The Beginning of a Perfectly Boring Life

by iminthisstanshit

Summary

If the Hollander-Rozanov family kept a diary of their boring lives, these would be the things they would write about.

or

The one where Shane and Ilya become parents, and their life is boring in the most perfect way

Notes

Hiii, hello, welcome everyone

I am very shy about posting this work, but I really wanted to try this thing. Hudcon storm left one injured, doctors recommended rest and fanfiction.

I intend to do this as multiple works, and every one of them will be covering different times.

Do not ask me about the timeline.

When they first met her, Ilya had cried nonstop for exactly 31 minutes. Shane knew the duration because it matched the time he had spent waiting to hold her in his own arms. Later, after everyone had gone to sleep that evening, Shane had stood in the bathroom for 36 minutes, staring at himself in the mirror and watching his tears flow down his cheeks. Some might have found this pitiful, of course that was possible, but for the Hollander-Rozanov family (and Ilya would have corrected Shane by shouting Rozanov-Hollander if he had heard him), it was the beginning of their new life.

Ilya's dream of a beautiful, boring life.

Alana Liliya Hollander-Rozanov was born that day, February 26, at 12:30 a.m. She weighed 3 kilograms and 810 grams. She was only 52 centimeters long. Just 52 centimeters. That was what softened Shane and Ilya's massive bodies to the consistency of soft dough. Half a meter tall, blue-eyed as they later will learn, bald for now but clearly destined for blonde locks, pink-cheeked Alana.

Shane didn't remember the tedious part of the process very well. Either he chose to forget, or he genuinely forgot because they usually didn't talk about that part of the story. The paperwork, the complicated procedures, the fuss and excitement had all blended together and faded away. Of course, paperwork could have excited Shane too. But watching Alana's tiny body disappear first into the purple blanket, then into Ilya's chest, Ilya's tears and the huge smile that never left his lips... Shane remembered those things. Years later, when Alana grew up, if Ilya was convinced she had found someone perfect enough to marry and Alana decided to start a family, if they had grandchildren, Shane would remember and recount these things. But right now, there was no need for Shane to think that far ahead. A peace flowing through his veins like a fire-y fluid burning the veins of his heart... The baby scent of Alana filling his lungs...

The next day, they were allowed to go home. Shane dressed Alana in the newborn clothes they had prepared for her, while Ilya prepared the baby car seat they would use to carry her to the car. Shane's parents had sent a message about half an hour earlier saying they had prepared the house and left. Now Shane and Ilya were returning to the house which they had left as two people, sorry Anya, they would be entering as three. When Shane placed Alana in the car, he couldn't sit in the front seat. Ilya just stood at the door, watching Alana. God, they had become fathers.

Then, when they got home, they laid Alana in bed and lay down on either side of her. What would they do? What should they do? What did it mean to be a parent? Holding the little girl's tiny hand, feeling her skin that was somewhere between warm and cold, that little being, who didn't even understand that it was a hand yet, wrapping itself tightly around just a finger, the unfocused movements of her eyes—what did all this mean? Shane looked at Alana, then at Ilya, as if waiting for one of them to say something. The little girl's chest was rising and falling so fast that Shane realized he was getting excited and breathing faster himself. Ilya's free hand, the hand not holding Alana's fingers, was moving up and down with her breaths on the girl's belly. His eyes never left her nose, her pink cheeks, her open mouth. The sunlight streaming into their room made Ilya's curls shine with a golden glow. It hit at such an angle that Shane couldn't resist taking out his phone to snap a photo. Alana and Ilya, their first photo.

"I love her so much," Ilya whispered. "Will my heart burst, Shane?"

"I wish I knew the answer," Shane replied in the same quiet voice.

"Hollander..." Ilya's voice trembled, unable to rise above a whisper. "Hollander, my life no longer is for you only. Is her too. Maybe even more than half of it. Nothing I won't do if she wants me to. I'll live for her happiness. She will know I'll always have her back, and I'll always be there holding her hand. She will know, yes Shane?"

Shane knew today was harder for Ilya. He noticed he was talking more than usual with Yuna and David. Shane couldn't quite understand what was going through his mind, but he knew he was thinking about his own mother, father, and even his brother. His Ilya, his family. Ilya was thinking about her own family because the family they had built together was new to him. Shane knew. Ilya should know too, that Shane's mother was now his mother, Shane's father was now his father. And now their daughter, their daughter, their new family.

"I know you'll do everything to make sure she knows, sweetheart. We'll love her very much."

Ilya finally lifted his eyes to look at Shane, and the smile on his lips widened.

"Our Alyona," Ilya whispered in Russian.

"Our Alana," Shane replied in English.

They waited a few days, waiting for things to settle down, to figure out who would feed Alana when, when they would sleep and when they would change diapers and how to bathe Alana and how to cope with this exhaustion, and then finally Yuna brought Anya. Both men and the little dog were very cautious. Anya sniffed Alana's tiny socked feet first, her nose in the air. Shane and Ilya sat on the couch, Alana stretched out between them. Ilya stroked Anya's head with one hand.

"Your sister." Shane watched Anya's even more cautious gaze at the baby, at the pair, as Ilya spoke.

"Anya, this is Alana. Your sister. Our daughter, will be with us forever now." Anya looked closely at the baby, watched intently, sniffed a little more. Then she began to excitedly paw at the ground with her tail. She ran around excitedly, first around Shane's feet, then around Ilya's, never taking her eyes off the baby. Shane chuckled as he watched Ilya excitedly stroke Anya's head.

"Good girl, good girl."

There.

Shane remembered these things. He was recounting them. If the Hollander-Rozanov family kept a diary of their boring lives, these would be the first things he would write about.
