didn't really rest. He watched. He memorized the flutter of Shane's eyelids, the pattern of his breathing. He traced the vivid bonding bite, a stark, beautiful violent mark against the tanned skin, it was still red, but had already started to heal. This was what his obsession had wrought. Not the controlled possession he'd once imagined, but this total, terrifyingly awe-inspiring responsibility. He had wanted to own every part of Shane, and now, through the bond, he did. He felt the echo of Shane's fever in his own bones, the deep ache of overworked muscles, the hollow, hungry thirst. It was no longer a fantasy of control, but a shared life.

Once, deep in the second night, Shane stirred. His eyes opened, clearer than they had been in hours. He looked at Ilya, and his brow furrowed slightly, a ghost of his old, questioning self. He lifted a trembling hand and touched Ilya's cheek, where stubble had grown and exhaustion had carved deep shadows.

A single, coherent word rasped from his raw throat. "Tired."

It wasn't about himself. Ilya felt the meaning through the bond- a thick, aching concern that cut through the fever haze. You are tired.

The selflessness of it, in the midst of his own instinctual ordeal, shattered Ilya. He caught Shane's hand and pressed a fervent kiss to his palm. "I am not tired," he lied, his voice thick. "I am exactly where I need to be."

Shane's eyes searched his for a moment longer, then the clarity faded, smoothed away by the returning inner tide. He made a soft sound and nuzzled back into Ilya's neck, his purr restarting, a ragged, comforting vibration.

Ilya held him, listening to that sound. This was the reality of the bond. Not just the frenzy and the claiming, but this: the silent vigil, the shared breath, the carrying of the load when the other could not fend for themselves. The obsession that had almost destroyed them both was not there. He was no longer just protecting Shane from the world. He was sustaining him through the storm within his own body. It was the most honest thing he had ever done.

Day five dawned with soft gray skies of the summer rain, soft light seeping into the cottage. The fever had almost faded, coming and going during the afternoon, leaving behind a profound, trembling fatigue that made Shane's limbs feel like lead. The silent, pliant subspace of the peak heat had softened into a wordless clinginess. He followed Ilya from room to room with slow, unsteady steps, his fingers twisted in the waistband of Ilya's sweatpants, his forehead often pressed between Ilya's shoulder blades, breathing him in.

Ilya guided him to the bathroom and sat him on the closed toilet lid. Shane swayed, his eyes half-closed. "Bath?" Ilya asked softly.

A faint, almost imperceptible nod.

Ilya started the water, running it cool. When he went to help Shane in, Shane balked, a weak sound of protest in his throat as the water touched his overheated skin. "Shh, I know," Ilya murmured, his hands firm. "It will help. Just for a minute."

He settled Shane in the water and sat on the broad rim of the tub, using a hand-held sprayer to gently run the cool stream over Shane's back and shoulders. Shane shivered, but gradually the tension seeped out of him, his head lolling forward. It was then, in the clear morning light filtering through the window, that Ilya saw the full map of their passion.

Dark, vivid bruises bloomed over the crests of Shane's hips, the imprints of Ilya's fingers from days of relentless holding. More bruises mottled the insides of his thighs. A constellation of hickeys- some purple, some fading to yellow-green were scattered across his chest, stomach, and the tender skin over his ribs. The bonding bite on his neck was a fading, scabbed masterpiece, but these other marks... they were the evidence of a less sacred hunger. Of an alpha lost in rut and possession, of an omega pushed to and past his limits.

A cold knot of shame tightened in Ilya's stomach, cutting through the constant, low hum of the bond. He had planned to join Shane in the bath, to soothe him with slow, gentle lovemaking now that the height of the heat was passing, to reaffirm their connection in the water as they had countless times throughout this week. But the sight of the bruises changed everything.

You are not your father, he reminded himself, the therapist's voice blending with Svetlana's in his head. You're a large Alpha, of course some bumps and bruises should be expected.

He turned off the water. He still didn't get in. Instead, he reached for a soft cloth and the gentle, unscented soap Shane used. "Just cleaning," he said, his voice quieter than before.

He washed Shane with a tender thoroughness, avoiding the darkest bruises. He shampooed his hair, massaging his scalp until Shane's purr kicked in, a ragged, exhausted sound. He rinsed him, all without a single touch that could be construed as a demand. When he was done, he drained the tub and wrapped Shane in a large, fluffy towel, drying him with the same focused care.

Back in the bedroom, Ilya laid him on the fresh sheets he'd put on the bed. He retrieved the arnica cream he kept in his kit for hockey bruises and warmed a dollop between his fingers.

Shane watched him, his eyes clearer now. The thin blue thread of color that matched Ilya's eyes was fading, but still clouded with fatigue. He flinched slightly when Ilya's hands first touched the bruise on his hip.

"I am sorry," Ilya said, the words automatic and inadequate. He spread the cream with infinite gentleness, his touch apologetic on every discolored patch of skin. "I was not careful."

Shane's hand lifted slowly, coming to rest over Ilya's where it pressed against his hip. He didn't speak. He didn't need to. The bond carried the feeling- not accusation, but a simple, weary acceptance. It happened. I wanted you. It was a lot.

Ilya finished, then stretched out beside him, on top of the covers, while Shane lay beneath them. He propped himself up on an elbow, his free hand drawing idle patterns on Shane's unmarked arm.

"No more today," Ilya stated, his voice leaving no room for argument, though it was soft. "Only rest. Your body needs to come down soon, I don't want you to drop too fast."

Shane looked at him for a long moment. Then he shifted, painstakingly turning onto his side to face Ilya. He pushed at the covers between them with a clumsy hand until they were out of the way, then scooted forward, tucking himself against Ilya's body, his head finding its home on Ilya's chest. It was an answer. An agreement.

Ilya's arms came around him, holding him without constriction. He pressed his lips to Shane's damp hair. The frantic, consuming drive of the heat was gone. The obsessive need to constantly claim and reaffirm was quiet. What remained was the quiet certainty of the bond, a golden, humming thread between their hearts, and the solemn responsibility to tend to the vessel that contained his other half. He was fascinated that he could feel Shane's emotions through their bond. He'd read about that some mates could develop that connection and he was ecstatic that they had that. It wouldn't last past the heat cycle, but he loved that he got to feel Shane's emotions for however long it lasted.

Shane's breathing deepened into sleep almost instantly, his purr stuttering back to life. Ilya stayed awake, watching the slow rise and fall of his chest, feeling the faint, sore ache in his own body echoed back through the bond. He closed his eyes, listening to the purr, and for the first time in five days, allowed himself to truly rest.

Ilya surfaced from a light, dreamless sleep not to sound, but to sensation. A warm, wet, perfect heat enveloped him, drawing him from the depths of his first sleep in a week into a state of instant, throbbing awareness. The room was still dark, the cottage silent save for the sound of the water in the lake. He didn't need to open his eyes. The bond told him everything. It sang with a focused, hungry intent that was entirely Shane's.

He lay perfectly still, letting the pleasure build- a slow, torturous pull, a slick slide of tongue that knew exactly how to wring a choked gasp from his throat. Shane's hands were braced on his thighs, his head a dark silhouette in the dim room. Ilya could feel the faint tremble in those skilled fingers, the residual fatigue, but the purpose was unwavering.

When Ilya's hips gave an involuntary jerk, Shane knew he was awake. He released him with a soft, wet sound and sat up, straddling Ilya's hips. In the faint ember-glow, Ilya could see his face- eyes dark and determined, lips swollen. The bruises on his hips were shadows in the low light, the bonding bite a stark, sacred ruin on his throat.

“Shane,” Ilya rasped, his voice thick with desire. His hands came up to frame Shane’s waist, his thumbs stroking the bruised skin. “You should be resting. You’re sore.”

Shane shook his head, a quick, negating motion. He didn’t speak. Words were still sometimes difficult, a clumsy tool compared to the direct line of the bond. Instead, he leaned forward, placing his hands on Ilya’s chest, his gaze locked on Ilya’s. He communicated in the way Ilya had once used to dominate- with sheer, unbreakable will.

He lifted himself up, positioned himself, and sank down in one slow, inexorable motion.

Ilya’s breath left him in a rush. The feeling was staggering- the tight, clinging heat, the profound intimacy of being sheathed completely inside his bonded mate. That feeling will never get old. Shane was slick and ready, his body accepting him effortlessly, but Ilya could feel the echo of soreness through the bond, a background hum of overstimulation. He tried to guide the movements, to let Shane set a gentle pace.

But Shane had no interest in gentle. He braced his hands harder on Ilya’s chest, his fingers digging in, and began to move. He set a ruthless, rolling rhythm, riding Ilya with a desperation that spoke of a need deeper than physical release. This wasn’t the pliant surrender of the heat’s peak. This was Shane, his Shane- the brilliant, stubborn, resilient omega, taking what he needed. Claiming his alpha in return. Each downward stroke was a punctuation, a silent declaration- I’m back. This is my choice. You are mine, too.

Ilya’s control, already frayed by sleep and the perfect sensation, shattered. His hands flew to Shane’s hips, not to guide or slow, but to hold on as he was thoroughly, beautifully wrecked. He met each rise and fall with a thrust of his own, driving deeper, chasing the connection that was already absolute but still felt new enough to steal his reason.

“Look at you,” Ilya groaned, his voice a wrecked thing. “Moy lyubimyy. Riding me so perfectly. Taking everything. Using me just how you need.” Words flowed out of him and Shane must still feel the bond because even the russian parts seemed to have an effect on him, a darkly tender mirror of their earlier frenzy, but now it was filled with awe.

A broken, gasping sound escaped Shane. He threw his head back, the line of his throat exquisite, the bonding bite offered like a trophy. His rhythm became frantic, losing its precision, driven by a cresting wave of pure sensation. Ilya could feel it coiling at the base of his own spine, the pressure building in tandem through the golden thread between them.

He sat up abruptly in a surge of strength, wrapping his arms around Shane's torso, crushing him close as he rolled them over without breaking their connection. He pressed Shane into the mattress, blanketing him, and drove into him with three final, deep, claiming thrusts.

"Now," Ilya snarled against the bonding bite, his teeth grazing the scarred flesh. "Come with me. Now."

It was not a command the bond needed,; it was a plea their bodies answered as one. Shane's climax tore through him with a loud, seismic shudder, his inner muscles clamping down in rhythmic pulses. The feel of it, the blinding feedback of pleasure through the bond, hurled Ilya over the edge immediately after. He spilled into Shane with a guttural cry, his own release feeling less like a taking and more like a gift given and received in the same instant.

He collapsed, careful of his weight, turning them to their sides. They lay tangled, breathless, sweat-slicked skin cooling in the night air. Shane's hand came up, his fingers tracing the matching bite on Ilya's neck, then drifting to rest over the frantic beat of his heart.

The silence was total, but the bond hummed between them, satiated and peaceful. No obsession, no fear, no past ghosts in the shadows. Just the two of them, bound in the dark, having found a new way to speak without words, a language of equal hunger, equal trust, and a love that was finally, unmistakably, consummated.

One day eight, the fever was gone, the debilitating fatigue had receded, but the bond between them seemed to have its own gravitational pull, demanding constant, physical reaffirmation. They had already made love four times that day- slowly against the kitchen counter at dawn, desperately in the shower after, languidly in the nest before lunch, and with rough, hungry urgency against the wall of the bedroom just an hour ago. Each time was a conversation the bond translated perfectly- I am here. You are mine. We are real.

Now, after the fifth time, Shane lay on his back amidst the wreckage of sheets, his chest heaving. Sweat gleamed on his skin, highlighting the fading bruises and the dark, scabbed bonding bite. His eyes were unfocused, staring at the ceiling, his pupils so dilated the warm brown of his irises was nearly swallowed. He was floating somewhere far away, in that deep, submissive space where only sensation and instinct lived.

Ilya lay beside him, one arm thrown over his eyes, catching his own breath. The constant cycle of sex and care had left him physically spent but mentally wired, the bond humming with a satiated, golden warmth. He felt Shane's hand fumble for his, their fingers tangling. Then Shane guided Ilya's palm and pressed it flat against his own lower abdomen, over the soft, firm plane below his navel.

A single, slurred word escaped Shane's kiss-swollen lips. "Baby?"

The word landed in the quiet room like a physical blow. Ilya's breath hitched. He turned his head, removing his arm from his eyes to look at Shane. His omega's face was still hazy, but there was a desperate, hopeful longing in his unfocused gaze that carved straight through Ilya's heart. The heat, the bond, the sheer biological imperative of their joining, it was all screaming at Shane's hindbrain, overriding the careful, rational decision they'd made together.

"No, sweetheart," Ilya said softly, his thumb stroking Shane's stomach. "Not this time. Remember?" He kept his voice gentle, but firm. "The injection? We agreed."

The clarity of the reminder seemed to pierce Shane's fog for just a second, long enough for the disconnect to register. His lower lip trembled. A soft, wounded whimper escaped him, and then tears, silent and profound, welled in his eyes and spilled over, tracing paths through the sweat on his temples. It was the pure, uncomplicated grief of an instinct denied.

"No, none of that," Ilya murmured, his own chest tightening. He wiped the tears away with his fingers. "Do not cry. Next time. We will make a baby, okay? When you are ready. When we are both ready. We agreed." He was repeating it like a mantra, for both of them.

But Shane wasn't hearing the agreement. He was feeling the hollow, aching want that the heat and the bond had amplified to a deafening roar. With a sudden, clumsy surge of strength, he pushed himself up and climbed over Ilya, straddling his hips. His movements were uncoordinated, driven purely by need. He took Ilya in hand, stroking him firmly, expertly, until he was hard again against his palm. Then, without preamble, he sank down onto him, sheathing him completely in a slow, breathtaking slide.

He braced his hands on Ilya's chest, his tear-streaked face set with a heartbreaking mix of determination and despair. He began to move, riding him with a slow, deep, rolling rhythm that was less about pleasure and more about a profound, intrinsic plea. He looked down, his blown-out pupils fixed on Ilya's.

"Give me a baby, Alpha," Shane whispered, the words raw and ragged. "Please. I want a baby."

The plea, spoken in that broken, instinct-driven voice, was a knife twisted in the gut of every alpha fiber Ilya possessed. His hips wanted to snap up, to drive into that sweet, welcoming heat and answer the call. The bond thrummed with the shared, desperate yearning. With as much sex as they'd had, a treacherous, hopeful part of him had wondered if the shot had failed. But Shane's scent, while rich with omega and sex and him, hadn't shifted into the particular, subtle sweetness that signaled conception he'd read about. The chances were marginal at best. This agony was for nothing.

He didn't argue. He didn't try to reason with the final burst of heat-haze. Instead, he reached up, his hands framing Shane's face, and pulled him down into a deep, consuming kiss. It was a kiss meant to swallow the plea, to communicate what words couldn't. I hear you. I want it too. But not like this. Not when you are not yourself.

He took over the rhythm, rolling them carefully until Shane was beneath him, never breaking the kiss. He moved inside him then, not with the frantic pace of before, but with slow, deep, reverent strokes. This wasn't about answering the desperate call for conception. This was about connection. About love. About reminding Shane, and himself, that they were more than their biology.

“I love you,” Ilya breathed against his lips between kisses. “My Shane. My heart. My mate. Right now, this is enough. You are enough.”

He poured every ounce of that devotion into each movement, each touch, until the desperate tension in Shane’s body gradually melted, the grief in his eyes clouding over with a dazed, overwhelmed pleasure. When Shane finally climaxed, it was with a soft, shuddering cry that sounded more like relief than triumph, his body clinging to Ilya’s. Ilya followed him over, spilling into him with a groan, the act feeling both like a surrender and a promise.

Afterward, he held Shane close, their legs tangled, his lips pressed to the bonding bite. Shane’s tears had stopped. He was pliant again, exhausted, his earlier desperate plea seeming to have been wept and loved out of him for now. The bond hummed, still longing, but soothed.

Ilya stared at the ceiling, one hand splayed once more over Shane’s flat stomach. The want was a physical ache in his own soul. Next time, he promised silently, to Shane, to the universe, to the ghost of his own father who would have seen this as a failing. Next time, we will do it right. For now, he held his crying, wanting, perfect mate, and learned the hardest lesson of love yet: how to cherish a dream while patiently waiting for the right time to make it real.

Shane woke to a silence that felt different. It wasn’t the heavy headed feeling he’d had all week, , but the clear, crisp silence of a cottage in the early morning. His mind, which had been a swirling fog of instinct and sensation for eight days, snapped back into focus with an almost audible click. The first thing he registered was the ache. A deep, pleasant soreness in his muscles, a tender throbbing between his legs and behind, and a sharp, specific pulse on the left side of his neck.

He sat up slowly, the sheets pooling around his waist. A full-body blush crept over his skin as the memories, not as a coherent narrative, but as vivid, sensory flashes, assaulted him. The desperate cling of the nest, the cool water of the tub, the searing pain-pleasure of the bite, the relentless, sweating rhythm of their bodies, and his own voice, broken and begging for more. He covered his face with his hands, a low groan escaping him.

A warm, calloused palm settled on the small of his back, rubbing in a slow circle. Shane peeked through his fingers. Ilya was propped on an elbow, watching him. He didn't look exhausted or frenzied. He looked... peaceful. A gentle, unguarded grin played on his lips, softening the usual severe lines of his face.

"There you are," Ilya murmured, his voice rough with sleep but brimming with warmth.

Shane lowered his hands, his blush deepening. "I'm... here. I think. Everything hurts."

Ilya's grin widened. He sat up fully and leaned in, capturing Shane's lips in a kiss that was unbearably soft and sweet. It was a hello, a welcome back. When he pulled away, he kept his forehead pressed to Shane's. "You have killed me, love," he whispered, the words a tender confession. "Completely unmanned me. I am dead. I've died a very happy man."

The humor, so light and genuine, disarmed Shane's embarrassment. A shaky laugh bubbled out of him. He leaned into Ilya, curling against his side, tucking his head under his chin. Ilya's arms came around him, holding him without an ounce of demanding pressure, just a steady, sure warmth. They stayed like that for long minutes, Shane listening to the strong, steady beat of Ilya's heart, feeling the new, golden thread of the bond humming contentedly between them. It wasn't a noise. It was a presence, like a second heartbeat nestled beside his own.

"I don't remember... all of it," Shane admitted quietly into Ilya's skin. "It's like... bright pictures. Feelings. The bath. The... the bite." His fingers rose to trace the scabbed mark on his own neck, then mirrored the motion on Ilya's. A shiver that was pure awe went through him. It was real. They were bonded.

"You were very brave," Ilya said, his lips against Shane's hair. "And very... determined."

A flash of memory- himself, climbing onto Ilya, taking control with a clumsy, desperate strength. "Oh, god," Shane mumbled, hiding his face again.

Ilya chuckled, the sound vibrating through both of them. “It was perfect. Even when you were... You were perfect.” His hand stroked down Shane’s spine, soothing. “And you are safe. You are here.”

Another, more troubling flash. Tears. A hollow, aching want that had felt like it would crack his ribs open. “I asked for... I said...”

Ilya’s hand stilled. He understood. “You asked for what your body needed at that moment. What the bond wanted. There is no shame in it.” He paused, choosing his words with the care Shane now recognized as his new, hard-won love. “We have an agreement. A plan. That has not changed. The want... the want is just a promise for later. It is okay to feel it.”

The structured, analytical part of Shane’s mind, now fully online, latched onto the logic. The injection. The timing. Their careers. The fragile, miraculous thing they had just rebuilt. It was the plan. The rational agreement stood firm. But beneath it, in a deeper, newly awakened chamber of his heart, the echo of that instinctual plea still resonated. Next time.

“Okay,” Shane whispered, not trusting his voice with more.

Ilya seemed to understand that, too. He didn’t press. He just held him closer. “We should get up. Eat something that is not a protein shake. You need real food.”

The mention of food made Shane’s stomach growl loudly. The all-consuming hunger of the heat was gone, replaced by a normal, profound emptiness. He nodded.

As they shifted to get up, Shane’s body protested with a chorus of aches. He winced, and Ilya was instantly there, a solid support for him to lean on. Shane looked at the man beside him, the obsessed rival who had burned the world for him, and was now, patiently and with immense gentleness, helping him out of bed, his blue eyes full of a devotion that asked for nothing in return.

The hot water drained away the last remnants of sweat and sleep, and with it, the final clinging haze of the heat. Shane moved stiffly under the spray, a full-body wince accompanying his reach for the shampoo. Ilya watched, his sharp eyes missing nothing.

Before Shane could protest, Ilya was out of the shower, returning a moment later with two pills and a glass of water from the sink.

“For the soreness,” he said, his voice leaving no room for debate.

Shane took them, his eyes fixed on the drain, a blush warming his cheeks that had nothing to do with the water’s heat. The vulnerability of it, needing care, being so thoroughly used, still clashed with the lifetime of rigid self-sufficiency.

A calloused finger hooked under his chin, applying gentle, inexorable pressure until Shane’s gaze was forced upward. Ilya’s blue eyes were close, intense, but the old, frantic obsession was banked, replaced by a quiet, unwavering focus. “Eyes on me,” he said, the words a soft command. “Always.”

It wasn’t a demand for submission, it was a request for connection. A refusal to let Shane hide in his own shyness. Shane held the look, and the embarrassment slowly seeped away, replaced by a grounding warmth. He nodded, a tiny movement against Ilya’s finger.

The shower was for cleansing, not for reigniting. They washed each other with a practical tenderness, Ilya’s hands carefully massaging shampoo into Shane’s scalp, Shane returning the favor with slow strokes down Ilya’s back. They kissed under the spray, slow and deep, a quiet rediscovery of lips that had spent days communicating in growls and whimpers. It was a recalibration.

Stepping out, they toweled off in the steam-filled room. As Ilya turned to hang his towel, the mirror caught his reflection, and Shane’s gaze snagged on it.

The landscape of Shane’s back, hips and shoulders was a canvas of Ilya’s own making. Dark, mottled bruises bloomed across his hips, the unmistakable imprints of desperate fingers. A few lower down, on his thighs, spoke of a fierce, clinging grip. There were scratches on Ilya too, thin and red, tracing paths over his ribs and across his shoulders.

A familiar, cold knot of guilt tightened in Ilya’s stomach. He saw Shane’s eyes widen, his lips part. He braced himself for the apology, the regret, the shadow of the past where his touch was something to be feared and regretted.

But Shane didn't need it. He stepped closer, his damp fingers hovering just above a particularly vivid red line on Ilya's bear tattoo. A slow, incredulous smile spread across his face.

"Wow," Shane said, his voice laced with a hint of awed laughter. "We really... went for it, huh?" He met Ilya's wary eyes in the mirror, his own shining with a mix of mischief and possessiveness. "Guess the 'conflict-avoidant Hollander' takes a vacation during heat. Look at the state of us."

He gave a soft, genuine laugh then, shaking his head as he turned to grab his toothbrush, as if marveling at a strange and fascinating discovery about himself.

A slow smile spread across his own face. "Looks like I gave as good as I got," he said, his voice deliberately casual. He reached out and poked a particularly vivid bruise on Ilya's hip. "You're gonna need a note for the trainer. 'Excused from practice, got manhandled by his omega.'"

Ilya's smirk deepened into a real, warm grin. He caught Shane's poking finger and brought it to his mouth, kissing the tip. "A small price to pay," he murmured, the words vibrating against Shane's skin. He released his hand and gave him a gentle swat on the backside. "Now brush your teeth. Your breath is terrifying."

Shane laughed, a real, unguarded sound that echoed in the steamy room. He turned to the sink, squeezing toothpaste onto his brush. The normalcy of it was a balm. As he brushed, he watched Ilya in the mirror. The alpha stood behind him, applying a salve to the fresh bonding bite on his own neck with clinical precision. Their eyes met in the glass. No words passed, but the bond hummed between them, a contented, golden thread.

The tension bled from Ilya's shoulders so completely he felt lightheaded. The apology died on his tongue, unnecessary. This wasn't shame. This wasn't fear. This was Shane, seeing the evidence of their own passions, his own surrender, and his own strength, and claiming it with a joke. It was acceptance, pure and simple.

Ilya watched him squeeze toothpaste, his own reflection softening in the foggy glass. The bruises ached, a pleasant, grounding soreness. They were not marks of a battle, but souvenirs of a mutual surrender. Shane's laughter in the face of them was a greater gift than any careful touch could ever be. It was the sound of a ghost being laid to rest, the ghost of the omega who flinched, and the alpha who saw his own love as something destructive. He leaned against the counter, a slow smile answering Shane's in the mirror, and let the simple, ordinary sound of brushing teeth fill the room. It was the most peaceful sound in the world.

Finished, Shane rinsed and spat. Ilya immediately reached for his own toothbrush, but Shane was faster. He snatched the tube of toothpaste and held it behind his back, raising his chin in a playful dare.

Ilya stared at him, toothbrush poised. "Give."

"Make me."

For a second, the old Ilya flickered in his eyes, the one who would have pinned him against the counter and taken what he wanted. This Ilya just sighed, a long-suffering sound, and leaned in. He braced his hands on the sink on either side of Shane, caging him without touching, and simply took the toothpaste from Shane's loose grip behind his back. It was so easy Shane hadn't even felt it.

"Cheater," Shane mumbled around a fresh smile.

"Strategy," Ilya corrected, squeezing a stripe onto his brush. He nudged Shane aside with his hip to get to the water. "Go put clothes on. You are distracting."

Shane wandered back into the bedroom, the towel around his waist. The aches were still there, a persistent, deep-down soreness, but the medicine and the shower had taken the sharp edge off. He found the soft sweatpants and Ilya's shirt that he had laid out for him on the freshly made bed. As he dressed, he looked at the nest, now dismantled, the sheets stripped. It was just a bed again.

He heard Ilya spit and rinse in the bathroom. When he emerged, his hair damp and dark, his own sweatpants slung low on his hips, he found Shane sitting on the edge of the bed, pulling on socks.

“Ready?” Ilya asked.

Shane nodded, standing up. A twinge in his thigh made him wince, just slightly.

Ilya saw it. Of course he did. He didn’t comment, didn’t fuss. He just walked over, took Shane’s face in his hands, and kissed him, slow and sweet. “Come on,” he said against his lips. “I will make eggs. You will eat all of them.”

It wasn’t a question. And for the first time in a long time, maybe ever, Shane Hollander didn’t feel the need to negotiate the terms. He just leaned into the kiss, and then followed his alpha toward the smell of coffee and the promise of a new, ordinary day.

The morning sun danced on the lake’s surface, a field of shattered diamonds. They had settled into two weathered Adirondack chairs at the end of the dock, the wood warm beneath them. A soft, clean breeze carried the scent of water and pine, a world apart from the intense, scent-saturated air of the cottage bedroom. Shane sipped his coffee, watching a bird dive in the distance, his body a symphony of pleasant aches anchored by the steady, golden hum of the bond in his chest.

“What would you like to do today?” Ilya asked, his voice a low rumble that blended with the lap of water against the pilings. He wasn’t looking at the lake; he was looking at Shane, his blue eyes calm, his presence a solid, quiet fact beside him.

Shane let out a long, contented breath. “Nothing. Absolutely nothing. Just... this. For a few days.” A small, approving smile touched Ilya’s lips. He nodded. Then, after a comfortable silence, Shane voiced the question that had been hovering in the back of his mind since clarity returned. “When... when do you have to go back?”

Ilya didn’t hesitate. “I am here for however long you want me to be.”

The simplicity of the statement, the utter lack of negotiation or condition, sent a jolt of pure, undiluted joy through Shane. It wasn't the overwhelming, suffocating possession of before.

A wide, effortless grin spread across Shane's face. He abandoned his chair in a flash, his soreness forgotten in the rush of happiness. He climbed into Ilya's lap, the older chair groaning in protest, and settled himself, tucking his head under Ilya's chin. Ilya's arms came around him instantly, holding him close, a soft chuckle vibrating against Shane's temple.

"Happy?" Ilya murmured.

"Very," Shane confirmed, nuzzling into his throat, right beside the bonding bite. He could feel Ilya's contentment through the bond, a deep, steady river matching his own.

They sat like that for a long while, wrapped in sunlight and silence. Finally, Ilya's hand stroked slowly up and down Shane's back. His voice, when he spoke, was thoughtful, careful.

"There is something I wish to speak about."

"Hmm?"

"Your parents." Ilya felt Shane go very still in his arms, but he didn't tense with fear. It was the stillness of attention. "I want to meet them. Formally."

Shane leaned back just enough to look at him. "You've met them. At games, after..."

"That is not meeting," Ilya said, his expression solemn. "That is... being in the same space during chaos. I mean to meet them. To sit with them. To tell them my intentions." He paused, his thumb brushing over the bonding bite on Shane's neck, a silent acknowledgment of the permanent step they had already taken. "We are mates now. It is only right. In a proper courtship, I would have asked your father for permission to court you long before this. I did everything... backwards. And wrong. I want to do this part correctly.”

The words settled over Shane, heavy with meaning. This wasn't the Ilya who operated in shadows, who hired investigators and bypassed every normal social protocol. This was a man trying to build something above board, to integrate his life with Shane's in the daylight, where his family could see. It was an apology for the past and a plan for the future, all in one.

Shane thought of his mother's sharp, knowing eyes, his father's calm assessment. He thought of the terror they'd endured, the secrets he'd kept. Letting Ilya in, formally, would be forcing that final door open. It was terrifying.

But the bond hummed, warm and sure. He looked at Ilya's face, saw the earnest hope there, carefully restrained but undeniable.

“Okay,” Shane said softly. He traced the line of Ilya's jaw. “But we do it here. At the cottage. Neutral ground. And... we tell them everything. About the bond. About... everything.” It was a condition, but also a sharing of the burden.

Ilya's eyes closed for a second, as if in profound relief. When they opened, they were clear and sure. “Da. Everything. They deserve to know who their son has tied his life to.” He pulled Shane closer again, pressing a kiss to his hair. “Thank you.”

They lapsed back into silence, but it was a different quiet now, charged with a new, shared purpose. The obsession that had once been a locked room was now an open door, and Ilya was asking to walk through it, hand in hand with Shane, to face the world and his family, on the other side. It was, Shane realized, the most romantic thing Ilya had ever done.

The laughter on the dock softened into a comfortable quiet, broken only by the gentle lap of water and the distant cry of the loon. Shane's fingers traced the edge of a faint bruise on Ilya's forearm, his touch idle. “You know, for a guy who's supposed to be ‘completely unmanned,’ you're still pretty insufferable.”

Ilya didn't open his eyes, a smirk playing on his lips. "You prefer me insufferable. It gives you something to fix. A project."

"My last project almost got me kidnapped and set on fire," Shane shot back, but there was no heat in it, only a weary, accepted truth. He leaned his head against Ilya's shoulder. "This one just eats all my food and hogs the blankets."

"I am a growing alpha," Ilya said solemnly, finally opening his eyes to look down at him. "I need my strength. My mate is very demanding during his heat." Ilya joked, squeezing Shane's hip.

Shane snorted. "Terribly demanding." He grew quiet again, the humor settling. The sun was climbing higher, warming their skin. The bond between them was a quiet, steady pulse, a fact of his new existence as fundamental as his own heartbeat. Ilya's earlier request lingered in the air, a necessary, daunting step. Shane took a deep breath. "Okay. Let's do it."

He pulled his phone from his pocket. Ilya's arm around him tightened briefly, a silent squeeze of solidarity, then relaxed, giving him space.

His mother answered on the second ring. "Shane? Honey, is everything alright?" Her voice was sharp with immediate concern. In the background, Shane could hear the familiar sounds of his parents' kitchen- a spoon clinking against a mug, the low murmur of a news channel.

"Yeah, Mom. Everything's fine. I'm good." He used his calmest, most even tone, the one he reserved for reassuring her after a hard hit on the ice.

"You've been quiet. We've been worried." The subtext was clear: You disappeared after winning the Cup, and you're at the cottage alone, you usually check in at least once during your heat to let us know you're ok.

"I know. I just... needed some quiet time. To decompress." He caught Ilya's gaze. Ilya was watching him intently, his expression neutral but his eyes soft. "Actually, that's why I'm calling. I was wondering if you and Dad wanted to come up for dinner. Maybe tonight?"

A pause. He could picture her face, the calculating concern. “Dinner? At the cottage? Just... us?”

Shane swallowed. “Well. Me, and... a guest.”

The silence on the line stretched. He heard her put a hand over the receiver, the muffled sound of her saying, “David, he’s got a guest.” When she came back, her voice was carefully, painfully neutral. “A guest. I see. That’s... lovely, honey. Of course we’ll come. Should I bring anything?”

“Just yourselves,” Shane said, relief making him slightly lightheaded. “It’s nothing fancy. I’ll cook.”

“You’ll cook,” she repeated, and he could hear the thousand questions in those two words.

“I’ll see you later tonight, Mom. Let’s do 6? Love you.”

“Love you too, Shane. See you later honey.”

He ended the call and let the phone drop into his lap. He stared out at the lake, the vast, glittering blue suddenly seeming to hold the weight of all the words he hadn’t said.

Ilya’s hand came up, his fingers gently tilting Shane’s chin until their eyes met. “You did well,” he said, his voice low.

“She knows it’s you,” Shane said, the certainty sitting like a stone in his gut. “She has to.”

“Probably,” Ilya agreed, not denying it. “But now, she will have a table between us. She will be able to look at me. To ask her questions.” He brushed his thumb over Shane’s cheek. “It is better this way. No more shadows.”

Shane leaned into the touch, drawing strength from its steadiness. The terrified, secretive omega who had hidden his entire nature was gone, burned away in the fires of the past year. In his place was a man who was tired of hiding, who had a mate, and who was, for the first time, preparing to introduce the two most important parts of his life to each other. It was terrifying. But with Ilya’s solid presence beside him and the golden thread of the bond thrumming with unwavering support, it also felt, impossibly, like the next right step.

“Come on,” Ilya said, standing and pulling Shane up with him. “If we are having company, we need more prepare the food. And you,” he added, a glint of the old, challenging smirk returning to his eyes, “need to decide what to wear to make you look like you haven’t been naked for the past week.”

The tension broke. Shane shoved him, laughing as Ilya pretended to stagger on the dock. “You’re such an asshole!”

“I am yours,” Ilya corrected, catching his hand and lacing their fingers together. “And you are stuck with me. Now, and at dinner later. I’ve never met parents before. Should be fun.”

Hand in hand, they walked back up the dock toward the cottage, leaving the sunlight dancing on the water behind them. The peace of the morning was now layered with a new, anticipatory gravity. The cottage was no longer just a retreat. It was about to become a proving ground.

The afternoon sun slanted through the cottage windows, painting the dust motes gold. A nervous energy had replaced the morning’s peace, thrumming in the air as tangible as the hum of the bond. The scent of marinade and chopped herbs mingled with the underlying, permanent trace of them, bonded mates. Would his parents be able to feel it even though they were only betas?

Shane stood paralyzed before his open closet, a pile of discarded clothes on the bed behind him. His mind, usually so adept at systems and plays, was stuck in a loop of social calculations. The variables were too many: his mother’s hawk-like perception, his father’s quiet scrutiny, the fresh, undeniable evidence on his skin.

A dark henley was rejected- too hot, too suspicious for a lakeside dinner. A high-collared polo was next, but the stiff fabric chafed the bonding bite. He tried a team hoodie, then immediately threw it off, muttering about looking like he was hiding. The structured, conflict-avoidant part of his brain was screaming to control the narrative, to present a version of this that wouldn't alarm. To show them that he was still 'their Shane' but with Ilya added with him.

Ilya leaned against the doorframe, arms crossed, watching the silent crisis. He had set the table on the deck according to Shane's instructions. He'd offered to help with the food, but Shane had shooed him away, needing the familiar, mechanical ritual of prepping vegetables. Now, Ilya just observed, a quiet, steady presence amid the sartorial chaos.

Finally, with a frustrated sigh, Shane pulled on a soft, blue linen shirt his mother had bought him last summer. It was open at the collar, the fabric too light to hide the dark, scabbed claim on his neck or the faint bruises peeking above the neckline. He paired it with plain shorts. It was a normal outfit. Something to remind them that everything would be fine. This is me. Take it or leave it.

He turned and saw Ilya's chosen outfit. The breath caught in his throat.

Ilya wore his black Boston shirt, the sleeves torn off at the seams, revealing the powerful curves of his shoulders and biceps. It was faded, well-worn. The shirt of a rival. The shirt of the man who had burned for him. Below, he wore a pair of Shane's own shorts, which fit him loosely across the hips. The statement was blatant, defiant, and utterly Ilya. I am who I am. I am here, in your clothes, in your space. . Your mate.

"You can't wear that," Shane said, his voice thin.

Ilya raised an eyebrow. "Why not? Is clean. It is my team."

"It's... going to rile my mom up."

A slow, dangerous smile touched Ilya's lips. "Good."

There was no time to argue. The crunch of tires on gravel echoed from the driveway. Shane's heart leapt into his throat. The bond flared with a burst of shared anxiety, instantly soothed by a wave of deliberate calm from Ilya's end. He took a deep breath and went to the door, Ilya following slightly behind him.

They walked out onto the deck together. Shane carried a platter of vegetables for the grill. Ilya carried everything else.

Yuna and David Hollander emerged from their car. Yuna's eyes went immediately to Shane, scanning him head-to-toe in a millisecond. He saw the moment her gaze stuck on his neck, the slight hitch in her step. Her expression didn't change, but it became... set. David's assessment was slower, taking in Shane, then Ilya, then the way Ilya's hand came to rest, almost imperceptibly, at the small of Shane's back as they approached the steps.

"Momma. Dad," Shane said, forcing a smile. "You remember Ilya Rozanov."

"Mr. and Mrs. Hollander. ," Ilya said, nodding. His voice was respectful, but there was no deference in his posture. He met David's gaze directly, then Yuna's. "Thank you for coming. It's good to see you in better circumstances."

"Hi, honey," Yuna said to her son, her voice tight as she pulled him into a hug. Her nose flared subtly against his hair- checking his scent. The change would be profound to another omega: the clear, bright notes of his natural scent now irrevocably intertwined with the dark, spicy signature of an alpha. A bonded alpha. She pulled back, her hands on his arms. "You look... well."

"I am," Shane said, and for the first time, he meant it completely.

David shook Ilya's hand, his grip firm, his eyes kind but unreadable. "Rozanov. Good to see you."

The understatement hung in the air. The last ‘circumstance’ had been a hospital waiting room after a kidnapping.

“I will grill,” Ilya stated, taking the platter from Shane’s hands. It was a tactical retreat, giving the family a moment. He turned his back to them, focusing on the grill.

Shane was left with his parents in the evening light. The silence was brittle.

“So,” Yuna began, her eyes following Ilya’s broad, shirtless back. “This is... a visit?”

Shane took a deep breath. The analytical part of him wanted to script this, to follow facts. But there was no chart for this. There was only the truth, and the bond humming like a plucked string in his chest. He looked at his father’s calm face, his mother’s guarded one.

“He’s staying for a while,” Shane said. Then, the words coming simpler than he’d feared: “We have things to talk about. A lot of things. But first... dinner?”

David nodded, a world of understanding in his eyes. He placed a hand on Yuna’s shoulder, a gentle pressure. “Dinner sounds perfect. Can I help with anything?” He didn’t wait for an answer, deciding to go stand with Rozanov.

His wife and Shane had always had a close relationship. Not excluding him, but they just understood each other without words. It was something beautiful to see, so he knew they needed time to speak.

“So,” Yuna started.

“Mama, Ilya and I are together. We’re mated.” Shane said with a blush.

Yuna stayed silent, a shocked expression on her face for a moment. “Wow. I did not expect that. I thought you two hated each other. I mean-“

“No, mama. I mean I get where anyone would think that. But we love each other. So much mama, we tried to stop it. We had so many things go wrong, but we love each other.”

“Oh baby! All I ever wanted was for you to be happy! I don’t care with who as long as they treated you right-as long as they saw you for you-“

Shane grabbed her into a tight hug, holding in his tears, trying to get her to understand why they hid for so long, why he hid from her for so long.

After a few minutes, Yuna pulled back, kissing his cheeks and wiping both of their faces. “Enough. We have to sit and talk.”

As they moved, setting out drinks, the normalcy of the actions a stark contrast to the seismic shift in the spaces atmosphere, Shane watched Ilya at the grill. The Boston logo seemed to blaze in the sunset. This was it. No more shadows. No more hiding. The proof was on his skin, in the air, and sitting at his table. The conversation was yet to come, but for now, the scent of grilling vegetables and the quiet, defiant presence of his bonded mate by the lake had to be enough. Yuna’s eyes, sharp and worried, kept drifting back to the mark on Shane’s neck, and Shane knew the real test was just beginning.

David and Ilya had set the table while they talked. Grilled chicken and vegetables where piled on everyones plates and the buttered pasta was mostly for Ilya and David. The air on the deck was thick with the scent of food, lake water, and a rising tension that had little to do with the fading sunset. Yuna Hollander placed her fork down with a precise click.

“So,” she said, her gaze fixed on Ilya, who met it unflinchingly from across the table. “You are mates. That is... permanent. What is the plan, Ilya? Shane’s career is in Montreal. Yours is in Boston. The media, the league... his safety.” The last word was heavy, loaded with the memory of headlines and hospital waiting rooms.

Ilya had prepared for this. The old him would have laid out a dictated future. The man he was now, the one who had survived almost losing his mate several times, chose his words with care. “I am working on several plans. But any plan,” he said, his eyes shifting to Shane, who was staring fixedly at his own hands, “will be discussed with Shane first. He will choose. My career is flexible. His does not have to be.”

David nodded slowly, a pragmatist assessing a proposal. Yuna’s expression remained carved from ice. “And your intentions beyond this summer? Your history is... well-documented. The press paints a picture of a man with little regard for commitment.”

A flush of anger, hot and defensive, rose in Ilya’s chest, but he banked it. She was protecting her child. He had given her every reason to. “The press made an example of me,” he said, his voice low but clear. “It was easier to let them. But there has been no one else since the first time we got serious. There will be no one else. I love him. I am loyal to him. This,” he gestured between himself and Shane, the bond a palpable truth in the space, “is the only thing that is real to me.”

It was a good answer. An honest one. But for Shane, the pressure in the room was becoming a physical weight. The questions, the scrutiny, the unspoken history of trackers and fire and fear, it was too much input. The structured part of his mind, his refuge, was short-circuiting. He could feel his mother’s disapproval, a sharp, sense of worry and protectiveness that grated against his own raw nerves. The sounds of the night insects amplified into a screech. The wood grain of the table blurred and swam.

His breathing hitched, then shallowed. A high, thin whine started in his ears. He couldn’t do this. He folded forward, arms coming up to shield his head, his forehead pressing into the cool, solid wood of the table. He was trying to disappear, to make the sensory world small and manageable again.

“Shane- ” Yuna began, her chair scraping back, her instinct to comfort her child in the way she always had.

But Ilya was already moving closer.

He was out of his seat and kneeling beside Shane’s chair in one fluid motion. He didn’t grab him. He didn’t try to pull him upright. He simply leaned in, his body a shield between Shane and the overwhelming world, and put his lips close to Shane’s ear. His voice was a private rumble, for Shane alone, in the quiet Russian he used for their most intimate moments.

“Solnyshko moyo, you are safe. I am here. Breathe with me. We are fine. Your parents will understand and everything will be ok.”

Yuna froze, half-risen from her chair. The protective anger in her posture drained away, replaced by a stunned, silent watchfulness. She saw the way Ilya’s large body curved around Shane’s folded form, not to restrain, but to enclose. She heard the low, unfamiliar cadence of his voice, not a command, but a steady, rhythmic anchor. She saw Shane’s knotted shoulders slowly begin to loosen, his frantic breathing deepening to match the pace of Ilya’s murmured words.

Most of all, she saw the kiss. Not dramatic or possessive, but a soft, deliberate press of lips to Shane’s temple, a seal on the whispered comfort. And Shane, her son who flinched from unexpected touch, who had spent a lifetime building walls, leaned into it. He turned his head, just slightly, his forehead coming to rest against Ilya’s cheekbone. A silent, complete trust.

Yuna sank slowly back into her seat. David reached over and covered her hand with his, giving it a gentle squeeze. The fight went out of the air, leaving behind a raw, fragile quiet.

It was Shane who broke it. He sat up, scrubbing a hand over his face, his cheeks flushed with embarrassment but his eyes clearer. “Sorry,” he mumbled, not looking at anyone.

“Don’t be,” David said, his voice kind. “It’s a lot.”

Ilya returned to his seat, but his attention remained tethered to Shane, a visible line of care. Yuna studied them both, the vivid proof of the bond on her son’s neck, and the new, quiet proof of devotion in the alpha’s watchful eyes.

“Well, we need to make a plan,” Yuna began again, her voice softer now, stripped of its interrogating edge. “They will be complicated. His contract is up for renewal this season, the league’s image policies, his brand deals with the...”

“I will take care of it,” Ilya said, interrupting her gently but firmly.

Yuna's eyes flashed. "You will take care of his contracts?"

"No," Ilya corrected, understanding the flare of protective instinct. "I will take care of the situation. The lawyers, the negotiations, the... the problems. I will handle what comes at us, so Shane can focus on hockey." He looked at Shane. "The decisions will be ours. Together. But the weight of making it happen? That is mine to carry. It is the least I can do."

It was not the arrogant claim of a man taking over. It was the vow of a man determined to build a buffer between his mate and the world he had once dragged him into. A penance, and a promise.

The rest of the dinner passed in a tentative, newfound calm. The conversation turned to safer topics, the cottage, the upcoming season, a neutral recounting of the Cup win. Ilya answered questions politely, his hand finding Shane's under the table, their fingers linking.

When Yuna and David left hours later, the night was full and dark, the lake a black mirror. On the driveway, Yuna hugged Shane tightly, her face buried in his neck for a long moment, right beside the bonding bite. She didn't mention it. She just held him.

When she pulled back, she looked at Ilya, who stood a respectful step behind Shane. "You will keep him safe," she said. It was no longer a question.

"With my life," Ilya replied. It was the simplest, truest thing he knew.

They watched the car's taillights disappear into the pines. The cottage, their sanctuary, awaited them, but it felt different now. It was no longer a hiding place. It was a home that had just been acknowledged by the outside world. The first, hardest audience had borne witness.

Shane let out a long, shaky breath, leaning back against Ilya's chest. Ilya's arms came around him, his chin resting on Shane's head.

“It is done,” Ilya murmured into his hair.

“For now,” Shane said, but the tension was gone from his voice. It was replaced by a weary relief. The secret was out. The bond was seen. The path ahead was terrifying and fraught, but they were on it. Together. And for the first time, with a fragile, hard-won blessing resting on the night air behind them.

The fire had burned down to a deep bed of glowing coals, painting their faces in warm, shifting light. They were curled together on the wide outdoor lounger, a blanket thrown over their legs, in a comfortable silence broken only by the crackle of embers and the distant lap of water.

The loon’s cry sliced through the night -it was a long, trembling wail that echoed across the lake, rising and falling like a ghostly siren. Ilya jerked upright so violently he nearly upended them both. “Blyad! What the fuck was that?”

Shane, who had been drifting into a doze against his shoulder, blinked slowly. “A loon?”

“A what?” Ilya’s head swiveled, his eyes trying to pierce the blackness of the lake.

“A loon. It’s a bird.”

“Sounds like a fucking wolf,” Ilya muttered, his body still tense, one arm automatically curling tighter around Shane as if to shield him from the unseen menace.

“It’s a bird, trust me.” A slow, sleepy smile spread across Shane’s face. He tilted his head up to look at Ilya’s alert, suspicious profile. “You’re so scared!”

“I am not scared,” Ilya hissed, his pride wounded. “I am assessing an unknown threat. What kind of a bird makes a noise like that? It is unnatural.”

“A loon!” Shane’s smile turned into a grin. Another cry sounded out in the distance. “See? Not a wolf. A bird.”

The loon called again, its cry even closer, a series of manic, yodeling notes.

Ilya flinched. “Is a fucking wolf-bird. Stupid Canadian wolf bird. Does it have teeth? It sounds like it has teeth.”

Shane couldn’t help it. He laughed, a soft, warm sound that vibrated against Ilya’s side. “It has a beak. For fish.” Shane raised his hands off of Ilya and cupped them around his mouth, a bird cry mimicking the loons came out.

“Oh, so now you speak bird, too?” Ilya grumbled, finally settling back down but keeping a wary eye on the lake. “Of course. Fluent in hockey, French, and now... stupid flying wolf.”

“Yes, I’m amazing,” Shane confirmed, nuzzling back into his spot. He could feel the steady, strong beat of Ilya’s heart, still slightly elevated from the surprise.

Ilya let out a long-suffering sigh, the tension finally leaving his shoulders. He dropped a dramatic kiss onto Shane’s hair. “I hate you.”

Shane’s hand found Ilya’s under the blanket, lacing their fingers together. He brought their joined hands up and pressed a kiss to Ilya’s knuckles, right over a faded scar. “No,” he said, his voice full of quiet certainty. “You don’t.”

Ilya had no retort for that. He just hummed, a low, contented sound, and rested his cheek on top of Shane’s head, his gaze softening as he stared out at the dark, wolf-bird-infested water. Ilya didn’t answer. He just turned his face into the curve of Shane’s neck, his nose brushing the bonding bite. A long, slow breath left him, the last of the tension dissolving. They sat like that as the fire crumbled into a bed of pulsating coals, painting them in a faint, rosy light.

Shane held him, savoring the solid weight, the steady breath against his skin. He realized, with a quiet thrill, that he loved every version of this man- the brilliant rival, the terrifying protector, the broken penitent, the devoted mate, and now, the one who jumped at bird calls and grumbled in Russian about anything that made him learn about something new. It was all Ilya. And it was all his.

The fire had grown low, casting long, dancing shadows. The easy laughter from their earlier teasing had settled into a comfortable quiet, but a new tension hummed beneath it, born of the serious turn their conversation had taken. The loon, their “wolf-bird,” was silent now, leaving only the crackle of the flames.

Ilya stared into the embers, his jaw working slightly. “Your friends,” he began, his voice measured. “Pike and JJ. They should know. That we are together.” He glanced at Shane, his blue eyes intent. “It would be easier. No more hiding in pieces.”

Shane felt a familiar knot of anxiety tighten in his stomach. The thought of widening the circle, of making this real to the people who had held him together after everything... it was terrifying. “I know,” he said quietly, tracing the seam of the blanket over their legs. “And they will. I just... I need a little more time. To get used to it myself first.”

“The two people I care about,” Ilya continued, as if Shane hadn’t spoken, “Marly and Svetlana. They both know everything. About you. About what I did. Is only fair.”

The words were logical, but they felt like a pressure. Fairness. Ilya was trying to find balance. Shane understood it, this was Ilya’s way of trying to build something transparent, to atone for the secrets and surveillance of the past. But understanding didn’t make the fear any less acute.

Ilya fell silent. He didn’t argue, but the quiet that descended wasn’t the peaceful one from before. It was heavy, charged with his restrained displeasure. He gave a single, short nod, his gaze fixed back on the fire, his posture rigid.

Shane watched him for a moment, seeing the way the light carved the unhappy line of his mouth. Although the obsessive, all-consuming alpha was gone, but in his place was a man trying desperately to do things right and chafing against any delay. Shane nudged him gently. “Hey. Add some logs?”

Ilya did, moving with efficient, economical motions. When the fire was rebuilt, its warmth blooming anew, Shane caught his wrist. “Come here.”

Ilya allowed himself to be guided, lying back down on the lounge and resting his head heavily in Shane’s lap. The moment he did, a sigh seemed to deflate him, as if the simple act of being directed, of being physically connected, released the tension he’d been holding. Shane’s fingers immediately carded through his sun-lightened hair, finding the familiar rhythm that soothed them both.

“Tell me about your brother,” Shane murmured, his touch a silent invitation.

Ilya’s eyes were closed. “He hates me. Always did. I was the better hockey player. The one our mother focused on. After the old man died... there was nothing left to say. I have not heard from him.” He stated it as a fact, without self-pity, but the bond carried a dull, old ache.

“And your mother?” Shane asked, even softer.

Ilya was silent for so long Shane thought he might not answer. Then, his voice, when it came, was different. Rougher, older. “I found her. She had been... gone for a while. The depression... it ate everything. The light, her songs, her.” He swallowed. “But before... before the darkness, she was the most beautiful woman. She was so beautiful, and funny. Always had little stories to make me laugh. She would sing. Old Russian songs. Her voice was like... like something warm you could hold onto. She would hold me and sing, taught me to dance, and for a little while, nothing in the house could touch us.”

A single, hot tear escaped from beneath Ilya’s closed eyelid, tracing a path down his temple and into Shane’s sweatpants. Shane didn’t wipe it away. He just kept stroking his hair, his heart cracking open at the image: a small, curly haired boy clinging to a fleeting island of melody and love in a sea of brutality.

“She would have thought you were too good for me,” Ilya whispered, echoing his words from the night before, but now they were wet with grief. “She would have been right.”

“She would have seen how you love me,” Shane corrected, his own throat tight. He bent, pressing his lips to Ilya’s forehead, lingering there. “She would have heard it in your voice when you talk to me. She’d know.”

Ilya turned his face into Shane’s stomach, “She would have loved you, like I love you. She would have seen that we were meant to be. But she would stopped me from making so many stupid mistakes.” A silent, shuddering breath escaping him. The bond between them hummed, not with passion, but with a profound, shared sorrow and a protective tenderness so fierce it felt like a new kind of vow.

They stayed like that as the new logs caught and blazed, the fire pushing back the cool night. Here, by the fire, with Shane’s hands in his hair and the bond a golden tether in his chest, Ilya wasn’t just surviving them. For the first time, he was allowing someone else to help him carry the weight. It was the most terrifying and necessary surrender of his life.

They stayed locked together as the fire burned down again, the warmth at their front a small defiance against the cool night and the colder places inside. The healing of their relationship and themselves, Shane understood, wouldn’t always look like passion or even peace. Sometimes, it would look exactly like this: holding on tightly in the quiet dark, simply because the alternative- letting go into that numb, wantless space, was no longer acceptable to either of them.

The morning dawned clear and cool, the kind of perfect Ontario day that felt like a reward. Shane moved with a careful deliberateness, each step a conscious negotiation with his still-protesting muscles. Ilya watched him dress, a process involving much quiet sighing and the rejection of anything with a restrictive waistband, then watched with a smile as his mate neatly folded anything he had discarded.

“A short hike>” Ilya proposed, leaning against the doorframe. “Slow, no hills.”

Shane nodded, relief in his eyes. Sex was still quietly, mutually off the table, a necessary pause for Shane’s body to recover. The trail was dappled with sunlight, fragrant with damp earth and pine. Ilya set a punishingly slow pace, his own long strides shortened to match Shane's ginger progress. He didn't offer a hand, knowing Shane's pride and his occasional need for uncomplicated physical autonomy, but he positioned himself always on the slightly rougher side of the path, like a silent buffer.

It was peaceful. Shane pointed out a type of moss, his voice slipping into the detailed, factual tone Ilya adored. Ilya listened, asking a simple question here and there, knowing that Shane loved his facts, loved feeling useful and in control of situations. This was the Shane he'd first been drawn to across the ice- not the omega, but the fascinating, focused mind inside.

When they returned, flushed and pleasantly tired, the cottage welcomed them with its familiar quiet. The question of what to do next hovered, but the answer was easy and they just wanted to relax.

Controllers were retrieved. The screen flickered to life with the garish colors of a racing game. Almost immediately, the chirping started.

"You take turns like babushka in her Lada," Ilya said, his car effortlessly sliding around a corner.

"At least I stay on the road," Shane shot back, his tongue caught in concentration. "Your driving is like you do everything else- Recklessly and like you're hoping you don't crash out."

A laugh, genuine and surprised, burst from Ilya. It was adorable. Shane's chirps had never been the witty, scalding barbs of the locker room. They were blunt, oddly specific, and delivered with such earnest conviction that they were infinitely more disarming. The proud little smirk Shane got afterward, like he'd just delivered the ultimate zinger, sent a warm, dangerous curl of affection through Ilya's chest.

The urge to pounce was a physical pull. To haul Shane into his lap, to bite playfully at that smirking mouth, to kiss him until the smugness melted into a sigh. It was the alpha impulse, the possessive reflex that had once ruled him.

But he didn't. He swallowed it down, let it settle. He took his medication with a sip of water when Shane was distracted by the game. The restraint wasn't a cage anymore; it was the foundation of this new space they were building. He could love the smirk without needing to devour it. He could love the focused frown between Shane's brows without needing to control the thoughts behind it.

"You are a menace," Ilya said, his voice fond, and executed a perfect, illegal pit maneuver that sent Shane's car spinning into the digital grass.

"Cheater!" Shane cried, shoving at his shoulder, but he was laughing.

They played until the light shifted to afternoon gold, trading wins and inept insults. The bond hummed between them, not with the frantic energy of need, but with the steady, warm frequency of companionship. It was a simple joy, uncomplicated by obsession or trauma. For a few hours, they were just two athletes, rivals turned something else, teasing each other in the quiet of a lakeside cottage.

As Shane groaned in defeat after a final race, flopping back against the cushions, Ilya looked at him, the messy hair, the faded bruises, the contented exhaustion on his face, and felt a peace so profound it momentarily stole his breath. This was the healing. Not in the dramatic confessions or the fiery passion, but in this: the choice to sit beside, to play, to laugh, and to simply let the other person be. It was a quieter victory than any they'd ever won on the ice, but it felt, finally, like a lasting one.

Chapter End Notes

💙 ...Well. 💛

We've officially crossed one of the biggest milestones I've had planned since outlining this story.

Thank you all for sticking with me through Ilya's obsession, Shane's walls, the ugly parts, the healing, and every tiny step that got them here. None of this chapter would have worked without everything that came before it.

Hopefully that came across the way it lived in my head. 😭

As always, I'd love to hear your favorite line, favorite scene, or the moment that made you yell at your screen. (I know at least one of you is going to be screaming about THAT conversation and another about THAT promise. 😂)

Thank you again to my wonderful beta reader, my honorary writing committee of two gays, and everyone who's been leaving comments every chapter. Seriously, your comments make my entire week and keep me motivated to keep writing.

See you in Chapter 33. Things are changing now... not because they love each other, but because they finally know how to. ❤️

The first thing Shane became aware of was not light, nor sound, but a profound, enveloping warmth that seemed to radiate from his very core. Then, the scent. It didn't just fill the air; it was the air. It wove into the fabric of his consciousness as he swam up from sleep, a rich, complex tapestry being deliberately drawn over him.

Ilya was awake. His large, warm body was curled around Shane's back, a solid fortress against the quiet cottage morning. His face was buried in the juncture of Shane's neck and shoulder, and nuzzled his face against the skin there, pressing his scent to mix with his mates. It was not the frantic, possessive marking of his rut, nor the desperate reassurance of the heat's peak. This was different. This was deliberate, meditative communion.

Shane lay still, drifting in the semi-lucent space between sleep and waking, and let himself be known. He felt the slow, hot exhale from Ilya's nose against his sensitive skin, a gentle puff that raised goosebumps. Then the inhale- deep, deliberate, a conscious drawing-in of Shane's essence. Ilya's nose traced a slow, unhurried path along the line of his tendon, up to the shell of his ear, then back down, nuzzling into the place where his scent was strongest and purest. Each breath Ilya took made Shane relax even further, removing all the intrusive thoughts he should've been having.

The scent he was absorbing, their scent, mixing together and becoming a layered thing. On the surface, the clean, sun-dried cotton of the sheets and Shane's own sleep-warm skin, like his usual honeysuckle and lake air. Beneath that, the deeper, more permanent signature of omega, a sweet, grounding note that was uniquely Shane's. And woven through it all, inseparable now, was Ilya himself- the dark, spicy signature of alpha, the faint, clean tang of his sweat, and something else, something fundamentally Ilya that reminded Shane of a storm on a distant horizon and the quiet safety of a locked room.

With every measured breath against his neck, Ilya was reading him. Checking his emotions through the bond. Tasting the lingering echoes of the previous day's tension with his parents, feeling the solid peace of the bond, confirming the absence of pain or fever. It was an act of silent stewardship, as intimate as a kiss and far more vulnerable. He was drinking Shane in, not to possess, but to know. To anchor himself in the reality of their shared peace.

A soft, involuntary sigh of pure contentment escaped Shane's lips. At the sound, Ilya's rhythmic nuzzling stilled. His arm, slung heavy and secure across Shane's waist, tightened almost imperceptibly.

"Solnyshko?" Ilya's voice was a sleep-roughened murmur, vibrating directly into Shane's spine. The word was breathed into his skin, part of the scenting itself.

"Mmm." Shane's hand came up, his fingers finding their home in the thick, dark silk of Ilya's hair. He pressed back slightly, arching his neck to offer more, a silent I am here. I am yours to know. "I'm here."

In response, Ilya rolled him with infinite care, as if handling something precious and newly forged. The world tilted gently, and Shane found himself on his back, caged by Ilya's arms, bathed in the soft, blue-grey light of dawn and the intensity of his alpha's gaze. Ilya braced himself on his forearms, his eyes searching Shane's face, not for permission, which had already been given in the offering of his scent, but for connection. His gaze traced the fading shadows under Shane's eyes, the relaxed line of his mouth, the utter lack of guard in his expression.

No words were needed. The silent conversation of scent and touch had asked and answered the only question that mattered. Shane lifted his head, bridging the small space between them to capture Ilya's lips in a kiss that tasted of sleep and safe, familiar warmth. It was a kiss of homecoming, not hunger.

Ilya made love to him then with a patience that felt sacred, a physical continuation of the morning's quiet ritual. Every touch was a question, every shift a request for confirmation. His hands, so capable of brutal force and exquisite control, were instruments of reverence. He mapped Shane's body with a tactile devotion that avoided the tenderest bruises and worshipped the rest, the dip of his waist, the firm plane of his stomach, the strong line of his thigh. When he finally entered him, it was with a slow, inexorable care that made Shane's breath catch in a soft, broken gasp. It was not an invasion, but a homecoming, a perfect, full alignment that resonated through the golden thread of their bond.

"Okay?" Ilya breathed the word against his lips, pausing, buried deep, his entire body trembling with the force of his own restraint. His eyes, dark and unwavering, held Shane's, reading every micro-expression.

Shane, overcome by the tenderness, could only nod, his vision blurring. He wrapped his legs around Ilya's hips, not to pull him closer for more, but to hold him there, in that perfect, suspended moment of connection. "Okay," he whispered back, the word a vow.

Ilya began to move, setting a rhythm that was less about friction and more about profound, wordless conversation. Each slow, rolling thrust was a reaffirmation, a gentle pulse along the bond that spoke of protection, belonging, and a love that had been stripped of all its old, jagged edges. His focus remained entirely on Shane's face, watching for any flicker of discomfort, his own pleasure seemingly a secondary, distant concern.

"Tell me," Ilya murmured, his voice strained with the effort of his gentleness. "This is good? You are sure?"

"This," Shane gasped, his hands coming up to frame the beloved, serious face above him. He brushed his thumb over the faint stubble on Ilya's cheek. "Just this. You. Just like this."

It was the antithesis of the heat's consuming frenzy. This was conscious, mutual choosing. This was Ilya, the man whose love had once been a wildfire, now a sustained, warming hearth. It was the most profound proof of his transformation Shane could ever have imagined.

Their climax, when it came, was not a shattering, but a melting. It built slowly, a warm, golden tide that swelled through Shane, pulling a soft, shuddering sigh from his chest, a release that felt like the final surrender of a fear he'd forgotten he carried. Ilya followed him over the edge moments later, his own release a quiet, surrendering groan muffled against Shane's shoulder, his big body trembling not with unleashed power, but with the exquisite effort of his sustained tenderness.

He collapsed with careful grace, rolling them to their sides, staying joined. For a long time, they simply breathed, foreheads pressed together, the bond between them a quiet, humming glow of satiated peace, deeper and calmer than it had ever been.

Finally, Ilya pressed a kiss to the damp skin beneath Shane's eye, tasting the salt of his quiet tears. "Good?" he asked, the single word encompassing a universe of concern, hope, and fragile joy.

Shane laughed, a wet, hiccupping sound of pure, unadulterated happiness. He kissed Ilya, slow and sweet and deep. "Better than good." He traced the strong, beloved line of Ilya's brow, his touch sure. "You're... you're everything."

A faint, real smile, one that reached his eyes and softened his entire face, touched Ilya's lips. He nuzzled back into the sanctuary of Shane's neck, his arm a heavy, comforting weight across his waist. "Sleep a little more," he murmured, his voice already thick with returning drowsiness, his scent now perfectly, peacefully mingled with Shane's own. "I am not going anywhere."

And Shane knew, with a certainty that lived in his bones and sang along the bond, that it was true. He drifted off not to silence, but to the sound of Ilya's steady heartbeat against his own, and the deep, calming fragrance of their shared peace, woven into the very air they breathed.

The morning after his parents' visit, the cottage held a new kind of quiet. It was no longer the insulated silence of a secret hideaway, but the deeper, more resonant quiet of a space that had been witnessed and, however tentatively, accepted. Sunlight streamed through the windows, illuminating dust motes dancing in the warm air, still faintly perfumed with the echoes of cedar, coffee, and them.

They found themselves on the dock, two mugs of coffee steaming between them. The lake was a sheet of polished glass, reflecting the flawless blue of the sky and the deep green of the encircling pines. No loons called. The world was hushed.

Ilya sat with his legs stretched out, his bare feet against the sun-warmed wood. Shane was curled beside him, not quite in his lap but leaning into the solid line of his body, his shoulder a constant point of contact against Ilya's bicep. They didn't speak. They didn't need to. The bond was a live, humming wire between their sternums, conducting a low-voltage current of shared calm. It allowed for a wordless synchronicity that still felt miraculous. Ilya would shift, and Shane would adjust his weight without thought. Shane's finger would trace a knot in the wood, and Ilya's hand would cover it, their fingers lacing together automatically, a completed circuit.

It was in this profound, peaceful syncopation that Shane found the courage. The fear was still there, a cold, familiar knot under his ribs, but it was no longer alone. It was surrounded by the warmth of Ilya beside him, by the solidity of the bond, by the memory of his mother's final, searching hug that had felt more like a blessing than a blockade.

"I want to tell them," Shane said. His voice was quiet, but it didn't tremble. It was a statement of fact, dropped into the center of the silent lake.

Ilya didn't stiffen. He'd felt the shift in Shane's emotions through the bond, the resolve crystallizing out of the anxiety. He brought their joined hands to his lips, pressing a kiss to Shane's knuckles. "You do not have to. Not yet. There is no timeline on this but ours."

"I know," Shane said. He took a slow breath, organizing his thoughts like he was preparing for a game film session. "I'm not... ashamed. I could never be ashamed of you. Of this. I've always hidden this part of myself. They know I'm an omega now. They should know that I have someone in my life. Plus it might have JJ stop trying to find alphas for me." He said with a smile and squeezed Ilya's hand. "I'm nervous because they've only ever known you one way. As my rival. As the guy who..." He trailed off, the words hired investigators, placed trackers, broke my trust hanging unspoken but deeply felt between them. Only Scott and Rose knew most of what happened. "They protected me when I needed it. If they reject you now, I'll be... split. Between the people who held me together and the person who is my peace. I hate the idea of choosing."

Ilya listened, his gaze on the distant horizon. This was the consequence of his actions, a ghost he would always have to face. He had isolated Shane, and now Shane was risking his other connections to include him. The weight of it was a solemn pressure on his heart. “Whatever you want. Now or until you are sure. Their loyalty is to you. Is a good thing. I will earn my place with them, or I will not. But I will not be the reason you feel torn.”

Shane turned then, shifting so he could look Ilya directly in the eyes. The morning sun lit the flecks of gold in his brown irises and highlighted the faint, fading bruise on his jaw. His expression was utterly earnest, the structured, analytical mind fully committed to its conclusion. “Ilya,” he said, his voice firm. “I want to.”

Three words. Simple. Revolutionary.

For Shane Hollander, who had spent a lifetime compartmentalizing his omega self from his hockey self, his private pain from his public persona, his heart from his head, this was the final wall coming down. This was the conscious, deliberate choice to merge every fractured piece of his world into one, complex, integrated whole. It was terrifying. And it was freedom.

Ilya saw it all in his face. The fear, yes, but beneath it, a determination so fierce it stole his breath. He didn’t smile. The moment felt too sacred for that. He simply nodded, a slow, deep acknowledgment. “Okay,” he said. “Then we tell them.”

Shane pulled out his phone. His thumb hovered over the screen for a second, his over-analytical mind running a final run through of how he could deliver his decision. Then he began to type in the group chat, his movements sure.

SHANE– Hey everyone. I’m up at the cottage. Would you be able to come by this weekend? Around 2? I have something important I need to talk to you all about.

HAYD- We’ll be there. Mind if we bring Emma?

JJ- Yeah, of course. Make sure we have real food-not that rabbit food you like.

Scott- Noah will be excited to see Uncle Rookie. Guess we’re taking a road trip.

Rose- Some time in that fancy house and time with you? Perfect.

Back on the dock, Shane set his phone face down on the wood. The deed was done. A tremor ran through him, a final release of the old, guarded energy.

Ilya felt it. He set his own coffee aside and opened his arm. Shane went into the embrace without hesitation, turning and tucking himself against Ilya's chest, his ear over the steady, strong heartbeat. Ilya wrapped both arms around him, holding him tightly, his chin resting on top of Shane's head. He didn't offer empty platitudes. He didn't promise it would be easy. He simply held the space around Shane's courage, making it safe, making it real.

They sat like that as the sun climbed higher, the lake slowly coming to life with tiny ripples. The peace was no longer just the absence of conflict. It was the calm in the eye of a deliberate, chosen storm. The compartments of Shane's life were now open, and very soon, everyone he loved would walk through the door. The thought was terrifying. But here, anchored to the man he loved, feeling the golden certainty of the bond between them, it also felt, for the very first time, like coming home.

The group chat exploded within seconds of Shane's message.

JJ- Are you retiring? Taking a vow of celibacy? Dude, we just won the Cup.

HAYD- Is it an injury? Tell me it's not another concussion.

Rose- OMG are you eloping?? Did you meet someone at the cottage?? I'll be the best maid!

Scott- We'll be there. Whatever it is.

JJ- Maybe he's joining a monastery. Finally some peace and quiet.

HAYD- Not funny, JJ.

KIP- Hayden, breathe. He said talk, not crisis.

JJ- Are you pregnant?

HAYD- JJ, FOR THE LOVE OF GOD.

Rose- I'm bringing lemon squares.

JJ- What? It's a valid question! I've never seen an omega not pregnant during the summer.

Scott- We're bringing the baby. Will scare off Rook for a few years so we can lure him to New York..

Shane showed Ilya the scrolling messages, a faint smile on his lips. "They're worried. And JJ's being JJ."

Ilya read the 'pregnant' text, his expression unreadable. The smile faded from Shane's face as he felt the shift through the bond. The calm, steady presence from the dock was gone, replaced by a low, vibrating hum of anxiety. It wasn't the sharp, aggressive tension that he felt before they went to see his parents though. This was different. Softer. More brittle.

As evening fell, Ilya began to... pace. Not his usual predatory stalk, but a restless, circuitous wandering from the living room to the kitchen and back. He opened the refrigerator and stared blankly inside for a full minute.

"What went on between you and Rose Landry?" he asked abruptly, not turning around.

"What?"

"You and Rose Landry- I saw pictures." He closed the fridge and faced Shane, his brow furrowed with genuine consternation.

"Nothing. I mean we're just very good friends. She's one of my best friends."

"That wasn't what it looked like. You were with her while she was naked." Ilya ran a hand through his hair. "What the fuck was that?"

"Ilya, those were taken out of context. It was raining and all our clothes were soaked. She took off her clothes just to change," Shane said, though the thought sent a chill through him. "But they love me. She loves me. Please be civil."

“Civil,” Ilya repeated, the word tasting sour. “I do not want civil. I want... I do not know what I want.” He slumped onto the sofa, looking so uncharacteristically lost that Shane’s heart squeezed. This was the man who had confessed to murder without his voice breaking, who had faced down the league and his own demons. Yet the prospect of a few of his friends and their partners in their space had him unraveling.

“I do not like her near you. She’s an Alpha. A relationship with her would be easier for you.”

Shane crossed the room and sat beside him, taking his hand. He linked their fingers, sending a pulse of calm through the bond. “How do you know? She’s like me, her agent publicly has that shut down. Everyone thinks she’s an omega.” Shane said softly.

Ilya brought their joined hands to his forehead, closing his eyes. “Do you think I let anyone around you without being carefully looked into? Her people are almost as good as yours.” he whispered.

“No more investigating my friends,” Shane said, leaning into him. “But you’re learning. And it’s... it’s really endearing to see you flustered.”

Ilya peeked one eye open. “Do not ever tell Svetlana. She would never let me live it down.”

A few days later, they were getting ready for their guests. Ilya was tense the whole day before, repeatedly scenting Shane, leaving hickeys in very visible places and not the least bit sorry when Shane scolded him. Shane grumbled as the cleaners had to come earlier to air out the cottage- the whole place was drenched in their scent and the smell of sex. He knew that Ilya was feeling a little territorial over having people near him, but that wouldn’t be plausible in the long run.

Ilya watched from the doorway with a frown. Shane would wear a scent patch while people were around. Ilya would too, but he didn’t like the thought that Shane would hide his delectable scent from him. They still needed to talk soon. They'd been in the cottage for almost a month. Their little bubble had been perfect- better than Ilya could have ever imagined but they would need to figure out a strategy going forward.

That afternoon, cars began crunching up the gravel driveway just after two. The cottage, usually a haven of peace and quiet, was soon filled with the warm chaos of arriving friends. Hayden and Jackie arrived first with a baby strapped to Hayden's back, Hayden's gaze sweeping the property like a security detail. JJ pulled in right behind, already laughing about something. Scott's SUV, with its baby seat visible in the back, arrived next, followed by Rose's little convertible.

Shane passes his eyes over the open entertaining area, making sure their clothes that Ilya had ripped off their bodies just a couple hours ago were put away, Ilya gave him one last kiss before going up to the loft to wait until Shane called him down.

Ilya observed everything from the small loft overlooking the entrance. The fact that 3 other alphas were around his mate, even though two were bonded to other people made his skin crawl. He wanted to drag Shane away, to lock them in a place that no one could ever see him again and they could just be alone. But that wasn't possible. Shane wouldn't thrive off that- even though he didn't like to be around too many people, these were his friends and he needed them.

The initial greetings were a flurry of hugs and backslaps for Shane, questions about the drive, admiration for the lake. But as they settled around the living room, the sharp-eyed observations began.

Hayden noticed first. His eyes caught on the two mismatched coffee mugs sitting side-by-side on the deck railing, still faintly steaming. One was Shane's familiar, chipped "World's Okayest Centre" mug they he'd gotten as a joke from Carter Vaughn. The other was plain black, large, the kind for guests. JJ, ever tactile, kicked off his shoes and padded to the kitchen to grab a drink. He paused in the fridge, "Since when do you buy normal soda and food?" he called out, holding up a can of Coke.

Rose, helping Shane bring out a tray of lemon squares to the coffee table, peeked into the bedroom as she passed the open door. A large, black duffel bag was visible on the floor, and draped over a chair was a soft-looking, sleeveless t-shirt that was decidedly not Shane's style or size. She paused. She knew Shane's clothes. Over time, she had practically picked everything he had in his closet except for a few things his mom brought him or from endorsement freebies.

Scott and Kip exchanged a quiet look. Kip, holding their sleeping son, nodded subtly toward the far corner of the deck where two hockey sticks were propped. One was Shane's, with its familiar tape job. The other was a different model, the blade taped in a distinct, slightly more haphazard pattern.

The clues were mounting, painting a picture the group chat's wildest theories hadn't quite captured. The atmosphere shifted from relaxed curiosity to a charged, waiting silence. All eyes eventually landed on Shane, who stood by the sofa, uncharacteristically still, watching them piece it together.

Hayden's protective instincts, always close to the surface, locked into place. He stood up, his voice carefully neutral. "Shane. You said you had something to tell us."

Shane took a deep breath. He could feel Ilya's anxiety spiking from where he waited, out of sight just inside the sliding door. He sent a wave of reassurance back: steady, I'm here, and met Hayden's gaze.

"I do," Shane said, his voice clear. "And I'd like you to hear it from both of us." He turned toward the staircase. "Ilya?"

The heavy footsteps had the Alphas in the room tense. Ilya Rozanov stepped into the room.

For a moment, there was absolute, stunned silence. JJ's drink hung frozen halfway to his mouth. Rose's eyes went comically wide. Hayden's entire body went rigid, his hand unconsciously finding Jackie's shoulder.

Ilya looked, for the first time anyone had ever seen, uncertain. He stood beside Shane, his posture straight but not aggressive, his hands loose at his sides. He gave a single, slight nod to the group. "Hello."

It was Scott who broke the silence, his calm, captain's voice cutting through the shock. "Well," he said, shifting his sleeping son in his arms. "This is the 'something important.'" He looked from Shane's resolved face to Ilya's guarded one, and a small, understanding sigh escaped him. "Okay. We're listening."

The silence that followed Ilya's appearance was absolute, a vacuum that sucked all the sound from the deck. It was the kind of silence that exists between the flash of lightning and the crash of thunder, heavy with impending shock.

Everyone froze.

Hayden's hand, which had been resting on Jackie's shoulder, tightened into a fist. JJ's trademark smirk vanished, replaced by blank astonishment. Kip's eyes widened, his arms instinctively tightening around his sleeping baby. Rose's lemon square hovered halfway to her open mouth. The last person any of them expected to see standing in the doorway of Shane's sanctuary was Ilya Rozanov.

Rose was the first to recover. She set her dessert down. Her eyes, usually bright with laughter, were sharp and assessing as they darted from Ilya's carefully neutral expression to Shane's tense but resolute one. The word she breathed out was barely audible, but it shattered the silence like glass.

"...You've got to be joking."

It broke the spell of stillness, but not the tension. All eyes swiveled to Shane. He looked pale but steady, his shoulders squared against the wave of their collective disbelief. He opened his mouth, closed it, then tried again. This wasn't a line breakdown with his team or a press conference. There was no script. He reached out and Ilya threaded their fingers together.

"I, uh... I know." He swallowed, his gaze dropping to the deck boards for a second before forcing itself back up, making contact with each of them in turn. "I know what you're thinking. I know... what he did, about what the press says about us. The... everything. I know why you'd hate him. I hated him too, sometimes."

His words were stumbling, halting, stripped of all his usual analytical polish. This was raw nerve. “After... after everything, I told him to stay away. And he did. For months. He got help. Real help.” Shane’s voice gained a little strength, fueled by conviction. “And I... I missed him. Not just the... the bad stuff. I missed him. The person he is when he’s not... lost. The friend I had before it all went wrong.”

He took a shaky breath, his hand clenching at his side. The confession was costing him, laying his most vulnerable judgment bare before the people whose opinions mattered most. “I understand if you’re worried. Or angry. At him. At me. But this... it’s my choice. It’s real.” He finally looked directly at Ilya, who hadn’t moved from his spot, his own face a mask of strained control. Shane’s voice softened, final and sure. “I love him.”

The words hung in the air, simple and devastating.

Then, movement. A blur of furious pink.

“You bastard!”

Rose launched herself off her chair with a speed that belied her petite frame. She didn’t go for Shane; she went for Ilya, her hands curled into fists. “You scared him! You broke him! You don’t get to just show up here!” Her first swing was wild, her fist connecting with a solid thump against Ilya’s jaw. He didn’t raise his hands to defend himself. He just stood there and took it, his eyes on Shane, accepting the blow as his due.

“Rose, stop!” Shane moved, but Scott moved too, wrapping his arms around Rose’s waist from behind and hauling her back as she kicked out, her sneaker connecting with Ilya’s shin.

“Let me go! He doesn’t get to be here! He doesn’t get to love him after what he did!”

“Rose, enough!” Scott’s voice, the captain’s voice, cut through her fury. She went still in his grip, chest heaving, tears of rage in her eyes.

In the strained quiet that followed, all attention turned to Ilya. He straightened his shirt where she'd struck him, his movements slow. He looked at the circle of hostile, wary faces, and when he spoke, his voice was low, stripped of all its usual characteristic charm or arrogance.

"She is right," he said, his accent more pronounced. "I know I gave you every reason not to trust me. Every reason to want me gone." His gaze found Hayden, who was watching him with the cold, analytical focus of a defenseman studying a threat. "I hurt him. In ways I am still learning to understand. There are no excuses. I can only promise that I will spend the rest of my life making sure I never do that again. My life is his. However he wants it."

It wasn't a grand romantic vow. It was a bleak, factual statement of atonement. The sincerity in it was so stark it was uncomfortable.

Hayden broke his silence, his voice carefully controlled. "How do we know this isn't just another game to you? Another way to get what you want or to trick him?"

"You don't," Ilya admitted, meeting his gaze head-on. "You will have to trust Shane's word on that."

JJ, who had been uncharacteristically quiet, finally spoke, his tone skeptical. "So what, you're just... different now? Therapy fixed the crazy?"

A faint, pained shadow crossed Ilya's face. "No. It is not fixed. It is... managed. Every day. The wanting to control, to possess... it is a noise. I am learning to hear it, and not act on it. For him."

Scott, still holding a now-subdued but glowering Rose, shook his head slowly, a bewildered laugh escaping him. "I just... all these years. The fights, the penalties, the media crap... you two were secretly in love with each other?"

"It was not so secret at the end," Kip said softly from his seat beside Scott. All eyes turned to him. He was gently rocking their baby carrier with his foot, his expression serene. "I suspected. For a long time. The way you watched each other... even when you were fighting. It was... everything. Too much of everything."

A stunned silence met his words. Kip, the quiet omega, the one who saw the world in shades of connection and scent, had perceived the truth they'd all missed.

As if on cue, a thin, fussy wail erupted from the carrier. Baby Noah was awake and unimpressed with the tense adult drama. It seemed like Scott had a good grip on Rose, so Shane relaxed.

He looked over at Kip to get his okay and moved closer to the carrier. It was instinctual, he crossed to the carrier, his movements becoming fluid and sure. He unbuckled the straps with practiced ease, gathered the squirming, red-faced infant into his arms, and settled him against his shoulder. He began a slow, rhythmic bounce, his hand a gentle pressure on her back. "Shhh, it's okay," he murmured, his voice dropping into a soft, melodic register none of them had ever heard. "Too loud, huh? All these big, noisy alphas."

The transformation was instantaneous. Noah's cries hiccupped, then quieted into snuffles. She turned her head, nuzzling into Shane's neck, soothed by the calm, omega steadiness of him.

Ilya watched. He didn't just look; he beheld. Of course he thought Shane was hot, the most beautiful man he'd ever see. But now, he was transcendent. Every trace of tension, every defensive line in his body, melted away. His expressive dark eyes, so often sharp with calculation or dark with intensity, went soft with a kind of reverent awe. He watched Shane, the fierce hockey star, the man he loved, effortlessly hold a baby, and something in his own face settled into a peace so profound it was heartbreaking.

Rose, still held by Scott, saw it. She felt the anger drain from her own body as she watched Ilya's expression. This wasn't the hungry, consuming gaze of obsession she'd heard about when Shane had an extra glass of wine while they had one of their gossip movie nights. Could it be real? After everything that she'd heard? This was a man seeing the future he wanted, not as a conquest, but as a gift he feared he might never be worthy to receive. The fight went out of her completely.

The invitation, once the initial shock had settled into a wary truce, was met with a mix of reluctance and loyalty. Shane's quiet, "You could all stay for the weekend. If you want," was less a suggestion and more a plea, a chance for them to see the reality he was living in, not just the bombshell he'd dropped.

Rose, ever fiercely devoted, had a filming commitment she couldn't break, but she agreed to stay until Sunday morning, her narrowed eyes promising Ilya a continued, vigilant audit. The others, after a silent round of glances and subtle shrugs, nodded. For Shane.

Dinner was a collaborative, if awkward affair. Hayden and JJ took over the grill, a familiar task that required little conversation. Scott and Kip prepared a salad, their quiet domesticity a calming counterpoint. Jackie, with her easy smile and hands resting on the gentle curve of her stomach, orchestrated setting the table with Shane, deliberately placing Ilya not at the head, but in the middle of one side, surrounded. To everyone's surprise, Kip and Jackie had put Ilya on baby duty, and after a few seconds of confusion on how to hold both of them at the same time, he looked highly pleased with himself. When Shane looked over and saw Ilya with the babies, his heart skipped a few beats and he pulled out his phone quickly and took a few pictures.

When they sat, the weight of the unspoken was a physical presence. The lake breeze and the scent of grilling beef did little to dispel it. Ilya sat stiffly, his usual predatory grace replaced by a conscious stillness, as if moving too suddenly might shatter the fragile peace. Shane, beside him, picked at his napkin, his usual conflict-avoidance screaming internally at the tension radiating from his friends.

Rose's glare from across the table was a physical force, a silent promise of violence if a single line was crossed. Hayden and JJ ate in near-silence, their communication reduced to brief, loaded glances. The only sounds were the clink of cutlery and Scott's gentle questions to Kip about the baby's schedule.

It was Jackie who broke the stalemate. Under the table, she found Shane's hand and gave it a firm, reassuring squeeze. Then she turned her warm, intelligent gaze to Ilya.

"The cottage is beautiful, guys. Who was the builder? I might have to get a house built when we finish having babies." Her tone was deliberately light, conversational, but the question was a test. An invitation to participate in the normal, to see if he could.

Every eye at the table flicked to him. Ilya set his fork down carefully. “All I had a say was in the rink and gym. A courting gift for Shane.” he said, his voice low but clear. He didn’t elaborate, didn’t try to charm. He stated the fact, then added, “Shane did everything. He planned it all out beautifully.” Shane looked down to hide his smile when he saw Jackie and Kip practically swoon at his words.

“It is,” Kip agreed softly, bouncing a drowsy Noah on his knee. He offered Ilya a small, neutral smile. “We’ve always loved it being by the water. We told my family about the pregnancy. At this beach front rental.”

The mention of the healthy, public omega pregnancy was a deliberate anchor to a positive reality. Scott picked up the thread, his captain’s ease smoothing over the roughness. “Yeah, that whole weekend was wonderful. Glad we waited a while to have the peanut though.” He looked at Ilya accusingly.

Ilya met his gaze, eyes narrowing. “Glad to know it was only you and your mate involved in that decision.”

“What’s Boston’s off-season looking like?” Jackie pressed, steering toward safe, professional ground. “Hayden says the Eastern Conference is going to be a warzone next year.”

It was a lifeline. Ilya took it, discussing matchups and line changes with a clipped, analytical precision that was purely hockey, devoid of the personal venom that used to lace his every word about Montreal. He even conceded a point about Montreal’s improved defense. Hayden, listening while methodically cutting into his steak, didn’t agree, but he didn’t scoff either.

The conversation, stilted and careful, began to flow in a narrow channel. Scott and Jackie carried most of it, with Kip adding soft comments. Ilya responded when directly addressed, his answers concise and truthful. He didn’t try to dominate. He didn’t try to win.

Through it all, Rose watched, her fury simmering. When Ilya passed the salt to Shane without being asked, his fingers brushing Shane’s lightly, purposefully, a silent I am here, Rose’s knife clattered loudly on her plate.

“Sorry,” she muttered, not sounding sorry at all.

Later, as dusk fell and the group dispersed to clean up or get settled, Ilya went alone to the stacked firewood, and started the stack for the fire pit. Shane knew what he wanted. Ilya had declared smores the perfect food. His movements were precise, a physical outlet for the emotional strain.

He went inside to gather the supplies for dessert, wondering if it would be weird if he brought some fruit out for himself, but that would raise eyebrows. He was loading up the tray when Rose walked in.

The kitchen was a pocket of quiet, insulated from the low murmur of voices in the living room. Shane opened the cupboard, pulling out graham crackers, chocolate bars, and a bag of marshmallows. Rose leaned against the counter, her arms crossed, the casual pose belied by the intensity of her gaze.

“Okay, Hollander. Kitchen’s clear. Spill it.” Her voice was low, no-nonsense. “Level with me. Is this... is he making you do this? That bond- I’ve read stuff. Can he... is he making you feel things?”
